Lord Derby two years or one year ago. That, then, is my answer to the proof of the right hon. Gentleman that Her Majesty's Government had a policy of endowing all the Churches of Ireland, and, of course the Roman Catholic Church, the most important of the unendowed bodies—namely, that we entertained a measure which ever since I have been in Parliament has been more or less entertained or proposed in answer to frequent and annual deputations, urging the consideration of the case of the Regium Donum. The only difference with regard to the present Ministry is that we were obliged to tell those who waited upon us, that whatever our feeling upon the subject might be—a feeling, I think, shared by the majority of the House—that it was a very poor pittance, it was impossible, in our view, considering the present state of public opinion, to make any proposition to increase it. That is really the only proof which the right hon. Gentleman has brought forward. ["Oh!"] Well then, the right hon. Gentleman has gone back to the speech of my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (the Earl of Mayo) and has asked "What did you mean by the equality of Churches?" Now, my noble Friend on a former occasion gave his explanation and interpretation of what he did say in the speech referred to. He told the House that we did not mean the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church; but that there were a great many modes—some of which he had supported, and others which he was prepared to support—which would effect a very considerable alteration in the status of the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church. He particularly referred to a variety of measures—some of which he had originated, and all of which he had supported—such as the introduction of chaplains into prisons and other arrangements of that kind, which may be treated lightly now, but which were passed with great difficulty, and but for our upholding them would never have been passed, which in his opinion did virtually give that equality. That is the explanation which my noble Friend gave, and that is the interpretation which has been accepted by the country. ["No!"] It may not have been accepted in electioneering squibs; but it has been accepted by the calm and candid opinion of the country. ["Oh!"] I repeat that, in the face of my distinct statement on the part of the Government that we on no consideration whatever would agree to the endowment of the

Mr. Disraeli

Roman Catholic priesthood, these are frivolous charges, the worth of which is properly appreciated by the country.

MR. CARDWELL: However unimportant electioneering letters and electioneering squibs may be, one thing, at least, is most important, and that is that there should be no mistake and no misunderstanding about the declarations made in this House by Ministers of the Crown. There will be an end of Parliamentary government when there is an end of distinct understandings with regard to statements officially made by Ministers. Now, I shall be in the recollection of every Gentleman who was present, when I say that on the night when the right hon. Gentleman came down to the House to state that he had received Her Majesty's commands to form a Government, he told us it would be found that he had a truly Liberal policy for Ireland, and he referred us to the following Tuesday, when, he said, we should hear from the noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland (the Earl of Mayo) what that Liberal policy was. Well, we heard that Liberal policy explained in a speech of great length and great ability—a speech worthy of the noble Earl and of the office he holds; and what did it tell us? It told us that there were questions that were of great interest in Ireland—the Church question, the land question, and the education question. It spoke of a Commission of Inquiry upon each of them, and there was only one practical proposal which was announced as the substance of that Liberal policy—namely, the granting of a charter to a Catholic University. We were distinctly told, and I am sure the noble Earl will not contradict it, that the expenses of that University were to be provided by the Votes of Parliament, and that the Colleges which were to be in connection with that University were to be postponed for the present. The noble Earl said—

"Seeing that this University question has long been a matter of dispute in Ireland, we do offer a plan by which we believe it may be finally set at rest—a plan which will not in any way interfere with the vitality or strength of existing institutions, but will supply everything which has ever been demanded by those whose religious scruples prevented them from taking advantage of the present system. With regard to endowments it will be essential, of course, if Parliament agrees to the proposal, in the first instance, to provide for the necessary expenses of the University—that is to say, for the expenses of the officers and of the professors, and also to make some provision for a building; and I have no doubt if Parliament approves the schemes it will not be indisposed to endow certain University scholarships. With regard to the endowment of Colleges, it is impossible we could make any proposal of that nature at present, until we know what kind the Colleges will be, and to that extent the question will be left open to future consideration."

Now, I think we had better have no Ministerial declarations at all; for Ministerial declarations will not be enlightening, but misleading, if we are to be told, after having acted for two months on such declarations, that they were not meant in their original spirit, and that the speech of the noble Earl referred to chaplains in the army and in the workhouses, and some other questions about which there is no controversy and no dispute, and to some past transactions about the Regium Donum and the Bill for the endowment of Maynooth.

THE EARL OF MAYO: I desire to say only a few words, for I thought that the explanation which I gave the other night was clear, frank, and explicit. The whole gist of my observations was this—that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government, with regard to ecclesiastical arrangements in Ireland, to endeavour to maintain the policy which this House and this country has adopted towards Ireland in that respect for a great number of years. I stated that I believed that any changes that were indicated were indicated only in this spirit—namely, that the ecclesiastical arrangements of Ireland had been for a great number of years sanctioned by Parliament on a distinct line of policy, and that it was our intention to endeavour to maintain, and, if possible, to advance it. That was all I said, and all I intended to say. With regard to the University, I distinctly said that it was not the intention of the Government to propose an endowment for the Colleges connected with it. I stated that if Parliament sanctioned the establishment of the University, I thought they would be prepared to provide for the small expenses—which could not possibly exceed more than a few hundreds a year—for the remuneration of the few professors who would be necessary. One of the principal objections taken to the scheme by the Roman Catholic prelates was that no provision was made for a sufficient endowment; and therefore it is clear that they, at all events, thought our proposal on that point unsatisfactory. I must remind the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) that in his proposal for granting a charter of incorporation to a Roman Catholic College he proposed that Parliament should be asked to provide for the establishment of scholarships in connection with the University and with the Colleges which were to be affiliated to it. Thus, in point of fact, the proposal I made was substantially the same in spirit, except that whereas he proposed a University which should have the power of affiliating denominational Colleges, asking Parliament to contribute to the establishment of scholarships, we proposed a denominational University, and intended to ask Parliament to contribute the small sum necessary for the establishment of a few professorships that would be requisite. With regard to any intention on the part of the Government for a proposal to endow the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, I beg to say that such a proposal was never entertained. I believe I am in the hearing of many Gentlemen to whom I have spoken very lately, and who have reminded me of expressions of opinion that I constantly made use of in their hearing, and which amounted to this—that no matter what the opinions of persons might be with regard to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, I had always believed that no man in his senses would ever make such a proposal; that if such a project had ever been possible the time for it had long gone by; and that I believed no Minister would ever venture to make such a proposal. With that explanation I sit down, merely adding that it is extraordinary that such immense exertions should have been made by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the other side to attach an interpretation to words of mine which they were never meant to bear, and which no candid mind would attach to them.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I am sorry to be obliged again to correct a misstatement—no doubt an unintentional misstatement—made by the noble Earl as to the intention of the late Government on the subject of University education. The noble Earl has repeated what I was obliged to contradict on a previous occasion, that the late Government intended to found a new University, and to endow it with scholarships in connection with it. [The Earl of Mayo: I said "Colleges."] If the noble Earl meant Colleges and not a University, I utterly deny that any intention existed on the part of the late Government to found scholarships in connection with such Colleges.

THE EARL OF MAYO: I said that it was the intention of the late Government to endow new scholarships in connection with the Colleges which they proposed to affiliate to the University.

SIR GEORGE GREY: It was not intended by the late Government to establish a University, but only to extend the powers of the Queen's University; and there were scholarships to be endowed in connection with that University, but with this difference, that they were to be entirely undenominational and were to be open to students from all the Colleges affiliated, whereas the scholarships connected with an exclusive University, such as was contemplated by the present Government, must be exclusive scholarships.

MR. H. E. SURTEES said, that his hon. Friend (Sir Thomas Bateson) had made a great omission in not asking the right hon. Member for South Lancashire to explain his statement about the hon. Member for Athlone (Mr. Rearden). The right hon. Gentleman stated that the hon. Member was no supporter of his or of the Liberal party, and that he believed he had voted against him on most important occasions, except those connected with the Irish Church. Now, taking the Division Lists of those divisions in which the party "whips" had acted as tellers, he found that in no single case had the hon. Member for Athlone in 1868 voted against the right hon. Gentleman. In 1867 the hon. Member had voted against the right hon. Gentleman on the Representation of the People Bill, which, if carried, would have caused a dissolution. In 1866 the hon. Member for Athlone had voted against the right hon. Gentleman upon such matters as the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) on the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, the Cattle Plague Bill, the Marine Mutiny Bill, and the Contagious Diseases Bill. And he had yet to learn that the fact of the hon. Member for Athlone voting against the right hon. Gentleman on such measures as the Contagious Diseases Bill, &c., disqualified him from being considered a supporter of the Leader of the Opposition. He was also informed that the hon. Member for Athlone received the missives of the right hon. Gentleman's "whips," and he should now have asked the hon. Member for Athlone a Question of which he had given him Notice, only that he did not see the hon. Member in the House—namely, whether the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, that the hon. Member was no supporter of the Leader of the Opposition, was correct.

The Earl of Mayo

ARMY—CLERKS IN THE ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.—OBSERVATIONS.

QUESTION.

GENERAL DUNNE, in rising to call attention to the position of the Clerks in the Engineer Department, said, that he received from the Under Secretary for War in 1866 an assurance that the case of these clerks should be referred to a Committee then sitting. Formerly they had the privilege of rising to places of trust and great emolument—even as much as £800 a year—but in 1858 a change was made, and now they could not rise to salaries of upwards of £270, with very slow promotion. Besides the officers he had mentioned, there were others, such as purveyors, keepers of stores, and others who are called civil officers, and upon whom, by a Warrant issued in the present year, was conferred what was called relative rank. This was a mischievous course to be taken, one which had in no single case produced good, but had in very many instances tended to bring about confusion. Then, further, all the civil officers were, or were supposed to be, entitled to certain allowances, which, indeed, were actually granted to all such officers except those engaged as clerks of works and clerks in Engineering Departments. The latter received these allowances when they went abroad; but when they returned to this country they were deprived of them. There was no reason why these allowances should be given to one class of civil officers and denied to others. All other civil officers, moreover, were entitled to pensions for their widows and orphans; but he held in his hand a list of several of these officers who had died abroad from the climate, and it was hard that their widows should receive no pensions. It might be said that they were entitled to superannuations under the Superannuation Act; but considering that they could hardly expect to arrive at salaries of £270 a year, their superannuation allowances would be exceedingly trifling. These officers were not only employed in distant and unhealthy countries, but they were sometimes under fire. It was strange that when the Committee on Army Organization sat it did not consider their case. In March, 1863, a Warrant was issued from the War Department actually granting these allowances, and they were even paid; but two months afterwards the order was cancelled and these gentlemen were made to refund the money. Some learned authorities held that under the circumstances they had a legal right to that allowance ; but certainly they had a moral title to it. The number of these officers was lessening every day, from the circumstance of the War Department preferring to take the clerks from the military profession ; but as long as any of them remained justice ought to be done to them ; and he trusted that a favourable answer would be given to his question, Why they are refused certain allowances which they claim under a Warrant, and the right of pensions for their widows granted to other Civil Officers of the Department ?

MR. P. WYKEHAM-MARTIN said, that previous to the time when these officers were made liable to service abroad there might have been some reason in not giving their widows pensions ; but since they had been employed in every part of the globe the case was very different, because even where they had insured their lives the insurance companies would not allow them to keep up their insurances when they went to unhealthy climates. In one case one of these gentlemen, having been sent to Cape Coast Castle, the insurance company refused to renew his life policy, and he died from the climate, leaving a widow and five children, who thus lost every farthing of the insurance money. When the matter was represented to the War Office, the Department said there was no special provision for such cases, and nothing could be done for the widow. In another instance one of these officers died in the West Indies through having been ordered to remain at a station from which the troops were removed on account of its unhealthiness, and his life insurance was forfeited in consequence. If the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) looked into the merits of that question, and did not suffer himself to be misled by the permanent officials of his Department, no doubt he would favourably entertain the claims of these unfortunate men.

MR. M. CHAMBERS considered that these officers were in the same position and exposed to the same dangers as army surgeons and other non-combatants, and that it was but fair that their widows should be placed precisely upon the same footing as the widows of non-combatants or regular military officers.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was not disposed to admit that these clerks in the Engineer department ought to be regarded as soldiers ; but he could not deny that there was a great deal of force in what had been urged as to the dangers of climate to which they were undoubtedly exposed. His hon. and gallant Friend (General Dunne) stated in the first place that these officers were refused certain allowances which they claimed under warrant ; and next he complained that the right to pensions for their widows was not conceded to them. With regard to the first point, the fact was that those appointments were civil appointments, to which, therefore, the Superannuation Act did not apply, and the Treasury had clearly decided that under the existing law the War Department were not authorized in giving pensions to the widows of those who held them. He admitted, however, that hardship arose, and a case recently came under his observation in which one of those men, in the prime of life, was sent on duty to the coast of Africa, and died there, leaving his widow in a position of great distress. Under the existing law it was not in his power to award a pension to that widow. He agreed with what had been said that evening to this extent—that the state of affairs should be re-considered, for the purpose of seeing whether the Government ought not to be empowered to grant pensions under certain conditions. With respect to the claim to certain allowances, however, he did not think that that stood on the same footing. The allowances were claimed by Engineer clerks under a Royal Warrant of March, 1863 ; but in May, 1863, that Warrant was cancelled, and the previous system, under which these clerks had no claim to the allowances, was reverted to. His predecessor in the War Office was pressed on this subject, and the whole question was referred by his right hon. and gallant Friend (General Peel) to a Committee. The result was that the Committee came to a distinct decision that these officers had really no claim to come within the system of military allowances.

SUPPLY—THE DISSOLUTION. QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished, before the House went into Committee of Supply, to put a Question of some importance to the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the Estimates which were about to be submitted. The Government were defeated at the end of April or the beginning of May upon a question which, under ordinary circumstances, would have been followed by an immediate dissolution. In consequence of the peculiar state of the law with regard to the representation of the people the Government were not able to advise the Queen at once to dissolve the Parliament; but they advised that it should be dissolved as soon as the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills should have been passed; and they stated that they hoped to bring in a Bill to shorten the period of the registration, so that the elections might occur in the autumn. However, they added that, as the scheme was placed before them in an imperfect state, they were not then able to specify when the elections would occur. That statement having been made and Government having desired time for full consideration, no immediate action was taken with respect to the amount of Estimates which would be required before the dissolution; but the Government were asked once or twice last month whether they had arrived at a decision as to the time of the elections. The answer given by the Government was that the matter was still under consideration; but to-night the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had given notice of a Bill to shorten the period of the registration during the present year. The House must, therefore, conclude that the Government had decided when the elections would occur; and this would be doubtless stated when the Home Secretary introduced the Bill. Under these circumstances, it might naturally be asked how much Supply the Government were going to ask the House to vote, for, in accordance with all precedent, neither the Government, after experiencing a hostile vote, would ask the House to grant nor would the House consent to give more Supply than was necessary to cover the period which would elapse until the earliest time when Parliament might meet again. In 1841, when Lord Melbourne's Administration was defeated by a majority of 1 upon a Vote of Want of Confidence, Lord Russell stated a day or two afterwards that Lord Melbourne had advised the Queen to dissolve Parliament, and the question arose for how long a time Supply should be granted to the Government. The position of things was almost the same then as at present, for some of the Estimates had been passed. Indeed, almost the whole of the Army Estimates had been voted, the whole of the Navy Estimates were voted, but only a part of the Commissariat Estimates and a small part of the Civil Service Estimates had been passed. The Government were pressed by Sir Robert Peel to state distinctly the amount of Supply they would ask for, and a debate having ensued, Lord Russell said—

Mr. Childers

“In regard to the Miscellaneous Estimates, they would take the same course which was pursued in 1830, on the death of George IV. They proposed to take a sum on account for six months from the 1st of April last, sufficient to supply the immediate wants of the Budget and prevent inconvenience to individual and public officers.”—[3 Hansard, lviii. 1264.]

That occurred on June 7, the Vote of Want of Confidence having been carried on the 4th. Therefore, the view taken by the Government then was that only sufficient Supply should be taken to cover such brief period as must elapse before Parliament could meet again. A question was raised whether the Government were not asking too much, and Sir Robert Peel used these words—

“The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to take the whole of the remaining Estimates for six months. That appeared to him to be a material departure from the usual course. . . . Not only ought the act of dissolution to be as soon as it could take place consistently with the manifest demands of the public service; but the new Parliament should be convoked immediately. If the noble Lord took a Vote for the various remaining Estimates for six months, that would clearly enable His Majesty's Government to defer the meeting of Parliament till October or November. He would submit to the House that taking a Vote on the Estimates for three months would be amply sufficient. Still, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say that there were certain Votes for which a grant of three months would not suffice, he would grant the additional sum.”—[3 Hansard, lviii. 1270.]

A distinct engagement was then given that Parliament should be dissolved so as to meet not later than the month of September. His right hon. Friend near him reminded him that the Parliament met again on the 19th of August. However, sufficient Supply was taken to cover the intervening period until the re-assembling of the new Parliament. He (Mr. Childers) had referred carefully to the Appropriation Act of 1841, and he found that that understanding was carried out in the spirit and the letter. All the Votes passed before these explanations were included in full in the Appropriation Act; but all the Votes not previously taken were granted for six months only, and this was stated distinctly in the Appropriation Act. Assuming, then, that the Government would not think of doing otherwise than following the precedent of 1841—based, as that was, on the precedent of 1830—he would now ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, For how many months from the present moment the Government would ask the House to grant the remaining Estimates? and he hoped the answer which the right hon. Gentleman would give would be so precise as to enable the Committee of Supply to proceed with the Education and other Votes, the Government undertaking to ask for only such an amount as would be sufficient for that period.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was somewhat inconvenient that a Question of this kind should be put without Notice. He thought the cases referred to by his hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) were not parallel with the existing position of things. At present a Reform Bill was passed for England; but the Boundary Bill was not passed, and the Reform Bills for Scotland and Ireland were not passed. Therefore, it was utterly impossible to say at present when there could be a dissolution. He hoped that there was no misapprehension as to the desire of the Government to bring about a dissolution as speedily as possible; and when the hon. Gentleman suggested that Supply should, in order to insure an early dissolution, only be granted for a limited time, he could assure the House that it was unnecessary for such a course to be taken, as it was the intention of the Government to bring about a dissolution as soon as possible. The period for which the Supplies would be taken must depend on the time when a dissolution was possible. At the present moment it was almost impossible to say when there could be a dissolution. Under these circumstances the House would hardly expect the Government to say for what period they would ask the Supplies; but if the hon. Gentleman would repeat his Question to-morrow he should be happy to give him an answer.

MR. LOWE asked when the Report of Supply would be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there being no Resolutions passed as yet he was unable to say when they would be reported. It was usual that Resolutions passed in Committee of Supply one evening should be reported the next. Perhaps it would be more convenient to take the Report on Monday than to-morrow.

MR. CHILDERS thought this not a party question but a constitutional question of great importance, and he wished to know whether, in the event of Resolutions being taken to-night, the right hon. Gentleman would be prepared to say on Monday for what period the Supplies would be taken—for the whole year or only for a certain number of months?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had already said so.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTION.

MR. TORRENS inquired as to the course of proceeding on Monday?

MR. DISRAELI said the Cattle Market Bill would not be taken on Monday. They would proceed with the Committee on the Scotch Reform Bill, and he hoped afterwards to go on with the Boundary Bill.

SLAVE BOUNTIES.—OBSERVATIONS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES rose to call attention to the sums paid by the Treasury as bounties for the capture of Slaves, and for their support, &c., after capture, yearly from 1863 to 1867, inclusive, and Estimate for 1868-9; also, the amount paid for the support of the Mixed Slave Commission in the West Indies. In 1863 the tonnage bounties, &c., paid amounted to £44,454; in 1864, to £45,592; in 1865, to £16,955; in 1866, to £4,857; in 1867, to £24,738: the number of slaves captured in those years being in 1863, 1,395; in 1864, 6; in 1865, 0; in 1866, 3; in 1867, 0; in 1868, 0. The sums paid for support and conveyance of captured negroes in those years were—1863, £26,059; 1864, £26,528; 1865, £23,787; 1866, £36,280; 1867, £4,840; and the Estimate for the present year was £28,656. The cost of the Mixed Slave Commission was in 1863, £10,650; in 1864, £10,950; in 1865, £7,550; in 1866, £10,650; in 1867, £10,450; and this year it was estimated at £9,450. The tonnage bounties, therefore, for the five years 1863 to 1867, amounted to £136,596, and the expense for the conveyance and support of slaves for those years to £117,494. The Mixed Slave Commission, in the West Indies, cost £50,250, add to these sums the pay of the squadron for those five years on the West Coast of Africa, £366,590, and we have the formidable sum of £670,930, for the capture of 1,404 slaves on the West Coast of Africa, or at the rate of nearly £478 per head, and this was independent of the pay of ships on the East Coast of Africa; the number of slaves captured on that coast not being stated in the Returns.

The hon. and gallant Member complained of the want of distinctness in keeping the Treasury accounts, although he did not at all assert that the money had not been properly disposed of; but it was impossible to determine from the Treasury accounts what portion of the outlay applied to slaves on the West Coast, and what portion to the East Coast of Africa. In looking over the ships to which the bounties had been given for several years he had not found, except in two or three instances, that they had been on the Western Coast of Africa, where slavery had altogether ceased. On the Eastern Coast, slavery was of a domestic character, and its outlet was confined to the Arabian peninsula. It was quite right we should endeavour to put it down; but that should be done at as little cost as possible to the country. He was glad to know that the Admiralty had reduced the number of vessels employed on the West Coast, considering the melancholy waste of life and health; but he thought, instead of fourteen five or six vessels would be sufficient for that service; and he hoped they would go on diminishing the force. He wished to know whether the Secretary to the Treasury could not lay on the table a more distinct account of the manner in which the slave bounties were distributed, and whether the captures had not been confined to one coast?

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he did not think it any part of his duty to follow the hon. and gallant Member into details as to the policy of the suppression of the slave trade or the possibility of making further reduction in the West Coast squadron. He should confine himself to answering the Question put to him; and, in a great degree, the hon. and gallant Member had himself anticipated the answer he had to give. The greater portion of the slaves had been captured on the Eastern, not on the Western, Coast of Africa. The majority of the slaves captured on the West Coast were taken, not by Her Majesty's ships, but by coasting vessels. District officers captured, in 1863, 50 slaves; in 1864, 39, out of a total of 45 seized; and in 1865, 35 slaves. The following were the relative numbers of slaves captured on the East and West Coasts:—In 1863, on the East Coast 383, on the West 1,475; in 1864, on the East Coast 110, on the West 45; in 1865, on the East Coast 645, on the West 35; in 1866, on the East Coast 831, on the West none; and in 1867, on the East Coast 382, and none on the

Colonel Sykes

West. The slaves who were captured on the East Coast were disposed of in a very convenient manner, and at no cost to this country, by being sent to either Zanzibar, the Seychelles islands, or Aden, where they easily found employment. The sums expended upon tonnage bounties were as follows:—£5 per ton where slaves were captured; £4 per ton where no slaves were captured, but where no doubt existed as to the character of the vessel; and 30s. per ton in the event of the ship being broken up and not being available for conversion into money. The whole of the money was expended in conformity with the terms of the Act of Parliament. The expense under this head was a diminishing expenditure on the whole, and for this reason—that the mixed Commission applied only to those parties who were of approved nationality. The policy of the slavers was to throw their papers overboard, and thus hide their liability. The cost was diminishing because the establishment at St. Helena was broken up, and the Mixed Commission at New York might not be continued. He readily admitted that the Returns which had been quoted by the hon. and gallant Member were calculated to mislead, and he would take care that if moved another year that they should be more clearly set out.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £7,800, to complete the sum for Grants to Learned Societies, Great Britain.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER asked for an explanation as to the withdrawal of the grant of £500 to the Royal Academy of Music?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that as it would have required four times the amount of the grant—namely, £2,000, to keep the Academy in a satisfactory condition, and as other societies were pressing their claims for support, it was thought advisable to withdraw the grant. He hoped, however, that an extended plan for imparting a good musical education would sooner or later be brought before Parliament.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK inquired what result had been obtained by the inquiries conducted by these learned societies?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he would remind the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Alderman Lusk) that on the death of Admiral FitzRoy, who had conducted certain meteorological experiments for many years, and who received a certain sum for that purpose, a Committee was appointed jointly by the Board of Trade, the Admiralty, and the Royal Society, for the purpose of taking into consideration the advisability of continuing those experiments. That Committee, by their Report in 1866, recommended that a Committee should be appointed to administer a sum of £10,000, to be appropriated in continuation of the efforts made by Admiral FitzRoy to obtain something like a uniformity of statistics with reference to the weather throughout the country, so as to enable people to forecast, if possible, the probability of storms approaching our coasts. The Treasury assented to that proposal, and the whole of the management of those experiments was undertaken by a Committee of the Royal Society, it being understood that under no circumstances was any further demand to be made upon the public Revenue for this purpose.

COLONEL SYKES remarked that the Reports of Admiral FitzRoy had proved of great interest and utility; and, no doubt, the labours of the Committee of the Royal Society would be equally so. His chief objection to the present system was that the experiments were conducted by a body of gentlemen who were not responsible to either that House or to the Board of Trade. There was a body of Fellows of the Royal Society who received, as a Committee, £10,000 per annum of the public money for the conducting of meteorological research experiments. He did not insinuate for a moment that any misapplication had occurred, or would occur; but he objected to the total absence of responsibility. As regarded the Geographical Society, he should regret that any objection should be taken to that grant, the advantage to the public resulting from it being obvious.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £1,580. Dr. Petrie's Antiquarian Collection.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he had a great respect for antiquities, but would be glad to learn if the country had obtained full value for the money which it was proposed to vote.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, that Dr. Petrie at his death had expressed a wish that his collection, to which he had devoted the whole of his life, might become the property of the nation. The Government had selected three eminent antiquarians—the Bishop of Limerick, Dr. Reeves, and Mr. Franks—who, with a view to ascertain the value of the collection, had closely examined it and had made a Report to the Treasury. That Report which, if necessary, could be produced, would show that the collection had been purchased for a smaller sum of money than it is supposed it would have fetched if it had been offered in the public market.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £2,265, to complete the sum for the Queen's Colleges, Ireland.

(4.) £1,784, Royal Irish Academy.

(5.) £1,050, to complete the sum for Theological Professors and General Assembly's College, Belfast.

(6.) £11,949, to complete the sum for Grants to Scottish Universities.

MR. CHILDERS objected to the charge for repairs.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it was thought that if a sum were fixed upon, the application of which was left to the local authorities, the money would go the farthest, and a vote of £500 had therefore been proposed.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £2,200, to complete the sum for Board of Manufacturers, Scotland, &c., agreed to.

(8.) £511,324, to complete the sum for Public Education, Great Britain.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU entered into an explanation of the causes by which the Vote had been reduced from the original Estimate of £842,554 to the sum proposed. The Estimate had been founded upon the supposition that the Education Bill introduced by the Government into the other House of Parliament would be carried. But the abandonment of that Bill had, of course, led to the withdrawal of those sums which were founded upon it. Now, in that Bill it was proposed to omit Clause 8 of the Revised Code, by which schools receiving State aid were compelled to be in connection with some religious body, or to make a practice of having the Bible read daily during school hours. Had that clause been omitted, the Congregationalists, who now objected to receiving assistance from the State, would have applied for grants. The increased sum that would be necessary for that purpose had been estimated at £8,192; and that sum would, of course, be cut off from the Vote now asked for. A sum of £1,250 for the Congregational Training College had also been cut off. Then there was another clause in the Bill, which gave peculiar facilities and increased grants for the building of schools. By the withdrawal of the Bill they had cut off £15,000 for the services under that head. The Bill also provided for taking an educational Census, wherever the President of the Council should think that step necessary, and a sum of £3,000 was set aside for the purpose; but this sum would not now be taken. Another clause of the Bill was to exempt small schools from the necessity of having certificated teachers. A great many schools would have been brought under the system by that clause, because in very many cases the managers saw they could not afford to pay for certificated teachers. Under this head there would be a reduction of £14,768 in the Estimate. It had also been proposed that the managers of every school which sent up a pupil teacher to a Normal College should receive £20, instead of £10, the sum now given; but as that proposition was not to be carried out, there would be a further reduction of the Estimate by a sum of £6,000. There would be a reduction of some other items, owing to the previous Estimate having been taken rather wide. It had been estimated that a great number of schools would come in under the Workshops Act, and a sum of £21,000 had been proposed to meet the additional expenditure which would thereby be incurred; but that Estimate had since been cut down by a sum of £10,000, so that only £11,000 was now asked. From grants to Scotland a sum of £1,000 had been struck off. Under the proposed Bill a number of additional inspectors would have been required. Many of these had been appointed; but three of them had not been and would not be appointed. This enabled the Department to reduce the Estimate by a further sum of £1,740. Only one assistant inspector had been appointed, and a sum of £280 would be saved by the non-appointment of two assistant inspectors whom it had been proposed to appoint. The total of the reductions amounted to a sum of £61,230. This made the net increase on last year's Estimate £75,459, instead of £136,689. Of the increase of £75,459, which would be found on the Estimate as it now stood, £39,770 was due to the working of the Minute of February 20, 1867, and which was generally known as Mr. Corry's Minute. The remaining £35,689 was due to the ordinary increase in the number of schools, and to the £11,000 which was taken for the schools which would come in under the Workshops Act. Having explained the reduction which had been made in the Estimates, he would now proceed to the Estimates themselves. First, he would refer to the expenditure of last year as compared with the Estimate for the coming year. Last year the grants for building, enlarging, and improving schools expended from January 1st to December 31st amounted to £21,656. The reduced Estimate under this head for the year 1868-9 showed an increase, being £30,000. The amount which was thereby elicited in the form of voluntary contributions for that purpose last year was £86,784. Last year the grants for the maintenance of elementary schools amounted—for day schools, to £416,584, and for night schools to £15,018, making a total sum of £431,602. The voluntary contributions to elementary schools of both classes of schools amounted, up to the 31st of August, 1867—the date up to which the account had been brought—to £358,296, and the endowments during the year amounted to £36,776. In the present Estimates it was proposed to take £492,661 for the day schools, and £18,018 for the night schools. Last year the grants to 31 normal schools amounted to £69,886. In the Estimates for the coming year it was proposed to take a sum of £73,000 for grants to those schools. The cost of administration and inspection was last year £80,978. This year it was proposed to take £88,565 for that purpose. On last year's account there was a balance of £25,427 to be surrendered. Having now gone through the cost of means, that was the expenditure of last year, it was his duty to show what work had been done in return for that expenditure. The number of new schools built up to the 31st of August, 1867, was 73; the number enlarged, 60; and the number of teachers' residences built, 48. The day schools visited for annual grants, or for simple inspection—some few schools being visited merely for simple inspection—up to the 31st of August, 1866, was 8,753; but in 1867, up to the 31st of August, the number was 9,340, showing an increase of 587. He would now refer to the separate departments of schools under separate teachers. In 1866 the number of these separate departments visited was 12,130; in 1867 it was 12,901, showing an increase of 771. In 1886 the number of children for whom there was accommodation in the schools was 1,724,208; in 1867 it was 1,837,307, showing an increase of 113,099. In 1866 the number of scholars on the books was 1,510,871; in 1867 it was 1,592,912, showing an increase of 82,041. In 1866 the number of children present at inspections in the day schools was 1,264,829; and in 1867 it was 1,342,469, being an increase of 77,640. In 1866 the number of children present at inspection in the night schools was 32,399; in 1867 it was 45,837, showing an increase of 13,438. In 1866 the average attendance during the year was 1,039,183 children; in 1867 it was 1,098,742, being an increase of 59,559. He now came to the results obtained from the work done. In 1866, in the day schools, there were individually examined for annual grants 660,000 children; in 1867, the number so examined was 690,532, being an increase of 30,532. In 1866, in the night schools, there were individually examined for annual grants 31,481; in 1867, the number so examined was 40,572, being an increase of 9,091. In 1867, there passed in "the three R's" — reading, writing, and arithmetic — 432,486, or 65 per cent; in 1867, the number that so passed was 462,799, or 67 per cent, being an increase of 30,313. From these figures the Committee would see that there had been an advance of 2 per cent in the number of children who passed in reading, writing, and arithmetic. In 1866, the percentage of those who passed in reading was 89·9; in 1867, it was 90·7. In 1866, the percentage of those who passed in writing was 86·33; in 1867, it was 87·59. In 1866, the percentage of those who passed in arithmetic was 75·31; in 1867, it was 76·28. It was to be noticed that the subject of arithmetic was still the one in which there occurred the greatest number of failures; and it was also, in the nature of things, the least mechanical of the three subjects. In the Minute of 1866-7, page xxi., there was this remark—

"Throughout the schools the minimum which each child must learn in order to pass for a grant under Article 48 is apt to be of a mechanical character, and to efface that more intellectual aspect which, under the old system, struck a visitor looking at the best schools as a whole."

He had stated that an increase of £40,000 was taken for the Minute of Feb. 20, 1867. Since the passing of the Revised Code in 1862, the number of pupil teachers in England had been steadily decreasing; but this year, for the first time, the tide had turned. The increase during the past year had been in England and Wales 551, or, taking Great Britain, 715. That increase he attributed to the operation of the Minute of 1867. The expenditure under that Minute during the past year had, however, been only £5,382 6s. 7d. The schools last year were not in a position to take advantage of that Minute; the staff of pupil teachers had everywhere been reduced to the minimum necessary to meet the conditions under which alone it was possible to obtain grants under the Revised Code; and the higher subjects had been disregarded, the attention of the teachers being concentrated upon the "paying subjects" — namely, reading, writing, and arithmetic. Now, things were different; many schools were beginning to devote attention to higher subjects, and education, under the operation of that Minute, was becoming somewhat more intellectual and less mechanical, for schools were now qualifying to obtain the increased grants held out to them by that Minute. The greatest difficulty felt at present was in getting candidates for the training Colleges. To obviate that difficulty, it had been proposed to give to the managers who sent up a pupil teacher who had completed his term of service a sum of £20, instead of £10 as heretofore. The male training College was built to hold 1,669 students, which was considered at that time to be the lowest number required to supply the different schools with teachers; it actually contained only 922 students — being a deficiency of 44·8 per cent. The female training College was not so badly off, the number for which it was built being 1,536, and the actual number of pupils 1,335, showing a deficiency of 13·1 per cent. There was but one other point he wished to bring under the notice of the Committee, and this was that, for whatever reason, there were a number of really good schools which did not come under the Privy Council system. He would not pretend to say with what truth or justice, but allegations had been made that the Government rules were too harsh, and that their operation, instead of improving the character of education, tended rather to degrade it. In Mr. Barry's Report, it was stated that of 300 parishes with schools in his district only 107 were under inspection. Mr. Meyrick represented that of 575 schools under his cognizance only 210 were under inspection; and Mr. Frazer wrote that of 171 schools in his district but 100 were inspected. Of the Reports of some inspectors, it might perhaps be alleged that they were new to the work and not entitled to equal weight; but the three Reports from which he had quoted were deserving of the highest respect.

MR. BRUCE: These are all Church schools?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU replied in the affirmative. There were therefore throughout the country a vast number of really good Church schools, the managers of which refused to receive aid and inspection, and of which, therefore, no account whatever was taken in our Reports. From the figures, however, which he had quoted, it must be perceived that the cause of education had made gradual but very steady advances; and, although there might still be realms of ignorance, yet the territory was day by day being conquered. On this point a good deal of misapprehension existed. What was, according to a careful estimate, the true state of the case? The population of Great Britain in 1861 was 23,271,965, and at the ordinary rate of increase, which in England and Wales was 12 per cent, and in Scotland 6 per cent, during ten years, the population of Great Britain in April, 1868, would be 25,092,168. Of that number the children between 3 and 15 years old would be 6,849,128; and, if each child were at school for the maximum period of six years, there should be at school at one time 3,424,564. Now, as to the number which were actually at school. The Commissioners, in their Report of 1862, page lxxx., divided schools into four classes—namely, Class I., schools of religious denominations; Class II., ragged, Birkbeck, factory, &c. schools; Class III., taxation schools; and Class IV., collegiate and upper-class schools. Let the Committee suppose that there was an increase due to the increase of the population under all these classes except Class III., the taxation schools—that is, pauper and criminal schools—for they would give the advantage to those who tried to make out a case of educational destitution. He would suppose that the relative amount of poverty and crime decreased in order to make out that education at the same time advanced, more slowly than it really advanced. They would therefore expect to find at present in Class I. 1,679,454 children; in Class II., 46,718; in Class III., 47,748; and in Class IV., 37,940; making the total number of children in public schools, inspected and uninspected, 1,811,860. To these must be added the number of children in private schools, which in 1858 was 860,304, and, for the purpose of the calculation, he would take it that this number had not increased. This was manifestly untrue; but he would still give the advantage to those who desired to make out a case for educational destitution. There must further be added for Scotland 418,367 children, the exact number in this case appearing from the Scotch Commissioners' Report (p. clxxiv.). The total number, therefore, of children actually at school in Great Britain in 1863 would be 3,091,531. The total number which they would expect to find at school, on the assumption that six years was the proper term of schooling for every child in Great Britain was, as he had already shown, 3,424,564, thus showing a deficiency of only 333,033 children in the United Kingdom who ought to be at school but were not. The calculation which he had made was taken in many respects most unfavourably. He had supposed, for instance, that the number of pupils at private schools had remained stationary, and he had not allowed for any increase commensurate with the increase of the population under Class III. Hence there would probably be deductions to be made from that maximum number of 333,033 children who were estimated as without schooling. The Estimate also was made throughout with reference to children of from 3 to 15 years old, whereas they knew that very few children went to school before six years old, or remained at school after 12. It was estimated that 46 per cent of the children who should be at school, but were not, were between the ages of 3 and 6. The Estimate which he had given to the Committee had been most carefully framed by officers in whom he had every confidence, and he felt convinced of the accuracy of it. If by any means it were found possible partially to relax the rules so as to bring into connection with the system a number of very good schools that at present were not under it, he believed further advantages would be gained.

Lord Robert Montagu

LORD HENLEY said, he was glad to hear that it was proposed to give additional aid to schools, more especially as he had feared at first, in consequence of the alteration in the Vote, that an actual decrease in the amount of aid was contemplated. He understood the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) to say that it was intended to apply something like £75,000 for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of our schools, and that the diminutions which had been referred to were owing to the circumstances of the Bill which Government brought forward early in the Session having been dropped. For his own part, he did not much regret the abandonment of that measure, which, however, had the merit of avoiding two things that were highly objectionable—namely, raising the money for the promotion of education by a local rate on real property, and the forcing of education on the agricultural classes. The general taxpayer was quite as much interested, if not more so, in the education of the children of the poor as were the landowners, the farmers, or the owners of houses in towns. Every one practically acquainted with the working of education in rural parishes must acknowledge this. In his own neighbourhood he had noticed that the cleverest and best educated boys almost always left their native village in order to push their fortunes in the metropolis; and it must be obvious that the merchants and capitalists who employed these lads gained as much, if not more, by their education than those who paid the rate. It was only fair, therefore, that the general taxpayer should contribute something towards defraying the expense of education. The plan of supplementing voluntary efforts by public aid was, no doubt, an excellent one; but the great defect of the system was, that in some isolated parishes where subscriptions could not be raised the children of the poor were left without education at all. To those parishes where assistance was most required no single farthing of the money voted in that House was given. This case was one of a class which presented great difficulty to those who desired the spread of education; and he understood that hon. Gentleman below him proposed to get over the difficulty by dividing the country into rateable districts something like Poor Law unions, and levying a rate upon those districts. He did not like the idea of an enforced rate, but he saw no objection to forming the districts, and giving the management of the educational funds, to be supplemented by grants from Votes such as the one now under consideration, to a number of the wealthy and well-disposed persons living in those districts. He strongly hoped they were not going to vote any more local rates, believing as he did that the doing so would, by imposing enormous burdens on real property, reduce that class of property to the condition of an estate so deeply mortgaged that the owner has nothing left upon which to subsist. He was strongly opposed, also, to the establishing of a system of compulsory education in the agricultural districts. Such a system in the manufacturing districts was, in his opinion, stringent, and he might say tyrannical; but in the rural districts, where the labouring classes were very poor, and the schools far away, in many cases, from the dwellings of the people, its operation would be still more harsh and unjust. Further, as the Reform Bill of last year did not admit the agricultural labourers to the power of saying how the laws should be framed, he thought it would be additionally unjust to enact stringent laws for their government—laws against which he felt it his duty to protest. He would now say a few words on the educational system as it at present stood. It had been proposed by the abandoned Bill that a Secretary of State should be appointed to preside over the education of the country; and it was urged as a strong reason for this appointment that the business of the Education Department was already so extensive, and the correspondence so elaborate, that it was really necessary to have a Cabinet Minister at the head of the Department. Now, he considered that many of the Returns required from the schools were much more elaborate, and entailed much more expense, than was at all necessary. He thought it might be greatly simplified, so as to lighten the work of the Department to a great extent. He had the authority of one of the managers of a school for saying that the school in question was not put under Government inspection for the reason that the Government grant would not pay for the time the schoolmaster would have to devote to the making out of the Returns required by Government. Whilst he was in favour of Government inspection, he should like to see that inspection carried out in connection with a system much less burdensome and difficult than the present one. It seemed to him, some years ago, that the purse strings of the Government were opened rather too freely as regarded gifts to schools. It was found necessary to reduce those gifts; and the effect had been to make cheeseparing, which amounted almost to shabbiness, apparently the sole object of inspection. All sorts of trivial objections were taken, and one of them was to tiled floors, wooden floors being insisted upon, although the children were used to tiled floors at home. These trifling matters were very annoying to school managers. The effect was to dishearten the managers of schools already under Government inspection, and it prevented others from putting their schools under that inspection. They were, in fact, afraid of Government interference. Instead of suggesting improvements, and threatening to cut down the grants if they were not made, Government ought, in reality, to give a little more in order to have them carried out. In conclusion, he wished to remark upon the tone in which the Government Department addressed the managers of schools when corresponding with them. They were addressed as if they were employés and subordinates of the Department, instead of being, as they were, independent persons who voluntarily devoted their time and talents to the promotion of education. The tone as adopted was not harsh and severe, but peremptory and discouraging, and if persevered in would have the effect of causing the managers of some schools to withdraw the institutions with which they were connected from Government inspection—a result to be strongly deprecated.

MR. BRUCE said, the greater part of his noble Friend (Lord Henley's) speech had been devoted to two points which were not then before the Committee—namely, an education rate and compulsory attendance at school. His noble Friend had expressed a strong opinion against both; but he (Mr. Bruce) believed it was not the intention of the Government to adopt either. He would not then enter on a discussion of those points; but he believed there was no country in the world where a good system of education prevailed that did not depend upon local rating and local effort. No country in the world besides our own had attempted so utterly wild and impracticable a project as the education of the children of the nation by means of Imperial funds. Would the hon. Members for Scotland give up their system of rating in order to draw their educational supplies from the Imperial funds? ["No!"] There was not a Scotch Member who would not say that the sum raised by rating for schools in Scotland was the most valuable public expenditure in Scotland, and did more than anything else to keep down the poor rates. Any Scotch population would admit that it was education which kept down the poor rates. With a national system that was really popular, as the system in Scotland was, compulsion was practically unnecessary, because the people gladly sent their children to school; and it was only in England, where there were squires' schools and parsons' schools, which were not popular, that there existed any necessity for compulsion. He knew something of the Returns managers were required to make to the Privy Council, both as a Vice President of the Department and as a manager of a large school; and in the latter capacity, although he had been sometimes inclined to grumble at the minuteness of the details to be gone into, he never finished the Return without feeling thankful that the duty of making it had been imposed upon him. It compelled him at least once a year to make a careful investigation of the affairs of the school; and the benefit of such an inquiry was an advantage that ought not to be lost. As to unnecessary interference, it was perhaps inevitable that in a national system rules should be laid down which were not universally of useful application; but there was reason in the objection to brick and tiled floors, for children and teachers did not stand still upon them for hours together at home, as they did at school, where teachers, and female teachers especially, had through dampness of floors contracted diseases from which they never recovered. So much was imposed upon teachers that regard ought to be paid to the maintenance of their health. The statement of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu) showed that the present system, imperfect as it was, was working well within its limits; and he was sure the House had never shown the slightest disposition to stint illiberally the supplies for education when the demand was shown to be legitimate. The country was gratified to learn that the Congregationalists had agreed to avail themselves of the grant on condition of the withdrawal of the 8th Article, which made religious teaching a sine qua non of the State system. Their objection had been, not to State assistance, but to religious conditions; and to meet that objection the Government had agreed to withdraw the 8th Article. What possible objection could there be to its withdrawal? The number of secular schools in the country was inconsiderable; and even if there were more, the true position, and that which would now be generally maintained, was that, however desirable it might be to make religious instruction a portion of daily education, the province of the State was confined to the promotion of secular teaching only. He did not regret the omission from the Estimates of £3,000 for a school Census, which might show how many children were at school without distinguishing between good and worthless schools; but the rate of the building grant might be advantageously increased. It was once 6*s.* per square foot; it was reduced to 4*s.*, and then to 2*s.* 6*d.*; and the difference between 2*s.* 6*d.* or 4*s.* was a large one, and the increase proposed by the Government Bill would, in many instances, encourage the building of schools. The country was well supplied with schools in the richer districts; but the large and populous and poor districts in our great towns were inadequately provided; and the reduction of the rate of grant materially prevented their establishment in those districts. He did not see why those alterations and improvements that could be made by the mere alteration of the Revised Code could not be adopted, instead of waiting for special legislation. He regretted to see that £45,000 put down last year in order to meet the expected increase in the attendance at schools, in consequence of the passing of the Factory and the Workshop Regulation Acts, had been reduced to £10,000. The reduction showed that the introduction of these Acts into practical use would be a very slow and gradual operation. With regard to the payments to inspectors and their travelling expenses, which absorbed a large portion of the Education Grant, he thought the time had come when they might be satisfied with one class of inspectors only instead of three separate inspectors for Church, Roman Catholic, and British and Foreign schools. The present system was not only expensive, but it led to administrative difficulty, for, as each inspector had in his own mind a standard by which to pay for results, the more you multiplied inspectors the more you varied the standards. Then, as to the Conscience Clause, he believed that the rule should be laid down boldly and broadly that wherever public money was spent in school grants every child within reach of the school should have a right to a secular education, leaving it to the parent to decide whether he should have religious instruction or not. That principle was a just and right one; and if it were laid down those heart-burnings and disputes which had tended so much to delay the progress of education would be removed once and for ever. The noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) had stated that in round numbers the children who ought to be at school were 3,400,000, and those out of school 3,100,000, the exact difference being 333,000. But he distrusted these calculations. When you read that in Prussia 1,000,000 children were at school, you knew that there was an average attendance of 920,000. In England there was an average attendance of something like 926,000; and in order to secure that we were obliged to have at school 1,376,000 children. This showed how imperfect was our system. In Prussia no children were reckoned until they were five years old. Here we reckoned every child from the age of a year and a-half up to five; and in our State-aided schools there were some 240,000 children under five years of age who in Prussia would not be reckoned at all. Then there was the irregularity of attendance; and if that were so great in the State-aided schools, where regular attendance was one of the conditions of the grant, what must it be in the dame schools and others where no such influence operated? The figures which had been given were fallacious, and little could be learned from them. If you wanted the broad results of the present state of education it was necessary to look at the Reports of the Factory Inspectors, the Reports of Education Societies in the large northern towns, and the Registrars' Returns of persons who, on marriage, were unable to write their names. These showed, unhappily, that one-half of the working population of this country had not even the semblance of education. The work of National education was one in which slow progress was made; and it was only when generation after generation was properly taught that we should have that general appreciation of education which prevailed in Scotland and in Germany—countries which had enjoyed the blessings of education for many years. While admitting the great good which had been done of late in spreading education in this country, he felt that the time had come when it was the duty of Parliament to consider what steps should be taken to found a really national system of education. He would not enter into the subject now; probably there would be another opportunity for discussing it; but, while gladly allowing the good points which were presented in this year's statement, he entered his strong protest against the notion that we should be satisfied with things as they were.

Lord Henley

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he was not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bruce) who was strongly imbued with official ideas, should not have relished the remarks of the noble Lord the Member for Northampton (Lord Henley), which, however, he believed would meet with a cordial response throughout the country. The Privy Council treated school managers as if they were supplicants for alms, rather than what they were, persons who made considerable sacrifices for the cause of education. He quite agreed with those who thought that the compulsory system would be a most dangerous one to try in this country. What induced the House to adopt this principle in the Factory Acts was a well-grounded fear that otherwise the health of the children who worked in those factories would suffer, but there need be no such fear in the rural districts. His experience was that the children who were educated in our schools in the rural districts did not remain there, their ambition being to get into the Excise and Customs. For his own part he did not credit the charges of gross ignorance which were made against the working population of this country. Ignorant they might be in one sense; but then the question was, what constituted ignorance? Some thought that others were ignorant because they did not know what the former knew or come up to their standard. Now the definition he would venture on was that every man was an ignorant man who did not know the business he contracted to perform, and that you had no right to call a man ignorant who did know his business, even though he might not know other things. He had a suggestion to make to all the friends of education who attempted to promote it by delivering lectures and addresses throughout the country—namely, that they would contribute immensely to the success of the cause if, as a general rule, they would make themselves a little less disagreeable than they were. They ought to remember that, in a free country like this, a great deal was expected from co-operation, and that the persons who subscribed to the schools often made much greater sacrifices than official people.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had taken the trouble to inquire about the Bills on national education which had been brought into that House for the last twenty years, and he could say, with reference to them and to the meetings held in Scotland on the subject, that a single instance would not be found in which a rate was not contemplated as part of the plan. He felt strongly convinced that they would never get a good system of education for the poor until they made it in the interest of the rate-payers to see in what manner their money was expended. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bruce) had ascribed much more importance and merit to the Scotch schools than, he feared, they deserved. Two, three, or four schools were often required now where one was sufficient before, and though much had been done by voluntary efforts there was still a great deficiency. With respect to quoting figures showing the large attendance at schools nothing could be more fallacious. For instance, in the Report issued within the last few days by the Education Commissioners for Ireland it was stated that 913,198 children, or about one sixth of the present population of Ireland, were at school. He did not think they would get a country in Europe where so large a proportion were really at school. But a few lines further on it appeared that the daily average attendance was only 321,515. If the larger number could have been supposed to be in regular attendance, Ireland would be a much better educated country than either England or Scotland, whereas there was a far greater proportion in Ireland of persons who could not sign their names there than in any other part of the United Kingdom. It was a startling fact that this was the 34th Report of the Irish Commissioners. That showed that those schools had been in existence thirty-four years, and that all the young persons married in Ireland within the last few years had an opportunity of attending a national school, and yet the result was that not more than one-half the people of Ireland who had recently been married could sign their names.

MR. POWELL remarked that the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken (Mr. M'Laren) had fallen into an inaccuracy

Mr. Bruce

when he stated that the people of Ireland had enjoyed the advantage of the National schools for thirty-four years. That was only the beginning of the system, which had been growing up from the time the Commissioners made their first annual Report to the present, and therefore, neither the average attendance nor the attainments of the people during thirty-four years could be taken as a fair test of the system. It was true that the system in Great Britain had of late years received considerable expansion; but he could not regard it as satisfactory, either in relation to the ignorance which still existed or the increase of the population from year to year. He was afraid the right hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Bruce) was rather sanguine in what he expected from a system of undenominational inspection. The Roman Catholics would be extremely reluctant to submit their schools to inspection by members of another creed, and he had no doubt that undenominational inspection would lead to disappointment. He would suggest that in future years the Estimate should not be prepared until the annual Report was produced, as it was but right that they should have the benefit of the light afforded by the Report in preparing and discussing the Estimate. With regard to the abolition of certificates, he hoped this country would never take so retrograde a step. They might say that in parishes of a certain size certificates should not be required; but if they were to say that they should not be required in schools of a certain size, then the result would be a multiplication of small schools, coming into competition with larger and more expensively-conducted schools. He hoped the Government would re-consider their determination, and that they should hear no more of the absence of certificates in schools below a certain size. It was not in England alone that certificates were required, but in all countries in which education had made progress. They were required in France, in Germany, and, after a certain measure, in America; and in America they were accompanied by much more severe conditions, because there was a much more ample power of withdrawing the certificate in cases where the teacher became inefficient. With respect to building requirements he trusted that the Government, though not fastidious in regard to architecture, would be strict in all matters relating to comfort and health, and particularly with respect to flooring. At home the children might have brick floors, but then they were continually moving about, and where they had to sit long mats were generally put under their feet. Schoolrooms could not have large mats, and therefore, as the next best thing, wooden floors were insisted upon. As to the effect of the Workshops Regulation Act, he was of opinion that no reliable estimate could be formed of the number of children who would thereby receive education. He hoped the unsettled state of the education question would not lead for a moment to the arrestment of its progress. He believed the friends of education need not be discouraged by the apprehension that their schemes, if founded on sound principles, would be defeated by any opposition in that House. The days of cold official obstructiveness were past, and when they observed the amount of ignorance existing they could not but feel that additional exertions were requisite to overcome it. He would venture to express an earnest hope that proposals for the amendment of our educational system would be received in a friendly spirit, and discussed with a desire to arrive at the best mode of diffusing education among the people of this country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Powell) that this Vote should not be proposed so early in the Session, or else that the Report should be issued sooner. With regard to the small schools, he believed that to relax the demand for certificates on account of the size of a school would be unwise. The districts which urgently required assistance, owing to the absence or the illiberality of wealthy residents, no doubt deserved consideration; but he thought their claims should be met by an arrangement based on the condition of the district, and not on the size of the school. He believed the inspectors would agree with him that inspection as at present carried on could not be relied on as the sole guarantee for the efficiency of a school. To make it such the number of inspectors would have to be increased and their visits lengthened, this requiring an increased expenditure, at which the Committee would probably be surprised, so that as things stood the guarantee of the good training of the master must be retained as well as that of inspection. As to the Workshops Act, he hoped too sanguine expectations of its results would not be indulged in. He rejoiced at its passing, since it was a recognition of the duty of the employers of labour in workshops ; but the little experience there had yet been of its working justified the belief that the appointment of inspectors or of a public prosecutor was essential to its efficiency. If the matter were left to local authorities the influences against its efficiency were so strong that little result could be expected, and information he had received from the straw-plaiting districts, where the operation of the Act was particularly required, had confirmed him in this opinion. He wished he could concur in the hopeful view taken by the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu). If his figures were trustworthy we should stand almost first, educationally, among civilized nations ; but he (Mr. W. E. Forster) confessed he had not the slightest faith in them, because, whenever these figures were tested by actual examination, education was found to be the reverse of what it was represented to be. The most recent test with which he was acquainted was supplied by the first annual Report of the Birmingham Education Society. Some gentlemen had made a careful educational survey of Birmingham, and 273 of the 1,027 streets being chiefly inhabited by the upper and middle classes they had thoroughly canvassed the remaining 754. They made inquiries as to 45,056 children between the ages of 3 and 15, but assuming that the youngest of these might receive education afterwards, he would only quote the Returns as to children between 11 and 15 years of age. Of the 13,130 children of that age, 2,019, or 5 per cent, had never been to school at all and probably never would go. What was the education possessed by the remainder, who had been to school ? It was this — 4,701 could neither read nor write, and 1,818 could only read ; thus 50 per cent of the whole number of children between 11 and 15 could not read nor write. These figures erred if at all on the favourable side, for the visitors took the word of the parents, though believing that they in many cases overrated their children's attainments. Of 3,801 children between 14 and 15, an age at which, if they were to receive education at all they would have received it, the proportion unable to read or write was rather larger, being 1,487, or 39 per cent, while 573, or 15 per cent, could only read, so that it was a mere delusion to quote the figures the noble Lord had quoted to show that education in the country was in a sound condition. In an examination of

Mr. W. E. Forster

908 young people of both sexes — 529 males and 399 females—employed in 26 establishments and between the ages of 13 and 21, the result was that only 36 per cent could read, only 27 per cent could write, and only about 1 in 20 possessed any proficiency in what was called "general knowledge." The examination was in what was called the fourth standard, which was a very low one. Birmingham was generally considered to represent a comparatively favourable condition of general education ; and if these were the results in Birmingham, it was easy to conclude what must be the state of other parts of the country. The fact was, that in our great cities a large population were growing up which had got beyond the present provision for education, and the voluntary system was quite unable to cope with the deficiency. The noble Lord (Lord Henley) had spoken of the burdens upon real property, and hoped they would not be increased. But the present state of things entailed tremendous burdens upon real property in the shape of poor rates and prison rates. It would be a wise expenditure of money to put on a little more in the shape of a school rate, in order to take it off the other rates. He looked forward to a payment of one-third of the school expenditure out of the Consolidated Fund, one-third by the children of the parents, and one-third out of the local rates. It was necessary that the responsibility for the evil of neglected ignorance should be fastened somewhere, and upon whom could it more fitly devolve than upon the inhabitants of the district ? The greatest kindness the Legislature could do to a district was to insist upon the inhabitants taking measures to prevent the evil from coming back to them in rates for paupers and prisons. Complaints had been made of the interference with school managers exercised by the Privy Council ; but with a system of rate-supported schools this interference must necessarily diminish. He regretted that the state of public business prevented the Government Education Bill from coming down to that House. The noble Duke at the head of the Education Department (the Duke of Marlborough) did not probably regard that measure as sufficient to meet the wants of education, though he supposed he thought that it was all the Government could attempt at the present time. Almost everything in the Bill, however, was a step in the right direction ; but, in the present transition state of education, he entirely objected to the proposal to turn the Revised Code into an Act of Parliament. The proposal to appoint a Minister of Education had his entire approval; for he had long considered it to be extremely unfortunate that the head of the Education Department was always a Member of the other House. General experience proved that the regulation with regard to secular schools was perfectly useless. It caused a great deal of dissatisfaction. Its object, he believed, was to secure a religious education in all schools. Even if it was the place of the Government to secure that object, it could not be secured by that regulation. All that it required was that one or two verses of the Bible should be read in a school. Managers who wished to evade that provision could do so very easily. But, on the other hand, good schools connected with mechanics' institutes were unfairly excluded from the Government Grant. A large body of Dissenters objected to the regulation because they held that it was not right for the Government to interfere with regard to religious education. He thought that there should be only one set of inspectors whose duty it should be to report simply upon secular subjects. The Church of England really suffered by an interference in the management of the religious teaching of Church schools, because a clergyman of one school of religious thought objected to an inspector of another school of religious thought interfering in the management of his school.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he rose merely to ask the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) a Question with reference to the Conscience Clause. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government during the coming year, in the absence of any Bill on the subject of education, to carry out the Conscience Clause in the manner and in the form in which it had hitherto been carried out by the Privy Council, or whether it was intended only to apply it in the very limited and, as he thought, very imperfect manner in which it was proposed to carry it out in the Education Bill which had been laid before the House of Lords? He regretted very much that the Education Bill, which had been introduced into the House of Lords by the Lord President (the Duke of Marlborough), after passing through several stages had been withdrawn; for though it might not have passed, in consequence of the pressure of business, it would have been very desirable to have it discussed. It would only be necessary, for instance, to have a fair discussion on the Conscience Clause, and all the difficulties in the way, not only of its limited application as proposed in the Bill, but of its universal application to all grants, would disappear. It was monstrous that children should be denied education in parishes where there was only one school, because they would not consent to attend to a religious instruction which their parents objected to. Another reason why he regretted that the Education Bill was not discussed was because the 8th Article of the Revised Minutes remained unrepealed, and therefore the Congregational Union would be deprived of the grant for another year. Indeed he could not see that an Act of Parliament was necessary for the repeal of that Article, and if the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) would propose the grant he would meet with no opposition from that side of the House. He regarded the noble Lord's statement on the progress of education as very satisfactory; but he was satisfied that they must in the end come to local rating. The present system, though it had done a great amount of good, was imperfect, and not equal to the occasion.

COLONEL SYKES thought it must be admitted that the existing system had produced satisfactory results, though they might not be altogether commensurate with the amount of money expended. The inspectors reported from year to year that the numbers of scholars increased, and it appeared from the Reports of the Registrar General that the number of persons able to sign their names also increased from year to year. The difficulty was in getting children to go to school at all, as long as their parents found their labour profitable. The parochial system of education in Scotland was admirable in its results. Owing to the facilities which the sons of farmers and of small tradesmen enjoyed for going to the Scotch Universities, by the aid of trifling bursaries, many of them became distinguished in science, art, and literature, and took the degree of Master of Arts; and it was of such men that many of the class of parochial schoolmasters in Scotland was composed. He had himself presented a petition some years ago from seven schoolmasters in Aberdeenshire, four of whom were Masters of Arts, while their school salaries did not exceed £28 a year. Men so qualified did turn out scholars competent to go through the University curriculum.

He advocated the extension of evening schools in every direction, and was of opinion that no child should be allowed to enter a factory, or be apprenticed, until he was educated to a certain extent. Local rating would not, perhaps, do all that was expected of it; but it would give the ratepayers an interest in the schools, and induce them to see that the money they contributed was usefully employed.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK complained of the elaborate system and the different classes of schools which the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) had described. The people were puzzled to choose among so many, and they did not send their children anywhere. It was discreditable to the country that so many children never went to school, and he believed that the sooner they abolished the Conscience and such like clauses and adopted one simple non-denominational system, the better. He thought the plan pursued with regard to the payment of the police should be adopted in respect to education. One-third or one-fourth of the expense should be paid by the Consolidated Fund, and the other two-thirds or three-fourths thrown on the rates. Where there was a will there was a way, and they ought to make up their minds that elementary education should be compulsory.

MR. LOCKE said, he could not understand what the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Alderman Lusk) meant. He would not have any Conscience Clause—he would not have this—he would not have that—it appeared he would not have anything. It was all very well to talk of “a simple system;” but what did a simple system mean? Discussions of that kind might go on all night long; there was no reason for their ever coming to an end. The best thing they could do was to vote some money for that which did exist. It was certainly better than nothing; and his hon. Friend did not point out anything that was better except nothing. He (Mr. Locke) was at a loss to know where they were. The hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) told them of the number of Masters of Arts that were schoolmasters in Scotland. But he had always heard that Aberdeen Masters of Art were not to be relied on; and as for Aberdeen doctors, they were a mere joke, for in his early days any man who sent £10 to the Aberdeen University might be made a doctor. But what had all this to do with the question? If neither the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Alderman Lusk) nor the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) could enlighten them as to what was best to be done in future they had better go on voting some money for what already existed.

Colonel Sykes

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU would say a few words in answer to the remarks which had been made on this subject. The hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) had complained of the apathy of parents in regard to education; and the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Alderman Lusk), it appeared, had arrived at the conclusion that we must have compulsory education. Now, he did not think they could carry out a system of compulsory education in England. It might be done in Prussia, but could it be done in England? For in Prussia they were accustomed to rigorous laws, and minute police supervision. But in England persons liked to judge for themselves and to act without governmental interference. In England a man's house, be he poor or rich, was his castle. Suppose the police went to the house of a British labourer and insisted that his children should attend school, what would be the result? The policeman would quickly be ejected through the door. They were not accustomed to such interference. Beside this, a clause for compulsory registration was necessary as the very foundation of a compulsory system. There must be an accurate register of every child in a parish, and a register of every child in school; and these must day by day be compared, and the delinquents hunted up by the police. Yet the House has constantly refused to sanction any clause for the compulsory registration of births. Would they now sanction not only that, but also the machinery necessary for compulsory education also? Moreover, how was it possible to carry it out? How were they to enforce it? Suppose a labourer were summoned because his child did not attend school, and he pleaded poverty, saying he had a large family and small wages, and suppose that he asked why he should not make use of the labour of one of his boys to assist in the maintenance of the family, would the magistrate not be apt to let him off? Next day another labourer would appear with a case nearly but not quite so strong. He would also be acquitted. Then another; he would be discharged. Thus they might drive a coach and four through their Act of Parliament, and there would be an end of the compulsory system of education. Children did not attend school; but why was it? On account of the apathy of their parents? Get rid of that apathy and the children would attend school; but if they did not get rid of that apathy he defied them to carry out a compulsory system. Where education was valued, compulsory education was unnecessary; where it was not valued, compulsory education was impossible. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Foster) had alluded to the proposal for the appointment of a Minister of Education, which he approved chiefly because that Minister would bring forward the Education Estimates in that House. The object was to give the power to the Crown to appoint a Minister of Education, without constraining the Crown to choose a commoner. The President of the Council had at present a multiplicity of duties to perform, and could not attend to educational matters; while the Minister who administered the system of national education should devote himself to that subject alone, and he would find plenty to do. He would have to administer a large sum of money—larger than either the Colonial or Home Secretary had to administer. Numerous duties would devolve upon him. He would have to concern himself with the education of the lower class and of the middle class in this country; with the Irish Education system, with science and art, and perhaps with Colleges and Universities. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bruce) had said that in every country where there was good education, there they found local rating and local efforts; but he denied that they were necessarily combined. Local effort was not peculiar to rating, which was not the result of effort, but of compulsion. Local effort belonged much rather to voluntary subscriptions and voluntary labour. The right hon. Gentleman compared our system with that of other countries. Our system was a new one. This was the principle of it: that local effort should be assisted by the State. The State did not begin the work of education; it had not the initiative. It was only when local effort had given proof of local valuing of education that the State stepped in and gave its aid. Such a system had never been tried elsewhere. In this country it dated from 1842, or at furthest from 1839. It was unfair to compare that system with the system of other countries; that in America, beginning with the present century, or that of Scotland, which dated from 1660. But we had taken up our system a few short years ago; and yet we were surpassing the systems of education which had existed so long in other countries. The hon. Member for Finsbury said that ratepayers took greater interest in schools when local rates were imposed. But was that the case with other rates? Were not the London Boards of Guardians, for instance, complained of in all the newspapers? Were they not vilipended, and most justly censured? Rates were raised for the poor; and yet the ratepayers took no interest in the poor. They cared only to reduce the rates. And would not the same be the case in regard to education when supported by rates? A system of false economy would be introduced, and expenditure would be cut down till education itself would die out or become so degraded that no one would care for it. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) complained of putting the Revised Code into an Act of Parliament. But the managers of schools complained of the constant changes. They feared to undertake anything, lest some new Minute might damage their interests, and therefore it was thought desirable that the Revised Code, with many emendations in it, should be put into an Act of Parliament, in order that there might be a permanent system, instead of a changeable law. The hon. and learned Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) asked how the Conscience Clause was to be administered. There was no change in that respect. He had stated to the House last year on May 3, the rule which would guide him; and he had never deviated from that rule. Many hon. Members had complained that the Government had not carried out their original intention of removing the 8th Article from the Code. But did not the Government propose in their Bill to omit that Article, in order to respect the scruples of those who objected to the restriction it imposed, and to permit them to come in without subjecting them to the pressure of which they complained? The Government showed their animus by introducing this relaxation in the Bill; they proved their generosity by withdrawing the Bill. For hon. Members asked why the Bill had been withdrawn? They said it would have been better to have gone on with the Bill, seeing that its provisions would not have been much disputed in that House. The simple answer to that remark was that it was done in generous deference to the wishes of the House. For it was said that the Government did not possess the confidence of the House, and therefore that they ought to drop all legislation except legislation of an absolutely necessary character, in order that there might be a speedy dissolution. In order to secure an early dissolution the Government had accordingly dropped the Bills they had framed with reference to this and to other subjects. The right hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil (Mr. Bruce) asked whether it was the duty of the State to teach religion at all; while the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) went further, or spoke with more courage; for he said that it was the duty of the State to provide secular education only. But what was their end? What was the object of education? Why should Government assist in promoting education? Let anyone make out a case in answer to that question. In granting funds for educational purposes the object of the Government was to make men better citizens and better men. If that was not the end in view, what other end was there? He would like to hear anyone attempt to defend a State education except on the ground that the Government should strive to make men become better. Or if the State was not to do it, what other body was to do it? A body, doubtless, of far higher authority; for this was the highest end in life. But if that object were to be attained it would not be sufficient merely to teach reading, writing, and arithmetic, or even to give a scientific education. Palmer, Rush, Smethurst, Townley, and numbers of others whom he could name were not deterred from committing murders by the education they had received. Were they good men? Were they good citizens? Therefore some other kind of education was necessary, besides secular education. That other kind was the most necessary; for its end was the end of life. But secular education was not necessary; for a tailor could make as many coats or a cobbler as many shoes without being able to read. The right hon. Gentleman had even gone a step further, and had contended that the different denominations of inspectors should be done away with, and that they should have only one class of inspectors. But that would be doing away with the denominational system altogether. That system rested upon the power of veto which had been given to the different denominations — a power which had been wrested from the Government by each denomination separately. Did he never hear of the controversy concerning the Management Clauses which raged for twelve years? Did he not know that each denomination fought the Government separately for three or four years; and that the trust deed, and the Management Clause it contained was the treaty of peace between that religious body and the Government; and that the power of veto upon the appointment of an Inspector was thereby secured for ever? And yet the right hon. Gentleman now called upon the Government to fight them all at once, and to tear up the treaties of peace which had been entered into with them by taking from them the veto they possessed upon the appointment of the inspectors. The right hon. Gentleman also said he would rather take the average attendance at schools as a datum than any other estimate of the numbers of the children.

MR. BRUCE observed that what he said was that he preferred taking the average attendance at the schools as a datum rather than the numbers on the books.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the average attendance did not fairly represent the numbers of children who attended the schools, seeing that 42 per cent attended less than 200 times in the year, so that a large number of the children would count as fractions in the average attendance, instead of units. It was for this reason that the average attendance was usually taken as representing only 75 per cent of those who attended school. The hon. Member for Bradford had alluded to the statistics contained in the Report of the Birmingham Educational Society; but it must not be forgotten that these societies were supported by the money they obtained by subscription; and that it was not unlikely that their paid secretaries and treasurers, whose income depended on the existence and amount of funds of the society, would set to work to collect facts respecting educational destitution in large towns, which, put together, would make up most harrowing tales, calculated to induce silly women and doating old gentlemen to subscribe to the funds of the societies. The truth was that no sane man would give implicit credence to the Reports of these institutions, for they obtain their money by making out a bad case. He believed he had now answered all the questions that had been put to him, and he begged in conclusion to thank the Committee for the attention with which they had listened to him.

Lord Robert Montagu

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought that the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) had not dealt justly with the society to which he had referred in such strong language. The object of that society was not primarily to obtain information; it was to send those to school whose non-attendance was due to the apathy of their parents. In that object it had attained great success, and if the noble Lord had given the subject any consideration he felt certain that he would not have given expression to the opinions which had fallen from him that evening.

MR. BRUCE said, he would remind the Committee that the noble Lord in saying that no education was worthy of the name unless it combined religious with secular instruction had in reality censured the policy of the Government, inasmuch as the Bill which the Government had introduced in the other House of Parliament during the present Session had proposed to admit secular schools to the benefits of State assistance, on precisely the same footing as was done at present in the case of schools combining religious with secular instruction.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £141,690, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, of the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Science and Art, and of the Establishments connected therewith."

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, it was proposed in the present Estimates to make several important reductions in this Vote. The sum expended in purchases for distribution would be reduced by £10,000; for examples, by £600; for the purchase of food, &c., by £250; photography, by £2,000; and books, by £500; The expenditure on the National Portrait Exhibition would be reduced by the whole amount, £3,000. In reality, the collection had been brought down to the reign of Queen Victoria, and might not be continued. At all events it might now be regarded as self-supporting, inasmuch as the money taken at the doors was very nearly sufficient, if it did not exceed, the sum required for current expenses. It was also proposed to make the important reduction of £3,000 in connection with the Royal Museum, Bethnal Green; £250 in the purchase of books for the Jermyn Street Museum, and £1,000 in the purchase of books for the Edinburgh Museum. These figures would give a total reduction on the Vote of £20,600. The working of the science schools could be shown without troubling the Committee with any lengthened statement. In 1867 there were 212 science schools, attended by 10,230 persons, of whom 4,920 were examined, and by whom 8,437 papers were worked. In May, 1868, there were 302 schools, attended by 14,677 pupils, and of these about 8,000 were examined, while 13,112 papers were worked. 194 teachers had received in 1867 sums varying from £1 to £220, the average being £41 per teacher. The total sum was £7,976, being at the rate of 15s. 7d. per pupil; last year the average was 14s. 6d. The examinations were held simultaneously in 167 centres. At present 98 schools of art were in operation, giving instruction to 17,341 students. There were 588 schools for the poor, in which 791,411 poor children had been taught drawing during the year. In 1866, night classes for drawing had been established for persons above twelve years of age: there are now 72 such classes. Last year there were 32. In the National Art Training School there were 28 students training to be masters of schools of art; 118 free students receiving tuition and 727 students paying fees. Several exhibitions and scholarships had been established, notably among which were 60 of £25 each, and 30 of £100, which had been founded by Mr. Whitworth.

MR. DILLWYN commented upon the rapidity with which the Vote for this Department had of late years been increasing. In spite of the reduction of the original Estimate there was still an increase of over £8,000. For his own part there were several directions in which he would rather witness a reduction of the Vote than in the purchase of books. It was, however, of very little, if any use, for any Member to attempt a reduction, because his experience had shown him that an hon. Member in making such an attempt would be undertaking a thankless task, and one in which he had very little chance of being successful, especially when the reduction proposed was at all connected with the Science and Art Department. His attention was first directed to this subject in 1855, when he was entirely new to the ways of the House, and when the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright)—then the hon. Member for Manchester—predicted, in language which at the time he regarded as overstrained, that which since had actually happened. It was at that time proposed to erect a building of some kind for the reception of works of art; and the hon. Member then warned the Committee that they were about to fall into a trap, because if they agreed to a proposed outlay, the time would soon come when the Committee would be assured that the building was discreditable to the nation and to so valuable a collection, and largely increased votes would therefore be required for it. The hon. Gentleman at the same time reminded the Committee that they were about to launch into an expenditure which would constantly increase, and which might last for fifty years. In 1857, the expenses of general management in London were £2,917; in 1868 they had grown to £8,507. The general Estimates for Science and Art had grown from £7,000 in 1857 to £40,000 in 1868. In 1860 there appeared an item of £17,000 for permanent buildings, which had grown to £32,500 in the present year. For general and local management of all schools the expenses had grown from £12,000 to £401,590. The total expense of buildings had been £187,000, and the entire expenditure presented a total of £701,555. He hoped these facts would arouse the attention of the House and the Government, to see whether we obtained any adequate return for this large outlay. The only results visible at present were not admitted by competent judges to offer evidence of good science and good art. There could be no doubt that we had embarked in a vast and increasing expenditure for a very questionable purpose.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE believed that the hon. Member for Swansea had missed the true reason for the blunders in public taste which he had denounced. For his own part he maintained that until there was a real Department of Architecture, Science, and Art, there would always be an increase of expenditure and a paralysis of efficient administration. The true remedy for the evil would be found in dissolving the ill-assorted marriage between the Department of Practical Education represented at the Council Office, and the Department of Science and Art, charged as the former was with responsibilities for the conduct of elementary instruction of a totally distinct character from those of its artistic side, and in combining the latter with the more cognate Department of Public Works, under a strong Minister of Arts, Science, and Public Works. To this Committee the trustees of an enlarged

Mr. Dillwyn

British Museum, responsible both for the Museum and the South Kensington Collections, ought to be responsible. The expenditure of £750,000, to which the hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn) had alluded, though nominally incurred in London, had really been partly spent for the benefit of the provinces, in training masters and forming the collections which were afterwards to be sent round as models. For his part, having regard to the successful results which had been attained, and having had opportunities of judging of the excellent social and civilizing results of the science and art schools throughout the country, he felt astonished at the smallness of the outlay. No man probably had been engaged in more small squabbles than himself with the administration at South Kensington, or had more frequently spoken his mind roundly on particular points when he believed it to be in the wrong; but he felt it due to the authorities there to bear testimony to the great zeal and energy shown by the Department. Whatever might be the faults of Mr. Cole, or of other men with whom he was associated, want of a disposition to "go-ahead" could not be charged against them. They had organized a remarkable collection of works of art, which was an honour to the country, and it would be only cheeseparing to complain of the cost. Let there be one efficient Administration, and let it correspond directly with the British Museum as the one Executive Board for collecting purposes, and the complaints would be considerably silenced. The real defect lay in the paralysis of administration, resulting from the exercise of divided and often antagonistic authority. The Department at South Kensington was not to be blamed; but, on the contrary, it deserved credit for its achievements in the face of this palpable absurdity. He had listened with regret to the long list of retrenchments announced by his noble Friend (Lord Robert Montagu) fearing that some valuable interest must have suffered by those reductions.

MR. GREGORY concurred with his hon. Friend who had last spoken (Mr. Beresford Hope) that institutions of science and art to be efficient must be supported with generosity by the nation, and he did not think the total amount totted up by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) need alarm the House of Commons. It was of great importance, however, to have regularity and systematic exhibition in the Department, and it was still more important to have in the institution at South Kensington a museum to step in where the British Museum ended, starting with the Mediæval Collections and coming down to the present time. But, as long as things were in their present fluctuating condition, it was impossible for this to be done. He wished to see the Kensington Museum separated from the educational Departments. That museum might be made for mediæval art what the British Museum was for ancient art. Then he wanted to know who was responsible for the purchases made for the Kensington Museum. He understood there was no system in regard to the responsibility of those purchases. He heard that gentlemen at the British Museum had been applied to for their assistance in the matter, but had refused it; and he was further informed that the next application for advice was to tradesmen who dealt in articles of the character of those which it was proposed to purchase. He did not say that opinions ought not to be taken; but he did contend that some authority ought to be responsible for the purchases. The next point to which he had to refer was the removal of the iron buildings from South Kensington to Bethnal Green and the erection of a museum at the latter place. Last year a Vote of £5,000 was taken, and this year a further Vote of £10,000 was proposed to be taken for the removal of those buildings, and for other purposes in connection with the establishment of a museum at the East End of London. He presumed there were other purposes in view, because £15,000 could scarcely be required for the removal of the buildings. [Lord ROBERT MONTAGU: The buildings have to be erected also.] Now, in his opinion, this was a matter on which the opinion of the House of Commons ought to be distinctly taken; because if it was intended to scatter objects of art about London and to exhibit them in different museums, there was not a town in the kingdom which would not feel itself entitled to put in its claim for a museum of its own to be established at the public expense. Once more he protested against the publication of what was called the Universal Art Catalogue. He had done so when the Department proposed to publish that catalogue in the supplement of The Times. The reason given for that had been that The Times was read all over the world. The House, however, was opposed to this publication of the Art Catalogue in The Times. So, when that failed, the next step taken was to publish the catalogue in the supplement of Notes and Queries. It could not be said that the supplement of Notes and Queries was read all over the world. If it was intended to publish merely a small catalogue which would enable a person to refer to an object in a moment, he should not have objected to that; but to publish a universal art catalogue, apart from the catalogue of the British Museum, was as puerile a waste of money as had ever been undertaken. The original project was to make a catalogue of all works of art necessary for an art library; but now this project had expanded into the absurd scheme of making a catalogue which, as Mr. Quaritch showed in his excellent statement laid before the House last year, would embrace every work which had an illustration within it. If the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) could not separate the item for this catalogue from the sum required for printing the catalogue of the British Museum, he should feel bound to take the sense of the Committee on the subject.

GENERAL DUNNE felt, with the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), that every town in the country would have as good a right to apply for the establishment of local museums as well as a district of the metropolis. He thought it most preposterous that while the Science and Art Grant to the whole of Scotland was only £17,000, and in Ireland an amount incommensurate with her wants and the taxation she paid, one of the most unpromising districts in London got £15,000. The Geological Survey, if properly carried out, was a matter of considerable importance, especially in regard to coal, and he had on a former occasion wished to know whether the labours of the Commission were to extend to Ireland? The Secretary to the Treasury had promised to inquire and state the decision come to on this point, and he now wished to renew the question.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he saw that the sum of £15,000 was to be appropriated to purchases made at the recent Paris Exhibition, and he should be glad to know what was the precise nature of those purchases?

MR. POWELL thought the House ought to be generous in dealing with any Government proposal for the cultivation of science and art. He wished, however, for some explanation of a charge of £3,000 for the preparation of papers, &c., for examination?

MR. A. SEYMOUR remarked that the Vote had been reduced to the extent of £600 by the two Art Referees having been done away with; but, on the other hand, £300 had been added to the salary of the General Superintendent. He wished to be informed, therefore, whether that gentleman discharged the duties which formerly devolved upon the Art Referees? He thought that if a large sum of money was laid out on an institution like the Kensington Museum, it was advisable the House should see that the public got a quid pro quo for their money, and that more rubbish of specimens were not purchased. He trusted the noble Lord would explain why so large a sum as £10,000 was put down for specimens?

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING-MAXWELL remarked that the reason assigned for the publication of the Art Catalogue was that the attention of persons interested in art would be directed to it, and that they would make corrections and additions as the work progressed. It would be satisfactory to know whether such a result had followed the publication of the catalogue, and also whether there had been any demand for the work on the part of the public.

COLONEL SYKES thought no hon. Member ought to grudge the money that had been expended on the South Kensington Museum, which no person, of whatever age, could visit without bringing away a new idea in his mind, at least; he spoke for himself. Indeed, in his opinion, that Museum did as much for the instruction of the people, by the eye, as all the elementary schools in the country.

MR. SCOURFIELD doubted whether these very large collections really promoted the circulation of a knowledge of science and art, and expressed his belief that in this respect a few well-chosen specimens were far more effective. A high authority on the subject had remarked that the contemplation of works of art without understanding them jaded the faculties and enslaved the intelligence.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he was anxious to know who were the parties responsible for the expenditure in the Department under discussion. He was of opinion that it would be much better to expend a large sum at once upon a suitable building than to be annually spending amounts of money in detail for the purpose of enlarging and improving the present edifice, which was by no means an ornament.

Mr. Powell

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, the hon. Member (Mr. A. Seymour) had proceeded on a wrong assumption with regard to the General Superintendent, who was not called upon to discharge the duties of an Art Referee. It was true, however, that £300 a year had been added to the salary of the gentleman in question—Mr. Cole; but this was by way of recognizing the great efforts he had made in establishing the Museum. Since the abolition of the permanent Art Referees, gentlemen skilled in different branches of science and art were consulted as to intended purchases, and were paid according to a set scale of fees. In each branch the best authority was selected, and the result was that the work was better done and done at a cheaper rate than under the old system. As to the Royal Museum at Bethnal Green, he might remark that it was no more a local institution because it was in Bethnal Green than the British Museum was a local institution from the circumstance of its being situated in Bloomsbury, or than Kew Botanical Gardens because they were in Kew. With reference to the publication of the Art Catalogue in Notes and Queries, it was through that medium circulated far and wide, and many corrections from correspondents had come in. Copies were sent abroad and they elicited the information required. It was originally contemplated that the Geological Survey should terminate in 1875-6, but Sir Roderick Murchison was anxious that it should be completed earlier, and the staff was increased last year in order that the survey might proceed more quickly. A report of the progress of the survey, accompanied by maps, was published every year. No steps were taken towards purchasing anything at the Paris Exhibition until the Committee appointed by the House had published its Report, and then three gentlemen were sent over to make the purchases recommended by the Committee. These might be seen at South Kensington Museum. The increase in the number of science and art schools necessitated the increase in the Estimate for the preparation of examination papers and diagrams, and if £1,600 was exceeded last year, £3,000 would not be more than sufficient this year. The exhibition of art specimens was not confined to London; they were sent all over the country. Many had been sent to the Exhibition at Leeds; a similar collection was to be sent next year to Bolton; and independently of special exhibitions, pictures and works of art were constantly circulating among the art schools, where the pupils had the opportunity of studying them and making copies, while the public had also the privilege of inspection. Doubtless a large collection kept at one place would not be favourable to the general advancement of art; but broken up for circulation the collection could no longer be regarded as a large one. The Lord President and himself were responsible for the expenditure, and of course could be called to account for it in the House; but the utmost care was exercised in the making of purchases, which were entertained only upon report, and not effected without further reference.

MR. DILLWYN protested against the principle of granting money to the Bethnal Green Museum, on the ground that it was to be a means of education to the people of the East End of London as distinct from those of the West. Were that principle thoroughly carried out, Liverpool or Swansea might advance claims for money upon the same ground. One of his objections to the South Kensington Museum was that it was a local museum scattered about in different places; and he always thought it would have been better if the large sum spent there had been expended on the British Museum. He insisted that there ought to be a collection of works of art and science in the metropolis worthy of the nation, and not a collection merely for the purpose of educating a locality in science and art. If collections were to be established in particular localities, where was the expenditure for such things to stop? If every locality was to have its collection, the expense would be gigantic. He suggested that the appointments, which were very good ones, in the national collection, should be held out as premiums to men who distinguished themselves in art and science.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU denied that this was a local museum. It was in every way national, and the objects displayed there were sent by turns all over the kingdom. What was meant by the term "local museum?" Had hon. Members ever asked themselves what was meant by a national museum? Every museum must be in some place. Was it therefore local? The inhabitants of Bloomsbury and the rich who had carriages came from a distance to see the British Museum. Yet it was called a national museum. The working classes of Bethnal Green could not reach it; but they would flock to the Royal Museum there. Why should it not be a national museum. He was at a loss to know.

COLONEL SYKES said, the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had asked where the expenditure was to stop, if museums were established at Liverpool and other places. The answer was simply this—Liverpool and other large towns were rich enough to supply themselves with museums; but Bethnal Green was poor, and a Vote of the Committee would enable them to get instruction which otherwise they could not get.

MR. LOCKE asked how the £20,000 set down for the "Auxiliary Museum in the East of London" was to be expended? He had understood that it was to be applied to the purchase of the land at Bethnal Green. Was it to be devoted to carting away the "Brompton boilers" to Bethnal Green?

MR. BENTINCK said, his noble Friend (Lord Robert Montagu) had made no allusion to the question of the permanent building. In 1866 an Estimate was laid before the House, showing that £420,000 was asked for by the Science and Art Department for the permanent building. The Treasury reduced the amount to £220,000. Last year the Estimate was brought on for discussion on the 9th of August, when nobody was present, and the result was that it passed without attracting public attention. What he wanted to know was whether the Government had agreed with the officials of the Science and Art Department to limit the expenditure to £195,000, and, if so, where were the plans to show how that sum was to be expended? He should be glad to learn whether the noble Lord was willing to guarantee that, after the £195,000 had been expended at the rate of £32,000 per annum, no further sum would be asked for.

MR. BRUCE desired to say a few words on this Vote, inasmuch as it was the late Government that was really responsible for the expenditure to which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) had just referred. The origin of this Vote had been alluded to by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). In 1860 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) moved the appointment of a Committee on the subject, and the Committee recommended that a plan for a permanent building should be adopted. The whole of the South Kensington Museum had been a matter of gradual growth. The production of a plan was insisted upon on the part of the Treasury by his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), and the expenditure was limited to £195,000, which was to be extended over six years. It was that plan which their successors had adopted, and when the £195,000 should be expended it would be for the House of Commons to decide whether the building should be in any way extended. He was also to some extent responsible for the system adopted with regard to Referees, for as one of a Commission of Inquiry upon the subject of the Department he had decided against the appointment of permanent Referees, and had approved the selection of gentlemen known to be qualified to judge of the particular matter on which a decision was required.

MR. CANDLISH reminded the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu), that he had not informed the Committee how much of the Vote was to be expended on the Art Catalogue.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU replied that the sum proposed to be expended in that direction was £1,000. In answer to the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) he might say that the land required for the erection of the Bethnal Green Museum had been purchased.

MR. GREGORY said, his criticism upon the Bethnal Green Museum had not been dictated by any feeling against that particular district. He should be glad to witness a more general extension of museums over the country; but he thought some definite and fixed principle ought to be laid down, so that persons in different localities might know what local exertion was necessary before they could expect to receive any State assistance. The Art Catalogue, however, to which the responsibility of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr Tydfil (Mr. Bruce) also extended, was the subject to which he now particularly desired to allude. The opinions referred to by the noble Lord did not in the slightest degree justify the preparation of this enormous catalogue, in the first number of which thirty-five different editions of Æsop were quoted. Mr. Quaritch, the eminent bookseller, had distinctly stated that to carry out the idea of this catalogue it would be necessary to include every species of book containing illustrations. It might, and no doubt would, be well to make a thoroughly good catalogue of the existing library in South Kensington Museum; but such a catalogue as the one now in course of preparation involved a foolish and a useless waste of public money, and it was with a view to prevent this waste that he now moved that the Vote be reduced by the £1,000 intended to be devoted to the preparation of this catalogue.

Mr. Bruce

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the Item of £2,500, for Preparation, Illustration, and Printing of Catalogues and Inventories of the Museum, and Universal Art Catalogue and Inventories, be reduced by the sum of £1,000."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 54: Majority 20.

MR. BENTINCK complained of not having received a reply to his inquiry. He asked whether any plans of the building, which it was said was to cost £195,000, would be laid before the Committee?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, the reason he had not replied to the Question of his hon. Friend was because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Bruce) had given an answer a great deal better than he could have done. His hon. Friend had asked whether he would lay the plans to which he had referred before the House? All he could say was that the plans and the Correspondence had been laid before the House in July, 1866. The buildings in question would cost only £195,000, and the expenditure would be spread over a period of six years. If any further expenditure was to be incurred, it must be done with the sanction of the House. He could not prophesy what the House might think well to do at a future time.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(10.) £6,063, to complete the sum for the University of London.

(11.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £10,992, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for the Salaries and Expenses of the National Gallery, including the purchase of Pictures."

MR. BENTINCK expressed a hope that this Vote would not be pressed that night in the absence of many hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in it.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he was sorry he could not accede to the request of the hon. Gentleman. He had already intimated his intention of bringing on the Vote.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Bentinck,)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £800, to complete the sum for the British Historical Portrait Gallery.

(13.) £235,195, to complete the sum for National Education in Ireland.

(14.) £730, Commissioners of Education in Ireland.

(15.) £2,155, to complete the sum for the Queen's University, Ireland.

(16.) £1,740, to complete the sum for the National Gallery, Ireland.

(17.) £5,083, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Great Britain.

(18.) £34,040, to complete the sum for Merchant Seamen's Fund, Pensions, &c.

(19.) £30,400, to complete the sum for Relief of distressed British Seamen.

(20.) £145,857, to complete the sum for Superannuation and Retired Allowances.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, this Vote had increased by more than £8,000. He complained that offices were abolished and young officers pensioned, and new clerks appointed. The officers, instead of being pensioned, ought to be transferred to other Departments and utilized.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER admitted that these allowances should be watched with great jealousy, and that it was undesirable to grant them to persons fit for service except on very special grounds. In the case of the Board of Trade the re-organization of the Department had necessitated the abolition of certain offices, some of which had been held for a very long time by men who could not well be now put to junior work. Allowances in these and other cases had been granted with great care.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, the War Office had pensioned a number of clerks, some not very old, and at the same time the number of clerks had been increased.

Vote agreed to.

(21.) £13,134, to complete the sum for Hospitals and Infirmarys, Ireland.

(22.) £4,915, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Ireland.

(23.) £14,000, to complete the sum for Temporary Commissions.

(24.) £780, Malta and Alexandria Cable, and Balmoral Telegraph.

(25.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £19,377, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for certain Miscellaneous Expenses."

SIR J. CLARKE JERVOISE objected to the enormous expense of the inspectors of cattle. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £11,058, being the amount charged for the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £11,058 17s. 6d., for the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council Office, Salaries and Expenses, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Sir Jervoise Clarke Jervoise.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he hoped the hon. Baronet would not persevere in the Motion. The Vote was to provide for current expenses, many items of which had been incurred during the past year. At present there was a Treasury Commission investigating this head of expenditure, which would probably lead to considerable reductions.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHILDERS asked for an explanation of the item of £6,070 for robes, collars, and badges for the Knights of the several Orders, the charge last year having been only £1,500?

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK complained of the item of £6,000 for robes, badges, and collars which had increased to that sum from £1,500, at which it stood last year. He thought such a sum unreasonable, and one that could not be justified. He moved that it be reduced to that amount, £1,500.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had inquired into the matter when he was Secretary of the Treasury, and considered that they could not refuse to insert this item. If the Committee now passed this Vote he should be prepared to make a further explanation on the Report.

MR. DISRAELI explained that these honours were conferred by Her Majesty, and it was therefore obvious that the item ought to stand.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK withdrew his Motion, but gave notice that he should move the reduction of the Vote by £4,500 on the Report.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(26.) £31,599, to complete the sum for Local Dues on Shipping under Treaties of Reciprocity.

(27.) £2,000, for promoting the Cultivation of Flax in Ireland.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK complained that the greater part of the Vote was really expended in travelling expenses—namely, £1,860, and he also condemned the principle of the Vote. Why should Irishmen be, as it were, bribed to do their duty to themselves? The farmers of Ireland were intelligent men and could get on very well without it, if they were left alone. He moved the omission of the item.

THE EARL OF MAYO explained that the increase of the Grant was due to certain representations that had been made to the Government respecting the importance of proper instruction being given to the Irish people in the cultivation of flax by competent instructors. The Vote was not to be regarded as a permanent one.

MR. CHILDERS pointed out how the Vote had increased, although it was to have been only temporary, and trusted it would speedily disappear altogether from the Estimates.

MR. M'LAREN thought the Vote ought to be altogether omitted, as everybody seemed to have somebody else to watch him, and in that way £1,860 was spent in travelling.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for encouraging the Cultivation of Flax in the South and West of Ireland."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 18: Majority 25.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [May 29] reported.

Res. 7. (Register House, Edinburgh).

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE observed that a Committee in 1866 had unanimously reported that a salary should be attached to the responsible head of the important office of the Lord Clerk Register; and he wished to know whether the Government intended to adopt the recommendation of the Committee?

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING-MAXWELL said, that the powers of the Lord Clerk Register were already very great, and that both his powers and duties would be considerably increased by a Bill now before the House; it appeared to him neither expedient nor fair to confer powers or impose duties on an unsalaried officer.

MR. M'LAREN contended that the office of Lord Clerk Register was a mere sinecure. It was held at one time by a Governor General of India (Lord Dalhousie), it was then abolished, it was then revived as an honorary office, and now it was proposed, without any increase of duties, to make it a salaried office.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE was of opinion that the Scotch Members had a right to complain of the surplus fees being sent to the Treasury without adequate provision being made for the performance of official duties.

MR. CRAUFURD agreed in the opinion that the office of Lord Clerk Register ought no longer to be a sinecure.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, it was true that in the case of Lord Dalhousie the office of the Lord Clerk Register was a sinecure. The duties were performed by a deputy, but Lord Dalhousie did not receive the salary. The salary had been abolished by Act of Parliament, and could only be revived by the same means. He certainly thought that the office ought not to be a sinecure; but as to the extent to which the office might require revision, and what the amount of salary ought to be, he was not prepared to give any opinion.

Resolution 11. (Government Prisons and Expenses of Transportation).

MR. CHILDERS renewed the question he had put on a previous evening, as to the absurdity of sending the convicts to Gibraltar, when their labour would be of value in this country, and desired to know whether his hon. Friend (Sir James Fergusson) could give him an assurance that the present extravagant system should be altered?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, the fact was that the convict prisons in England were full. Formerly that was not the case, because 600 convicts were sent to Australia every year; but now, in consequence of transportation having been put an end to and from the fact that under sentences of penal servitude convicts were subjected to more lengthened detention, we had more convicts at home than we could well provide for. About 200 were consequently sent to Gibraltar a short time since; but no more would be sent this year because for the present we could provide for them in this country. In Gibraltar convict labour was of value, from the great difficulty, if not the absolute impossibility, of obtaining free labour. The works at Chatham might be pressed on with greater rapidity if more convict labour were employed; but to do this it would be necessary to construct barracks for them, and it was doubtful whether it would be advantageous to incur the expense. It should be remembered, too, that formerly a large number of convicts were housed in hulks, but that that system had been abandoned. He could therefore assure the hon. Gentleman that there was no intention of sending any convicts to Gibraltar if it was possible to accommodate them at home.

Resolutions agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter
before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, June 5, 1868.

MINUTES]—PUBLIC BILL—Committee—Established Church (Ireland) [117].

Report—Established Church (Ireland) [117].

METROPOLITAN FOREIGN CATTLE MARKET BILL.—MOTION.

MR. MILNER GIBSON moved that it be referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, to inquire whether the Amendments which have been introduced in the Select Committee on the Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market Bill involve any infraction of the Standing Orders. The right hon. Gentleman said that this Bill was introduced to the House in a most imperfect form, inasmuch as its main object was not indicated by any of its clauses. He made inquiry as to the reason of this, and, after some difficulty, he was told that the reason of this clause not being introduced was, that the Notices which had been given in the Gazette of the intention of the Government to bring in this Bill would not cover the ground, and that, therefore, if the clause had been introduced, the Bill might have fallen through when brought before the Committee of Standing Orders. This clause was, therefore, not introduced till after the second reading, when it was inserted by the Select Committee. That clause required that all foreign cattle should be taken to one particular place on the Lower Thames to be slaughtered, and this prohibited the use of a number of private wharves, where the cattle trade had hitherto been carried on. This, in point of fact, would be to take away the property of persons who were now conducting their business according to law. The clause had given rise to large claims for compensation; and, as it had been introduced by a Select Committee, as it interfered with private rights, and as it contemplated objects not within the original Notices, he thought that it ought to be referred back to the Examiners.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU thought he had a little to complain of, as he did not get notice of this Motion.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the Notice was on the Paper, and he fixed it for to-day in order to escape the charge of delaying the Bill.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU contended that this could not be regarded as a Private Bill, and should not be subject to the laws which applied to Bills of that description. A Private Bill was a Bill introduced for the particular benefit of certain persons. Their benefit was, of course, the injury of others. A Committee was therefore appointed by Parliament to adjust their conflicting interests—and Parliament acted in its judicial capacity. Then a surprise, or a point suddenly raised without due notice might cause considerable injury to one of the parties, and might prevent the Committee from judging justly. Hence, the Standing Order which applied to the case. But this was a Public Bill, as a reference to Sir Thomas May's book, at pages 627, 628, and 728 would show. This was a Bill for the benefit of the country at large. It stood among the Orders for Public Bills, and could not, in any way, be regarded as a Bill for the particular benefit of any individuals. Besides which, there had been no surprise, in the matter, because, in November last year, he himself gave Notice of the clause in question, and it had appeared on the Notice Paper every Saturday since. That Notice was quite in accordance with the Preamble of the Bill. The Preamble stated that it was expedient to make a market for the sale and slaughter of cattle, and if the slaughter of cattle was out of the Order of Reference, so was their sale. But he had had no opportunity of introducing the clause before it went to the Committee upstairs, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ashton (Mr. Milner Gibson) rose on the second reading, and opposed the Bill on the very ground that compulsory slaughter at the waterside was not in accordance with the recommendations of his (the Trade in Animals) Committee. He then regarded compulsory slaughter as the very principle of the Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman then said that he would not divide the House if the Bill might be referred to a hybrid Committee. The clause was then put in manuscript into "the filled up Bill," which was sent to all the petitioners against the Bill, and laid before the Committee. Nay, more; every petitioner against the Bill had alleged this very point of compulsory slaughter as the special ground of objection against the Bill. The counsel for the promoters, in opening the case, read this very manuscript clause as the very point and essence of the Bill. Every witness who was called against the Bill endeavoured to prove that the Bill would be injurious, because of the compulsory slaughter; and the wharfingers and butchers and others claimed compensation on that very ground. The learned Counsel (Mr. Vernon Harcourt), when closing his case against the Bill, rested chiefly on this very clause; but never raised the objection that the clause was contrary to the Standing Orders. It was clear, therefore, that full notice had been given and received, that there was no surprise, and that the objection was merely technical, and was raised only for the sake of delay. But what would follow? If that clause were out of the Order of Reference, the Compensation Clause, which was inserted as a corollary to it, should also be struck out; and all the evidence of the opponents which referred to it, was also out of the Order of Reference, and could, therefore, not be received by the House. He would, however, not object to the matter being referred to the Examiners, on the honourable understanding that the Bill should not be in any way delayed.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he had no intention of delaying the progress of the Bill; but the course he proposed would not occasion any delay, as the Bill was not to be proceeded with until Monday week, and during next week there would be ample time for the inquiry he proposed.

Lord Robert Montagu

Ordered, That it be referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills to inquire whether the Amendments which have been introduced in the Select Committee on the Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market Bill involve any infraction of the Standing Orders.—(Mr. Milner Gibson.)

MR. MILNER GIBSON then moved, in order that the persons interested might have full notice, and be able to send in their memorials to the Examiners, the addition to his first Motion of the following words—

"Memorials complaining of non-compliance with the Standing Orders be deposited in the Private Bill Office not later than Tuesday the 9th day of this instant June, and that the Examiner do give three clear days' notice of the sitting."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Memorials complaining of non-compliance with the Standing Orders be deposited in the Private Bill Office not later than Tuesday the 9th day of this instant June, and that the Examiner do give three clear days' notice of the sitting."—(Mr. Milner Gibson.)

MR. DODSON pointed out that such a Resolution was hardly necessary, as the Examiners were in the habit of giving two days' notice, and he thought it would be sufficient if the matter were left to them.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

POST OFFICE—THE CAPE MAIL.

QUESTION.

MR. MORRISON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether there is any objection to the bi-monthly, as well as the monthly Mail for the Cape of Good Hope, being embarked and disembarked in the port of Plymouth?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: The bi-monthly as well as monthly Mail will be embarked and disembarked at Plymouth as soon as the new Contract is brought into operation.

ARMY—OFFICERS IN COMMAND OF DEPÔTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, If the Circular relating to Officers in Command of Depôts, issued last year, is to extend to those Officers in Command before that Circular was issued from the Horse Guards?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I find, on inquiry, that no circular of the nature referred to by the hon. and gallant Member, was issued last year; and I presume that the circular to which the Question refers was one issued in December, 1866. I hold a copy of the circular in my hand, and it does not appear to be open to the Question he put. It consists of three clauses, and the first begins thus — "The present Lieutenant Colonels of Depot Battalions shall remain in undisturbed possession of their employment until removed by casualties." The last clause is this—"Officers appointed at any period hereafter shall hold the appointment for five years." No words can be more clear than these to show that the regulation is to have no retrospective action.

BOUNDARY COMMISSIONERS' REPORT. QUESTION.

MR. STOPFORD said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to adopt the recommendation of the Select Committee as to the non-extension of the Boundaries of fifteen Boroughs, contrary to the Report of the Boundary Commissioners?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, we go into Committee on Monday next on the Boundary Bill, and then the Members of the Committee will have an opportunity of giving the reasons which induced them to adopt the recommendation which they have offered to the acceptance of the House, and I shall listen to those reasons with much interest.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES BILL. QUESTION.

MR. SCHREIBER said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Meath, Whether, at a recent meeting of Roman Catholic prelates, presided over by Archbishop Manning, it was decided that, in the present state of public feeling in this Country, it would be inexpedient to proceed with the Bill for the repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act; and, whether, in consequence, he is now in a position to state what course he will pursue, with respect to the Bill in question?

MR. MAC EVOY, in reply, said, except that inferentially, by means of the Notice of the hon. Member, he had no reason to think that any such meeting as that to which the hon. Gentleman referred had been held. If the hon. Member was correctly informed upon the subject, he must enjoy more of the confidence of the Roman Catholic prelates than he (Mr. Mac Evoy) could lay any claim to. With regard to the last part of the Question, he would remind the hon. Gentleman that, with the consent of the Government, a Committee had been appointed to inquire into the subject; and, in courtesy to that Committee, he had abstained from pressing the Bill, while they were prosecuting their investigations; but, as soon as their Report was presented, it was his intention to take the sense of the House on the second reading of the Bill.

ARMY—WAR DEPARTMENT. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, with reference to his promise that Vote 18 in the Army Estimates (Administration of the Army), should not be taken until a statement of the proposed changes in the organization of the War Department had been laid upon the Table of the House, When that statement will be submitted to Parliament; and, whether any statement of proposed alterations in the audit of Military Accounts will be laid before Parliament in sufficient time to enable the Committee of Public Accounts to consider them during the present Session?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that he did not recollect having made any such promise as that referred to in the Question of the noble Lord. When the Army Estimates were moved, he entered into a full statement of the changes which were intended in the War Department; but the details were not yet completed, and therefore he could not lay them upon the table of the House. As regarded the Audit Department, only one alteration had been made, and that was the transfer of the Department from the Assistant Under Secretary to the Parliamentary Under Secretary. The regulations, however, were not yet complete; but when they were, he would have no objection to lay them upon the table.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he and others were under the impression that, in the course of a desultory conversation in Committee on the Army Estimates, the understanding that Vote 18 shall not be taken till the statement in question has been laid on the table of the House was arrived at. It is most important that the House shall have the statement before proceeding to the Vote.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he must repeat that he did not recollect having made any promise on the subject, but he would endeavour to meet the wishes of the noble Lord if he would communicate with him privately.

SUPPLY—METROPOLIS—BURLINGTON HOUSE.—OBSERVATIONS.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. BERESFORD HOPE wished to call the attention of the First Commissioner of Works to an advertisement which, to his great surprise he read in The Times of that morning. It announced a sale by auction of the "valuable materials of the colonnade, with Doric stone columns and frieze," of Burlington House. That handsome colonnade of Burlington House, which had been so much talked of in that House, and the gateway, an interesting specimen of the architecture of the last century, were, it appeared, to be knocked down to the highest bidder. This sale would bring a few miserable pounds to the credit of some Government Department; but it would either remove from the metropolis or utterly abolish a monument of architecture which, besides being of historical interest, possessed a considerable amount of architectural beauty. The Government might take power to re-erect this colonnade and portico in one of the public parks or gardens—at Kew, for instance, or South Kensington, or Kensington Gardens. If not the colonnade, they might, at least, put up the archway as an entrance to something. He must protest against the Vandalism which neglected these monuments of the art and history of this country. It was bad enough when such things were done by private individuals; but when the Government allowed such objects to go to the hammer it was time a protest should be made. He trusted that the noble Lord would give the House some assurance that these monuments should not be knocked down to the highest bidder; but that they should be re-erected somewhere, on ground belonging to the country, where they might remain as monuments of architecture of an interesting period in our history.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he should be very happy to treat privately with his hon. Friend with respect to the sale of this colonnade. He was already in communication with his hon. Friend the

Sir John Pakington

Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) on the subject, and he should be glad to meet their views as to the re-erection of the colonnade and archway either in Bedgebury Park or elsewhere.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he thought that the noble Lord ought to have given a more serious answer. He did not believe the intention of the Government to knock down to the highest bidder the colonnade of Burlington House had been stated in that House.

NAVY—GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the circumstance that the daughters of Seamen killed or disabled in the service of the Country do not enjoy the privilege of maintenance and education at Greenwich Hospital.

MR. CORRY said, in reply, that under the wording of the statutes the daughters of seamen and marines killed in action would appear to have an equal claim with their sons to share in the funds of the Hospital. It was not the intention of the Admiralty to re-establish a girls' school in connection with Greenwich Hospital, but they were disposed to think that a certain portion of the income of that institution might be appropriated to the purpose of aiding local institutions for the education of the daughters of seamen and marines in the various ports. The question was referred to in the Report of the Greenwich Hospital Committee which would be presented in a few days, when his hon. Friend would see what was proposed.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON said, he rose to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) in reference to this Bill. He said the right hon. Gentleman had expressed a desire to respect all vested interests, and there were in Ireland a large and meritorious body of gentlemen—the vicars-general and registrars of different dioceses—who held their offices for life by patent; but whose incomes derived from fees for the registration of institutions and consecrations, would, if the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman became law—and he (Lord Claud John Hamilton) sincerely hoped it would not do so—be seriously affected. He wished to know, If it was the intention of the right hon.^d Gentleman] to introduce a Clause in his Bill to compensate those gentlemen for the loss they would sustain?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is the fashion, sometimes, to complain of want of Notice. I think the noble Lord would have done better to have placed a Notice of his Question upon the Paper; and probably a better course still would be to raise the question in Committee; but, as at present advised, I may say that I apprehend the gentlemen in question are entitled to certain fees for the performance of certain duties. But I am not aware of any fact—no representation has been made to me to show that they have a right to require that certain things shall be done in order that they may receive fees for doing them.

NAVY—GREENWICH HOSPITAL.
QUESTION.

MR. SEELY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, When the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the present system of management of Greenwich Hospital and Schools (which was laid upon the Table of the House on the 19th of May last) will be in the hands of Members?

MR. CORY said, in reply, that the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the present system of management of Greenwich Hospital and Schools, together with the Evidence, which was voluminous, would be in the hands of Members in a few days.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)
BILL.—[BILL 117.]
(Mr. Gladstone, Sir George Grey, Mr. Lawson.)
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. AYTOUN rose to move an Instruction to the Committee—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to provide in the said Bill, that the tenure of every office connected with the College of Maynooth be subject to like conditions with those to which official tenures connected with the Established Church in Ireland will be subject after the passing of this Act, and that no money shall be payable under the Act 8 and 9 Vic. c. 25, to the Trustees of the College of Maynooth for or for the use of any senior student or other student to be admitted after the passing of this Act.”

He said, that in addition to the three Resolutions of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) which had been carried, laying the foundation for the disestablishment of the Episcopal Church in Ireland on the principle of religious equality, a fourth Resolution had been carried, affirming the necessity of discontinuing the grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum as soon as the Episcopal Church in Ireland should be disestablished. The Bill upon which they were about to go into Committee had been brought in to give effect to the intentions expressed in the first three Resolutions; but in order to place all denominations on an equality in Ireland, it appeared to him to be necessary to treat the grant to Maynooth in exactly the same manner as they were about to treat the Established Church. The Bill enacted that when any archbishopric, bishopric, or other benefice became vacant, no successor should be appointed to it, but that its revenues should be paid into a fund to be placed in the hands of certain Commissioners; and by a subsequent clause, in the case where any congregation would be deprived of the religious services to which they had been accustomed through the non-appointment of a successor to their clergyman, temporary provision was to be made by the Commission for continuing the services of their church. It appeared to him it would be only fair and consistent that some step should be taken with regard to Maynooth analogous to that adopted by the Bill towards the Established Church. Accordingly, understanding that it was only by an Instruction to the Committee that could be done, he had placed on the Notice Paper the Motion with which he would conclude, referring to any vacancies which might occur in the professorships or other offices connected with the College of Maynooth, and also to a large number of studentships in that institution, for which sums were paid out of the Consolidated Fund. The Bill provided against any extension of the Established Church in Ireland, the 3rd section being to this effect—

“It shall not be lawful for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland to make any new grant for the building, re-building, or enlarging of any church or chapel, or for the building of any glebe house, or the augmentation of any benefice or the maintenance of any minister or the purchase of any house, land, or tithe-rent charge.”

That clause, taken in connection with the 1st clause, clearly pointed to the conclusion that, while all rights of property and all interests of individuals were to be respected, no extension of the Established Church was to be permitted. Therefore, if they were to deal in the same manner with Maynooth College, it would be necessary to enact that no money should continue to be payable out of the Consolidated Fund to the Trustees of that institution for the maintenance of any senior or other students admitted after the passing of the Act. The principle of the Resolutions was that all Churches in Ireland should be equally deprived of any assistance from the State; and the Bill based upon them having for its object to prevent the creation of any new life-interests connected with the Established Church, he thought that, in all fairness, the same rule ought to be applied to appointments in the College of Maynooth. In order that that might be done, he now begged to move his Instruction.

After a brief pause, during which no hon. Member rose to second the Motion, Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would second it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to provide in the said Bill, that the tenure of every office connected with the College of Maynooth be subject to like conditions with those to which official tenures connected with the Established Church in Ireland will be subject after the passing of this Act, and that no money shall be payable under the Act 8 and 9 Vic. c. 25, to the Trustees of the College of Maynooth for or for the use of any senior student or other student to be admitted after the passing of this Act."—(Mr. Sinclair Aytoun.)

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT said, he considered this Instruction quite unnecessary, and quite irrelevant to the Bill before the House. The object of the Bill was not to disestablish the Irish Church, but to prevent the growth of new personal interests in it between the present time and the period when the new Parliament, to which that matter was to be relegated, would come to deal with it. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Aytoun) desired to establish religious equality, but his proposal, if carried, would have a totally different result. It was a mistake to say that the Bill gave effect to the 1st Resolution of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). That was remitted to the new Parliament. The Bill gave effect only to the 2nd Resolution, which was merely intended to prevent the growth of new vested interests in the interim. The hon. Member said he wished, by his Instruction, to carry out the 4th Resolution, but the 4th Resolution declared that when effect was given to the 1st by disestablishment of the Irish Church, then the grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum should cease. But the hon. Gentleman proposed to prevent any students from entering the College of Maynooth between the present time and August, 1869; so that the operations of the College, as far as new students were concerned, would be immediately and entirely stopped. The hon. Member could not have understood the provisions of the Bill nor the explanation given of them by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, who had said that those provisions, combined with the Church Temporalities Act and the general ecclesiastical law were sufficient to enable every function and operation of the Established Church in Ireland to go forward, in different hands, indeed, but as really and efficiently as if the Bill were not passed. If the proposed Instruction were agreed to the operations of Maynooth would not go on; while all that was contemplated by the Bill in respect of the Established Church was the prevention of the growth of any new interests, and the Church itself was left to be dealt with by the new Parliament. When they were going to establish religious equality he very much objected that they should take this small sum from the religion of the mass of the Irish people, while they allowed the Irish Church Establishment to be dealt with by the new Parliament. He thought nothing could be more unfair; and he would simply remark that the Regium Donum was left out of sight. He was quite satisfied with the assurance of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire that no more State funds should be applied to religious purposes, and if that were not sufficient for the hon. Member, let him look again at the 4th Resolution adopted by the House, which said that when the Church of Ireland had been disestablished the grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum should be discontinued. It was therefore unnecessary to adopt the proposed Instruction. He would move as an Amendment, in the words of the 4th clause of the Bill, substituting Maynooth for the Established Church, that—

Mr. Aytoun

"Every person who shall be appointed to any office in the College of Maynooth, after the passing of this Act, shall hold the said office subject to the pleasure of Parliament."

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the words "Bill, that" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

"every person who shall be appointed to any office in the College of Maynooth, after the passing of this Act, shall hold the said office subject to the pleasure of Parliament," — (Colonel Greville-Nugent,)

—instead thereof.

MR. GLADSTONE : On a former evening when my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Aytoun) made a Motion relating to this subject, before the Bill was introduced, we were necessarily led to enter upon questions by which deep feelings were likely to be excited, because religious differences and questions of principle were involved. But I am not aware that on the present occasion any topic of that kind can naturally or properly be introduced ; because, in fact, on the former occasion we determined the principles on which we would proceed, and left for consideration nothing but questions, important indeed, but comparatively small, as to the mode in which effect was to be given to those principles. I wish just to point out to the hon. Gentleman that in my opinion he cannot consistently vote in favour of his own Instruction, because I am sure his intention is to adhere to the basis on which the House founded these proceedings, and his Instruction as it stands does not adhere to that principle. As the hon. Member for Longford (Colonel Greville-Nugent) has pointed out, there are two stages in the process which we on this side of the House contemplate. One is the final and entire disestablishment of the Church in Ireland, and the other the establishment of a provisional and intermediate state of things under which, as we consider, every spiritual and pastoral office of the Church is to go forward without difficulty and with sufficient provision made for it from the same sources as before, but no new vested interest is to be created. The House has adopted a Resolution to the effect that when legislative effect is given to the 1st Resolution about the disestablishment of the Irish Church, then the grants connected with Presbyterian and Roman Catholic purposes shall be wound up. I think my hon. Friend will see that he cannot possibly found his Instruction upon that Resolution. It is too much, and it is too little. It is too much, because the 4th Resolution points simply to the period of the disestablishment as the period at which certain measures are to be taken with regard to bodies other than the Established Church ; while this Instruction would stop absolutely, so far as the admission of new students is concerned, the operations of the College at Maynooth. It is entirely beyond the scope of the 4th Resolution, which has really nothing to do with this intermediate period, and it is, as applying to the College of Maynooth, a measure and rule of procedure which we do not apply to any of the offices of the Established Church. Therefore the Instruction errs on the side of excess. But it also errs on the side of defect, because when the hon. Member makes that provision with regard to the College at Maynooth he takes no notice of the reference in the 4th Resolution to the Regium Donum. On the simple ground that this Instruction goes much beyond the rule that the Suspensory Bill proposes to apply to the Establishment in Ireland, I apprehend that it is totally impossible for the House with consistency or propriety to accede to it. But the hon. Member for Longford, basing his Amendment upon grounds which are perfectly just and intelligible as far as principle is concerned, does really raise the point which I think the House ought to consider, and which we may consider without prejudice from any controversial topic whatever. We who are friendly to the Bill are all agreed — and I do not think many of our opponents will differ from us in the opinion — that if the Irish Church be disestablished public grants should cease for other bodies ; and not only so, but I think our agreement must extend one step further, and must go to this point, that if the Suspensory Bill be passed the two other bodies must be put substantially upon the same footing as the Established Church with reference to the operation of that Bill. That, I hope and believe, is the real object of my hon. Friend. Then comes the question as to the mode in which we can best give effect to that opinion. I quite agree that if the Suspensory Bill should become law, no person appointed to be a Presbyterian minister, or to be a professor or officer of Maynooth, or to be a student of Maynooth, ought to acquire any vested interest whatever in any shape. But ought we to legislate for that purpose ? I do not think that is a matter in which any religious body, as such, has an interest. It is in my view a question for Parliamentary consideration, and it is a question on which I should be disposed to attach great weight to the opinion of the Government, who are the most natural and proper guardians of the privileges and powers of this House in these matters of form. My own opinion is that it would not be convenient to in-introduce into this Bill any provision on this subject. We are in the habit upon many occasions of barring by law the growth of new vested interests where those interests are derived from property; but I am not aware of any case in which we have by law barred vested interests where those interests had no other basis than the votes of this House or the provisions of an Act of Parliament. If any case can be produced it may materially alter my opinion. Last year from this side of the House it was proposed to relieve the Consolidated Fund, by repealing an Act of Parliament, from the grant which now supports certain Bishops and clergy in the West Indies. The Government did not think it convenient to do that by an Act which was to be passed last Session; but it was urged from this side that if the passing of an Act was postponed till the present Session, no Bishop or other dignitary or clergyman should take any vested interest if appointed in the meantime. We did not pass an Act of Parliament for that purpose, but if I remember right it was entrusted to the Executive Government to make sufficient provision through its officers to carry out the intention of Parliament, and to warn persons accepting offices not to expect that they would have any vested interests. That appears to me to be the proper course to follow on the present occasion. I entirely agree that these parties should be placed on the same footing, after the passing of the Suspensory Act, as the Members of the Established Church. The House is not bound to do that by the 4th Resolution; but I think they are bound to do it by the spirit of their proceedings. The only question I raise is as to the mode of doing it. There is another difficulty — namely, that if we were to legislate to the effect that no professor at Maynooth shall have a vested interest in his appointment after the passing of the Suspensory Act, the question would arise as to what course we should adopt with respect to the Presbyterian minister. You may say that he is paid by a vote of this House year by year, and that he has not the security which an Act of Parliament gives. But that is not the question. The question is whether a Presbyterian minister has that sort of vested interest which, though not recognized, this House is accustomed to respect. The 4th Resolution places the vested interests of the Presbyterians on the same footing as the Grant to Maynooth, for it declares that when legislative effect shall have been given to the 1st Resolution respecting the Established Church in Ireland it is right and necessary that the grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued, "due regard being had to all personal interests." The consequence is that the vested interests of the Presbyterians are to be respected. It would be unfair to prevent the growth of interests that are not regarded as legal interests at all, in the case of the Roman Catholics, and not in the case of the Presbyterians. It appears to me that the best method would be to look to the progress of this Bill; and when it becomes law that would be the period when the Executive Government, either of itself or on the Motion of this House, should convey to the parties interested a sufficiently distinct warning of the intentions of the House. I fear that what I have said may appear somewhat fastidious, but I do not wish to fetter the discretion of this House in the work of legislation; and I fear that if we pass a statute giving a legal form to vested interests which appear to be founded on a moral and equitable right, we may perhaps fetter the action of the House. I think we should pursue the wisest course if we were not now to attempt any measure of this kind, but at a later stage of the proceedings to revert to the subject. At the same time I, as an independent Member of this House, do not claim for myself any other than a secondary part in deciding a matter of this kind. I look to the Government as the natural guardians of the privileges of the House, and as the best advisers on that point; and any course I may take will be very much governed by the opinion which they may express.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he considered that the endowments of Maynooth would be placed by the Instruction on the same footing as those of the Established Church of Ireland under the Suspensory Act. The difference between the Resolution now proposed and the 4th Resolution adopted by the House was, that by this Resolution the action of the law would be simultaneous in reference to Maynooth with the action of the law in reference to the endowments of the Established Church. The endowment of Maynooth was a legislative creation. Prior to the Act of 1845, the provision for the officers of Maynooth, and also for the senior students, who were like the University scholars at Oxford, was voted from year to year in the Estimates. If it should be the pleasure of Parliament they might revert to the system in use before that year. He thought the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun) had done perfectly right in not including the provision for Presbyterian ministers, called the Regium Donum, in his Resolution, because that provision stood on a perfectly different footing, being made by an annual Vote of the House. When they heard so loudly proclaimed the intention of establishing religious equality, and were asked to pass with that view an Act suspending the functions of the Ecclesiastical Commission in Ireland, and suspending the permanent appointment of any clergyman of the Established Church, it seemed to him that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun) was merely acting on the decision of the House, and preventing it from being betrayed by delay, in proposing the Resolution now placed in the Speaker's hands. Objecting to the whole Bill as anticipating the decision of a future Parliament he felt that if it was right to legislate at all it was as right to legislate with regard to Maynooth as with regard to the Established Church.

Mr. Gladstone

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 109; Noes 185: Majority 76.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'every person who shall be appointed to any office in the College of Maynooth, after the passing of this Act, shall hold the said office subject to the pleasure of Parliament,'"

be added instead thereof.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT said, he thought, after the exposition which had been given by his right hon. Friend below him (Mr. Gladstone), he should best consult the opinion of the House by asking leave to withdraw his Amendment. He should leave it to the new constituency to decide the question of the Regium Donum and Maynooth when the Irish Church had been disestablished.

MR. SPEAKER asked whether it be the pleasure of the House that the hon. Member have leave to withdraw his Amendment? ["No, no!"]

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would again appeal to the Government on the question which now opened for their consideration; it was one simply as to the mode of procedure usual in the House. Here was an Act charging on the Consolidated Fund a certain sum of money for the purpose of providing for the expenses of Maynooth; and the proposal before them was that any person to be appointed to an office in the College of Maynooth after the passing of this Act should hold the said office subject to the pleasure of Parliament. He had pointed out what happened last year. It was contemplated to pass an Act at a future period withdrawing the salaries of the West India Bishops, and it was likewise contemplated and intended by the House that any person who was appointed before that Act should pass should take no vested interest, and this was a transaction wholly in the hands and under the guidance of the Government. He therefore wanted to know whether they thought the same plan they pursued last year should be followed on this occasion, or whether they thought that, in this case, the right of parties arising under Act of Parliament, the House of Commons should, through a previous Act, warn the parties that they would have no right, in case of being appointed after that date, to anything in the nature of a vested interest. This was a question of considerable importance as one of Parliamentary procedure. He gave his opinion before on it; but he thought it a matter on which they might naturally look for guidance to those who had a general charge over the Business of the House; and he should be very glad to have the opinion of the Government upon it—not disguising his own opinion that the course taken last year was, on the whole, the right one; but being quite aware that when the suspensory measure passed some measures must be taken to convey to parties that notice which he believed was common in like cases—although passing a statute was without precedent in cases of this kind, however proper it might be where there was a real endowment, and where parties held their emoluments by some title quite distinct from and beyond that of mere vote.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, so far as I am concerned, I had no wish that any further interference should take place at this stage of the Bill; but it seems to me that in principle the proposal of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun) and also that of the hon. Member for Longford (Colonel Greville-Nugent) is just in itself and in accordance with the provisions of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone). The mode of carrying out the object of this proposal appears to me to be comparatively immaterial as long as we give full notice to the persons who are to be affected by it. Upon that ground, therefore, I should not have objected to the proposal of either of the hon. Members, except upon the ground put by Mr. Speaker, that it would be inconvenient in a Bill of this kind to introduce a subject not absolutely kindred with it. But as the Instruction is before the House I cannot help saying that it seems to me to be in entire conformity with the principle of the Bill that those who take offices in Maynooth for the future should hold them subject to the pleasure of Parliament. Any probable case that might arise would be met by the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for Longford. I hope and believe that the Bill itself will not reach the stage which the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) contemplates; but, in the event of its becoming an Act of Parliament, the right hon. Gentleman says it would then become necessary to call the attention of Parliament to the question. But I think that by calling the attention of Parliament to it now we shall be giving due notice to those who are likely to be affected by the provisions of the Bill. Should the matter go to a division, I shall vote for the Instruction which has been moved by the hon. Member for Longford.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he thought that the system of instructing Committees had been carried to too great a length. The House had agreed that it should be an Instruction to the Committee of the Whole House on the Scotch Reform Bill that certain English boroughs should be disfranchised, and now it was proposed that it should be an Instruction to the Committee of the Whole House upon a Bill relating to the Established Church that provisions should be introduced with regard to the College of Maynooth. There was no legal parity whatever between the benefices of the Irish Church, which were freeholds vested in the persons holding them, and the endowments of Maynooth, which were annuities created by Parliament, and therefore liable to be dealt with at the pleasure of Parliament. He did not understand why Her Majesty's Government, who were opposed to the suspension of appointments in the Established Church in Ireland should be in favour of the suspension of those in the College of Maynooth. He hoped that the House would reject this Instruction.

MR. COGAN said, he hoped the House would not interpose to prevent the hon. Member for Longford (Colonel Greville-

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

Nugent) withdrawing his Amendment. In such a case he should propose to his hon. and gallant Friend to vote against the Motion. He had witnessed with great surprise the course which had been taken by the Ministers of the Crown on the division which had just taken place. It was well the country should know the course the Government took, because then they would be all made acquainted with what the "truly Liberal policy" held out by the Government was, and what they meant by "religious equality," which the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland said was the policy they would pursue—although the Home Secretary repudiated the idea of religious equality. The Bill of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire would only suspend the creation of any further appointments in the Established Church for a year; whereas the Instruction of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun) would be to put an end to the College of Maynooth for ever: for the Bill for suspending appointments in the Irish Church was merely a temporary measure, whereas the Instruction provided that no student shall be admitted to the College of Maynooth "after the passing of this Act." The Instruction did not say "during the continuance of the Act," but "after the passing of the Act." It was well that the country should know what course the Government took upon this question.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he was glad that the Government had not, by giving advice, fallen into the trap which had been laid for them by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who was entitled to the whole discredit which might attach to the Bill, which he (Colonel Stuart Knox) hoped would never become law.

MR. AYTOUN, in reply to the hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Cogan), said, that of course the clause introduced in accordance with the Instruction would only last for the same time as the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY observed that it was no use going to a division on a question on which there was no real difference of opinion. A division would very inadequately express the opinion of the House, and the only question was how the wish of the House was to be accomplished—that no new vested interests should be created in Maynooth or the Regium Donum, pending the settlement of the question of the Irish Church. He thought his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Greville-Nugent) should persevere with his Motion, and he would propose as an Amendment to insert after the word "Maynooth," the following words "and likewise every Presbyterian minister hereafter to be appointed to receive a share of the Regium Donum."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by inserting after the word "Maynooth" the words—

"And likewise every Presbyterian Minister hereafter to be appointed to receive a share of the Regium Donum."—(Sir George Grey.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question,

"That the words 'every person who shall be appointed to any office in the College of Maynooth, and likewise every Presbyterian minister hereafter to be appointed to receive a share of the Regium Donum, after the passing of this Act, shall hold the said office subject to the pleasure of Parliament,' be added to the words 'Bill, that' in the Original Question,"

—put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to provide in the said Bill, that every person who shall be appointed to any office in the College of Maynooth, and likewise every Presbyterian minister hereafter to be appointed to receive a share of the Regium Donum, after the passing of this Act, shall hold the said office subject to the pleasure of Parliament."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. NEWDEGATE moved that this House will upon this day six months resolve itself into the said Committee. As it now appeared that the Government had given up all idea of endowing either the Roman Catholic University or the Church, and as their declaration on the subject was much more explicit than that of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, he (Mr. Newdegate) thought that Protestants, including Protestant Dissenters and Voluntaries, were perfectly justified in taking the course of supporting the Government. However much the Government might have committed themselves to an unwise proposal, they had withdrawn it in terms much more distinct than any used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, as to his intention not to endow the Roman Catholic Establishments, schools, or seminaries in Ireland with a portion of the revenues taken from the Established Church, though the right hon.

Gentleman had been called upon to say that he would not apply any portion of the revenues of the Irish Church, or the equivalent of them, to the support of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland; and after the declarations of Dr. Moriarty with reference to the anticipations of, at all events, a section of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, he (Mr. Newdegate) thought that some pledge should be given on the subject, and that it should be distinctly understood that neither glebes nor glebe houses should be furnished for the Roman Catholic clergy. He opposed the apportionment of the revenues of the Irish Church to any such purpose. As to the 1st Resolution, he altogether dissented from its declarations. On a former occasion he had gone at length into the grounds of his dissent, and he would not repeat them; but it was clear that the Bill before the House was based upon it, though ostensibly upon the 2nd or 3rd Resolution. The 1st Resolution declared that it seemed necessary to disestablish and disendow the Established Church. Why was this necessary? The Dublin Review, a publication patronized by the Papal hierarchy, assigned a reason, and that reason was the Fenian conspiracy. He admitted that the conspiracy was a formidable one, though he deemed it unbecoming that its influence should be omnipotent on a question of this kind. Since 1836 this Review had been considered as the organ of the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Ireland. In 1845 it was directly patronized by the late Dr., afterwards Cardinal, Wiseman; and it was now received everywhere as the exponent of the opinion of the Roman Catholic hierarchy; and, in the article in question, the writer boasted of the Fenian conspiracy as having been the means of bringing that House to its senses—meaning that they would lead the House to obey the wishes of His Holiness the Pope. The writer spoke of the superiority of Stephens to O'Brien or to Mitchell. He referred to the movements of Stephens in France and America, and stated that this conspiracy had completely convinced the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, and the majority of that House, of the necessity of accomplishing, if not that, at all events the carrying out the mandates of the Papal hierarchy. He (Mr. Newdegate) thought it was disgraceful that a majority of that House should be under such an imputation. He rejoiced at the opposition to this Bill on the part of the Government, since it showed that they would not allow themselves to be influenced by threats emanating from such a conspiracy, when one of its members had recently endeavoured to murder a member of the Royal Family. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had recently gone down amongst the Welsh people for the purpose of entreating them not to raise the cry of "No Popery." The hon. Gentleman no doubt thought that the Welsh were more accessible to such an application than the people of Birmingham would be. The people of Wales were a good deal isolated from the other inhabitants of Great Britain; but the hon. Member seemed to fear that the old spirit which characterized them would prevent them from looking with favour upon a measure which would indirectly carry out the Ultramontane principle; which proposed to sweep away the English Church from Ireland, and, as a consequence, to secure the existence of Papal establishments in that country. He would remind the House that they had a Bill before them—a Bill which had been introduced by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Mac Evoy), the object of which was to legalize the titles of the hierarchy of the Romish Church in Ireland. Well, then, what was their position? Whilst on the one hand they were asked by the measure of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire to abolish the Protestant Church as an Establishment in Ireland, on the other they were called upon by the Bill of the hon. Member for Meath to legalize the Papal Church in lieu thereof. There was a strong feeling in the country against both measures, and that feeling was becoming stronger every day. If the hon. Member for Birmingham had read the history of Wales he would have found that the people of that country from olden times had ever remained steadfast to their religious principles. When St. Augustin the Monk was sent over by the Pope, with forty other monks, to convert the people of England, he found that Christianity had been already established in Wales. He, however, proceeded there. Augustin vainly strove to induce the Welsh people to accept the Papal form of religion. They absolutely refused to do so. What happened? History much belied Monk Augustin if he did not compass the massacre of 1,200 Welshmen. ["Oh, oh!"] He (Mr. Newdegate) was aware of the tenderness of the Roman Catholic Members on subjects of ecclesiastical controversy. Dr. Manning, two years ago, rejoiced over the cessation of controversy, and proclaimed the satisfaction which he felt. The conclusion which he drew from that circumstance was the speedy conversion of England to the Romish Church. It appeared, then, according to Dr. Manning's view of the matter, that the avoidance of all controversy was the certain means of converting the English people to the Romish Church, and of securing their submission to the dictates of the Pope. Now, he was one of those persons who did not look forward with satisfaction to the prospect set before them. He was one of those who though probably considered by hon. Gentlemen opposite and the party with which they were connected as troublesome persons, nevertheless felt it to be his conscientious duty to raise his voice in defence of the national Church, and in tones of warning against the consequences that must follow its downfall. He sincerely wished that the House would leave this question to be dealt with by another Parliament. Having proclaimed its own inefficiency as a representative Assembly, he should have thought that it would at least have felt the propriety of leaving this subject to be decided by the country. Dr. Manning (Roman Catholic Archbishop) wrote a pamphlet lately full of accusations against the Established Church, and against the tenure of property in Ireland. In that pamphlet the writer agreed to the letter in the declaration of Bishop Moriarty that the Papacy recognized no prescription of right as claimed by the holders of land, either clerical or lay, which land had ever been in the hands of the Roman Catholic Church. Although they had been told that this measure had been framed at the solicitation of the people of Ireland, he denied that the people of Ireland had ever asked for it. The House, by agreeing to it, was yielding to the dictation of Cardinal Cullen and the Romish hierarchy. It was only four years ago when Cardinal Cullen first raised this question. He said, on arriving from Rome in this country, in 1849, that his mission was to care for education and the land question; but four years ago he added that he would never be satisfied so long as the Established Church existed in Ireland. Where, then, did this movement come from? It came directly from Rome. It was to the dictates of Rome they were now yielding, enforced, as it seemed to him, by the Fenian conspiracy, which consisted entirely of Roman Catholics. He, for one, would never cease to lift his voice in the language of protest against this attempt to destroy the Irish branch of our National Church, especially under such dictation. This was nothing short of a conspiracy to undermine the Church in Ireland, with the view of establishing the Papal religion in its stead. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, when he brought forward this question, seemed to go into history for facts to justify his conduct, and he attributed the discontent of Ireland to the existence of the Established Church. The right hon. Gentleman touched a little upon the Penal Laws. Why were the Penal Laws enacted? Was the enactment of those laws a gratuitous act of spite and malevolence on the part of the English Government and Parliament against the Catholics of Ireland? Now, no one knew better than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire that these Penal Laws were wrung from Parliament and the country by repeated rebellions which had always been fomented, nay, dictated from Rome. The right hon. Gentleman was very careful to omit all mention of these facts while he was denouncing the Penal Laws. He (Mr. Newdegate) did not wish to see those laws re-enacted; but he had no hesitation in saying that if this House by its conduct were to create an impression that it was yielding to terror upon this question, circumstances would probably arise to render necessary the re-enactment of those laws. Notwithstanding the boasted liberality of their concessions to the Irish Roman Catholics within the last few years, they had been obliged to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act over and over again. The Habeas Corpus Act was at the present moment suspended—the House were still afraid to restore the freedom which that Act conferred upon the Irish people. It seemed as though they were about to sweep away the Church Establishment of that country to propitiate the power which had rendered freedom impossible in Ireland. How could the conduct of that House in regard to this question be interpreted in any other way by the Roman Catholics of Ireland and their organs, than that it was yielding to Fenianism and intimidation in that country what it had denied to justice and their national good faith. It was his belief that those attacks upon the Established Church in Ireland had been influenced, not by a feeling that it had proved inefficient, but because it had become efficient and had succeeded in evangelizing many districts, particularly in the West of Ireland. It was well known that the Jesuits were now dominant in Rome. What had been their policy with respect to Ireland? It was to perpetuate Irish discontent. There was no better established fact than that. He would, with the leave of the House, quote an extract from the work of Cretineau Solly, an historian, who appeared to have been selected for the purpose of proving that the Jesuits had done no wrong. What, then, did he say in his History of the Jesuits (Volume VI. c. 2)? He was especially the advocate of the Jesuits—

Mr. Newdegate

"In the beginning of the 18th century. . . Little by little they (the English Government) allowed these Penal Laws to fall into disuse, which had reduced to slavery the faithful of the three kingdoms. Jesuits were no longer pursued as if they were public malefactors. If the faith had not been deeply rooted in the heart of Great Britain this well-judged toleration, following political commotions, might have proved fatal to Catholicism. But it was not thus. Prosperity had not engendered apathy, and by a zeal as full of prudence as of activity, the fathers of the Institute (Jesuits) profited by the calm which was granted them to cultivate and foster in the souls around them, devotion to their religious duties."

Page 92—

"They (the Jesuits) felt the great disadvantages of that sort of cosmopolitan education which, by displacing children from their country in their youth, gives them less of patriotic feeling. Ireland, according to them, had a right to see her children reared upon her own proscribed soil, in order that, nourished in her misfortunes, they might at some future day, claim her emancipation with more energy. It was this thought that inspired Father Kenny with the project of forming a national College; and he did create one at Clougowes, not far from Dublin. The restoration of the Institute (in 1814) augmented its prosperity to such a degree, that in 1819 they had more than 250 pupils. In the same year the generosity of Mary O'Brien enabled them to build another in the district of King's County. It was necessary to raise the Irish from the state of moral debasement in which it had been the policy of England to keep them. To this people the great voice of Daniel O'Connell, a pupil of the Jesuits, first taught the meaning of liberty. It was necessary first to teach them their duties, and then their rights. The Company of Jesus undertook the first task, O'Connell fulfilled the second."

Page 95—

"The Fete Dieu was celebrated at Clougowes in 1822, in the midst of an enormous crowd."

He had also before him an extract from the work of Mr. Thomas Wyse, showing the origin and character of the Irish Catholic Association, and the object of that association was the same. He thought that that extract would be sufficient to prove to the House how little this Ultramontanism would allow England to do in the way of providing for the future prosperity of Ireland by such concessions as they were making. It was not the Jesuits' object that Ireland should be prosperous and contented, and when the House was now obviously yielding to its fears he asked hon. Members to read this history which was written by an able man who was one of the greatest ornaments of the House. Mr. Wyse said that it was the object of the Association, which was conducted by Mr. O'Connell and other Ultramontane leaders—

"That without rendering its members amenable to the law it might make use of the free institutions of this country for every purpose of injury, that it could wield the Constitution against the Constitution, introduce a sullen, perpetual war into the bosom of peace; disturb every relation of society without violating a single enactment on which such relations repose, and finally produce such an order of things as to compel the Minister to choose between coercion and conciliation," &c. From an authority of the Roman Catholics themselves then he felt he was fully justified in describing this measure as a most unwise concession made not to a sense of justice but to the dictates of fear. ["Divide, divide!"] He should not be silenced by clamour when feeling it necessary to raise his voice against such a measure, and to express the opinions of his constituents that the policy pursued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire and his party upon this question was one that was highly detrimental to the true interests of their Protestant country.

COLONEL STUART KNOX, in seconding the Amendment, said, he wished to call attention to three proposals which had been made in the House in the course of the present Session, and which had electrified not the House only but the whole country. One of these proposals he would only refer to for the purpose of expressing his contempt for it. He regretted that it had come from an Irish Member. He might say that he had thought it his duty to give Notice to the hon. Gentleman, who was now in his place, and with whom it had originated, that it was his (Colonel Knox's) intention to allude to it, in order that that hon. Gentleman might have an opportunity of offering an explanation, if he deemed it necessary to do so.

MR. REARDEN rose to Order. He wished to know whether it was Parliamentary for an hon. Member to express his contempt for anything he (Mr. Rearden) had said or done?

Mr. Newdegate

MR. SPEAKER said, he did not hear the hon. and gallant Member say anything to justify this interruption.

MR. REARDEN: The hon. and gallant Gentleman said he should express his contempt for some remarks which, as implied, were made by me; for he pointedly referred to me. I want to know, Sir, whether that language of the hon. and gallant Member is Parliamentary?

MR. SPEAKER: I did not hear the expression referred to by the hon. Member, or I should have observed upon it at the moment.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, the second proposal was that of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), relating to the Oath taken by the Queen at her coronation. He believed, however, that the hon. Baronet himself asserted that his proposal did not affect the Coronation Oath; but, at all events, the document which had been placed upon the table was entitled, "The Oath taken at Her Majesty's Coronation." This proposal, therefore, indicated to the country the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman's supporters, if not of the right hon. Gentleman himself. The third proposal was that now under discussion. On a former occasion the right hon. Gentleman had admonished him that if he read his book he would improve his mind. He had since acted on that advice; and the conclusion he arrived at was that the inspired author of that work could not have come forward with his present proposal except with a perfect conviction that he was in the right. At the same time, he was of opinion that he had a right to pick up and make use of the book which the right hon. Gentleman had thrown into the gutter. In the first place, then, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman what was the present state of affairs. In the right hon. Gentleman's own words—

"Probably there never was a time in the history of this country when the connection between Church and State was threatened from quarters so manifold and various as at present. The infidel, with sagacious instinct, follows out all that tends to general diminution of religious influences. The Romanist (with some exceptions), in order to erect his own structure of faith and discipline, now seems to aim first at the demolition of every other, and to deem us so involved in fatal error that we must pass through the zero of national infidelity in order to arrive at truth. Some others of a different stamp are beginning to view the connection between Church and State with an eye of indifference, or even suspicion."

Again I assert, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman, that—

"The mass of the people remains firm in its adhesion to the ancient principles of the Constitution and the Church. It appears still to be their belief that the connection of Church and State is conformable to the will of God, essential to the permanent well-being of a community, and calculated to extend and establish the vital influences of Christianity. Upon us of this day has fallen, and we shrink not from it, a glorious and righteous duty—the defence of the Reformed Church in Ireland as the religious Establishment of the country."

These were the words of the right hon. Gentleman, and he believed they would find an echo in the minds of a majority of the English people of the present day. If the English Church was older and stronger than the Irish Church, the right hon. Gentleman should remember that though, by the law of primogeniture, the eldest got everything, the youngest was at least entitled to consideration and protection. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would soon change his mind upon this subject, and go back to those opinions which he formerly held, and which he (Colonel Knox) trusted he should hold and maintain so long as he lived.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Newdegate,)—instead thereof.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, as an independent Member of that House, sympathizing with those who held that Protestant ascendancy in Church and State had been the best work of civil and religious liberty in this country, and as representing a most important constituency, the great majority of whom were Church-going Protestants, and as officially representing 150,000 Orangemen, who felt strongly on this subject, and who were determined to defend the Established Church in Ireland, and to resist to the utmost any attempt to apply the resources of that Church to the purposes of the Roman Catholic religion, he protested against the legislation proposed by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). It had been stated over and over again in that House, that the Roman Catholics of Ireland looked upon the Established Church there as a grievance, an injustice, and an insult. It was easy enough to make that assertion, but not so easy to prove it. He, on the other hand, denied that one Roman Catholic in a thousand looked upon the Established Church as a grievance, or that ten in a thousand had been persuaded by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire and his coadjutors to regard it as an insult and an injustice. The Roman Catholics paid nothing for supporting the Establishment, and only felt its presence through the kindness and charity which they received from its ministers. What were the reasons advanced for the revolutionary measure proposed by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire—a measure, which, if carried, must lead to the separation of the State from all religion, and to the release of all religious corporations from State control and supervision? The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) advocated the application of the voluntary principle to Ireland. Nothing could be more unjust, heartless, and ungenerous—unjust as depriving Protestants, without any fault, of property, which had been theirs for centuries, and which, if properly distributed, would not more than suffice to provide them with the ministrations of religion; and heartless and ungenerous, as partial and exceptional legislation, imposed by a powerful nation on a comparatively poor and struggling province. With regard to the utter failure of the Irish Church as a useful working institution as asserted by the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), in a speech where bitterness and misrepresentation culminated in the unhalloved, and, he might say, infidel cry, "Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground!" very little inquiry, and slight acquaintance with facts, would prove that the assertion was altogether untrue—on the contrary, it was notorious that, within the last fifty years, Protestant churches and congregations had largely increased, and large sums had been expended for those purposes for which Church property was devised and intended. It was also admitted—and notably by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire—that the ministers of the Irish Church were distinguished for piety and zeal in their holy calling; in administering to the spiritual wants of those loyal Protestants upon whom England could surely rely in time of need, and in dispensing charity and extending civilization in parts of Ireland where they were probably the only resident gentry. But, if a reason were wanting why the Church in Ireland is entitled to the support of every true Protestant, it is this—that while the Church in England is distracted by internal divisions, scandalized by the abominations of the Confessional, and weakened by the advance of Ritualism, and the introduction of what Earl Russell calls "the mummeries of superstition," the Church in Ireland has remained sound in doctrine and pure in practice. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire had omitted no occasion during the debates on this question to put forward the disaffection of Ireland as a chief reason for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Nothing, perhaps, had ever occurred in the history of our country more indiscreet, and unstatesmanlike, and expressly mischievous, both as to present effects and future consequences, than for an influential statesman, aspiring to the high honour of being England's Prime Minister, to advance such a reason for sudden and important changes in the Constitution and settled institutions of a nation. To rest the proposed legislation upon the disaffection of a portion, though a large portion of the people, was not like yielding to a steady constitutional agitation, or to popular wishes, strongly and peaceably expressed; but, under present circumstances, and after the speeches made on the other side of the House, it had the appearance, and should be received as due to the manner in which dissatisfaction has been exhibited—open rebellion, and setting the law at defiance in Ireland, and the bloodthirsty and indiscriminate spirit which has distinguished Fenianism in England. It would be regarded as the success of an appeal to arms, and as the reward of murder, assassination, and crime. Ireland wanted bread. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire would take from her the bread she had and give her a stone. He took from many and gave to none—not even a cup of cold water to those whom it was pretended to benefit and conciliate. She asked for peace, he gave her a scorpion. Instead of conferring a boon on Ireland, and sending that message of peace so much needed, this measure would throw in a firebrand, and let loose the bloodhounds of civil and religious strife. Irish Members who had been a much shorter time in the House of Commons than he had must have observed that Ireland could expect but little consideration when it suited professional statesmen to elect her as their battle-field, and to make her interests their bone of contention—powerless in their hands, she was tossed as a football between them; but her very helplessness gave her a claim on the fair play and generosity of the people of England; and he, for one, would not despair for the Irish Church until the country had given its verdict, "Aye" or "No," to the revolutionary policy of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. Allusions had been made to the Oath taken by Her Majesty at her coronation. He contended that Parliament could not absolve the Queen from the obligations of that Oath. He was supported in this view by the authority of the Speaker, who had given his opinion that Roman Catholic Members who had taken the original Oath prescribed for Roman Catholics were bound by that Oath, notwithstanding its subsequent alteration. [The SPEAKER intimated that he had not given such an opinion.] He (Captain Archdall) would at once bow to the Chair; but, at the same time, he must assure Mr. Speaker that he was generally understood to have so expressed himself. Parliament might alter the Oath, or repeal it, as was practically proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), but that could only apply to future Sovereigns; and, whatever might be the fate of the present measure, he sincerely trusted that no man in that House would live to see the day when the Protestant Sovereign of these realms would not rather vacate the Throne than sanction the monstrous scheme of spoliation proposed by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire.

Captain Archdall

Mr. LEFROY said, he could not allow the opportunity to pass without offering a few remarks upon the subject, and at the same time he wished to address a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. One of his great arguments in favour of this Bill was, that the Roman Catholic population of Ireland was so great that they were entitled to this boon; and what he wished to ask was, whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to carry out his view with regard to Wales (where there was a national Church, and services were performed in the Welsh language? ["Oh!" "Hear, hear!" and "Divide!"]) He thought it was not unreasonable—when the hon. Member for Birmingham went into the country and stirred up almost a spirit of rebellion—to address a few observations to the House in defence of an institution so dear to himself and so important to the country. It was admitted that in Wales a majority of the inhabitants did not belong to the Established Church. Would the right hon. Gentleman disestablish and disendow the Church in Wales?

He wished to read a quotation or two in connection with this subject from one who was looked upon as a great authority. Mr. Burke, in his Letter on the French Revolution, said—

“It is said numbers ought to prevail. True, if the Constitution of a kingdom be a problem of arithmetic, this sort of discourse does well enough for the lamp-post as its second. To men who may reason calmly it is ridiculous. The will of the many and their interest must very often differ, and great will be the difference when they make an evil choice.”

Again, Mr. Burke, in his Letter to his Son, said—

“I would say, in justice to my own sentiments, that not one of those zealots for a Protestant interest wishes more sincerely than I do, perhaps not half so sincerely, for the support of the Established Church in both these Kingdoms. It is a great link towards holding fast the connection of Religion with the State, and for keeping these two islands in a close connection of opinion and affection. I wish it well as the religion of the greater numbers of the land proprietors of the Kingdom, with whom all establishments of Church and State, for strong political reasons, ought, in my opinion, to be warmly connected. I wish it well because it is more closely combined than any other of the Church systems with the Crown, which is the stay of the mixed Constitution; because it is, as things now stand, the sole connecting political principle between the Constitutions of the two Kingdoms. I have another, and infinitely a stronger reason for wishing it well—it is that, at the present time, I consider it one of the main pillars of the Christian religion itself. . . . Its fall would leave a great void, which nothing else of which I can form any distinct idea might fill.”

And, again, in the same Letter, speaking of the Established Church not being the religion of the major part of the inhabitants, he adds—

“This is a state of things which no man in his senses can call perfectly happy. But it is the state of Ireland. Two hundred years of experiment show it to be unalterable. Many a fierce struggle has passed between the parties. The result is—you cannot make the people Protestant, and they cannot shake off a Protestant Government. This is what experience teaches, and what all men of sense, of all descriptions, know.”

He believed the day would come when the right hon. Gentleman would feel that he had made a great mistake. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that Lord Althorpe and others on the same side had borne testimony to the importance of an Established Church in Ireland, and to the excellence of the clergy. He lamented deeply and sincerely the course pursued by the right hon. Gentleman, who was the last from whom he should have expected such a proceeding. He had always looked up to the right hon. Gentleman as the great supporter of the Church and Constitution, and he much regretted that the blow should have come from him.

SIR JAMES STRONGE said, as representing one of the largest Protestant constituencies in Ulster, he felt bound to enter his humble protest against the measure brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman. Insinuations had been made against the loyalty of Orangemen.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he rose to explain. What he said was, that there were hon. Members below the Bar creating a disturbance.

SIR JAMES STRONGE: The Protestants of Ulster were invited to settle in that country, and their rights were guaranteed to them by the most solemn contracts. Had they not performed their part of these contracts? The Irish Church had for 300 years been in uninterrupted possession, guaranteed by Acts of Parliament, of her endowments, and it was with alarm, and he might say disgust, that the Protestants of Ireland contemplated this revolutionary movement, which would shake all confidence in the security of property. It was alleged that the Roman Catholics of Ireland looked upon the Established Church as a badge of conquest. That he denied. He had resided in Ireland the greater part of his life; he had had many opportunities of knowing the sentiments of the people, and though he had often heard them speak of the repeal of the Union and the land question, he had never heard them utter a complaint on the subject of the Church Establishment. It should not be forgotten that nearly 300 years ago a great number of persons who professed the Reformed Faith had been induced to settle in Ireland on the faith that their rights would be protected. They had performed their part of the contract, and it was for this country to abide by hers. The measure of the right hon. Gentleman would not bring peace to Ireland; on the contrary, it would intensify those feelings of religious and political hostility which unhappily prevailed there. The principle of this measure, before many years had passed, would be applied to England and Scotland. He hoped that this great wrong would not be sanctioned by Parliament, that the feelings of the Protestants of Ireland, who were industrious, peaceable, and loyal, might be respected, and that those religious institutions to which they were so deeply attached might be left to them unimpaired.

MR. GLADSTONE: I will not detain the House for more than a very few moments; but I think it due to the deep respect which I feel for my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Lefroy) to give a precise answer to the question he has put to me. That question, as I understand it, was whether I entertain the same views with respect to Wales, or rather, whether I think that my arguments with respect to the Church in Ireland do not extend to the Church in Wales. I must frankly say I do not. I will not enter into any detailed argument at this unseasonable moment on the case of Wales, because it is quite enough for me to refer to a speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiganshire (Sir Thomas Lloyd) in which he showed in a very satisfactory manner the very broad distinctions which prevailed between the two cases. So far as I am concerned, I hope I have answered my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin explicitly. But I will go one step further, and ask my hon. Friend—what I know he may find it difficult to do—to believe me when I tell him that I am assured that the measure which we propose—I do not mean merely the Suspensory Bill—and which has been sanctioned in this House by such large majorities, is not in the nature of a blow and discouragement, but is truly and really for the benefit of the religion to which my hon. Friend is so much attached.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that as the Head of the Government was not then in the House, he should withdraw his Amendment.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble postponed.

Five clauses of the Bill agreed to.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT proposed an extra clause: that the right of any person to a share in the future Maynooth Grant or the Regium Donum should be subject to the pleasure of Parliament.

Clause agreed to.

Clause added.

Preamble agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported: as amended, to be considered upon Wednesday next.

Sir James Stronge

THAMES EMBANKMENT AND METROPOLIS IMPROVEMENT (LOANS) ACT AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 133.]

(Mr. Selater Booth, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER reminded the House that advances for metropolitan improvements had been sanctioned by three separate Acts—the first, in 1862, authorizing the Northern Embankment; the second, in 1863, authorizing the Southern Embankment; and the third, in the same year, having for its object the improvement of Mansion House Street. The original gross estimate for the first work was, in round numbers, £2,500,000; for the second, a little over £1,000,000; and for the third, £1,300,000—the total being £4,935,000. A great part of that sum was expected to be recouped by the sale of lands; and in 1864 an Act was passed guaranteeing a loan to the amount of £2,480,000, the net sum which it was thought would be required. The responsibility for the estimate for the first work rested with the Office of Works, the Bill being in charge of the First Commissioner, but the execution of the improvement being intrusted to the Metropolitan Board of Works. It was decided when the Bill was in Committee that nearly all the reclaimed land should be devoted to public purposes, part of the expected assets being thus sacrificed. The compensations for water frontages had far exceeded the original estimate; and with regard to the Southern Embankment, whereas the Metropolitan Board asked for borrowing powers for £700,000, the House reduced the sum to £480,000; while, with regard to the Mansion House Street improvement, the Board had purchased additional lands in order to avoid claims for compensation, and the estimate had thus been exceeded. The present estimate for the three works was £5,568,000, showing an excess of £633,000, half that amount being attributed to the additional purchases of land in Mansion House Street, which were regarded as a profitable investment, and the other half to the excess in compensation for water frontages. The Board had received £3,729,000, nearly all which had been expended, with the exception of £157,000, and the sum required to complete the works, in addition to the assets already available, was £1,839,000. Now, the Bill proposed that the Metropolitan Board should have power to raise £1,850,000 under a Treasury guarantee, and, with the exception of a slight addition with regard to the approaches, the works to be executed under this loan were those for which the original guarantee was given. The House would expect to be satisfied that the Government had a proper security, and this consisted in four different sources of revenue. The first was the surplus of the proceeds of the Coal and Wine duties up to July 5, 1882, after satisfying the existing claims upon that fund. The surplus was £15,000 to July, 1867. The income from this source was continually increasing, the annual growth being at the rate of £7,000 or £8,000 a year, and the surplus to July of the present year being estimated at about £22,000. The second security was the metropolitan rates; the third was the whole of the Coal and Wine duties from July, 1882, to July, 1888. This was in the nature of a deferred annuity, because up to 1882 they would have to satisfy the existing claims of those who had lent money to the Metropolitan Board of Works. These claims would be satisfied by July, 1882, and after that period these duties would be available as security for the present Vote. The House had passed a Bill for the continuance of the Coal and Wine duties until 1889; but for the last year of that term they would be applicable towards the buying up of certain bridge rights. The proceeds of the Coal and Wine duties amounted in 1867 to £200,000, so that this might be taken as an annuity for six years deferred for fourteen years of, say £220,000, at a moderate calculation of the growth of these duties. The present value of this at $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent was £690,000. The Government would have additional security in the property abutting on the new Mansion House Street, upon which the loan was to be a fair charge. The fair value of this property might be put at £1,500,000; but, in order to be quite safe, he took it at £1,300,000. If he took the value of the deferred annuity of the Coal and Wine duties at £600,000, which was considerably within the mark, and the value of the Mansion House Street property at £1,300,000, the Government would be perfectly safe as to the capitalization of the loan. These calculations were far below the estimates of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The annual interest on the sum at $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent would be £69,375, to meet which there would be the surplus of the Corn and Wine duties. But although the Government proposed to guarantee the whole of this loan, it would not all be required at once. The sum of £750,000 would be required for the first year; £600,000 for the second year; and £500,000 for the third year. Some of the property in the new street might be more speedily realized; but it was calculated that a halfpenny rate for three years would be sufficient. If any of the property in the hands of the Metropolitan Board of Works should find purchasers, it might be possible to dispense with any increase of the rates. He trusted he had said enough to justify the Government in having acceded to the proposal to guarantee this loan. The Board of Works considered that if the securities in their hands were capitalized they would amount to a sum of £5,662,000. The expenditure would be £5,568,000, so that a balance of £94,000 would be found in their favour. He had given the House all the facts bearing on the case, and he had now to ask the House to assent to a guarantee on the part of the Government of the loan of £1,850,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman would be very advantageous to the ratepayers of the metropolis, because the money required by the Metropolitan Board of Works would be borrowed at a much easier rate of interest on the security of the Government. But, however agreeable this process of obtaining a Government guarantee might be, he thought it well the public and Board should understand it was one that must not be too often resorted to. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman had any objection so to amend the Bill as to define the object for which the £650,000 was to be borrowed, to cause the £350,000 to be re-paid which had already been borrowed, and also to cause the remaining portion of the money which was to be guaranteed under the Bill to be faithfully applied to the completion of the works in Mansion House Street. He understood the Secretary to the Treasury to have undertaken to bring up a clause to that effect.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not rise to oppose the Bill introduced by the Government; on the contrary, he was prepared to support it. Considering the extent of these works, and that they were of an Imperial as well as a local character, the State might fairly step in to aid the metropolis by guaranteeing a portion of the funds required for their execution. A Return had been placed in their hands that morning upon the Motion of the Secretary to the Treasury, which professed to show the position of the Thames Embankment and the Metropolis Improvement Funds. The original estimate for these works was professedly given in that Return, with further particulars of the total expenditure up to 1868, and also their present total estimated cost. He presumed that that Return being dated from Spring Gardens, represented the opinions of the Metropolitan Board of Works on the subject, and that the Board was responsible for the statement signed by their own accountant. Now he wanted to know from what documents the original estimates for these works given in the Return to which he had referred had been taken. Having read through the Reports of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the evidence laid before Select Committees, he was unable to find that the original estimates for these works were in any one case that which that Return represented them to be. The original estimates there stated amounted to £4,900,000, whereas the real original estimates previously submitted to Parliament were not more than £2,500,000. The total estimate at this moment was £5,500,000, or far more than double the real original estimate for the works, which included the Northern and the Southern Embankments, and Mansion House Street. What he complained of was that the original estimates as now given were not really the original estimates which had been laid before Parliament, and which amounted to £2,480,000. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER was here understood to say that in the one case the net estimates, and in the other the gross estimates were stated.] That distinction as to net estimates was now introduced for the first time in the Return, and in the Reports of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and it was now so introduced because the Coal and Wine duties had been continued. Before the Coal and Wine duties were continued the Board had an interest in making themselves out to be as poor as possible. In none of their

Mr. Goschen

Reports had he seen any mention of their £1,500,000 of assets. True, the House now had the gross estimates put before it; but why had not an opportunity been afforded it of comparing the gross with the net estimates. The estimate originally laid before Parliament was £2,480,000, because it was believed that £2,480,000 was the gross sum which would be wanted. If that was a gross estimate why had Parliament been called upon to guarantee the whole of this amount instead of the net sum required? He was glad to hear that a great portion of the debt would be paid off very soon, and that it was hoped the property would become available in a short time for that purpose. But this was the first time that Parliament had been informed of the fact. In none of the accounts issued by the Metropolitan Board of Works hitherto had any distinct balance sheet been given, showing on the one hand what were their liabilities, and on the other what were their assets. It was for the interest even of the Board itself that the public should know what property it had at its disposal. Hitherto the Board had debited itself with the cost of the purchase of land, and the charges for compensation; but it had never shown any item to its credit for the amount of property it had thus acquired. It was, of course, difficult to estimate what the value of that property was; but, at all events, it ought to figure in any budget which it put forth, so that the ratepayers might have the means of knowing what the financial position of the Board was. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave a list of the securities of the Metropolitan Board, and he was sorry to see that those securities included the general rates. Even a rate of only a halfpenny in the pound was a considerable addition to rates that were already insupportable, and in time the halfpence became pence, and so the rates ran up. He admitted that there was no danger to the Exchequer in the transaction proposed, for the risk was amply covered; and, indeed, the Board had shown that they scarcely needed the security of the Coal and Wine duties at all, for the value of their property was estimated at £1,500,000 or £2,000,000. When the Government were asked to continue the Coal and Wine duties, no mention was made of these assets on which money could be borrowed, and which were not shown in the accounts of the Board. In those presented pursuant to Act of Parliament during the last two or three years, he could find no mention made, either in receipts or payments, of the coal and wine duties devoted to the extinction of the loans taken up by the Board and guaranteed by the Government; and the reason was, the money was paid over to the Commissioner of the Government and stood in his name, so that the receipts and the expenditure were not accounted for at all. To supply this deficiency, he moved for a Return in 1866; but it ought not to be necessary to have recourse to this mode of obtaining information. With reference to the cost of the Embankment, Sir John Thwaites stated before the Select Committee of 1866, in answer to Question 104, that its first estimated cost was £1,000,000, which included the approaches. He was asked about the cost of the approaches, and said they were not deemed sufficient; and therefore power had been obtained for more important and useful approaches, and they were included in the estimate of £1,290,000 as the sum required to complete the work, which would "cost nearly twice its original estimate." The matter was not clearly explained in either the accounts or the Return; and the fact of a difference between a gross and a net estimate was spoken of now for the first time. These things rendered it impossible for the ratepayers to follow the accounts. The Government were right in giving this guarantee, and the £285,000 required for the Chelsea Embankment should also be included. It was a bad system of finance to deal piecemeal with every separate loan, and the placing of one after another led to endless complication, and prevented the Board borrowing on the favourable terms they might do, if a more comprehensive system were adopted. If every shilling of money borrowed on security went to pay the principal and interest of prior charges, the interest of the money borrowed must, in the meantime, come from the rates; and out of an income of £200,000 the Board spent £80,000 in paying interest upon loans for past improvements.

MR. TITE said, he entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken that the item of £285,000 should be added to the same guarantee, as it would enable the Board to borrow the money without difficulty, and at a low rate of interest. He had endeavoured to induce the Government to consent to this, but had failed, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it an improper thing to give the guarantee of Government funds to works of this kind. He did not quarrel with them on the broad principle; but he regretted the application of it to a small matter like this. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the difference in the estimates. But this was no more than occurred in the case of any public work, say a railway, where the cost was estimated at £2,000,000 and the return in a few years at £1,000,000, the net estimate would then be £1,000,000, and the former would be the sum they would borrow. That was the case with the Metropolitan Board; the cost of the Embankments and the new streets was known, but the return from the value of the property, though equally certain, was not so well known as to its amount; and the difference between the estimate of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and that of the Board was that while the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated the value of the land at the modest sum of twenty-two years' purchase, the Board had estimated it at twenty-five years' purchase, and he was happy to say that all the land they had yet sold had brought, on the average, twenty-eight and three-quarters years' purchase. The nature of the accounts had been complained of, but the accounts were audited annually by a Government officer, and stated very clearly every outlay. He was sure that if any improved mode of keeping the accounts could be pointed out the Board would be quite willing to adopt it. With regard to those estimates that had been exceeded, he would remind the House that they were not the estimates of the Board at all. In fact the Board was called upon to carry out a plan that was not theirs, upon estimates that were not theirs, and the only advantage they had was the guarantee of the Government. The Thames Embankment was a scheme of the Government and not of the Board; and the cost at the outset was estimated at £500,000, and the cost of the new street at Blackfriars was also estimated at £500,000, making £1,000,000 in all; but such an estimate for a great work cutting through a mass of valuable property appeared perfectly absurd. He did not put himself forward as the apologist of the Metropolitan Board; but he was quite sure that they were actuated by a desire to benefit the public, and he thought that they had effected their purpose very worthily and honestly. When the great works in Paris, carried out by M. Hausmann at an expenditure of £30,000,000, were contrasted with the operations of the Metropolitan Board, the comparison would be found very much in favour of the latter body. They had paid off £400,000 of the debt which at one time pressed so heavily on the old Sewerage Board, and he believed from the natural growth of London that the rates imposed upon the citizens would come to an end some years sooner than the period of thirty or forty years for which they were imposed. Without a Government guarantee the Board would experience much difficulty in attempting to raise money to effect this improvement, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had observed. If the Board had estimated too highly the value of the surplus property, any deficiency could be made up by levying a rate. But unless there was a necessity the Board would certainly not do so, for being ratepayers themselves they were equally interested with the other ratepayers in opposing unnecessary taxation.

Mr. AYRTON said, that nearly two years ago he called the attention of the late Government to the great confusion into which the finances of the Metropolitan Board had fallen, and a Committee of that House was appointed to inquire into the subject. The members of the Committee were struck with the great recklessness which had been exhibited in preparing estimates for works, the cost in some instances being double the amount calculated on. It was also found that since the establishment of the Board various other local duties had been imposed upon them, and that the Board in its present constitution was unfit for the discharge of its various duties. The Committee reported, and when an attempt was made to carry their Report into effect they were met by the objection, fairly enough, he was willing to admit, that they had proposed to deal with the finances of the Board, and not with the Board itself. The Committee proceeded to consider how the Board could be re-constituted so as to gain the confidence of the metropolis, and a scheme was proposed by which there might be brought into it men of a higher scale of intelligence and character. That Report might also have engaged the attention of the Government; but, considering the great questions in hand last Session, it was not, perhaps, to be expected that they could undertake a measure for the metropolis which would require great time and give rise to much discussion in that House. They found themselves, therefore, in this dilemma—that they could not reform the finance of the Board because they could not reform the Board itself, and they could not reform the Board because its finance was in a most deplorable condition. What, then, could they do? They could not now apply themselves to the whole question. The Board had this Session given evidence of great neglect of the interests they had undertaken to protect. Nothing was more important than that the metropolis should be well supplied with gas. The City of London had in this respect secured for its inhabitants all they could reasonably desire; but the Board had refused to pay attention to the recommendation of the Committee, and left nine-tenths of the metropolis, so far as the supply of gas was concerned, in the same condition they were in before. Nothing was more extraordinary than that, dealing with this great metropolis and its vast resources, they should be going on from hand to mouth, just as some ordinary joint-stock company went on—find expedients for raising money for this work and that, without any general scheme or system. By the Bill before them it was proposed to obtain money by way of deferred annuities, and superadding one loan to another. That was not the way in which the exigency of the present times could be met. The system was at once oppressive and ruinous. It was necessary to take a survey of the whole question. Works like the Thames Embankment were in the nature of permanent improvements. They would last for centuries; and it was most injurious and unjust to throw the burden of them on the occupiers of property while the owners entirely escaped. Still more extravagant and absurd was it to concentrate the expenses within a few years. The whole subject required a Government that would grapple with it; they had now only a provisional or temporary Bill, which might be said to be a reflection of the condition of the Government. He would now simply enter his protest, and express a hope that after the present state of political turmoil had come to an end, the Government in power would be able to frame and carry out a scheme which should permanently settle the question.

Mr. Tito

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter before
Ten o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, June 8, 1868.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Calthorpe, after the Death of his Father. Took the Oath—The Lord Bishop of Lichfield.
 PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation, &c.* (120); City of London Gas* (109).
Third Reading—Cotton Statistics* (133); Metropolis Subways* (73).

ABYSSINIA—THANKS TO THE ARMY.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, an accident had occurred to the steamer bearing the despatches from Sir Robert Napier, and it was impossible they could reach this country for the next seven or eight days. He would therefore ask their Lordships to postpone the vote of thanks to Sir Robert Napier until next week.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, till To-morrow,
 half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, June 8, 1868.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, for the City of Dublin.
 SELECT COMMITTEE—On Admiralty Monies and Accounts, Mr. Du Cane added.
 PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Prisons (Scotland) Administration Acts Amendment*; Local Government Supplemental (No. 4); Local Government Supplemental (No. 5); New Zealand Company*; Larceny and Embezzlement.*
First Reading—Prisons (Scotland) Administration Acts Amendment* [155]; New Zealand Company* [156]; Larceny and Embezzlement* [157]; Courts of Law Fees, &c. (Scotland)* [158]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 4)* [159]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 5)* [160].
Second Reading—Turnpike Acts Continuance* [149]; Courts of Chancery and Exchequer (Ireland) Fee Funds* [146]; Regulation of Railways [142]; Consecration of Churchyards Act (1867) Amendment* [152]; Alkali Act (1863) Perpetuation [153].
 Committee—Representation of the People (Scotland) [29]; Boundary [78]—R.P.; Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* [148]; Endowed Schools* [143].
 Report—Representation of the People (Scotland) [29-154]; Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* [148]; Endowed Schools* [143].
Considered as amended—Lee River Conservancy* [144].

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to lay upon the Table of the House, Copy of the Evidence taken by, and of any Report made to, the Secretary of State for the Home Department by the Committee appointed by him to conduct certain inquiries into the management of the Metropolitan Police?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that it was not his intention to lay on the table the Evidence or Report referred to in the Question of the hon. Member, for the reason that the witnesses were informed that their evidence would not be made public. He did not intend that evening to proceed with the Metropolitan Police Funds Bill, which was down for second reading.

ARMY—FLOATING OBSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MAJOR ANSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Floating Obstruction Committee on "Passive Obstructions for the Defence of Harbours and Channels;" and, when the Report of the same Committee on Active Obstructions will be ready?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, it was not his intention to lay the Report on the table, as it contained matter which it would be inexpedient to make public. In reply to the latter part of the Question of the hon. and gallant Member, he begged to say that the Report of the same Committee on Active Obstructions was nearly complete.

NAVY—THE F. G. CAPTAINS' RESERVED LIST.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MACKINNON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, If the statement contained in an article in the Army and Navy Gazette of May 16th, 1868, that the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in 1862 on the F. G. Captains' Reserved List was formed from a falsified Copy of the Order in Council of 1851 which governed that List, and that such alteration in the wording of the Order in Council mis-stated the case as laid before the Law Officers of the Crown and caused an adverse judgment to their claims, is true; and, if so, does he intend to persist in refusing the claims of those Officers?

MR. CORRY: Sir, I have myself examined the Papers laid before the Law Officers in 1862, and I can say that there is not the slightest foundation for the statement that the opinion of the Law Officers was formed on a falsified copy of the Order in Council of 1851. On the contrary, the Order in Council of 1851 was laid in extenso before the Law Officers verbatim et literatim, and I cannot but express my surprise that any body of officers could have imagined that the Admiralty would have resorted to so unworthy an expedient as that referred to in the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS, 1868.

QUESTION.

MR. GORST said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is not the duty of the Clerks of the Peace, on or before the 10th instant, to issue their Precepts to the Overseers of their respective districts, with general instructions for the proceedings of the Overseers in reference to Registration; and whether it is possible to stop the issue of such Precepts, or whether such Precepts will have to be hereafter cancelled by the subsequent issue of fresh Precepts containing different instructions to the various Overseers?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, in answer to my hon. Friend, I can only say that there is no power to suspend the existing law, and that the overseers will have to act in conformity with the law.

SUPPLY—THE DISSOLUTION.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, For how many months of the present financial year it is intended to take the remaining Votes in Supply, including those to be reported this day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Since my hon. Friend put the Question the other night we have had full opportunity of considering the matter, and we have come to the conclusion that it will be our duty to propose to the House to vote the Supplies for the whole year. And I think that I shall be able to show that if this course be not adopted considerable inconvenience—I will not say to the Government, but to the House and the public service—if not embarrassment, will arise. My hon. Friend when he put the Question the other night quoted what he deemed the precedent of 1841. Now, I think, after hearing the observations which I have to make, he will be bound to admit, first of all, that the supposed precedent is not applicable; and secondly, that if it were, it would not point to the conclusion which he has suggested—namely, to take the Votes for nine months. Now, what was the case in 1841? It was this—the Government proposed to take Supplies for six months, and the Leader of the Opposition acquiesced in that course, though at first he suggested that they should be taken for three months. Early in June the Supplies were granted for four months from the time when a dissolution was possible, and to last for two months after the new Parliament could meet again. Now, supposing the suggestion made from the opposite Bench were adopted—namely, that Supply should be granted for nine months—that would not be granting Supply until four months from the time a dissolution could occur, or two months after the new Parliament could properly assemble. Therefore, if the precedent were applicable, it would not point to the conclusion of my hon. Friend and others; but, further, I would submit that the precedent is not applicable. What was the case in 1841? The House of Commons passed, by a majority of 1, the following Resolution:—

Captain Mackinnon

“That Her Majesty’s Ministers do not sufficiently possess the confidence of the House of Commons to enable them to carry through the House measures which they deem of essential importance to the public welfare; and that their continuance in office, under such circumstances, is at variance with the spirit of the Constitution.”
—[See 3 Hansard, lviii.]

No such Resolution, or anything approaching to it, has been passed by the present House of Commons. It is true the Government has been defeated on a very important question of policy by a large majority; but, so far from the House of Commons having in consequence of that proceeding thought fit to pass a Vote of Want of Confidence, it has been with the acquiescence of the House that the Government has proceeded with other measures of importance in order to enable it to appeal to the new constituencies as soon as possible. Now, what has been the result of our proceeding on that understanding? Why, that it has been impossible for us to have an immediate dissolution, unless we were to cause a great amount of inconvenience, and without being able to appeal to the new constituencies as we wish. Therefore, we have deferred recommending the Crown to dissolve the present Parliament until the appeal could be made to the new constituencies. The state of things is this. A Reform Bill has been passed for England, but the sequel to it, the Boundary Bill, has not yet been passed, and measures for amending the representation in Scotland and Ireland are still in progress. Now, with regard to England alone, it is clear that there can be no complete registration of the new constituencies until the passing of the Boundary Bill, for persons will not know for what constituency they are to claim. I do not know whether hon. Members have studied the subject of registration as much as it has been my lot to do. Three years ago I succeeded in carrying a measure amending county registration, and I therefore paid considerable attention to the matter. I was in communication with gentlemen in all parts of the country as to the alterations which were required, and the chief demand that was made was that more time should be allowed for the different processes of registration. Under the existing law the 20th of July is the day for sending in claims for county votes. Now, until the Boundary Bill is passed persons living in counties which have been subdivided by the Bill of last year will not know for which division they should claim. Moreover, I think it will be universally admitted that the process of registration is one which ought not to be unduly hurried, for it would be a farce to extend electoral privileges so widely as we have done and then not to allow persons a sufficient opportunity of claiming those privileges. It is of the greatest importance that there should be ample time for making claims, and on the other hand there ought to be a full opportunity for criticizing those claims, so that persons not duly qualified may be objected to. There is first the action of the parish officers to be brought into operation, next the action of the Revising Barristers, and lastly there is the printing. Now, it is evident to those acquainted with the subject that, whatever effort may be made to expedite the registration, it can only be done to a very limited extent. I can assure the House that it is the earnest desire of the Government that it should be expedited as much as is consistent with the convenience of the electors and of those concerned in the registration; but there seems to me no reasonable probability of the new Parliament being able to meet, except for a very short period, before Christmas. Now, hon. Members are aware that, owing to the forms of the House, a good many days must elapse after the assembling of Parliament before we can go into Committee of Supply, and I think that, supposing everything favourable — supposing the Boundary Bill and the Irish and Scotch Reform Bills passed without any undue delay, and supposing the House to accept the Registration Bill which my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) is to introduce on Thursday—I may say, without fear of contradiction, that it would be what in common parlance is called rather fine steering to find time before Christmas, after the Members had been sworn in, and after the debate, which may be expected to be a rather lengthy one, on the Address, to go into Committee and vote the rest of the Supplies. But suppose, unfortunately, we are not able to pass these supplementary measures in sufficient time to allow the registration to commence on the 20th of July, it is obvious that, in order to allow persons proper time for sending in claims, the date for their doing so must be postponed, and, even though there should be no considerable postponement, I am inclined to think — though I give no decided opinion on the point — that the new Parliament could not meet before Christmas. In that event, which I sincerely hope may not occur, it might be necessary for the present Parliament to be called together before Christmas for a supplementary Session in order to vote the rest of the Supplies. Now, let me put another case. Suppose that, as I have no doubt is confidently anticipated by hon. Gentlemen opposite, on the meeting of the new Parliament a Vote of Want of Confidence or something tantamount to it should be passed leading to a change of Government, considerable time must obviously elapse before the new arrangements were completed, and much embarrassment might arise if the Supplies had been voted only up to the end of the third quarter. Moreover, I would ask with reference to the hon. Member's suggestion, Cui bono? In 1841 Sir Robert Peel expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the assurance of Lord John Russell that the new Parliament would be called together as early as possible, and interposed no difficulty in the granting of the Supplies for the time asked for by the Ministry; and why, I would ask, should the frank and honourable course taken on that occasion be departed from now? I do not know whether it is suggested that Her Majesty's Government are anxious to postpone the meeting of the new Parliament. I can assure hon. Gentlemen opposite that there exists on this Bench a longing—I may say a burning desire—to ask for the verdict of the new Parliament and of the country upon our conduct and policy. The position that we have occupied on these Benches has been one rather too much for human nature to bear; and everything that can be done will be done by the Government in order to expedite the elections and the meeting of the new Parliament, so that we may be either confirmed in our tenure of Office, and may feel that we carry on the administration of public affairs with the confidence of Parliament and the country, or else that we may retire from a position which, as I have said, has been almost intolerable. With regard to the Votes of Supply already taken, the Government have no wish to press the Report, but think it fair that the House should thoroughly understand our proposals as to the registration. I would therefore propose that the Report should be postponed for a week, that in the meantime the House may have an opportunity of judging the proposals of my right hon. Friend (the Home Secretary) with regard to the registration.

STAMP DUTY ON THE TRANSFER OF DEBENTURE STOCK.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that the Stamp Duty on the transfer of the Debenture Stock of some of the principal Railway Companies is 6*d.* per cent, and in other cases 10*s.* per cent; and whether, considering the large amount of such Stock now being created, he will propose to Parliament the imposition of a uniform Transfer Duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have only become acquainted since the Question of my hon. Friend was put that there has been inserted a provision in two private Acts of Parliament passed in 1856 and 1861, by which the companies interested escaped the 10*s.* duty for a duty of 6*d.* The matter has been contested by the Inland Revenue in a third case, that of the South Western Railway, and that company has given up the claim. The provision crept into these Acts, as provisions will sometimes creep into Acts that are not public Acts, because they have not been overlooked by the public authorities. I am glad my attention has been called to the matter, for these provisions ought to be repealed. As to the alteration of the duty, I should wish to have further time to consider it, and if I make a proposition I will do so in the general measure passed every Session regulating the affairs of railways.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

REGISTRATION—THE SMALL TENEMENTS ACT—MORNING SITTINGS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in the case of a Borough of which the Boundary has been extended into an adjoining parish where the Small Tenements Act is now in force, and in which many of the persons about to be enfranchised under the Bill of 1867 have not been separately rated on account of the Small Tenements Act being in force, the Government will introduce a provision to enable such persons to be placed on the register so as to vote at the next Election?

He also wished to know, Whether, a morning sitting having been fixed for to-morrow at twelve o'clock, the arrangement made last year, by which the sitting commenced at two and was suspended from seven till nine, has been abandoned?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the arrangement for the morning sitting to-morrow is one which stands apart, and I will give the House an opportunity, if we have further morning sittings, of deciding whether the course pursued last year should be adhered to. With regard to the other Question of the hon. Gentleman, I recently stated, in answer to the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Schreiber), that I would bring up a clause on the Report of the Boundary Bill. It has been drawn, and I will place it on the table, so that it may be adopted at the earliest period.

PARTY PROCESSIONS ACT (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

LORD EDWIN HILL-TREVOR said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Londonderry County, Whether he intends to proceed this Session with the Bill of which he has given notice for the repeal of the Party Processions Act (Ireland)?

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE replied, that in consequence of the pressure of public Business he did not intend to persevere with the measure.

IRELAND—ALLEGED BRIBE TO A PENIAN.—QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether there is any truth in the statements, copied from the Weekly News newspaper by the Irish correspondent of The Times of the 1st of June to the effect that the Crown Solicitor, Mr. S. L. Anderson, offered John P. Murray £100 sterling with a Government situation in Ireland or the Colonies, provided that he would give such information as would convict Colonel Nagle and the other prisoners of the so-called Jackmel Expedition?

THE EARL OF MAYO replied, that there was no truth in the statement referred to. It having, however, been made upon oath before a public functionary at New York, he wished in justice to Mr. Anderson to read a letter which that gentleman had addressed to him. It was as follows:—

* Law Department, Dublin Castle, May 30, 1868.

"My Lord,—Referring to the article in this day's Nation newspaper, in which appears a copy of an alleged affidavit of one John P. Murray, alias John Cade, recently a prisoner in Kilmainham Gaol, stating that previously to his release I offered him £100, with a Government situation, provided he gave such information as would convict Colonel Nagle and others, I beg leave to acquaint you, for the information of his Excellency, that one of those 'Jackmel' prisoners who were arrested in Dungarvan gave his name as John Cade, and was discharged on the 3rd of March last, having signed a paper expressing his regret for having been engaged in 'the treasonable expedition' commonly known as the Jackmel Expedition, and undertaking not to join in future in any treasonable proceedings against the Queen; that I never had an interview with this prisoner, that I never to my knowledge spoke to him, that I never directly or indirectly made any proposal to him to become a witness, and that I never offered any prisoner or any other person £100 or any other sum, or any inducement whatever, provided he gave such information as would convict Colonel Nagle or any other prisoner, or provided he would give evidence against any person.

"I have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's obedient Servant, SAMUEL LEW ANDERSON.

"The Right Hon. the Chief Secretary, &c., Dublin Castle."

Appended to that was a declaration signed by the prisoner, wherein he entered into a solemn engagement not to take part in any treasonable proceedings in future against the Queen, and also admitted that he did engage in that piratical enterprise known as the Jackmel Expedition. He could only add that in this instance the clemency of the Crown had been very ill-requited by a pardoned prisoner, who immediately upon his arrival in New York had engaged in so gross an act of perjury.

AMENDED BOUNDARY PLANS. QUESTION.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will consider the propriety of giving directions for amended plans of the Boundaries of those boroughs of which the Select Committee of this House have advised the modification being placed in the Library of this House for the convenience of Members?

MR. DISRAELI said, in reply, that he would consider whether amended plans of the boundaries of those boroughs of which the Select Committee had advised the modification should not be placed in the Library of the House.

ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH.—QUESTION.

MR. VERNER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has seen a statement in the newspaper of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) to the effect that the British Government had ample knowledge of the fact that the unfortunate man who had attempted to assassinate the Duke of Edinburgh was not only insane at the time, but had been insane for a considerable period previously; and, whether any steps will be taken to guard the peasantry of Ireland against the circulation of such scandalous libels?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I have not seen the statement in the paper of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray), but I have seen some newspaper statements of that kind. No information of that description has been transmitted to us at any time. Had we received information of that kind, if we had thought it authentic, of course it would have been our duty to act upon it; but the Government have no reason to believe that the assassin of the Duke of Edinburgh was insane.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS BILL.
QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will lay upon the Table to-morrow the information ordered to be furnished as to the length of Telegraph and number of Stations connected with the Railways in this country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that no Notice having been given of the Question, he was unable to answer it.

MR. BRIGHT said, that in the Report by Mr. Scudamore, which had been laid upon the table, a good deal was said about the telegraphs in Belgium and Switzerland. He should like to know whether the Government had any information regarding the telegraphs in the United States, which were on a much more extensive scale than in those small countries, and regarding which a great deal of experience might be obtained, enabling the House to determine the questions raised in the Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had seen no statement on the subject of the telegraphs in the United States.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM—
REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
(SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 29.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 28th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 6 (Restriction on Number of Votes in City of Glasgow).

MR. GRAHAM: Sir, I cannot allow this clause to pass without renewing my earnest protest against the principle which it embodies. It was, however, not to be expected that the Government would treat a constituency so thoroughly Liberal as Glasgow with any great favour—scarcely even with fairness. The City of Glasgow has, in reality, been denied its legitimate share in the increased representation given to Scotland. In proportion to the whole representation of Scotland, Glasgow was fully entitled to nine Members; and in view of the burgh population of Scotland alone, it might claim ten. With reference to the representation of the large boroughs of England, Glasgow is at least entitled to five Members. Relatively to Manchester and Salford we might claim five Members. In proportion to Leeds, with less than half our population, we are entitled to at least six. The only cases of an opposite nature which can be found are those of the metropolis and of Liverpool—if Liverpool be indeed to be regarded as wholly apart from Birkenhead. It must be remembered, moreover, that the proportion of borough representation in England is very much greater than in Scotland; and therefore, if any difference at all was to be made in the representation, it ought to have been in the way of giving the boroughs a larger rather than a smaller share. But I do not blame the Government too severely for having treated this matter from a party point of view. There can be no doubt that this ingenious arrangement of three-cornered constituencies was introduced into the Bill of last year as a last desperate expedient to resist the progress of those Liberal opinions which hon. Gentlemen opposite regard with an alarm so unworthy of their intelligence. I believe that it is likely to be entirely a failure. The general opinion, so far as I can hear, is that it will lead to great confusion. Those who introduced this ingenious scheme have left out a very important element in the calculation—namely, that there are in all these important constituencies, not, as they assume, one minority, but two or more minorities; and it is to the most energetic and resolute of those minorities that the share of the representation provided by such a clause as this will fall. Toryism, as a political creed, hardly exists in Glasgow; but there are men holding the most extreme opinions in the opposite direction. There are many members of trades unions who will make their influence subservient to the interests of their society. There are also a large number of Roman Catholics—upwards of 100,000—in Glasgow, and less than 10,000 Conservatives. Instead of a Conservative candidate being returned for Glasgow, we may therefore have a man of extreme political opinions, with the support of the trades unions; or, not improbably, one selected by the Irish Roman Catholics. My personal knowledge of Manchester leads me to the opinion that something of the same kind will occur there also; for trades union opinions and the Irish element are both very strong in that constituency. Such a result would be indeed a strange comment on the efforts of the noble Lord who introduced this Amendment, himself a Conservative and an Orangeman, if this debated principle should be the means of introducing into this House a minority representation on the one hand of nominees of trades unions, and on the other hand of Roman Catholics. As, however, from what has occurred in this House, I know it is hopeless to attempt to strike out the clause, I shall content myself with protesting against it, and with appealing to the Parliament of the future.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 23 (Places for the Election and Returning Officers for new Constituencies).

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved to insert at page 10, Clause 23, line 4, after "thereof," the words—

"And the Writ for the Election of the Member for the counties of Peebles and Selkirk shall be addressed to the Sheriff of the county of Peebles, and, until otherwise directed by Parliament, shall be proclaimed at the burgh of Peebles."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 41 (Appointment of Boundary Commissioners.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not know whether it would be necessary to have Boundary Commissioners for Scotland; and if it were regular he should wish to have that clause still further postponed until the Committee had gone through the schedule.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he had on several occasions drawn the attention of the Government to this important subject. His own opinion had been that these Commissioners might have been appointed and might have proceeded with their labours pending the passing of the Reform Bill through Parliament. This had not been done; but he thought the subject too important to be lost sight of altogether. He gave the learned Lord Advocate notice that when they came to the question of Glasgow he should certainly desire to lay before the House the reasons why he thought the boundaries of that burrough would require mature consideration. He would, however, in the meantime acquiesce in the proposal of the Government.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there was no wish on the part of the Government to avoid having recourse to a Boundary Commission; and if it were deemed requisite he should be prepared to nominate certain gentlemen as Commissioners. It might, however, be the best course to strike out that clause in the meantime, reserving the liberty of bringing up a new clause on the Report.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that some of the boundaries in Scotland required rectification.

Clause struck out.

THE LORD ADVOCATE next moved to insert the following clause after Clause 1:—

(Application of Act.)

"2. This Act shall apply to Scotland only, except in so far as it provides that certain boroughs in England shall cease to return Members to serve in Parliament."

As originally drawn, the Bill applied to Scotland only; but in consequence of a Resolution to which the House had come, it was necessary to make the alteration which he now moved.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE brought up a clause (Lodger Franchise for voters in Burghs) which he proposed to insert after Clause 3—

(Lodger franchise for voters in burghs.)

4. Every man shall in and after the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, be entitled to be registered as a voter, and, when registered, to vote for a member or members to serve in Parliament for a burgh, who is qualified as follows (that is to say):—

1. Is of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity; and
2. As a lodger has occupied in the same burgh separately, and as sole tenant for the twelve months preceding the last day of July in any year the same lodgings, such lodgings being part of one and the same dwelling-house, and of a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of ten pounds or upwards; and
3. Has resided in such lodgings during the twelve months immediately preceding the last day of July, and has claimed to be registered as a voter at the next ensuing registration of voters.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that the clause would have the effect of restricting the existing lodger franchise in Scotland, as lodgers occupying premises at £10 a year had, in the majority of cases, been held to be entitled to a vote.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had stated his own opinion to be favourable to the view adopted by the majority of the sheriffs—namely, that lodgers occupying premises which, without reference to furniture, brought £10 rent per annum, were at present entitled to be put upon the register. He had taken this clause from the very words of the English Act, with the view, not of excluding from the franchise any persons whom the Scotch Reform Act of 1832 intended should have it, but of removing any doubt which might exist.

MR. M'LAREN said, he thought the words requiring a continuous residence "in the same lodgings," would have a disfranchising effect.

MR. MONCREIFF said, that if it was not the intention of the Government to interfere with the lodger franchise existing under the old law, that intention should be more clearly expressed than it was in the clause.

MR. ELLICE said, he hoped that the operation of the clause would not be to disfranchise persons who, as matters now stood, were entitled to vote.

THE LORD ADVOCATE pointed out that it would have no such effect, inasmuch as in the 48th section of the Bill (General Saving Clause) it was distinctly declared that the new franchises to be conferred by it were not in substitution for, but in addition to, the old franchises.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

On Motion, "That the Clause be read the second time,"

MR. M'LAREN moved to omit the words "the same," with the view of inserting other words in the clause expressly entitling a lodger otherwise duly qualified to vote, although he might have occupied not the same, but different lodgings during the prescribed period.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that the clause would have the effect of disfranchising persons who had a vote, because in Scotland lodgers were treated as householders. Some of the sheriffs had held that lodgers were not included in the Reform Act of 1832, but the majority held that they were.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that in the English Bill the lodger franchise was made to be dependent on the occupation of the same lodgings, and he did not know any reason why that principle should not apply to Scotland. There would be a difficulty in identifying a lodger for the purposes of the franchise unless he occupied the same lodgings.

MR. M'LAREN said, that if some such Amendment as that which he had moved were not adopted the result would be the disfranchisement in many cases of persons in Scotland who now enjoyed the right of voting. The case of England was entirely different, because in England no lodger franchise existed previous to the passing of the Act of last Session.

MR. MONCREIFF said, that according to the present law in Scotland, a lodger occupying premises of the required value successively was entitled to vote. It was proposed by the clause under discussion, however, that in order to be so entitled a man must occupy the "same" premises; and he should like to know which of those two regulations was to prevail in the future.

MR. CRAUFURD said, the two provisions clearly clashed.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he was afraid that he had been the means of leading the Lord Advocate into the labyrinth in which he found himself; but he would suggest, as a solution of the difficulty, the bringing up on the Report of a declaratory clause providing that the law under the old Act should apply to the new £10 lodgers.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that as the Government had no intention to disfranchise any of those electors who had hitherto enjoyed the right to vote, he had no objection to any alteration in the clause being made which might be deemed necessary to secure that right.

MR. M'LAREN said, he thought the Lord Advocate would feel that the matter was so trifling as not to be worth wasting time about.

Words. "The same lodgings, such," struck out.

Clause, as amended, ordered to be added to the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved to insert a new clause, Clause C (Provision for claims by persons improperly or erroneously exempted from the payment of poor rates) to follow Clause 17.

MR. AYTOUN said, he wished to know whether persons who were exempted by the parochial Boards would be placed in a position of disadvantage as compared with others in having to recover their privilege of voting through a process of appeal, which he presumed would be somewhat expensive.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the clause gave the only remedy possible. Under the Poor Law Act, the parochial Boards had power to exempt persons from the payment of poor rates on the ground of poverty only; but it was too often the practice of the Boards to exempt whole classes under a certain rental for the purpose of saving the cost of collection. Under the proposed clause if any persons were excluded from the franchise by an erroneous decision on that point they would have the power of claiming to be entered on the register of voters.

The Lord Advocate

MR. MONCREIFF said, he thought that great confusion would arise from the proposed clause. Many nice and difficult questions would crop up immediately after the first registration, and every sheriff might vary in his decision on these points. If the parochial Boards had not the power to exempt from payment of rates all occupiers under a certain low rental they ought to have it, for the amount collected would not be worth the cost and trouble of collection.

MR. M'LAREN said, the clause was useful as far as it went, but he was of opinion that parochial Boards should not have the power to exempt whole classes. The Poor Law Guardians who were assessed at a high figure could not be expected to have much sympathy with the poorer classes. He would suggest the expediency of withdrawing the proposed clause and bringing up a new one on the Report, for the rule with regard to the exemption from the payment of rates varied in the Scotch burghs.

Clause agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed a new clause to follow Clause 20 (Alteration of Dates respecting Register) the object of which was to alter certain dates in the preparation of the Register of Voters in burghs as provided by the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 58. The alteration was rendered necessary by the increase in the number of voters provided by this Bill?

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he wished to know how it would be possible to do all the work in the time which was to be allotted?

MR. CRAUFURD said, he wished to know why they could not let the registration commence on the 15th of August, and finish so much earlier?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he anticipated that the register would be completed before the sheriff by the 31st of October. The arrangement had been made not on his own responsibility, but after consulting the parties who would be engaged in the completion of the register for Glasgow and Edinburgh. They could not undertake to complete it earlier than the day named. He had heard from Edinburgh that if they had not proceeded in the work for the last two months as if the new Reform Act had passed, they would not have been able to complete it even by that time. He had done everything in his power to bring about an earlier completion of the registration, but it had been found impossible.

MR. MONCREIFF suggested that the appeal should be dispensed with altogether for this year, to enable registration to occur more rapidly.

MR. M'LAREN said, he thought the process might have been still further expedited by requiring the Judges of the Supreme Court to sit on the 16th of October as an appeal court. There would be very few appeals.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that a clause had been introduced expressly with the view, if necessary, of the court appointing Judges to meet during the vacation for the purpose of disposing of registration appeals.

Clause added to the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he proposed to insert a series of new clauses having reference to elections for the Universities. He moved that Clause A (Franchise for Universities) be inserted before Clause 37 as follows:—

“Every person whose name is for the time being on the register, made up in terms of the provisions hereinafter set forth, of the General Council of any one of the Universities of Scotland shall, if of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, be entitled to vote in the election of a Member to serve in any future Parliament for such University in terms of this Act.”

He did not anticipate that there would be much objection to the clause. One or two objections had been intimated, to which he would give attention as they arose.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE moved an Amendment requiring that every person whose name was on the register should be furnished with a certificate to entitle him to vote. The certificate should state his name at full length, designation, qualification, and ordinary place of residence.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not think this at all necessary, and it would interpose considerable difficulties in the way of the University franchise. It would require that they should furnish to each elector a diploma — [Mr. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE: ‘Certificate.’] Well, a certificate, stating his name and residence. I hardly think that is required. It will be enough to know the voter’s residence at the time he comes to vote. The plan suggested would diminish the number of voters and cause considerable expense to the University, and I think the clause is better without it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause added to the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed a new clause (Clause B, Qualifications for Members of General Councils).

MR. MONCREIFF said, he wished to have some general explanation of these clauses.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought his right hon. and learned Friend was pretty well in possession of the terms of the clauses, of which he had given him a copy some days before placing them on the Notice Paper. The clauses had also been adjusted with the approval of the Universities. The only point on which he thought any question could arise was that as to the delivery of voting papers.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he did not intend to make any complaint as to want of notice; but the clauses were considerably involved. Did his right hon. and learned Friend intend to adhere to the whole of these clauses, or would he adopt the Amendment of which he (Mr. Moncreiff) had given notice?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that although the practice was to take Amendments on each clause as they arose, he had no objection to say he would adopt the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend. The time provided for the completion of registration in all other cases was the 31st of October; but it so happened that an election of some interest—namely, that of the Chancellor of the University of Edinburgh, would occur on the 30th of October. The Statutory Council would meet on that day, and the proposition of his right hon. and learned Friend was that the register should for that purpose be completed by the 25th of October. Now this was certainly going a little out of the way from the ordinary course; but he had no objection to adopt the Amendment that the registration should be completed by the 21st of October, instead of the 28th, and be authenticated by the Vice Chancellor on the 25th instead of the 31st of October. It had been suggested that this postponement should be continued in future years; but from communications he had received, he was led to believe that such an alteration would be extremely inconvenient to the University authorities.

The Lord Advocate

MR. MONCREIFF said, he could see no reason at all why an election, which did not depend upon the same framework or machinery, should be obliged to follow the same practice as others. There could be no difficulty in making up the register at any period.

Clause agreed to.

Clause C (Registration Book to be kept), and D (Registrar to enter names therein), agreed to.

Clause E (Preparation of first Register under this Act—Revision by Registrar and Assistant Registrars—Authentication by the Vice Chancellor—Register to be conclusive).

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the University elections took place in October, whereas the register would not be completed till November. He thought it desirable that the election should take place when the register was fresh, rather than when it was exhausted, or about to expire. It would be better either that the registration should be completed earlier, or that the elections should be delayed till November.

MR. MONCREIFF thanked the Lord Advocate for having accepted part of his suggestion, but was at a loss to know why, in future years also, the register could not be made up in October instead of November.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had received a communication that day from a gentleman who took an interest in these matters; and he was led to infer that there would be some difficulty in the preparation in October for elections in the month of November. The registrar would be employed in making up the register in the month of October; and his attention would be disturbed if a poll was demanded, and he had to issue circulars. There were different dates for the meetings of the Councils. In Aberdeen and in Edinburgh those meetings were held at any period in October; in Glasgow, in the last week in October, or the first in November; and in St. Andrews, in November. This, however, was a matter which might be allowed to remain over until the Report of the Committee was brought up, which would give time for further consideration.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses down to Clause N, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause O (Polling at University Elections).

MR. J. STUART MILL moved to insert the following words after "Voting papers," in Article 4, line 4—

"Except so much of the said Act as requires that the voting paper shall be personally delivered by a Member of Council who shall make attestation of his personal acquaintance with the voter, and his knowledge of the signature."

If the terms of the English Act upon this point were adopted in the Scotch Reform Bill, half, if not more than half, of those who formed the University constituency would be disfranchised. There was always a large number of residents at the English Universities who could authenticate the signatures to the voting papers; but in the Scotch Universities undergraduates did not form such intimate acquaintance with each other as in this country, and in most instances towards the end of the year they were scattered all over the British Empire. The voters would be virtually confined to a small number of residents, unless some such alteration as he proposed were made.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the Bill, as originally framed, contained no such provision as the one under consideration. It was, however, thought better to assimilate the system of voting in the Scotch Universities to that which prevailed in the English Universities, and the provisions existing in England with regard to voting papers were adopted in the lump. He would remind the Committee that last year the principle embodied in the clause he now proposed was applied to the London University, which has no resident students, and where the constituency is, perhaps, less connected with the University than the students of the Scotch Universities are with their Universities; but he was inclined to think that, probably, it would not be necessary to require that the Member of the Council presenting the voting paper should be personally acquainted with the voter by whom it had been signed. As there was no desire to cause any inconvenience to the voter, he was willing to alter the clause to that effect. He thought it, however, desirable that the wording of the clause should be retained so far as it required that the voting paper should be personally delivered and attested by a Member of the Council.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, while accepting as sufficient the Amendment offered by the learned Lord, wished, from his personal experience, to support the proposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill.) The system of voting by proxy papers for the Universities was of very recent introduction, having owed its origin to the Act carried during the last Parliament by the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees, and only two contested elections had taken place under it—the one for Oxford at the General Election, and his own for Cambridge during the present year. He was entitled to speak from that practical acquaintance with the interior of his committee-room, which was accorded to the candidate for Cambridge, and refused to the one for Oxford, and his experience was that the actual system worked well for those Universities. But it worked well in consequence of the Collegiate system, with the acquaintances contracted in the College, and the relations created between the College tutor and his pupils. He believed that a more lax Collegiate system existed in Scotland, and that residence was practically objected to, and he was accordingly convinced that the stringency of the English requirements would be found to result in the disfranchisement of many of the voters for constituencies distributed, as those of the Scotch Universities were, over all quarters of the world.

MR. J. STUART MILL asked, whether the delivery of the voting paper by a Member of Council would not involve a considerable additional expense?

THE LORD ADVOCATE assured the hon. Gentleman that he had learned from persons of experience that this was the best arrangement that could be adopted.

MR. LOWE said, he could see no security against the presentation of fraudulent voting papers.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER reminded the right hon. Gentleman that the Member of the Council who presented the voting paper would have to sign his name at the back and express his belief in the authenticity of the voter's signature.

MR. LOWE said, he considered that that was really no security.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY observed that the voting paper would be signed before a justice of the peace. That would be an additional security.

MR. LOWE said, there might be no such justice of the peace as the one whose name was on the voting paper. A man might take the list and set to work to manufacture votes without the knowledge of the voters.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I hope no candidate for a University will demean himself by having recourse to such proceedings. Persons entitled to such a position will not make themselves parties to such criminal proceedings, and if they do so they will be treated as they deserve.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that it was desirable to have perfect security, but we could not always get that, and must be content with an approximate system. The punishment for the personation of voters was found on the whole to be sufficient.

MR. LOWE said, that the question was not one of candidates or electors, but of entire strangers, whose forgery it would be impossible to punish because it would be impossible to detect it, so that the mere fact that the person, if discovered, could be prosecuted was no security whatever.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the paper was to be signed by another voter pledging himself to its genuineness. It was to be supposed that a person tendering a voting paper would inquire where it came from, because if he did not, and it was fraudulent, he would first of all be exposed to the obloquy that would attach to the Act, and next to a legal penalty.

MR. MONCREIFF remarked that the fabrication of votes would be a very dangerous game to play, for how was the fabricator to know that the real voter would not send in his paper also?

MR. J. STUART MILL said, that many operations took place on the same security—namely, that if persons committed frauds they would be prosecuted.

Amendment withdrawn.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following words were added to the clause:—

“Except so much of the said Act as requires that the person delivering the voting paper shall make attestation of his personal acquaintance with the voter.”

Clauses P and Q agreed to.

Clause R negatived.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he had now to discharge an extremely painful duty—namely, to propose that seven of the smallest English boroughs should be disfranchised, in order to provide additional seats for Scotland. As his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate felt somewhat unwilling to move the extinction of the borough which had sent him to Parliament, that duty had fallen upon him (Sir James Fergusson). It was absolutely necessary that additional seats should be provided for Scotland; and he thought the Committee would admit that seven was the smallest number that could be given. As a

The Lord Advocate

Scotch Member, he very much regretted that the additional representation of Scotland was to be limited to that number, and he could not refrain from saying that had the Scotch Members been united in support of the proposal of the Government, they might have fared better. [MR. KINNAIRD: The original proposition gave us only seven Members.] The Government had the greatest difficulty in procuring seven additional seats for Scotland. As it was necessary to find seven victims some choice was forced upon the Government, and as the House had resolved to guide itself in this matter by population, the Government proposed to take the seven towns of least population and leave the remaining three still enfranchised. He therefore moved the addition of the following clause:—

(Certain boroughs in England to cease to return Members.)

“Whereas, in order to provide for the seats hereinbefore distributed, it is expedient that certain boroughs in England having small populations should cease to return Members to serve in Parliament, Be it therefore Enacted, That from and after the end of this present Parliament the boroughs of Arundel, Ashburton, Dartmouth, Honiton, Lyme Regis, Thetford, and Wells shall respectively cease to return any Member to serve in Parliament.”

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, that it had never before been proposed to disfranchise a county town, and he contended that an exception from that rule should not be made in the case of Wells, where, without wishing to exaggerate its importance as a city, the business of the county was transacted, and the sessions and assizes are held. He would fain have stopped here; but as it had been resolved to rob the English Peter to pay the Scotch Paul, he was bound to point out a substitute for Wells. He accordingly pointed to Evesham. The population of Evesham exceeded that of Wells by only thirty-two, and did so only because Wells constituted a small area of 700 acres, while Evesham extended over 2,338 acres. Again, if Wells were disfranchised the new division of mid-Somersetshire would be the only county constituency in England possessing no represented town within it; although Somersetshire had 1,000,000 more in population than Worcestershire, which boasted of three represented boroughs in each division. He would also remark that the rental of Wells's small area was £40,000, and of Evesham's large area but £21,000. Under these circumstances, he moved that Evesham be substituted for Wells.

CAPTAIN HAYTER said, he should not have felt warranted in interfering in this discussion had it not been for the principle laid down by the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), and endorsed by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), that representation ought to be taken from the over-represented and not from under-represented counties. The proportion of representation to population was already less in Somersetshire than in Worcestershire, and if Wells were disfranchised the disparity would be still further increased. The Customs Returns of Wells, moreover, were nearly double those of Evesham. The proposal was of necessity an invidious one to make; but if any borough were to be sacrificed, it ought not to be a county town like Wells.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he could not allow this clause to pass without entering his solemn protest against the whole proceeding. It was his opinion that a greater breach of faith had never been committed.

THE CHAIRMAN called the hon. Baronet to Order, and reminded him that the question before the Committee was to omit Wells and insert Evesham.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, that as it had pleased the House to condone that breach of faith, it was the business of the Committee to select the boroughs to be disfranchised. Wells had been selected because it happened that by the last Census it fell short of the number required. That was a most unfair line to draw. The importance of a town did not depend on the number of the inhabitants within it, but on its wealth and position, and whether it was surrounded by a large and wealthy neighbourhood. Wells was the centre of a large agricultural district; it was a cathedral town of great antiquity, and held a very prominent place in history. In fact, Wells was amongst the last towns that ought to have been disfranchised. The whole proposal was so unjust to England that he was not sorry that it was to be consummated by selecting a borough which had the greatest claim to preserve and retain its representation.

COLONEL BOURNE said, that Evesham was not a decreasing borough. The population of the borough had greatly increased of late years. Another fact that had not been laid before the Committee was that, out of the ten boroughs originally named to be disfranchised, Evesham was one of the few that was really an increasing borough. Much as he regretted they should decrease the representation of England to increase that of Scotland, he was afraid they must submit to it.

MR. CRAUFURD said, there was so little to choose between the two boroughs that the Committee ought not only to refuse to strike Wells out, but also ought to add Evesham to the list.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, they were in so much hurry last year to carry a Reform Bill, that they refused to consider many of the details connected with the subject. In disfranchising boroughs regard ought to be had to the character of the constituency, the associations and intellectual and moral condition of the town, and the number of the electors, and not to the number of the population alone. The principle of selecting boroughs for disfranchisement because they happened to have below 5,000 inhabitants was shamefully unjust. It was unjust to take the last Census Returns. The borough of Calne escaped disfranchisement by the mere fact of the nominal extension of the bounds of the borough, whereby the population just exceeded the hard and fast line that had been drawn. The constituency of Calne was the smallest of any borough in England except Arundel, and was inadequate to entitle the borough to be represented in that House. It could not be contended that Calne, with 175 electors, had an equal claim to representation with an ancient cathedral town and county town like Wells, with 274. There was no reason why Scotland should rob England to increase her representation, and he complained that what was proposed was unjust towards England. The representation of Ireland could be made to show an equal demand for increased representation. There was no reason why the right hon. Gentleman, who had been an obsequious imitator of the right hon. Gentleman on the other side, should support the present proposal. With that sublime facility with which he answered questions, the right hon. Gentleman told him (Mr. Darby Griffith) last year that he looked to Providence to supply the new seats for Scotland. [Mr. DISRAELI: No!] The right hon. Gentleman's subsequent memory certainly did modify many of his expressions as understood at the time they were uttered. He hoped the sense of the Committee would be taken on the question.

MR. GRAVES said, he thought the Committee had got into a very unpleasant discussion. They could not decide the question on the mere accident of one borough having a little more property and the other having a slightly larger number of electors. It would be better to adopt the principle of the Government and disfranchise the seven boroughs which by accident were smallest.

COLONEL SYKES said, it appeared from statistics that Evesham had increased since 1861, and Wells had not.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY said, that with reference to a remark of the hon. Member for East Somerset (Mr. Neville-Grenville) he would remind the Committee that a county town, Lancaster, was disfranchised last Session.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he thought that in getting seven seats Scotland got quite enough; but as the House had passed an Instruction to disfranchise ten boroughs, he would be for carrying out that Resolution and keeping three of the seats in reserve for allocation hereafter. He would vote for the disfranchisement of Evesham, if possible. He wished to ask whether it was not out of Order to disfranchise a less number of boroughs than was named in the Instruction to the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Instruction as worded gave the Committee a discretionary power to deal with boroughs under a certain population. The Committee had therefore power to disfranchise all, some, or none of them.

MR. M'LAREN said, he would not have spoken a word on this subject had it not been for the remarks made by Gentlemen on the other side, who had spoken in a very harsh way of Scotland. He protested against the word "robbery." Scotland had been badly used in having got so few Members. He might tell hon. Members that Scotland felt no gratitude whatever for this concession, because she felt she had received no favour.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Member for East Somerset (Mr. Neville-Grenville) had naturally raised this question, and as he had put it forward they must endeavour to form an opinion upon it. The hon. Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson) had truly observed that hitherto the House had dealt with population; but he must allow him (Mr. Gladstone) to observe, what materially qualified the force of his argument, that they had adopted population in dealing with a class of boroughs, and never, that he recollected, in the case of one borough against another. In dealing with classes of boroughs there was good reason for taking population as the test, for it would be impossible to weigh the different circumstances of all towns. The case, however, was different when they came to judge between two towns. It was fair to look at all the circumstances of both. There was some weight in what had been stated with reference to Wells, because it was a county town, which gave a degree of importance to it greater than it would otherwise possess with its limited population. Wells was a true and real town, having a population of over 4,000, living within the real limits of the town; whilst the population of Evesham was dispersed over a considerable district. He had never been there, but he believed that Evesham might with as much propriety be called a village as a town. Looking from these two points, he was disposed rather to wish that Evesham was included in the clause and Wells removed from it. But there was another consideration of greater importance which would prevent his voting with his hon. Friend, except upon a clear understanding that the question was between Wells and Evesham. It might possibly happen that they might drop Wells and fail to insert Evesham. He, for one, must first consider whether he would run the risk of such an alternative. He was one of those who undoubtedly thought that when they passed the Instruction to the Committee it definitely secured ten Members to Scotland, by the disfranchisement of ten small boroughs in England. He was sorry the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary for the Home Department (Sir James Fergusson) had chosen to enter into a retrospective and political consideration in making this Motion. He (Mr. Gladstone) thought that was unnecessary, and consequently he should not protract the controversy. He was sorry the ten were not to be given to Scotland, and he only accepted the proposal of seven, because he took it to be at the present moment the most favourable proposal that the House would entertain. The three towns saved had been saved for the privilege of returning one more Member, but the odds were 100 to one that they would not take part in more than for one General Election. If he was satisfied that Evesham would be inserted, should Wells be struck out, he was ready to vote for it; but looking to the scant justice that Scotland had received, he should not like to run the slightest risk of seeing the seven reduced to six.

Mr. Graves

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that from his knowledge of Evesham, and his connection with the county, he was able to correct what the right hon. Gentleman had stated with regard to that borough, and to inform him that Evesham had not a scattered rural population, but that it was a regularly built town, with numerous streets and houses. Although Evesham had not, like Wells, a cathedral, it possessed one of the most beautiful abbey-churches in England.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, we have arrived at a stage on this great question of Parliamentary Reform when I think a final decision is absolutely necessary. The hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Darby Griffith) is of opinion that this business of the reconstruction of our electoral system has been hurried over; but I must remind the Committee that we are now at nearly the end of the second Session during which this question has been constantly under discussion. We have considered it for two years, and I think the whole subject has been as well considered as a practical nation could consider a question on which legislation could not be indefinitely postponed. No doubt if we were to spend fifty years in devising a new electoral system we should arrive at a more perfect system than the one before us; but we must remember that we have the advantage of the practical enjoyment of the results we have achieved, which otherwise we should not have. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) complains of the manner in which Scotland has been treated. I am under a very different impression on that point. I am not conscious that I have considered with any want of feeling the claims of Scotland; I must say that I am surprised, and, on the whole, gratified at the results which, in the interests of Scotland, have been achieved; and I think that Scotch Members must be unreasonable if they are not satisfied too. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) is not only dissatisfied—he is indignant; and the fact that the Bill only proposes to give seven additional Members to Scotland is one which almost exhausts his powers in giving sufficient expression to his discontent. Considering, however, that the right hon. Gentleman was once in a very responsible position in this House and then brought forward a Reform Bill in which he only proposed an addition of seven Members to the representation of Scotland, I think the right hon. Gentleman might, at least, consider our proposal with some mercy and indulgence. With regard to the question now before the Committee, a certain principle has guided us, and to that I think we ought to adhere. It would not be expedient to enter into the comparative claims of Evesham and Wells. Wells has been described as a city and Evesham as a large village. I have reason to believe that that description is not at all justified; and I would remind the Committee that Evesham is one of the most ancient towns of England, and has been the scene of some remarkable historical incidents, if those give any claim in this matter. On the whole, I trust we shall adhere to the principle which we have laid down, and by supporting the Motion of the Under Secretary of State shall bring this long-vexed question to a happy conclusion.

Motion, "That the word Wells stand part of the clause," agreed to.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD said, he hoped that, after all, Arundel would be excluded from the list of towns to be disfranchised. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) that the question ought not to be determined entirely by numbers. There was a maxim in law, De minimus non curat lex—that was to say, that the law was sometimes in favour of small towns. On what reason, then, were they to exclude Arundel from the representation? He was not going to state for how many centuries Arundel had been represented. When the Assistant Commissioners visited Arundel they were evidently impressed with the suggestion of adding to Arundel for the purpose of representation the town of Littlehampton, a rising watering place, and growing port. The conjoined borough would contain a population of 7,000. A similar addition had been recommended in other cases. He moved that Arundel be excluded from the list of boroughs to be disfranchised.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the part of the Resolution in which Arundel appeared had already been passed.

Clause added to the Bill.

COLONEL SYKES moved, after Clause 40, the insertion of a clause (Remuneration of Sheriff's Clerks).

Clause negatived.

MR. GRANT DUFF moved to insert the following clause:—

"In all cities, burghs, or towns, or districts of cities, burghs, or towns in Scotland, except in the districts comprehending Kirkwall, Wick, Dornoch, Dingwall, Tain, Cromarty, Ayr, Irwin, Campbeltown, Inverary, and Oban, commonly called the Wick and Ayr Burghs, the officer to whom the duty of giving notice of the Election of any Member or Members to serve in Parliament belongs shall proceed to election within six days after the receipt of the writ or precept, giving three clear days' notice at least of the day of Election, exclusive of the day of proclamation and the day of Election."

Clause ordered to be added to the Bill.

Schedule (A) (Extended Boundaries of the City of Glasgow).

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that the plans of the Government had been altered in an extraordinary way, and that only two days' notice had been given to Members. He must ask that the Schedule might be postponed till the Report, to enable him to communicate with his constituents in Lanarkshire, and to give them an opportunity of considering the matter.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, on the Thursday before the Recess, he gave a distinct intimation that it was his intention to include in the Parliamentary limits of Glasgow, a district which belonged to the municipality of Glasgow. He hoped a decision would be at once come to with regard to this question.

MR. MONCREIFF appealed to the Government not to proceed with this Schedule until the general question of the extension of boundaries, which had been referred to the Select Committee, should come on for decision by the House. If the boundaries of Birmingham and other large towns in England were not to be extended, there was no reason why those of Glasgow should.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that the cases were not similar, because the Select Committee had considered only the boundaries of the particular boroughs that had been referred to them. The magistrates and town council of Glasgow were desirous of having the boundaries extended.

MR. ELLICE said, that it was all very well to say that the city of Glasgow was in favour of the extension. The reason of that was because the town council wanted to extend the area of taxation. No doubt, they would gladly bring the whole county within the borough. If the Committee were to consent to the Motion they would do not only a great injustice, but would perpetrate a monstrous job. By taking away so many voters from the county and putting them into the city they would materially affect the representation of the county. He thought the question ought to be deferred till the English Boundary Bill had been settled, and he, therefore, hoped the Schedule would be postponed.

Mr. Grant Duff

MR. DALGLISH said, he should vote for the proposal of the Government on the ground that it would enfranchise 7,000 or 8,000 persons who would not otherwise have a vote. Partick and Govan were really part of Glasgow.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought the question should be decided without regard to the treatment of boundaries in England.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he hoped the Government would deal with them on the principle that what was good for England was good for Scotland. Crowded meetings of the inhabitants of Partick and Govan had unanimously petitioned against incorporation with Glasgow. Unless constituted a separate constituency they preferred remaining in the counties. Against the petitions on the table they had only the statement of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish), the authorities of which cared only for having more people to tax.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he hoped the Government would consent to postponement.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he could understand opposition to the proposal on the part of owners and persons having county votes; but he believed the working men, who were small householders, of Partick and Govan were anxious to be annexed to Glasgow, and would be much disappointed if the boon were denied them. It had been stated that the border towns were indifferent to their formation into a group of burghs; but enthusiastic meetings had been held since the adoption of the proposal in order to express their gratitude to Parliament for the privilege conferred upon them.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, that if this argument was correct the suburbs of Glasgow ought to have a representative to themselves. But because they did not choose to give to the population of these considerable places a representative in this House, to which they were justly entitled, were they to deprive those who were county electors of a vote which they valued in order to give to others a vote which would scarcely be of any value.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I wish to refer in the first instance to what has been said by the hon. Baronet (Sir James Fergusson). He knows perfectly well that if the municipality of Glasgow shall use the argument that they propose to add this population, because they are anxious to give the franchise to the people, it is a very dishonest argument. And the Committee know perfectly well that, if the hon. Baronet and his Colleagues profess to support it on the same ground, in their mouths it is equally a dishonest argument. It is not a question of the franchise at all. The hon. Baronet does not mean to say that he and his Colleagues are in favour of extending household suffrage throughout the counties of Scotland. Surely, if it would be a right thing to do it in this particular district, it would be equally right to do it throughout all the districts of Scotland. I protest against arguments being used in which hon. Members obviously do not believe. This is an argument which the hon. Baronet has no right to use, though it may be successful for his case, and that of the right hon. Gentleman who sits next him. The real question is this—What is the opinion of the people who are to be affected? On a former occasion I used an argument to the Committee which I think cannot be answered. It is this—that whenever the Queen in Council proposes to give a municipal corporation to any borough, it is absolutely necessary that the district wishing to be incorporated should show that a majority of its population is in favour of it, and an officer should be sent down from the Council to the district to ascertain if such majority can be found in favour of the proposed charter, and if it be not so then the charter should in no case be given. It is proposed to bring 40,000 or 50,000 persons within the municipal government of the city who do not wish to be brought there, whose franchise will be made of less value, whose taxation will be enormously increased, and who have not come to this House to petition for this favour to be conferred on them. Dealing thus with large populations in regard to their Parliamentary or municipal rights is contrary to the ordinary practice of this House, and calculated to lessen the confidence which the people of all parts of the country should have in Parliament. I trust, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman will listen to the strong and logical and repeated remonstrances which have proceeded from this side of the House.

MR. GORST said, that the argument of the hon. Member for Birmingham was a false one, because it proceeded upon the assumption that the municipal and Parliamentary boundary would always be conterminous.

MR. BRIGHT: The hon. Member has stated that my argument is a false one. I should like him to prove it.

MR. GORST said, that he had used the term in no offensive sense, but he desired to point out that hon. Members opposite assumed that the municipal boundaries of boroughs should in all cases follow the Parliamentary boundaries; and they seemed very anxious, for purposes of their own, to make the country believe that generally this was the case. He would mention two instances which would show that this was far from being invariably so. The first was that of Manchester, which was incorporated since the Reform Act of 1832. The people of that city, in choosing their municipal boundary, chose one considerably within the Parliamentary boundary, and including only about two-thirds of the area. The other was that of the large borough of Darlington, incorporated since the passing of the Reform Act of last year. So little had the inhabitants been impressed with the necessity of having their Parliamentary and municipal boundaries conterminous, that, having before them the boundary settled last year by the Reform Act, they chose for the municipal boundary one of only half that area.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he believed that the real object of the Government was not to give the franchise to the artisans in these districts, but to take this Liberal portion of the constituency out of the county and to attach it to Glasgow. The object of the corporation of Glasgow, on the other hand, was to get these people assessed to the municipal taxes.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought that the question ought to be left to be decided by the locality.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, the question appeared to him to be whether the Members for Glasgow should represent the city as it now existed, or a portion of it, which had been the nucleus of the present city? He wished to ask the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), who contended that it would be no boon to these people to be included within the Parliamentary boundary, whether he could deny that by being enclosed many hundreds would obtain votes for Members of Parliament who would otherwise have no voice in the election of a representative?

MR. CANDLISH said, the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst) was by no means justified in the statement which he had made regarding Darlington. The fact was, that the Parliamentary boundaries of that town, so far from being settled by the Act of last year, were still undefined, and would be so until the Boundary Bill passed. By the Report of the Commissioners now before the House, they were made co-extensive with the municipal boundaries. If the precedent of the English Bill was to govern their decision upon the Scotch Bill, the boundaries of the English boroughs were not yet defined. The English Bill was passed last year, and the Parliamentary borough of Darlington remained undefined; the Scotch Bill was not yet passed, and yet the Committee were urged to define the boundary of Glasgow.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there were two questions involved in the Schedule. The first was whether the boundary of Glasgow should remain to a certain extent co-extensive with the Royal or municipal borough. As to that, he understood there could be no opposition from the other side of the House, because he believed it was an axiom with them that Parliamentary and municipal boundaries ought to be co-extensive. Yet the effect of negating the Schedule would be to preclude the extension of the existing Parliamentary boundary to the existing municipal boundary; for there was a portion of the Royalty not included within the present Parliamentary boundary. The second question was, whether the boundary should be extended so as to include the suburbs of Partick and Govan; which, though each of them had a police government of its own, were really parts of Glasgow. ["No, no!"] Practically speaking they were. He could quite understand the sensitiveness of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) with reference to the proposed enlargement; because the borough of Birmingham was in a similar position, and the hon. Member wished the decision of the Committee upon this question to influence the decision upon the case of Birmingham. With regard to the imputations the hon. Member had thrown upon the Government, they were accustomed to such imputations. He thought, however, they might have been spared. The hon. Member constantly made the assumption that he was actuated by the purest motives. He (the Lord Advocate) had yet to learn that imputations could be launched indiscriminately against the Ministerial side of the House; certainly the hon. Member was about the last person who should make them. When the question was raised whether there ought to be protection against excessive labour for the British workman and the factory operative, the hon. Member opposed the granting of it; and he did so—according to a statement he made within the last two or three years in addressing his constituents—not because he disapproved of the measure, or that he thought it wrong in itself—the hon. Member never would admit that he ever was in the wrong—but only because the measure was supported by the Conservative or country side of the House. [Mr. BRIGHT: The right hon. and learned Member is quite wrong.] He did not think he was wrong. He recollected the matter well, for it made a great impression on him at the time. But the House ought to have been spared the reference to motives made by the hon. Member for Birmingham; for it was much better to discuss these matters on their own merits. The objection to extending the boundary of Glasgow was that Partick and Govan might be involved in the municipal taxation of Glasgow; but because that might be probable in England, it by no means followed it would be so in Scotland, in a case in which the Parliamentary boundary extended beyond the municipal boundary. From 1832 till 1862 the municipal taxation had not been extended to the Parliamentary limit of 1832 in Glasgow. Recently arrangements were made for extending the municipal boundary of Perth; but it was not extended to the Parliamentary limits. If in the case of Glasgow it was ultimately proposed to extend municipal taxation to the Parliamentary limits that could not be done without the consent of this House. In the case of Birmingham the municipal authorities and those without the existing boundary objected to its extension. In the case of Glasgow the municipal authorities favoured the proposed extension. Under any circumstances, the Committee ought to agree to the Schedule; for by rejecting it they would negative the proposition that even the municipal boundaries or Royalty should be included within the Parliamentary boundaries.

Mr. Candlish

Question put, "That the Schedule stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 86; Noes 91: Majority 5.

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, Schedules B, C, E, G, H, I, and K struck out.

Schedules D, F, and L agreed to.

New Schedules added.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 154.]

BOUNDARY BILL—[BILL 78.]

(Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir J. Fergusson.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

On Question "That the Preamble be postponed,"

MR. GORST said, he would ask the Committee not to postpone the Preamble until there had been some discussion on the different principles of the Bill, and on the position in which the House now stood with regard to it. He knew he was taking a somewhat unusual course; but then the Committee were not going to be asked to take into consideration the clauses of the measure in the ordinary way, and to vote on any particular clause after duly hearing the arguments for and against it. They were invited to come to a decision as a matter of faith in some authority, and they were, moreover, in the awkward predicament of having two authorities claiming their faith and reliance in that matter. There was, in the first place, the Report of the Commission which had been appointed last summer; and, in the second place, that of the Committee which had just concluded its labours upstairs, and which had come to conclusions in some cases confirmatory of, but in others antagonistic to, those at which the Commissioners had arrived. Under those circumstances the House might pursue one of three courses. It might follow out the recommendations of the Commission and give effect to its Report, or it might disregard that Report and adopt the clauses as embodied in the Report of the Committee. Then came the third course, which was that in those points on which the Commission and the Committee were at issue the House itself might examine the reasons for and against the proposals made, and stamp the ultimate form of the Bill with its own authority. In dealing with the subject, he should not attempt to say a single word in praise of the conscientious manner in which the Members of the Commission discharged their duties, for they were far above any praise or censure in which he might indulge. There was one feature, however, by which the Commission was distinguished which he must mention, and that was that it was of an eminently judicial character. The gentlemen who composed it were not remarkable for their zeal as partizans in political warfare, but rather for calm judicial habits of mind, and they had set about the performance of their task with powers which might have been too limited and Instructions which might have been bad. It did not, at all events, lie in the mouth of the House to blame them if such were the case, because those powers and Instructions were given almost unanimously by itself. The Commissioners having been thus appointed performed their task carefully and laboriously, and presented a Report full of interesting details, and in which they assigned their reasons for the conclusions at which they had arrived. The House might have adopted the course—he did not know that it would have been an undignified course to take—of accepting in the main the recommendations contained in that Report, impugning the decision of the Commissioners in any case in which malâ fides on their part might have been suggested, while it would also have been open to the House to remedy any mistake as to a matter of fact into which they might be shown to have fallen. But where there was no suggestion of bias or prejudice, or no ground for supposing that the Commissioners had made a mistake with respect to a matter of fact, it appeared to him that the House having appointed a judicial tribunal of that character would have acted in a manner not altogether inconsistent with its dignity in following its recommendations. The House, however, had not thought fit to pursue that course. Hon. Members on both sides of it, it was true, vied with one another in their praises of the mode in which the Commissioners had discharged their duties, and, instead of blaming them for neglect of their duties, threw blame on the insufficient Instructions which they had received, and the limited powers which had been conferred upon them. The House then appointed a Select Committee to revise the decision of the Commissioners, and to that Committee they gave additional powers, which were, however, to be used only in the case of a very few boroughs. The House might have given the Commission last year bad Instructions; but in the present year it appointed a Committee upstairs without any Instructions whatever. Of course, it was for the House to consider whether the decision of the Committee was entitled to greater respect than the decision of the Commissioners. As it would be impertinent for him to criticize the characters of the Members of the Commission so it would be unbecoming on his part to criticize the characters of the Members of the Committee. He admitted that in eminence of station the latter were on a par with the Commissioners of last year; but this he would observe, that some Members of the Committee had earned their distinction by party warfare. He would not be so invidious as to mention names; but, while some of the Members of the Committee were distinguished by impartial and judicial minds, others had earned distinction by zeal and ability displayed in party warfare. [Cries of "Name."] Well, he would name as an illustration the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread). There was no man of whose ability and integrity he had a higher opinion; but it would be idle to say that he accepted that hon. Member as one possessing an entirely impartial and judicial mind. In recent debates the hon. Gentleman had raised his reputation with his own party by the vigour of his attacks on the Ministers. All he was endeavouring to make out was that the Committee upstairs could not be regarded as a fitting tribunal to revise and, if necessary, to reverse the decision of the Commissioners. Did the Committee upstairs possess any such advantages as should induce the House to accept their decision in preference to that of the Commission? In the first place, the hearing upstairs was secret. ["No, no!"] It was a hearing with closed doors, whereas the hearings on which the Reports of the Assistant Commissioners were founded were held in public places and within the localities affected. There was something in the Report of the Committee about their having had additional evidence. But what was that evidence? It consisted of memorials and petitions from the localities affected, and the same Committee had also the advantage of conferring with the Members of the boroughs and counties affected, who stated what they believed to be true, no doubt, but who still spoke in a strong partizan sense. Could anyone say that evidence such as that should induce the House to prefer the Report of the Committee to the Report of the Commission?

Mr. Gorst

Now that the Committee had reported, he asked whether there was anything in their Report to lead the House to accept without examination the opinion of the Committee in preference to the judgment of the Commissioners? The Report of the Committee began by stating eleven different objections to the extension of the boundaries of boroughs; but the Committee did not state whether these objections were valid or not. Looking at the Report of the Committee, the only shadow of a principle that he could find for their decision was that where the Parliamentary and municipal boundaries were co-incident, it was inexpedient that there should be any alteration of the boundaries; for in fifteen cases they recommended that no alteration should be made, and in ten of those cases the Parliamentary and municipal boundaries were co-extensive. He was confirmed in this idea by what was done with respect to Darlington. The Parliamentary boundaries of Darlington were temporarily defined in the Reform Act of last year; but since that period it had been incorporated, and the municipal boundaries included a smaller area than the temporary Parliamentary boundaries. The Committee upstairs curtailed the Parliamentary boundary in order to bring the municipal and Parliamentary boundaries into unison, and had thus disfranchised many persons who would otherwise, under the Reform Act, have been electors. Yet, with great inconsistency, in some cases the Committee had actually recommended the extension of the Parliamentary boundaries beyond the municipal. In forty-two cases in England and Wales the Commissioners last year recommended the extension of the Parliamentary boundaries. Only eighteen or nineteen of those cases had been challenged before the Committee; and in no less than eight of them the Committee had departed from the principle of making the Parliamentary and municipal boundaries conterminous, and had recommended the extension of the Parliamentary beyond the municipal boundaries. He believed that the objection which existing Parliamentary boroughs felt to be extended had great weight with the Committee. It appeared to him that this objection was confined to large boroughs; and it was a fact that when the Commissioners went down to Birmingham, and held a public meeting, the corporation and town clerk appeared before them and opposed the extension of the boundaries on the remarkably Liberal ground that in 1867 Parliament had conferred certain privileges on the existing electors, and they objected to share them with others. That was a singular argument to be used by a Liberal corporation. Let the House contrast the conduct of Birmingham with that of the large and important borough of Liverpool, which did not object to see the privileges it enjoyed conferred on the people around. Another principle which seemed to have actuated the Committee was based on the objection of outlying districts to be brought within the limits of boroughs. He confessed that he had not the slightest sympathy with such an objection. He thought it most gross injustice and selfishness on the part of people who lived in the neighbourhood of a borough and enjoyed all the advantages which that vicinity gave them to endeavour to escape from the payment of borough rates. Some of the adjoining townships of Liverpool actually shared in all the municipal advantages of that town, having water and gas supplied to them, but objected to be joined to it, lest they should be rated. The case of Gateshead was still more flagrant. There was every reason in that case for adding a large district to the borough; but the people living in the district which it was desirable to add to the borough did not wish to be included in it. The House had not the opportunity of seeing the Assistant Commissioners' Report with reference to this case, but he had enjoyed that advantage. ["Order."] He hoped he was not offending against any Parliamentary Rule.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE rose to Order. He had asked that these Reports should be produced. The Prime Minister declined to give them. They were not on the table. It was not, therefore, regular for the hon. and learned Member to refer to them.

MR. GORST said, he had moved that the Reports be laid on the table, and he believed they were produced ["No!"] Then, if he could not refer to the Report of the Assistant Commissioners, he would state what he was about to mention on his own responsibility. He was informed that in the case of the district which objected to be added to Gateshead there was no local Board of Health, as they objected to be washed and to have any sanitary rate. Would the House sanction such selfish and unworthy objections in the arrangement of a great question like this? The Tyne boroughs were all marvellously alike—there was a large manufacturing population and an excrescence of docks and shipyards. In the case of South Shields and Gateshead the Committee upstairs refused to add these excrescences along the river bank to the existing borough, whereas in Middlesborough they had actually extended the municipality for the purpose of taking in the outlying district. He did not say this was conclusive against the Report of the Committee; but he thought it was conclusive against adopting it without examination in detail. He would only mention one more anomaly in the proceedings of the Committee upstairs. They appeared to have a great horror of extending the system of grouping adopted by Parliament. They seemed to forget that groups of boroughs were not at all unknown to British representation. Wales abounded in groups of boroughs; but the Committee was so much afraid of grouping boroughs that they even refused to carry out the Report of the Commissioners in the case of Portsmouth by annexing to it Gosport although the parish of Alverstoke, in which the town of Gosport lay, extended as far as the middle of Portsmouth harbour, the two places being identical in interest and connected by a large floating bridge which traversed back and forward every half-hour. The opposition did not proceed from the inhabitants of the town of Gosport, but from the squirearchy of Alverstoke. It was extremely distasteful to the working men of Gosport, who wished the two should become one borough, and who said that the squirearchy of Alverstoke and the gentlemen of the town of Portsmouth—he did not know whether the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Serjeant Gaslee) was to be included—he did not mean anything offensive to the hon. Member—did not understand their wishes. The Committee thought fit to reverse the decision of the Commissioners in that case, and yet, with the most marvellous inconsistency, they grouped the boroughs of Windsor and Eton, which had no real affinity. The House, then, should examine for itself before deciding in favour of the Committee and against the Commissioners. They might give their sanction to the Report of the Commissioners—but he was afraid that after all that had passed they would be stultifying themselves by pursuing such a course. He thought that where the decision of the Commissioners was unchallenged, and where the decision of the Committee was virtually in accord with their recommendations, effect should be given to them; but in those cases where the Commissioners recommended one thing and the Select Committee another, he did not see how the House could avoid entering on a discussion. They must hear the facts and arguments urged upon both sides with patience, and stamp their final determination with their own judgment and authority.

Mr. WALPOLE: After the observations of my hon. and learned Friend the House will probably expect from me, as one of the Committee—and having been elected Chairman I look upon myself as the servant of the House—to inform them of all which the Committee did in order that the House may be enabled to arrive at a proper judgment of the whole of this matter. In doing so I shall avoid all controversy on one side or the other, stating only what the Committee have done, and their reasons, as far as I can briefly do it, for arriving at the conclusions they did, and I hope any Member of the Committee will correct me if I should state anything inaccurately. Two observations only would I make of a prefatory character. First, I agree with my hon. and learned Friend as to the courses which are open to us; and the other observation is this—I think my hon. and learned Friend, had he been present in the Committee, would not have charged any Member with acting from party motives. The difficulties of this case grow upon us as we reflect on them more and more. They have arisen from the imperfect manner in which the directions and Instructions were given to enable either the Commissioners or the Committee to arrive at a clear and satisfactory conclusion. I do not know that I can better point out the difficulties of the case than by reminding them of the course which it was proposed the House should take last year with reference to making new and enlarged boundaries in boroughs. The House will remember that, at the commencement of last Session certain Resolutions were laid on the table, and one of them—the 11th or 13th I think—related to the enlargement of borough boundaries, and for the sake of clearness I hope the House will permit me to point out the course that has been adopted from time to time by the House and by the Boundary Commissioners with regard to this subject. The original Resolution proposed a scheme—

Mr. Gorst

"For new and enlarged boundaries of the existing Parliamentary boroughs where the population extends beyond the limits now assigned to such boroughs."

That was a very general and a very large Resolution. When the Bill was introduced it contained a Clause to the following effect:—

"The Inclosure Commissioners shall report to one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State whether any enlargement of the boundaries of such boroughs is necessary in order to include within the area thereof the population properly belonging to such boroughs respectively."

These were such vague and general phrases that it was hardly possible to assign any definite and practical meaning to them without at the same time authorizing the Commissioners to go much further than the House intended, and accordingly, in the amended Bill, the clause took the following shape:—

"They shall also inquire into the boundaries of every other borough in England and Wales, with a view to ascertain whether the boundaries should be enlarged, so as to include within the limits of the borough all premises which ought, due regard being had to situation or other local circumstances, to be included therein for the purpose of conferring upon the occupiers thereof the Parliamentary franchise for such borough."

This was an indication that it was the intention of the House that the Commissioners were to have regard to two things—first, the situation of the outlying districts; and, secondly, the other local circumstances by which their decision as to the enlargement of the boroughs might be influenced. When the Bill was in Committee an Amendment was proposed by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), to the effect that the Commissioners should have regard to the municipal boundaries; but that Amendment was not adopted because it was pointed out, very properly, by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that the Commissioners would of course have the power of looking to the municipal boundaries as well as to any other circumstances affecting the question. Such being the only Instructions given to the Commissioners they soon discovered how difficult it was to act upon them. Before the Assistant Commissioners were sent down to the different boroughs the Commissioners, I think most wisely, put an interpretation upon the words, "situation and other local circumstances," which, if it had been acted upon, would have removed most of the difficulties which have since been met with. That interpretation will be found in the introduction to their Report. The Commissioners instructed the Assistant Commissioners to ascertain whether there was such community of interests between the outlying districts and the borough as would lead them to believe that such outlying districts should form part of the borough. A wiser interpretation than that could not have been put upon the words of the Act. And now let us see how far the Assistant Commissioners were able to act upon it. One of the ablest of the Assistant Commissioners (Mr. Cumin) came before the Committee upstairs, and, speaking of the boroughs of the great county of South Lancashire, he said that the expression "community of interests" could not mean merely identity of pursuit, because in reference to that county it was impossible to say where the community of pursuits began or ended. When he came to deal with Manchester, for instance, two propositions were made to the Assistant Commissioners—one by an able Conservative barrister, and the other by the Conservative Association. By the first proposition the Assistant Commissioners were asked to draw a circle with a radius of three miles, which was to include the borough; while by the second proposition they were asked to include all the outlying districts in the neighbourhood of the town, up to Ashton in one direction and Oldham in another. It was evident, therefore, that it was impossible to lay down any definite and clear rule which could be applied to all cases that arose in the manufacturing districts. The only rule that Mr. Cumin could lay down, therefore, was to disregard the mere circumstance of there being a community of pursuits, and to ascertain whether there was a great mass of continuous houses inhabited by those who belonged to the great mass of the population of the town. That was a sensible rule to lay down, so far as it could be acted upon; but it was soon found that it was impossible to apply it to Liverpool or to Birmingham without including enormous districts which could not properly be regarded as belonging to those boroughs. The final conclusion at which the Commissioners arrived under those circumstances was to determine each case in accordance with its own special circumstances; in short, to decide without any rule at all. I have alluded to these facts in order to show the House that this question is not such an easy one as might be supposed at first sight.

The best boundary line, in my opinion, that can be drawn is to include the outlying districts where they have a distinct community of interests with the borough, and to exclude them where their interests are independent of those of the borough. These being the difficulties the Commissioners had to encounter, what did they do? They had two classes of cases to deal with—the new and the old boroughs. With regard to the former they possessed large discretionary powers; and I do not think that there has been any dispute between the Commissioners and the Committee with regard to the minor differences that have arisen with respect to them. There were 197 old boroughs in England with which the Commissioners had to deal—116 of which they left without proposing any extension of their boundaries. Of the remaining eighty-one, forty-eight would receive the addition determined by the Commissioners, if the House adopted the Report of the Committee, as he trusted it would; the other thirty-three cases were referred to the Committee to adjudicate upon them. Now, in eighteen of these cases the Committee practically agreed with the recommendations of the Commissioners; but they thought that it was not advisable that any alteration should be made in the boundaries of the remaining fifteen boroughs. The objections raised to annexation were eleven in number. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst) said that he could not find out the exact reason which had induced the Committee to come to the determination at which they had arrived. What we did was this—we sat for four days consecutively, de die in diem, examining into every case in order to see what all the objections were that could be raised by all parties, and then we proceeded to deliberate upon the cases to see how far we could arrive at a conclusion with regard to them. We stated in our Report the various objections raised to the enlargement of the boroughs, and to the annexation of the outlying districts, and as hon. Members have had an opportunity of reading that Report I will not refer to them in detail, but I will proceed to lay such information before the House as I think will explain the reasons which induced the Committee to arrive at a different conclusion with regard to the fifteen boroughs from that come to by the Commissioners. I think you may divide these fifteen boroughs into four classes, placing five in one, six in another, two in a third, and two in a fourth. Now, in the first class I would place those very large boroughs to which annexations were recommended by the Commissioners, but in which those annexations have not been approved by the Committee. Those boroughs are Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Lambeth, and Marylebone. Now, in all these cases, with the exception of Liverpool, you will find that the annexation was equally objected to by the boroughs themselves and the outlying districts, and in all the cases without any exception you must, if you had adopted the principles upon which the Commissioners had proceeded, have annexed a great number of other places. Again, in most, if not all the cases, the outlying districts proposed to be annexed possessed some kind of interest distinct from that of the borough to which they were to be annexed, either in the shape of a local Board or some other form of local self-government. Again, in most, if not all, these cases there was a strong desire on the part of those possessing county votes to retain that privilege; and it was not to be lost sight of, that while the annexations would have swelled the populations of these boroughs to over 400,000 each, the remaining populations of the respective counties, or divisions of counties, in which they were situated would in most cases be very little more than, and in some cases actually less than 100,000. I submit to the House, therefore, that we were perfectly justified in the conclusions at which we arrived with regard to boroughs which would become so unwieldy and so disproportionately large. I now come to the next class of cases—those in which the districts proposed to be annexed possessed interests entirely distinct from those of the boroughs to which they were to be joined. In this class I may place Tynemouth, South Shields, Gateshead, Birkenhead, Warwick, and Portsmouth. Well, now as to Tynemouth, the Commissioners proposed to add Willington Quay to it, but the Assistant Commissioners themselves admitted that the two had no connection whatever, and the evidence adduced before the Committee showed that Willington Quay, if connected with any borough at all, was more connected with Newcastle-upon-Tyne than it was with Tynemouth. To South Shields the Commissioners proposed to annex the town of Jarrow, which is an old town, distinct from South Shields, and not the overflow of the population of that place, but independent of it. There was no reason for annexing

Mr. Walpole

Jarrow to South Shields, unless a system of grouping were adopted, any more than there was in the cases of many of the places the annexation of which was rejected. The next case, that of Gateshead, is a very striking one. From what appeared in the Report of the Commissioners I should have myself favoured the proposed annexation of the outlying districts; but the facts as brought out before us showed that the population of Gateshead was increasing in a southerly, but not in an easterly direction. The Commissioners, however, have added three ecclesiastical districts lying in an easterly direction, while between the borough and these districts lies a space of agricultural country of about a mile with very few houses. In this case nobody can pretend that the places proposed to be annexed are connected with the borough as affording accommodation for an overflowing population. The annexations proposed to be made to Birkenhead on the north side of the town would appear at first sight to be justifiable; but all the evidence adduced before the Committee went to show that the interests of the borough and the districts proposed to be added were not only not identical, but were absolutely conflicting, the fact being evident from the continual opposition offered by the neighbourhood to the passage of local Bills through this House; and the district north of Wallasey Pool, if connected with any borough, was rather connected with Liverpool than with Birkenhead. Then, with respect to Warwick, my own individual opinion is that it would have been a very good thing if Leamington and Warwick had been linked together some time ago; but I do not think that under their Instructions the Commissioners could properly include Leamington in Warwick, since that would be grouping two towns which were distinct from each other. It would be simply ridiculous to urge that the places proposed to be annexed were inhabited by the overflow of the Warwick population. Then comes the case of Portsmouth, to which the Commissioners proposed to annex part of the parish of Alverstoke, and upon that case my learned Friend was very severe. My brother being the rector of that parish I requested the Committee on that ground not to call upon me to take part in their decision; but, having heard the evidence, I must say that to my mind it was distinctly shown not only that Alverstoke possessed a separate Bench of Magistrates and belonged to a distinct Poor Law union, but that it was also neither socially nor municipally connected with Portsmouth. In the next class—the cases of Bristol and Nottingham—the House will, I think, see the difficulty with which we had to deal. Many of the objections which apply to the first class of cases apply also to these two boroughs, but there was, in addition, the extreme difficulty—as the Commissioners themselves pointed out—arising from the fact that as these towns are counties of themselves, we had to deal with a large number of freeholders whose rights of voting either in the county or in the borough would have previously to be determined. That question has never been fairly brought before Parliament since the time of the Reform Act, and my own individual opinion is that, independently of the other objections, you were bound to determine that question before, by annexing the outlying districts to the town, you deprived certain voters of rights which they now possess, and which for the most part they are anxious to retain. The cases of Wigan and Reading are the last. Now, in the case of Wigan, the districts proposed to be added being inhabited by a population unconnected with the borough by sympathy or interest, and which was not an overflow from the town itself they (the Committee) thought it would not be wise to annex them; and in the case of Reading everyone seemed to be agreed that the district proposed to be annexed was inhabited by persons who had selected residences with the special view of separating themselves from the town, and who were in fact much more identified with the county interests. These are the reasons which guided us in our decisions, and I have only to add a few words upon the course which we ought now to pursue. I must say that I agree with what my learned Friend said with reference to the Report of the Commissioners. If that Report had not been challenged, I, for one, should have been prepared, from the high respect which I entertain for the Commissioners, and the confidence I repose in their judgment, to accept the decision at which they had arrived. But when that Report was challenged, and referred moreover to a Select Committee, it would have been a gross dereliction of their duty if that Committee had not exercised their judgment in respect to the proposals recommended by the Commissioners. Now, something has been said as to the Report being regarded as final. I have always felt that any Report to the framing of which I have been a party ought to be submitted to the judgment of the House; but I must at the same time remark that if it is the intention of the House not to accept our Report, though I should not in the slightest degree find fault with that decision, yet I cannot disguise from myself we have lost a great deal of valuable time in determining this question. If such be the case, day after day has been spent in fruitless and superfluous labour; and I, for one, should have thought twice before I would have allowed my name to be placed on the Committee. At the same time, I do not in the least degree object to our Report being questioned, and with reference to the proposal of my hon. and learned Friend that we should deal with the particular cases one after another I can only say that we shall feel it our duty to give such information as may lay in our power, leaving it to the House to decide on each case as it comes under discussion. As a Member, not of the Committee but of the House, I may take leave to express one opinion which I entertain very strongly—namely, that where the point is in doubt as to whether you should annex outlying districts to a borough or not, it is very desirable that considerable weight should be given to the circumstance that the municipal and Parliamentary boundaries are conterminous. I have always contended for that principle in the House, as the only means whereby we can insure community of interests, inasmuch as that is the only means by which community of interests, duties, and burdens—in fact, the obligations of a common citizenship, can be obtained. I have one other general remark to make. I own I entertain very considerable doubt whether in cases where you have large borough constituencies, numbering four times as many electors as the constituency of the county in which they stand, you should proceed to take electors from those counties and add them to the towns. I am well aware it is felt that the counties are, ordinarily speaking, agricultural, and the towns commercial or manufacturing constituencies; but I think it by no means a bad point in our Constitution that we have some constituencies composed of both elements of population, and such constituencies can only be secured by preserving commercial and manufacturing counties as distinguished from those which are purely agricultural.

Mr. STOPFORD said, he regretted the Committee had to deal with two rival Reports from bodies of undoubted authority. He would confess he had been somewhat dismayed and disappointed by the Report of the Committee, because it re-opened the whole question of boundaries, and had not shrunk from raising points unanimously settled by the House last year. One would have thought that respecting the general principle of the extension of boundaries the House and the Government, the Commissioners and the Committee, would all have been in accord; but the Report of the Commissioners, which had been based in every case upon careful local inquiry, was entirely upset by the Report of the Committee, as far as the boroughs were concerned. Much stress had of late been laid on the value of local inquiry in the matter of bribery, and so highly did some hon. Members esteem it that they were prepared to relinquish control over cases of contested elections, if by that sacrifice local inquiry could be secured. Notwithstanding this, however, the Committee threw the whole of those patient local inquiries to the winds, and came to entirely different conclusions. As far as he understood it, the Committee's Report was based on these grounds, that municipal and Parliamentary boroughs should be conterminous; that boroughs should not be unduly extended so as to consist of an overwhelming number of Members; and that there should be a community of interest between the boroughs as at present constituted and the suburbs it was proposed to add to them. With respect to the first point, he contended that inasmuch as Parliament had not expressed an opinion on the subject last year it was now too late for the Committee to lay down any such principle. But, setting this aside, he at least expected of the Members of the Committee that they would be consistent, but he found they recommended the extension of the boundaries of several boroughs, and among these was Northampton, the Parliamentary and municipal boundaries of which would not be conterminous if the Report were adopted. The Committee also endorsed the recommendations of the Commissioners respecting Bolton, Chester, and Windsor, that the area of these boroughs should be extended by the addition of certain of their suburbs; so that in these cases the Parliamentary and municipal borough would no longer be conterminous. The objection that boroughs would become unwieldy by the addition of suburbs was quite untenable, even if it did not arise out of a question which the Committee was incompetent to inquire into—namely, whether boroughs, the population of which had outgrown their Parliamentary limits, should be added to by that population. This question had already been discussed and decided on in the affirmative by Parliament last year. It struck him as somewhat extraordinary that every one who differed from the Commissioners, including the Committee, were most profuse in complimenting them on their industry and care. The Committee had made much of the point that people in the suburbs of towns had objected to being brought within the boroughs because they would lose the privilege of compounding; but he could not regard that as a greater hardship to those at present without the Parliamentary boundary than it was to those within. It was of the greatest importance that counties should retain their representation in their own hands, but if large manufacturing towns went on increasing at their present rate the House would have the hon. Member for Birmingham sitting in the seat of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, than which a more extraordinary metamorphosis could not be imagined. As for the alleged necessity of responding to the wishes of the inhabitants of disputed districts he denied that local opinion had any right to be consulted in cases of Imperial policy. In the case of divisions on a great question recently before the House, Ulster had expressed a most unmistakable opinion, but the House had entirely disregarded Ulster's voice. Upon questions of Imperial policy, where the House had made up its mind, it had been broadly declared that local opinions ought not to prevail. But that was exactly the case of persons outside the boroughs. Parliament had adopted certain principles of extending the franchise as desirable, and now it was sought to reverse these in deference to the opinions held by persons outside the boroughs. The secret of the great objection felt by persons outside the boroughs to be included for Parliamentary purposes he believed to be the dread that they would some day be included for purposes of taxation. And he agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst) that persons who enjoyed every advantage derivable from living in close proximity to a town might not unfairly be asked to partake of the burden of local taxation. He could not help thinking that, as to Bristol, Wigan,

Mr. Walpole

Nottingham, Birmingham, and Liverpool, the Commissioners had made out a very good case for extending the Parliamentary limits. He did not profess to have any intimate acquaintance with the special details; but he might at least claim the advantage of being perfectly impartial on the subject of boundaries, as in the county which he had the honour to represent no question had arisen with respect to its extension. It had been a great disappointment to him and to many Members on the same side of the House to find that one great anomaly of the representative system was not proposed to be redressed. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had often called attention to the great discrepancy existing between the representation of boroughs and counties. While the boroughs had not so large a population as the counties, they had twice as many Members to represent them; and last year it was supposed that this anomaly was being to a certain extent redressed, by the absorption into the borough constituencies of large numbers of persons who, as long as they remained outside, swelled the county population, and rendered the county representation so very disproportionate. But if the population which the Commissioners proposed to include in the boroughs was thrown back into the counties they would be no better off than before the Reform Bill was passed. It was not for him to say what course the Government or the House should take on this important question; but he could not help thinking that it would be necessary for the Committee to go into every case again. It had been said that the Government were pledged to adopt the Report of the Committee, appointed on their own Motion; but he confessed that according to the view he took, the Committee had gone in some degree beyond their instructions in proposing the sweeping changes which they had recommended. He hoped that the House would agree with the Commissioners rather than the Committee.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I think that the preliminary discussion now taking place—though it may appear to occupy more time than is desirable—will be very advantageous. The Committee is at a very great disadvantage in not having the privilege of hearing the opinion of the Government, and especially the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, for on him will depend probably the decision whether we must go through the whole of the Schedule of eighty-one boroughs, and have discussion and division on a great many of them, or whether we can confine ourselves to the question whether we shall accept the determination of the Committee in regard to the fifteen boroughs to which reference has been made. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) has made as clear a statement of the case of the Committee as it is possible to submit to the House. The right hon. Gentleman referred to what was said by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Home Department on a former occasion when he proposed the appointment of the Select Committee, and proposed that the decision of the Committee would be final.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I beg pardon; that is not the case. I did not know that my right hon. Friend alluded to me; but it has been stated that such is the case, and I see that the words appear in The Times newspaper. But the way the question arose was this. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) asked me whether, if the Committee were appointed, they would have the power of reserving questions for the consideration of a future Parliament, or whether they would give a final opinion as to the boroughs submitted to them? I said, "The Committee would report to the House their final decision," and in The Times report the statement is added, "and the House would be bound by that decision." I felt confident that I had not made use of those words, and I requested a friend to look at the passage as it was reported in other newspapers. The Daily News puts it thus—

"Mr. Hardy said, it would be final so far as the Committee was concerned, but it would be for the House to ratify it or not, as they determined. If there was documentary evidence on one side, there ought to be documentary evidence on the other."

In another paper it is stated in the same way—

"The right hon. Gentleman asked whether the decision of the Committee would be final, or only to postpone the question for the further consideration of Parliament; for, if it were to be final, they certainly ought to have evidence on both sides."

The right hon. Gentleman here referred to is the Member for South Lancashire. [Mr. GLADSTONE interposed a remark.] I am only reading the newspaper extract. It goes on to say—

"Mr. Hardy said, it would be final, as far as the Committee was concerned, but it would be for the House to ratify it or not, as they determined. If there were documentary evidence on one side, there ought to be documentary evidence on the other, but there would be no opportunity of calling witnesses on either."

The question, therefore, to which my attention was directed, and to which my answer was pointed, was whether the Committee ought to reserve these cases for a future Parliament, or whether they ought to decide upon them at once.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is not in Order in reading newspaper extracts from reports of debates in the House during the present Session.

MR. BRIGHT: I do not in the least contest the explanation the right hon. Gentleman has offered; but I appeal to the House, and I may even appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, whether the impression conveyed to the House at the time the Committee was appointed was not that the Government would be disposed to receive with confidence, and as a final decision, that which should be determined upon by the Committee? In all cases of this kind, the House does not absolutely part with its power when it appoints its Committee; and perhaps on no former occasion was a Committee appointed more entirely worthy of the confidence of the House. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst) spoke of party men. Why, if you were to shut from due deliberation on grave matters all those who take an active part in the discussions of this House, the course of Business in this House would be greatly impeded. I was about to say just now that I thought the Government should step forward, on this occasion, and guide the House to the conclusion at which it should arrive. I think no men ever occupied the Treasury Bench who would not, under the circumstances, have come to the conclusion that it was their duty to accept the decision of the Committee. There are fifteen boroughs to which some hon. Members are disposed to take exception; and it would be most unfortunate if the House in Committee should go into a discussion and division with regard to every one of them. The hon. and learned Member opposite—I did not know before that the hon. Gentleman had been learned—made a speech to night which went at great length into these matters. But let me ask, why was the Commission appointed last year? Clearly because the House felt itself not equal to dealing with the details of a great number of boroughs, and the Commission was appointed for the sole purpose of offering, with these details before it, such advice, and of giving such decisions, as might guide the House. The right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) has shown what we now all feel, that the clause in the Bill was hastily drawn, and not judiciously for its purpose; and the result is that the Report of the Commissioners—without any blame to them—has not been so satisfactory in some respects as the House had hoped for and as we all could wish. And the reason the Report was not entirely satisfactory was that the Commissioners were compelled apparently, or thought they were compelled, to exclude from view certain considerations which should not be lost sight of when a question like this, affecting so many boroughs, was to be considered. The question of convenience—the public opinion of the boroughs as they exist now, and of the population of the districts to be brought in—all these are matters that ought to be considered. And because that had not been done there was some dissatisfaction felt, and how great it was Members on both sides of the House know. The hon. Member for Liverpool on that side, and the hon. Member for Cheltenham expressed dissatisfaction with the Report, and there was a prevalent feeling when the Committee was appointed, that the appointment of the Committee was the best solution of the difficulty in which the House found itself. Now what happened? As Members for Birmingham, my hon. Colleagues and myself appeared before the Committee. The Committee heard first of all the Assistant Commissioner, a gentleman who evidently knew very well what he was talking about, and had paid great attention to the matter; and after he had made a statement going very much into detail. Mr. Walter, one of the Commissioners, was also permitted to make a speech to the Committee. Mr. Walter, like hon. Gentlemen opposite, appeared to have an intense interest in the borough which I am permitted to represent, for he told the Committee that he had taken upon himself to go down to Birmingham and stay there some time, to make himself acquainted with the geography of the place. Well, he made a speech to the Committee. After that my hon. Colleague was permitted to state facts which we thought very important, and which doubtless the Committee thought important. And after him I was allowed to add a few arguments that presented themselves to my mind. They were very kindly, and very impartially listened to. Now, not only were we heard, but the hon. Member who represents East Worcestershire (Mr. Vernon) was heard; and not only was he heard, but also the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) who, no doubt, with an idea of the approaching meeting of the Social Science Association, said that he had prepared a paper for the Committee. I have not seen that paper, but no doubt he said everything that could be said on the side of the view which he entertained. When the Committee had heard all that they had to hear they deliberated. Now look at the dates. On the 22nd May my hon. Colleague and myself were before the Committee. On the 28th of May the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was before the Committee. On the 29th of May the Committee appears to have decided. I believe the hon. Member for Bridport (Mr. Kirkman Hodgson) made a particular Motion, but that is nothing, because it is stated in the Report that the Members of the Committee - and the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst) will admit that at least some of them had judicial minds—were absolutely unanimous in all these cases. The hon. Member says that there was no principle laid down by the Committee. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) does not say that there was any principle; and I do not see that there is any principle that can be accurately defined that would affect equally all the boroughs which were referred to the Committee. The question of municipal and Parliamentary boundaries is one which was mooted long since last Session. The right hon. Gentleman at the Head of the Government objected to an Amendment which, at my request, was moved by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey); but in his answer he made use of a few words which led inevitably to the conclusion that it would be impossible for the Commission wholly to keep out of view the question of the municipal boundaries of boroughs. Now, as I am on my feet, I will state a fact which the right hon. Gentleman referred to generally, but which affects the borough with which I am more immediately connected. North Warwickshire contains a population of about 116,000 outside the boroughs, and it was proposed to take 25,000 from the 116,000 of the population, and add them to a borough which was now about 350,000. East Worcestershire has about 130,000, and it was proposed to take from them 10,000, and add them to that borough, which, if the former addition had been made, would have had 375,000. Well, in the face of the hon. Gentleman, I say that is a preposterous proposition which the House, in an impartial, judicial state of mind, would not for a moment consent to. Now, the right hon. Gentleman said there were three courses, which were these—that you should take the Report of the Commission, or take the Report of the Committee, or disregard them both; the House going into a confused discussion and voting upon the case of each separate borough. But I take for granted that that last course is what the House rejected when it first of all appointed the Commission. The House declared by appointing the Commission that it was not competent wisely and impartially to go into the question of these various boroughs. Well, a Commission was appointed, and when it reported the House discovered that the Instructions to the Commission had not been sufficiently broad and distinct, and there was so much dissatisfaction with a portion of the Report, that the House determined to have the case tried again by a Committee, which would have the advantage of the information which the Commission had had, and of the information which had subsequently been offered to the House. And the Committee sat, and I will undertake to say that whether you take the three Gentlemen on this side of the House or the two Gentlemen on that side, you would not be able to find in the House five men to whom you would more freely leave the determination of any matter in which your personal interests were concerned. They sat from day to day; they heard everybody whom, by the Instruction of the House, they were permitted to hear. They heard them fully. It was not a secret Committee as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst) says. There was no secret about it. It was much more open than the Commission that made the other Report. I do not allude to the Reports of the Assistant Commissioners, but to the Report of the Commission itself. The Committee having heard everyone, they deliberated undisturbed by party influence of any kind, and they came unanimously to a certain conclusion. Well, I ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

—I do not believe I shall ask him in vain—whether he will sanction, and I ask the House whether it will sanction, the course that is proposed in opposition to the decisions of this Committee, which were so satisfactory—not possibly to some hon. Gentlemen who feel no interest but a party interest in this matter, but entirely satisfactory to the populations that are most concerned. Because, what has happened? So far as I have heard, there has not been a single petition or memorial offered to the House since this Report was published; nor, so far as I know, has any Member of the House proposed to disturb any of the decisions to which the Committee has come. Well, now, have not I made out a fair case for the course I am about to suggest? What I suggest is that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government and his Friends on that side of the House, being as anxious as we are on this side to get forward with the Business of the Session, we should accept without contest the decisions to which this Committee has come. If there be any case in which it can be shown that a positive error has been committed by the Committee—which is possible, as there were some errors on the part of the Commission—then, of course, the House will be willing to make such alterations as may be necessary. But I think, if hon. Gentlemen will get out of their minds the notion that there is any great gain to be secured for party in this matter, they will agree with hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House that we should accept the determination to which the Committee has come. I speak on behalf of the great constituency which I am permitted in part to represent, and of the population outside the borough, who by the decision of this Committee are to be left outside of it, which decision, I believe, meets with their entire approbation. If that be so, I appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and to the Government, whether it can be to their interest, or whether it can be to the interest of anybody in this country that that which is satisfactory to the large masses concerned should be disturbed after the repeated and solemn judgment has been given upon it by so eminent and influential a Committee as that to which it has been referred?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member for Birmingham seemed to assume that what was satisfactory to him and his Friends must of necessity be satisfactory to the House. What had the hon. Member proposed? That because the House had appointed a Committee, therefore the House should abandon its function of review. The hon. Member proposed that the decision of the Committee should be final with reference to the circumstances of the boroughs into which it had been appointed to inquire? It appeared to him that the House would not be justified in adopting the hon. Gentleman's suggestion. The right. hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Walpole)—the Chairman of the Select Committee—had argued the question entirely as a borough Member, and, like other hon. Members who had previously addressed the House, did not understand the position of county Members with respect to representation. As Member for North Warwickshire, he now represented 120,000 people outside the boroughs of Tamworth, Coventry, and Birmingham. But his constituency was composed of 7,000 electors, of whom fully 3,000 were freeholders or persons otherwise qualified in Birmingham, Coventry, and Tamworth. The hon. Member asked where would be the justice in bringing into the Parliamentary borough of Birmingham the number of persons now outside the boundary whom the Commissioners proposed to bring in. Now, the county electors of Birmingham amounted to one-sixth of the constituency of North Warwickshire, and therefore the borough population had a Parliamentary power outside the borough, while the population outside the borough had no electoral power whatever within the borough boundary. From this the House would see that the argument of the hon. Gentleman founded on the numbers in the county and the numbers in the borough, as though distinct in their representation, had no weight. In this respect the Committee had been less well-informed than the Commission. According to the admission of the Committee themselves, no two cases of boroughs whose boundaries the Commissioners proposed to enlarge had been decided upon the same principle. Each case had been decided on its own merits. How, then, could the House abdicate its function of review? He had not heard what the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) or Mr. Walter had said before the Committee, but his belief was that there was no case so strongly to the credit of the decision of the Commissioners, and so doubtful, even in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) himself—the Chairman of the Committee—as the case of Birmingham. When that case came on for discussion, he hoped to show that the Manor of Aston — the district which the Commissioners proposed to include in the borough of Birmingham—contained the Park and Manor House of Aston, which were the property of the Corporation of Birmingham. This constituted a case which was open to doubt, even in the opinion of some of the Committee, and he believed that the Members of the Commission would be found strong in the maintenance of their decision. The Park and Manor of Aston were opened in 1858 as a Park for the benefit of the people of Birmingham; the Commission recommended that it should be included within the borough, but the Committee dissented from thier recommendation. The Park and Manor had been purchased by the Corporation of Birmingham, and if it were decided to be outside the Parliamentary borough, it might as well be decided that Hyde Park and the Green Park ought not to be within the boroughs of Westminster and Marylebone. There had been no English county Member upon the Committee, and apparently no one who properly appreciated the position of county Members and constituencies ; and he thought he had adduced sufficient reasons for inducing the House not to accede to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, and adopt the Report of the Select Committee without review.

Mr. Bright

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he thought that before they decided between the rival claims of the Commissioners and the Select Committee they should know more correctly the actual facts of the case. In a short but important conversation which preceded the appointment of the Committee it was stated that the Commissioners had no power to inquire into the opinions of persons locally interested. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had now fallen into the same error ; but the fact was that the Assistant Commissioners were instructed to appoint a time for the reception of statements from inhabitants in favour of enlarging the boundary; and in their Report the Commissioners expressly stated that all persons desirous of making such statements were permitted to do so. Moreover, he knew in two cases that the Assistant Commissioners invited statements and evidence, and in one case counsel were heard for and against extension. It was not, therefore, correct to say that the Commissioners had not regarded the wishes of inhabitants. The hon. Member (Mr. Bright) said that local wishes should be almost conclusive ; but, if you were to ask people's opinion as to the constituency in which they would prefer to vote, you might almost as well ask them how much income tax they would wish to pay. A matter of this kind was not to be decided by the convenience or inconvenience of Members who canvassed a constituency, or by the wishes of the constituency itself. He felt that he was almost stating a truism when he stated that boroughs like Birmingham, Liverpool, and Manchester should include for electoral purposes the towns as they existed in the present day, and not a mere section or nucleus of those towns as they might have existed some time during the last century. If the House carried the Bill with the recommendations of the Committee, he had rather that the proposal of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) had been adopted, and the boundaries of these boroughs had been left as they were at present. It might be said that they were going to do the same thing ; but it was one thing to allow these boroughs to continue an anomaly admitted by every one, and it was quite another thing to stereotype these old errors, as was now proposed—to reiterate in the face of the facts that these towns had not increased, when every body knew that a large population connected by community of interest with the borough population had grown up just outside. If the Bill passed as amended by the Select Committee, it was a Bill which no Liberal Government in Office could have carried. He denied that the House which had discarded the recommendations of a Commission which nobody mentioned without praise had not the power also to review the recommendations of the Committee. The recommendations of the Select Committee in each case must stand or fall upon their own merits. The House had not before it the Reports of the Assistant Commissioners or the memorials presented to the Committee ; and he thought it would be only fair to report Progress and wait for that information before proceeding further with the Bill.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER : Sir, I do not wish to detain the Committee by any very long observations on this question, but important conditions have been touched upon in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) which ought not to be overlooked in determining this question. I understood him to say that one thing which had weight with the Committee was this—that it could not be for the benefit either of the counties or the towns, either of the rural or the urban population, to attempt to draw too “hard and fast a line” between these two different populations. I take the liberty to say that I am more and more impressed with that conviction as we approach the consideration of the question what is to be done in the way of increasing the representation of our larger communities. We feel it necessary to give them more Members, and then difficulties arise at every step. Are we to subdivide, as has been suggested in the case of Glasgow? That is a proposal the difficulties of which are felt by many, and it is therefore objected to. Are we, on the other hand, to give them three Members, and then, by means of the minority vote, practically neutralize the majority, or, at all events, diminish the power which they possessed when they had only two Members? I cannot but think that we shall get more and more into difficulties of that kind if we insist upon aggregating more than is done at present those portions of the adjoining population which have hitherto belonged to counties. And here I wish to point out what strikes me as having a most material bearing on this question. There is a converse question also. You have got no inconsiderable number of boroughs which are, in fact, parts of counties—such as Shoreham, Aylesbury, East Retford, and others. Neither your Committee nor your Commission has considered that question. No power of contracting such boroughs was conceded to them. And are you going to say that where you find a considerable urban population you will separate it from the counties, its connection with which now enables those counties to be represented in sympathy with the preponderating interest of the general population; while, on the other hand, you will take out of the counties a purely rural population and convert them into boroughs. Hitherto you have not proceeded on the principle of separating the rural from the urban population, and I do not think it desirable that you should.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I will strive, as far as I can, to bring the Committee to some practical point. The hon. Member for Birmingham made an appeal to me to announce the part which the Government would take, and argued that of course we could not oppose the Report of the Committee. That view is founded on an assumption which I think a most singular one—namely, that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had announced to this House that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to receive the Report of the Select Committee as conclusive. Now such an announcement was never made by my right hon. Friend; it never could be made, because no Minister would ever presume to make such an announcement; and I am surprised that it could be thought possible by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), who, generally speaking, is so jealous of the privileges of Parliament and of the rights of every Member. But I will tell the Committee what we are prepared to do. We are prepared to give to the Report of the Select Committee the same consideration and respect as we would have given to the Report of the Commission. We were not prepared to receive the Report of the Commission without criticism and without that fair Parliamentary scrutiny to which all such documents ought to be liable. We believed if we had gone into Committee originally on the Bill we might have considered as we proceeded the Report of the Commission, and if in various instances the justice and propriety of their recommendations had been admitted the good sense of the House would, after duly considering the objections, have arrived at a satisfactory conclusion at a much earlier period than apparently we shall now. The hon. Gentleman asks what I propose that we shall do? What I propose is indicated by the order of Business that has been prepared for this evening. The moment we concluded the Scotch Bill we proposed to go into Committee on the Boundary Bill, and I can see no other way of making progress than by going on with the Bill. We shall have before us as we proceed the Schedule, with the conflicting recommendations of the Commission and the Select Committee, and the good sense of the House will come to a conclusion. I know no other mode by which we can arrive at a result more speedily or satisfactorily. The hon. Gentleman cannot wish that the views of any powerful interest represented in this House should be entirely silenced. I think the hon. Gentleman will admit that the views of hon. Gentlemen should be put before the Committee. In no other way can we arrive at a conclusion satisfactory to the country. If we go into the subject in Committee, we shall find no greater difficulties than we have found in similar cases, and we shall overcome them as we proceed. That is the course which I recommend to the Committee. So far as I can collect the opinions of the Committee, though there are some points of considerable importance on which we are not all agreed, they are not numerous, and I cannot recommend a better course than that we should now proceed with the Bill.

Sir Roundell Palmer

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown has stated that there was a mistaken idea as to the declaration of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. I wish to confirm, as far as I can, what fell from the right hon. Gentleman. The question that I put to the right hon. Gentleman on the occasion referred to, was whether the Committee was to recommend — what I confess appeared to me a much wiser course than that which was adopted — that the consideration of the boundaries of certain boroughs should stand over, rather than that the particular mode of adjusting those boundaries should be at once determined, and it was with reference to that question that the right hon. Gentleman answered, if my memory serves me right, that the Committee were to make a final determination. Not, of course, that their recommendations should be absolutely final, for it would be impossible that any person should have stated to this House that the recommendations of the Select Committee should be final as against the House itself. Therefore there can be no doubt of the meaning of the language of the right hon. Gentleman. But while the House reserves in its own hands the power of dealing absolutely, according to its own discretion, with the recommendations of every Select Committee, there is to be kept in view by the other side this consideration, that the appointment of a Select Committee does mean something, and that a definite character of authority is to be assigned to the recommendations which it makes. Now, the right hon. Gentleman says, "Let us proceed to consider the Schedules, and we shall get through the difficulties as we have done in other cases." But our position in other cases has not been at all what it is now; nor does the right hon. Gentleman propose, in the speech he has made, to give any prima facie authority whatever to the recommendations of the Committee proposed by the Government itself. This is a case in which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham has said, the House admitted its own incompetency in discussion of detail. Why did we appoint a Commission and hand over our duties to that body, if we have here in the House itself the best means of disposing of the difficulties one by one as they arise? We did, by the very appointment of the Commission, acknowledge our own limited capacity for the adjustment of such matters. It seems to me that we have arrived at this point, that, except in some cases of great failure on our own part or that of the Commission, we should accept the results of its labours as final. Well, has there been a failure, and what was it? We appointed a Commission composed of persons of all opinions to obtain all possible knowledge and information in each case from persons of all opinions on the spot, with regard to the extension of boundaries, but we never authorized that Commission to allow the wishes of the population to weigh as an element in their decision. That is an omission which no doubt we made, and in reading the Report of the Commission it appears to me that they nowhere speak of the wishes of the population as an element which guided their judgment. I am bound to say that in no way could they exclude that element if they acted in accordance with the opinions of Parliament; but I do not think that the Instructions given by us would have justified the Commissioners in founding their decisions in any degree on the wishes of the population. Well, then, when we came to deal with the subject this year, we found in a certain number of instances, not very numerous, but important, the wishes of the inhabitants very strongly stated, and we found, too, that it was impossible for us to overlook the wishes of the inhabitants without giving them an opportunity of being heard. The House therefore appointed a Committee to consider the subject. And now it is said the Committee had not the same means of judging that the Commission had. I contend on the contrary, that it had much better means of judgment and larger powers, because, while we never gave the Commission the slightest intimation that they were to take into account the wishes of the inhabitants, every Member of the Committee knew that they had been appointed with that special object, and therefore they were enabled to include in their judgment elements which the Commission could not entertain at all. The Committee was appointed by the House as a tribunal of review on the Report of the Commissioners, armed with better means of information and larger powers of judgment, than the Commissioners. That was done by the Government itself, yet now we stand, according to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, in this position—he is aware of the fact that the Committee have made Reports recommending another course, but he has a Bill on the table and that Bill contains the whole of the recommendations of the Commissioners, and consequently passes by in every case the recommendations of the Committee. And the right hon. Gentleman says simply, “Let us go on with our Bill.” That is to say, the Committee may come and be heard, of course, just as any other party may be heard, against the Bill of the Government; but no weight whatever is to be given by the Government to the recommendations of its own Committee. [Mr. DISRAELI: No!] The right hon. Gentleman, I must beg his pardon, has said so; for he is going on with his Bill, which embodies in every case the recommendations of the Commissioners; and in no case the recommendations of the Committee. So that he gives no weight to the recommendations of the Committee, or if I have not adopted the most accurate expression let me say this—that in every case the right hon. Gentleman passes by the recommendations of the Committee. He tells the Committee he is quite ready to hear their reasons. Of course he is, and so he is ready to hear the reasons of the hon. Member for Birmingham, or the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, or anyone else who has reasons to allege; but to his own Committee he denies the authority which I must say I think he is in reason bound to accord to their decisions. I own it appears to me that if this be the position in which we stand; if the Government are not able to find that the labours of this Committee have issued in any fruit whatever; if in each case, as we must infer from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, the Government mean to proceed with the Bill as it stands, not abandoning any portion of the Schedule on which this discussion will turn, but are merely ready to have the subject discussed just as it must have been if no Committee had been appointed, then I must say this—in the first place, just respect has not been paid either to the decision of the House and of the Government itself in appointing the Committee, or to the Gentlemen who undertook to serve upon it; and, in the second place we have adopted a most inexpedient course in the loss of two or three weeks for the purpose of pitting one authority against another, and then being left to begin afresh and find our way through the mazes of a long controversy, which, according to the views of the right hon. Gentleman, we have done nothing whatever to simplify, but a great deal to complicate.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. PAULL said, that seeing so much more deference shown by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone), for the decision of one tribunal than for the decision of another, he was disposed to view with considerable suspicion the motives for that deference. The facts of the case were these — a Commission had been appointed to inquire into the state of these boroughs and the advisability of extending their boundaries, and in order to take evidence, and get information which the House could not itself obtain. Such information had been obtained by a body of men who were unanimously admitted to have been impartial, and to have done their work, as a rule, well. Now, surely, had there not been some object to serve, due respect would have been paid to the Report of that Commission. There were, however, objects to be served, and ends to be gained, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite proposed a Committee. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli), desirous, as he had always been, of conciliating the House, and assisting them to arrive at the best conclusion possible, acceded to the suggestion, though it was contrary to all the usual modes of procedure, for it was always understood that a Committee had not the same means of obtaining information that a Commission had, since the latter could visit the places interested, and make the necessary inquiries on the spot. It had been said, indeed, that the inquiry of the Commission had been limited, since they had not been deputed to inquire into the feelings and wishes of the inhabitants, while the Committee had been appointed expressly for that purpose. What, then, was the position of the House? They had before them on the one hand the recommendations of impartial men who had visited the boroughs, and on the other the recommendations of a Committee that had inquired into the wishes expressed by the Members for those boroughs influenced by party, or, all events, by partial sympathies. Having before them the recommendations of two tribunals based on different principles, what could be more fair than the suggestion of his right hon. Friend to proceed with the Bill, and weigh the recommendations of both tribunals, so as to come to a just decision? To ask the House to adopt en masse the recommendations either of the Commission or of the Committee was to ask them to abdicate their privileges. It appeared to him that this was part and parcel of the reiterated attempts which were being made to place the Government in a difficulty. Hon. Gentlemen opposite ought to be above such attempts. The Commissioners had had every opportunity of obtaining evidence, whereas the Committee had had but very limited opportunities, and to throw over the recommendations of the former would be to depart from all the principles by which the House was usually guided.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, that as one of the Commissioners he had not hesitated, finding their recommendations called in question, to agree to the appointment of a Committee, and, their powers being larger than those of the Commissioners, the House had, he thought, derived great advantage from their labours, in narrowing the field of the differences that existed. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) had, he thought, rather misunderstood the First Minister of the Crown when he had represented him as attaching no importance to the Report of the Committee, for the Government, it seemed to him, were disposed to attach great importance to that Report, though not to adopt it without question and examination. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole), when in his able speech he referred to the large size of these boroughs and to their immense number of inhabitants in comparison with the counties, left entirely out of view the great number of 40s. freeholders and of leaseholders in these boroughs who had votes for the county. Now, the difficulty which presented itself to him in accepting the Report of the Committee was that some of the boroughs which they recommended should not be extended at all were just the boroughs that had increased the most. Indeed, if the boundaries of these boroughs were not extended it did not seem advisable to extend any. As to the argument that they would become unwieldy, he had had a little experience of an unwieldy constituency, for he had had the honour of representing the whole of the West Riding, ninety miles long by forty wide, and containing a population of 1,500,000, or almost half that of Scotland. Well, what had been done with it? It had first been divided into two, and latterly into three constituencies. Then again the Tower Hamlets had been divided. The House surely could not shut its eyes to the vast increase of these places. He had been surprised to hear it stated that in the case of a Northern borough the Commissioners had recommended an addition a mile in length without any buildings, for he was not aware of any such case. It had been said that the Commissioners left everything to the Assistant Commissioners, who visited the boroughs, adopting everything recommended by them. Now, the fact was that the Assistant Commissioners were not empowered to report any opinion at all; what they had to do being to visit the towns, and take evidence, and report what the facts were. The Commissioners, having them at their beck and call, had endeavoured to arrive at a thorough knowledge of the facts of each case, and in no instance had they proposed an extension of boundary unless the suggested addition joined the borough and had really become part of the town. They had not recommended the addition of a straggling line of houses, or of a detached village, but only of what had become part and parcel of the town. If they had not proposed extensions under such circumstances they might as well, it seemed to him, not have been appointed at all. He thought the House should adopt the advice of the First Minister of the Crown and proceed to consider the Bill, dealing with each case on its own merits, and duly weighing the recommendations both of the Commissioners and of the Committee.

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, it appears to me, after the speech of the late Commissioner, who has not proved, at least to my satisfaction, that he gave to the subject the consideration it demanded, that we have arrived at the supreme point of stultification. In the first instance, Her Majesty's Government threw over the Report of the Commissioners. They acknowledge the justice of the memorials which were presented to them from several towns, and they appointed a Select Committee, which appointment was, in fact, a compromise with a party in this House in order to put aside the Amendment of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert). I altogether objected to the Report of the Commissioners; I objected to the constitution of the Commission, but I was not supported at the time. I did so, because when I saw an acute Member, of judicial experience, on the other side of the House appointed, and when I saw appointed another Member on this side of the House, excellent in all the relations of life, but unable to cope with the judicial ability of that hon. Gentleman, I knew well what the Report of that Commission would be. I am not going at this hour of the night to criticize the Report, although I could do so at considerable length; but I am not going to pay fulsome compliments to the Members of that Commission. I think it was defective from the first, and the Instructions were still more defective. What is the point we have arrived at in this House? These disputed cases were referred to a Select Committee, the impartiality of which I challenge any man to impugn. Even the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst), who to-night has impugned the impartiality of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), has nothing to say in answer to that mild, moderate, and judicious speech made by the right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole). No man can have listened to it and not acknowledge it was made in the purest and most moderate spirit. How has it been met by the Government? Why, Sir, I really felt a little ashamed for the Government that they should meet it so. Yes, I felt ashamed of the Government and of its supporters, not excepting the outspoken Member for St. Ives (Mr. Paull), that they should meet it in such a spirit. What is the position of the House now? We have pretended that we want to expedite a dissolution of this House, and we have positively thrown this question back three weeks. It will come to this—that the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) or somebody else must move the omission of Clause 4. As Her Majesty's Government are not disposed to treat the Select Committee of their own appointment in a proper and Parliamentary spirit, I move, Sir, that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he entirely and totally dissented from the doctrine that if the House adopted the Report of the Select Committee that would be tantamount to passing a censure on the Commission. His respect for the Commission and his intimate personal relations with one of its members would have prevented him joining the Committee if he had imagined it was to sit in judgment on the Commission. He believed one thing was referred to the Commission, and quite another to the Committee. The Commission, honestly and faithfully carrying out its Instructions, threw a wide net and embraced everything that came into its meshes. They told the House the greatest possible annexation that could be made to these boroughs, and the House, having heard them, appointed the Select Committee to consider and report what was the wisest thing to do under the circumstances. The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Paull) said the Committee never would have been appointed if there had not been objects to serve. What did he mean by "objects to serve?" What did he mean by such language? The hon. Member went on to say the Committee had listened to the party views and party interests of the people who were affected by the recommendations of the Commission. He (Mr. Whitbread) told the hon. Member the Committee did no such thing.

MR. PAULL: I said there were party objects to serve in the appointment of the Committee, but I never made any imputations on the Members of the Committee.

MR. WHITBREAD said, the hon. Member stated that there were party objects to serve, and he implied that they had been served. So far from the Committee having listened to party views, when anybody opened the question of party interests the Chairman promptly desired him to desist from referring to them. As to his own impartiality, which had been questioned by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst), all he would say was, he had sat for sixteen years in the House, and had adhered with tolerable fidelity to the party which represented his views, and the views of those who elected him, and if other hon. Members had done the same it would have been better for the House and the country; but although a party man, he could not charge himself with having voted or spoken in a way which would justify anyone in saying he would not give a fair verdict on a question like this. A man might perhaps be a bad judge of his own impartiality; but he should have thought that the legal experience of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst) would have taught him that the time to question the impartiality of your umpire was before he was appointed, and not after he had given his decision. He had little to add to the able statement of the Chairman of the Committee. A cry had been raised, "We will have the counties, and we will have them only as counties;" but this was a dangerous cry, and might provoke the cry, "Let the towns be towns." He advised the other side, before they raised the former cry, to consider how many boroughs were really fragments of counties. He was very sorry that the right hon. Gentleman at the Head of the Government had taken the course he had done. The right hon. Gentleman wisely said some nights ago he could not discover any party gain which could be obtained by adopting the recommendations of the Commission. He had been unable to detect any gain to be obtained from adopting the recommendations of the Select Committee. The present state of things would be unjustifiable if the Government did not believe that the country, when it was appealed to, would reverse the balance in that House; but the Government might rest assured that if the balance were turned it would be by a change in the sentiments and feelings of the whole country, and not by a miserable and paltry gain of a few thousands more or less of votes transferred in the settlement of boundaries.

MR. DISRAELI: It is vain to attempt to oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) at this hour of the night. At the same time, I must express my opinion that the time has come when the House ought really to act in as practical a manner as possible upon this subject. If any plan more practical than that I have proposed can be suggested I am perfectly ready to adopt it. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) spoke as if this Bill were framed in a spirit totally contrary to the recommendations of the Select Committee; but he forgets that three-fourths of the recommendations of the Commission were adopted by the Committee. I know no more convenient way of showing every possible respect to the Report of the Committee and to the recommendations of the Commission, and of expediting this measure, than proceeding with the Bill as it is before us, and discussing the few cases in which there may be differences of opinion. It is only by making progress with the Bill that we can bring these questions to a speedy solution; and, I will not say in one night, but in two nights, we might conclude this business. I shall put the Bill on the Paper for Thursday night, to follow the Registration Bill, the introduction of which will not lead to a long discussion. If we go on in Committee we may, by eliciting the expression of the opinions in disputed cases, arrive at some conclusion respecting them; but if any more convenient way can be suggested I shall be happy to hear of it. If the House wants to proceed with the Bill, it will do so in the regular course; and we shall hear and settle all these points of difference.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS BILL.—

[Lords.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE, in rising to move that this Bill be now read a second time, said, that this measure had undergone very careful scrutiny and consideration in the other House of Parliament, and the Board of Trade had received frequent deputations and much correspondence on the subject-matter of it. Many of the provisions were in accordance with the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and he hoped that, while it contained much that was valuable, there was very little in it to which either the public or the railway companies could fairly object. The first subdivision of the Bill, dealing with accounts and audit, was designed to meet a requirement which had very generally been felt, and for which the Bill of the right hon. Member for Gateshead (Sir William Hutt), introduced last Session and again this year, was intended to provide. He must here acknowledge the obligation the Board of Trade had been under to his right hon. Friend. They had adopted many provisions of his Bill, and had received from him in addition several valuable suggestions. In one respect he ventured to think that their measure was preferable. It contained in the Schedule the exact form in which it was proposed that railway companies should keep their accounts. The companies had objected, with some reason, that they might be put to inconvenience and expense if the form were altered from time to time at the discretion of the Board of Trade. The Board had, therefore, after conferring with the accountants of the principal railway companies, settled a form for general adoption. This would not, of course, preclude companies from adding in their half-yearly Reports to their shareholders such further information on matters of detail, such comparative statements with previous years and proposals of future policy, as the peculiar circumstances of each railway might render desirable. The 13th section related to sea risk. There could be no doubt of the convenience to the public of through booking for delivery beyond sea; and it seemed reasonable that companies should not be placed, by the impracticability of obtaining a bill of lading in each case, in a worse position as regarded their liability than a shipowner receiving goods at the port. It would be open to any consignor who objected to such provisions to make his own arrangements for sea transit. Section 14, requiring that tables of fares should be posted in booking offices, was one of which he gave Notice himself in 1866, and which would much facilitate the payment for tickets, and save time both to the ticket clerk and the traveller. He placed on the Notice Paper at the same time a provision for printing the fares on the tickets, as was generally done on the Continent and sometimes in England, but perhaps the clause now adopted was sufficient for the purpose. The 15th section provided for the separation on demand of terminal charges from the whole rate charged. This was recommended by the Royal Commission, and communications to the same effect had been forwarded to the Board of Trade by the Chairman of Committees and other high authorities. Section 16 proposed to supply a defect in an enactment in the Railways Clauses Act, which was intended to compel the consumption of smoke by railway engines, but which had proved comparatively inoperative. The 17th section dealt with the subject so often brought forward by the hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. H. B. Sheridan) and was the form in which the Board of Trade, after causing experiments to be made on some of the chief railways, considered the question of communication between passengers and guards could best be dealt with. The 23rd section gave shareholders an opportunity of determining at an early stage whether they would proceed with a Bill, instead of, as in what was called the Wharnccliffe meetings, expressing their opinion after a much more considerable expense had been incurred. The 28th section, which was introduced on the recommendation of the Attorney General, supplied an accidental omission by prescribing a moderate fee for duties to be performed by a Master of the Court of Queen's Bench under the Act of last Session. These were the chief provisions of the Bill. Some important suggestions had been made by a deputation from the Manchester conference of shareholders too late for the insertion of clauses in the Bill to give effect to such of them as were approved by the Board of Trade while in the other House of Parliament. He proposed, however, to put the Committee on the Bill for that day fortnight, in order to give ample time for the consideration of these and other suggestions which hon. Members had made or might wish to make on these important subjects.

Mr. Stephen Cave

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Stephen Cave.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 22nd June.

ALKALI ACT (1863) PERPETUATION BILL—[Lords.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE, in rising to move that this Bill be now read a second time, said, the Alkali Act had now been in force for four years and a half. It was passed in 1863 in order to restrain the escape of muriatic or hydrochloric acid gas during the process of manufacture of alkali—or sulphate of soda or potash by the decomposition of common salt. To show how valuable had been its results, he need only say that, before the passing of the Act, in some cases the escape of that most deleterious gas amounted to 50 per cent; that doubts were expressed by manufacturers whether that quantity could be reduced lower than 10 per cent; that by the Act it was obligatory to reduce it to 5 per cent, and that practically last year, owing to improvements which had been made, chiefly in consequence of the suggestions of the inspector, the average quantity of escaping gas was less than 1 per cent—namely, 0.88—and this year he understood it was still further lessened. He need hardly say that this result had proved profitable to the manufacturers as well as advantageous to the public. No complaints of hardship had been made by manufacturers; indeed, only one prosecution had been necessary. There had, therefore, been abundant proof of the salutary nature of the Act, which, unless renewed, would expire during the present year. It was proposed to re-enact it without alteration, but to request the inspector—who had performed his duty with intelligence, industry, and judgment, as the Reports presented to Parliament proved—to report on many other gases produced by various manufactures, some of which were represented to be even more dangerous than those which occasioned the passing of that Act.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Stephen Cave.)

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that the expense of carrying out the Act was thrown upon the public, instead of being borne by those who received the benefit from it. He hoped that a clause would be introduced to remedy that state of things.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

PRISONS (SCOTLAND) ADMINISTRATION ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE, Bill to amend the Acts for the Administration of Prisons in Scotland, in so far as regards the county of Lanark, ordered to be brought in by Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE and Mr. DALGLISH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 155.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT SUPPLEMENTAL (NO. 4) BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bill to confirm a certain Provisional Order under “The Local Government Act, 1858,” relating to the district of Tormoham (Devonshire), ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON and Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 159.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT SUPPLEMENTAL (NO. 5) BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders under “The Local Government Act, 1858,” relating to the districts of Malvern, Cowpen, Bristol, Sheffield, Margate, Bognor, and Otley; and for other purposes relating to certain districts under the said Act, ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON and Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 160.]

NEW ZEALAND COMPANY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ADDERLEY, Bill to remove doubts respecting the operation of the New Zealand Company's Act of the ninth and tenth years of Victoria, chapter three hundred and eighty-two (Local and Personal), ordered to be brought in by Mr. ADDERLEY and Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 156.]

LARCENY AND EMBEZZLEMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY, Bill to amend the Law relating to Larceny and Embezzlement, ordered to be brought in by Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY and Mr. COLERIDGE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 157.]

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, June 9, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Vagrant Act Amendment (138).
Second Reading—Army Chaplains* (116).

ARMY CHAPLAINS BILL—(No. 116.) (The Earl of Longford.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the object of the measure was to meet certain difficulties in the way of army chaplains discharging their duties at military stations in Great Britain and Ireland. At some places, where the Church accommodation was insufficient, garrison chapels had been built, in which Divine service was performed by the army chaplains, who were commissioned officers, appointed by the Secretary of State. Some parochial clergymen, however, objected to these chaplains as intruders into their parishes, and a recent decision in the Consistorial Court at Dublin had established the correctness of this view. The object of this Bill was to enable the army chaplains to legally continue their services. It was, therefore, proposed to empower the Crown, with the consent of the Bishop of the diocese within which a military station shall be locally situate, to set out a precinct or district and declare the same, for the purposes of this Act, to be a Royal peculiar, and extra-parochial district. Provision is made for the due registration of the scheme in the diocesan registry. The Secretary of State was to appoint any army chaplain to perform functions in the peculiars; any chapel erected within the precinct and duly consecrated was to be held to be, for all ecclesiastical purposes, an extra-parochial chapel; and where any unconsecrated building was certified to the Bishop as intended to be used by the military for Divine worship according to the forms of the Established Church, the Secretary of State had power to appoint an army chaplain to officiate therein; and power was also given to the Crown to declare the Bishop of any diocese to be the dean of these Royal peculiars, and to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction therein.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Longford.)

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL, in the absence of the most rev. Primate, said, he desired briefly to advert to some of the clauses of the Bill, which seemed to require further consideration, and which in his judgment it was most desirable to refer to a Select Committee. Of course it was right that every possible facility should be given to the chaplains of Her Majesty's service; and he frankly owned it was extremely inconvenient that any parochial clergyman should have the power of interfering with their ministrations. At the same time, he thought it was rather reversing the principles of our legislation to constitute Royal peculiars, especially when it seemed to be perfectly clear that simply by the constitution of extra-parochial districts all the difficulties that had arisen might be readily removed. But the present measure went further even than the re-establishment of what experience had shown to be unsatisfactory and anomalous. The general authority of the Bishop of the diocese was unnecessarily suspended; for, according to the provisions of the Bill, it by no means followed that the Bishop of the diocese would have any spiritual authority whatever within these Royal peculiars, though they really were within his diocese, as any Prelate might be appointed by the Secretary of State to exercise authority in them. This might lead to considerable difficulty, and he appealed, therefore, to the noble Earl to consent to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he was aware of the difficulties that beset the subject; but at the same time he thought it clear that the military chaplains should be enabled to perform their duties without obtaining the assent of the clergyman in whose parishes troops may happen to be. These chaplains are officers bearing Her Majesty's commission, and they ought not to be interfered with in the performance of their functions. The state of things to which the decision of the Dublin Court had given rise was one that could not be allowed to continue, and he thought the present measure well adapted to effect the purpose it has in view, and he could not see the slightest necessity for referring it to a Select Committee.

The Earl of Longford

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE inquired whether it was intended that one of the existing Bishops should be made the dean of these peculiars, or whether a new Bishop would be consecrated for the purpose. For his own part, he thought we had too many unattached Bishops already. It was also well worth consideration whether the Bishops should not have the superintendence of the peculiars in their respective dioceses. He begged to remind the House of the cost frequently involved in enforcing ecclesiastical discipline, and trusted Her Majesty's Government would take care that the Dean of the peculiars should be freed from the risk of incurring such enormous expenses.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he understood this Bill to be intended to remedy the difficulties that had arisen respecting the powers of army chaplains, and also the inconvenience which had arisen from their not being practically under any Bishop—for not being licensed by a Bishop, they did not look up to the Bishop of the diocese in which they might happen to be for guidance and assistance. His right rev. Brother (the Bishop of Gloucester) suggested that they should be placed under the charge of the Bishop of the diocese where they might happen to be placed. Practically, however, he thought with the Government that there would be much difficulty in carrying out such an arrangement; and he was disposed to think that it would be better to place the army chaplains under the charge of one Bishop; and he did not think any difficulties in the way of adopting this course had been suggested which might not be met in Committee of the Whole House.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he did not think there was any necessity to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. It had been carefully considered, and had been in the hands of the two Archbishops. He was disposed to be of opinion that the more convenient course in respect of licences would be that suggested by the right rev. Prelate who had just addressed their Lordships. That point could be considered before Committee on the Bill was taken. There was no intention to appoint a new Bishop under this Act ; and although Bishops could not be protected from legal expenses, it was hoped that no such cases would arise under the arrangement now proposed. He believed there was no doubt that as the power of appointment was vested in the Secretary of State for War, the power of removal would be his also.

Motion agreed to : Bill read 2^a, accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at half-past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 9, 1868.

MINUTES.] — PUBLIC BILLS — Committee — Fairs * [126].

Report—Fairs * [126].

Third Reading—Endowed Schools * [143] ; Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2) * [148] ; Lee River Conservancy * [144], and passed.

The House met at Twelve of the clock.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS BILL—[BILL 82.]

(The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stephen Cave, Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving that this Bill be now read the second time, said, it had been suggested the other day that the Bill had better be postponed in consequence of the state of Public Business and the position of Her Majesty's Government. Now, if the measure had been one which did not affect private interests and the convenience and accommodation of the public, the Government might have been disposed to yield to that suggestion. But he submitted that it was highly desirable that an early decision should be come to on the matter, not only with reference to the interests of the telegraph companies, but also with reference to the interests of the general public. As the House was aware, the Bill empowered the Government to treat with the various telegraph companies in the country for the purchase of their lines, and authorized the Postmaster

General to work the lines so purchased. If the measure were postponed for another year, the telegraph companies would be under the disadvantage of not knowing what new engagements to undertake ; the whole telegraphic system might be in a state of suspended animation as to extension, and the public, who were looking to the passing of this measure, would not obtain at so early a period the benefit of that improved accommodation which this Bill would certainly provide for them. Under these circumstances, he thought the House would agree with the Government that it was right to proceed with the measure in the course of the present Session. In introducing the Bill to the House, he had adduced a good many statistics to prove that the public would derive great advantage from the reduced tariff and increased facilities which would be afforded under the new system proposed. He was not about to repeat those statistics, as he thought the House was already sufficiently informed as to the figures by the Papers which had been laid upon the table ; but would refer shortly to the evidence given of the state of public opinion respecting this Bill. Since he had had the honour of a seat in this House, he had never seen so great a manifestation of opinion from disinterested parties as had been shown in favour of this Bill. In addition to the important petitions which had just been presented, there had been, up to last night, seventy-seven petitions from Chambers of Commerce, public bodies, merchants and traders, and the general public in favour of the Bill, and twenty-four of these petitions had emanated from the metropolis. To the petitions from the City of London the names of some of the leading firms were attached, and those petitions were very numerous and influentially signed. In addition, no fewer than 177 petitions had been received from the newspaper Press—so that the mercantile community and the Press were almost unanimous in favour of the Bill. On the other hand, he derived some satisfaction, not only from the character, but from the number of the petitions presented against the Bill. These were—Ten from telegraph and railway companies, and 319 from individuals, the 319 individual petitioners being shareholders in the telegraph companies. Apparently, the companies thought they would make a greater show by inducing their shareholders to petition individually ; and this reminded him of the preacher who, drawing a very small congregation, huddled together in one part of the church, told them that if they spread themselves more about the church they would "look more." Upon the same principle, the telegraph companies thought the opposition to the Bill would "look more" if the petitions were from individuals. The only petition presented against the Bill from persons who were not shareholders was one from Leamington. The companies thought that their interests had not been equitably dealt with. The Government had endeavoured to meet the telegraph companies in a fair spirit. That the telegraph companies were more interested in the terms they would get from the purchase of their lines than in anything else, was evident from the fact that they had gone to the Government and stated the terms on which they would be prepared to sell. Their proposals were that the lines of all or none of the companies should be purchased; that the terms of purchase as settled should be inserted in the Bill; and that the terms should be upon the basis of those in the Railway Purchase Act—namely, twenty-five years' purchase on the net profits, and that compensation should be provided for their officers. The Government did not assent to those proposals as they stood, and since the first reading of the Bill they had made these proposals to the companies—The Government agreed to some Amendments suggested by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves); that if the Government purchased the system of one company they should give notice to all the other companies of the purchase of their undertakings, so that there might be no question as to getting possession of one telegraphic line and working it so as to depreciate those of the other companies. As the Government had always intended to purchase the whole of the telegraph lines, he was willing to accept that Amendment. Then the Government proposed that the basis of purchase should be, not that suggested by the telegraph companies, but the highest price realized on the Stock Exchange for the companies' shares up to the 25th of May last. They admitted the principle of giving compensation to officers not retained in the Government service, provided these officers were engaged at a yearly salary and had served for not less than five years. The Government also proposed that if the terms were not agreed on, they should be referred to arbitrators, one to be nominated by each party, and umpires to be chosen from a list of names of men of high standing—Sir William Erle, Lord Colonsay, and Sir John Coleridge. The telegraph companies had not accepted that offer; but he thought it was a liberal and fair way of meeting them. If the House should consent to the second reading of the Bill, it would be referred in the usual way as a Hybrid Bill to a Committee partly nominated by the House and partly by the Committee of Selection; and it would be open to that Committee either to settle the terms of purchase and insert them in the Bill, or allow the terms to be settled by arbitration. The market price of the shares was the best proof that the proposed purchase by the Government had not been prejudicial to the companies. On November 1, 1867, the shares in the principal company were 144 to 148; on May 8, 1868, they stood at 164 to 169; so that the shares of all these companies rose after the proposal of the Government to purchase. In offering, therefore, to buy these lines of telegraph on the basis of the price of the shares, the Government had, in fact, contributed to the enhancement of the price of the article. Here was another significant fact. In a weekly periodical which appeared during the Session, and which was supposed to possess some authority, it was recently stated that the Government had abandoned the notion of proceeding with the Telegraphs' Bill. That statement was not correct; but it had its effect, because the shares of these companies immediately fell. These facts showed that the interests of the shareholders, at all events had not been prejudiced by the action of the Government. The only petition against the Bill which came from anybody not a shareholder in any of the companies, was from the town of Leamington, and he did not know what influence had been at work to obtain the signatures to that petition. He now came to the opposition of the railway companies. He quite admitted that opposition was bonâ fide, and that the view of those companies was deserving the serious consideration of the House. He had had a few weeks ago an interview with some of the principal managers of the railway companies, and what they were afraid of was this—that if the telegraphs passed into the hands of Government, they would not have the same amount of accommodation as they enjoyed under the present system.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

But to that he would say that if the Government obtained possession of the telegraph lines, it would be their duty to give the fullest accommodation to the railway companies necessary to secure the public safety. He could not conceive a Government taking any other view, for it was most important to those who travelled by railway—and that was now almost every person in the country—that every facility should be given to the railway companies, so that the traffic might be conducted with the same safety and security as at present. But, as he had stated to the gentlemen who had waited upon him, that was a matter of regulation and arrangement between the Government and the companies, and might be freely discussed before the Committee upstairs. In his opinion it was a matter quite capable of adjustment. He had mentioned when he introduced the Bill, that there was a provision in it to enable the Government to purchase from the railway companies, where they were proprietors of telegraphs, their interests in sending messages, leaving them at liberty to work the wires for their own use if they chose, or, if not, giving them every facility for communicating from station to station. In consequence of the shortness of the time at his disposal when he introduced the Bill he had not gone into the financial part of the proposal; but he would now give a few points in connection with that subject. If the measure proceeded as he hoped, it would be necessary to introduce a Money Bill, to make the financial arrangements necessary to complete the transaction. Since this matter of purchase had been mooted, and the Electric and International Telegraph Company had put out their statement, the Government had got some information not at their disposal before, and were enabled now to calculate on a much larger return from the working of the telegraph system than they could have previously done. He could now state that they anticipated a surplus revenue of £210,000 a year from that source, and that would enable the Government, if the proposal were adopted, to pay the interest of the debt, reckoned at the rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and to clear off the debt itself in twenty-nine years. If the House would excuse him he would rather not enter fully into details with respect to the purchase at present. But he would say that, speaking roughly, it would take something near £4,000,000, or at all events, between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 for the purchase and the necessary extension of the lines. As to where they were to find the money, they proposed to make use of the savings' banks funds as far as available, which he believed they would be to the full amount, and to raise money by means of terminable annuities for a period of twenty-nine years. According to the best calculations they had been able to make the whole debt would be wiped out by the surplus income from the undertaking in twenty-nine years. He would, however, take power in the Money Bill to raise part of the capital by bonds and also by bills, to prevent the necessity of drawing on the savings' banks fund to a greater amount than might be convenient. These were matters which would be fully discussed afterwards; but he had thought it better to mention them in order to show that it was not intended to impose any heavy burden on the public for the undertaking. Of course, after the period he had specified, the Government would have a valuable property, which would be of advantage for the further extension of the system, or for the general Revenue. He now asked the House to assent to the second reading of the Bill and to send it to a Select Committee upstairs, to be chosen partly by the House and partly by the Committee of Selection, in order that the interests both of the telegraph companies and the railway companies might be duly protected. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. LEE MAN, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, he must be permitted to express very strongly the feeling entertained by those whose private interests were affected on the ground of the form in which the Bill now came before the House. The House would observe, from what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that interests worth something like £4,000,000 were affected by the Bill, and he objected to the course pursued. As long ago as last November the Government gave notice in the London Gazette of its intention to apply for some Bill to enable them to purchase up the telegraph companies. Unless the Government was to be permitted to make a precedent for themselves, and to act upon a principle different from that which was pursued by private persons and corporations who came to that House to procure powers over private property, it was the duty of the Government to have taken the same course as a railway company, or private person, and in the first instance to have submitted the Preamble of the Bill to one of the Committees of the House, before which evidence might have been adduced, not only by the Government, but by the various interests affected. But instead of that the House was asked to assent to the principle of the measure on the mere statement of a Government official, Mr. Scudamore, which was all the information that had been laid before the House. Had they gone in the first place before a Committee upstairs, the companies could have shown the circumstances under which the telegraph system had been commenced and carried on in this country; how it had become intertwined between the telegraph and railway companies; and that, however desirous Post Office officials might be to have the control of the system, the circumstances were such as to render it impossible for the House to pass the Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman asked the House to reverse the proper course of proceeding. The right hon. Gentleman had said that since the Bill had been introduced certain information had been obtained which showed that a sum of £210,000 a year would be derived by the Government as surplus profit from the possession of the telegraphs. But he begged the House not to slur over, as they were asked to do, this great question, whether it was the duty of the Government to conduct business which had hitherto in this country been left solely to private enterprize. Telegraph companies were commenced nearly twenty-five years ago by private persons, out of their own resources and at their own risk; they had gone on extending accommodation to the public, and for many years they had never received a farthing of aid or any encouragement from the Government of the day. It was not until these undertakings were yielding fair dividends that the Government stepped in to buy them up; and they did this without any feeling having previously existed in the country in favour of such a step. As to the 177 petitions from the Press, it would be found on examination that they had a common paternity. Mr.

Mr. Leoman

Scudamore had communicated with the various newspapers through the postmasters, and in his own city it was the postmaster who suggested the petition. The same thing had, no doubt, been done elsewhere. What complaint had the Press to make against the companies? Every provincial daily paper was supplied for £200 a year with telegraphs, amounting on the average to 4,000 words a day. The company had an arrangement with Mr. Reuter, and had reporters, both in foreign countries and at home, as well as a staff of editors and other persons, so that information was collected in all parts of the world and supplied to the provincial Press on the terms he had mentioned. What, then, could the Government or the Post Office do for the Press more than was done by the existing telegraph companies? But the Press would not have stirred in the matter at all unless they had been incited to support the Bill by the Post Office. With regard to the railways, the right hon. Gentleman appeared to think they had only an incidental interest in the matter; but, in point of fact, their interest was not second even to that of the telegraph companies themselves. At the interview to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred all the great railway interests south of the Tweed were represented, and expressed the alarm with which they viewed this measure. It was not at all a question of money with them, for their relations with the telegraph companies were so intimate and complicated that they could not assent to the scheme on any terms. There were at least 250 agreements existing between the railways and the telegraph companies; and in many cases those agreements gave to the railways the power of controlling the whole working of the telegraph system when emergencies arose. The railway companies had, in many instances, originated the telegraph companies, and had a large beneficial interest in them, and from his twenty years' experience of the working of railways he believed they could not be properly worked if the telegraphs were transferred to a staff of Government clerks. In the undertaking with which he was connected in the North of England, not less than 40,000 carriages and waggons were daily and hourly moved from one part of the line to another, this being done entirely by the aid of the telegraphs. A great number of collieries and large ironworks were connected, moreover, with the line, and at present the telegraphs were managed partly by the company's clerks and partly by those of the telegraph company. Now, he did not believe the line could be safely and efficiently worked if the telegraphs were handed over to the Post Office authorities. The railway interest sought an interview with the right hon. Gentleman as soon as they knew this Bill was to be introduced, and strongly urged upon him their conviction that the scheme was inconsistent with the safety of the passengers and of the general traffic. It was solely on this ground that he opposed it, for he had never been a shareholder in any telegraph company. He would ask the House, moreover, whether it was prepared to adopt a policy contrary to that which had hitherto been pursued, and to place telegrams, which were open letters, in the hands of the Government. Such a policy might be all very well in Continental countries, where the Government was based upon a system of espionage; but let hon. Members remember the burst of indignation which was excited in this country by the intelligence of Sir James Graham having opened the letters of Mazzini, and what would people think if they knew their messages might be read by some Government official? A paper read two years ago before the Society of Arts spoke of the telegraph being extended to villages and worked by schoolmasters, or even by children; but how would such a system work? Then there was the possibility of the control of the telegraphs being turned to political purposes, as was notoriously the case in other countries, and he deprecated the introduction into England of the thin end of the wedge. He knew of a gentleman who went over to a Continental State to negotiate a Government contract involving many thousands of pounds. During a three weeks' stay he frequently telegraphed to his partners in England, and at the end of that time he actually saw in the Minister's office copies of his own telegrams. On his expressing some astonishment, the Minister asked him whether he was not aware that the director of telegraphs had every message sent to him. In France, indeed, four copies of every telegram were made, and were sent to the different bureaux. A similar case had occurred in Egypt. A gentleman in Paris who was conducting some business with the Government of Egypt corresponded by telegraph with his agent in that country; but on six or seven different occasions these telegrams were suppressed by the Egyptian Government until it was enabled to settle the matter in dispute upon its own terms. He did not believe that the English people would permit a system like that to prevail in this country. It would be against all their instincts to have their telegraphs brought into the same position. The Government ought to have stated some reason for treating the telegraphs differently from the railways. A Royal Commission had recently inquired into the policy of the Government becoming possessed of the railways. Witnesses were examined before the Commission, and Mr. Edwin Chadwick and others had given evidence in favour of such a proposal. The Railway Commissioners, however, in their Report, pointed out that the railway system had originated in the enterprize of individuals, and that private enterprize had led to a much more rapid development of railways than any other system could have done. The conclusion at which the Commissioners arrived was that on the various grounds mentioned by them they could not concur in the purchase of railways by the State, and that it was more expedient to leave the construction and maintenance of railways, under certain conditions to be imposed by Parliament, to the free enterprize of the people. The same language equally applied to the purchase of the telegraphs by the State. They were begun by private persons at their own risk and under great disadvantages, and their introduction here had led to the adoption of telegraphs through the whole world. The Electric and International Telegraph Company had grown seven-fold since 1850, and had now 49,000 miles of wire. In 1850 it possessed less than 1,000 instruments, it now owned 7,245. The United Kingdom and Irish Telegraph Company, whose petitions were on the table, had also shown the progress they had made up to the present moment. There were now in operation 80,000 miles of telegraph wires, the result of the private enterprize of this country, and there were not less than 2,000 telegraph stations at work. The telegraph companies during that time had availed themselves of every improvement that had been introduced as to the working of telegraphs, so that at the present hour the system of telegraphy in existence in this country was not to be surpassed in the whole world. The Government were bound to show that the public would be likely to obtain some advantage in regard to price, but this they had not done. At the commencement of the telegraph system the charge for twenty words was 1*d.* per mile for fifty miles, $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a mile for 100 miles, and $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a mile for more than 100 miles. Successive reductions of price had, however, been made, until in July, 1865, the scale now in operation was fixed. The charge for short messages in the London district and in other large towns was now 6*d.*, for which would be substituted by the Government Bill one uniform telegraphic rate of 1*s.* The present rate was—for 100 miles, 1*s.*; for 200 miles, 1*s.* 6*d.*; and for any distance beyond 200 miles, 2*s.* The telegraphic companies had given the public the advantage of this progressive reduction in the rates, coupled with every improvement in telegraphy. He would ask the House to consider the advantage of this 1*s.* charge to all places in the midland districts, including Birmingham, within 100 miles of London. It placed Manchester in communication with the whole of Lancashire, the West Riding, and many of the midland towns. Coming to London, the 1*s.* rate also prevailed to every place within 100 miles, south, east, and west. It prevailed as between London and Dover, London and Brighton, London and Southampton, and so on. Let them take the whole of the receipts from the telegraphs, and see what proportion the lower rates bore to the 2*s.* rate. He found that last year fully three-fifths of the entire receipts of the companies from the inland telegraphs of this country were at the 1*s.* rate. Of the remaining two-fifths, two-thirds were at the 1*s.* 6*d.* rate, and only the other third was at the 2*s.* rate. If, then, the object of the Government, as stated in the face of the documents prepared by Mr. Scudamore, was to reduce the general rate of telegraph to 1*s.* throughout the country, why had they not gone to the companies the parties who could best do the work, and who, as he had shown, had evinced no disposition to keep up the rates? But, supposing the Government took possession of the telegraphs tomorrow, it was clear, from Mr. Scudamore's statement, they must embark in a very large expenditure to give effect to their views; and how, he asked, would people in Liverpool and Manchester be benefited by an outlay of public money in order to secure for them at 1*s.* what they could now get done for 6*d.*? He would put this practical question to the House.

Mr. Leeman

Supposing the Government had established the reduced rate, who were the persons who would reap the advantage from it? Was there one man in a thousand in England who ever used the telegraph? When the rate was reduced to the figure which the right hon. Gentleman spoke of it would still be found that not one man in a thousand would use the telegraph. The people in the country villages, the tailors, shoemakers, and blacksmiths never used it, and it was very rarely indeed that the farmer had to spend more than 1*d.* in sending his business communications through the post. Even in most of the country towns it was a very exceptional thing for a tradesman to resort to the telegraph. Therefore, when the charge had been brought down to a 1*s.*, the general mass of the people would not have recourse to it. Then, as to the commercial classes, what proportion did their letters bear to the telegrams they sent? If the business they had to transact demanded a telegram at all, a slight difference of 6*d.* or 1*s.* in the charge would practically be of no importance to commercial men. Then, as the public at large were not likely to use the telegraph, they ought not to be called upon to bear the burden of the great outlay which the Government would have to make in order, as it were, to run all the other coaches off the road. It was surely hard that 999 taxpayers should be compelled to pay for the accommodation of the only man in 1,000 who wanted to send a telegram. But it was said that ultimately the telegraphs would not only pay, but would yield a profit to the Government; and the experience of the Post Office had been quoted. Now, the penny postage plan was tried under very different circumstances from those now existing in regard to the telegraphs. The Post Office had then been at work for a century and a half, and when the penny postage system was introduced they had not to buy up vested interests as they now must do. The Post Office had only to deal with its own property in making that experiment. True, the Post Office was now producing a large revenue; but the penny postage system never would have been made to pay as it now did—and here he spoke feelingly—if the Government had not entered into competition with the railway companies and become common carriers. [An Hon. MEMBER: Quite right, too.] It might be quite right as between the public and the Post Office; but it was not right as regarded the inference he wished to draw in respect to that particular question. By poaching on other people's manors the Government had been enabled to derive a considerable revenue; but a Return recently presented supplied valuable information upon that point. The penny postage was adopted in 1840. The year before that the revenue of the Post Office was £1,659,510, and in the first year after the penny postage system was introduced that revenue fell to £578,000; and the Return showed that it took twenty-four years to bring the revenue up to the figure at which it stood before the new system came into operation. The present income from the Post Office was over £2,000,000; and he asked—was this a time, having regard to the financial position of the country, in which they could afford to experimentalize with an item of £2,000,000, which went to the relief of the general taxation of the public, in order to secure the more than doubtful advantages which the Government sought by their scheme to obtain for any class, even the commercial class, of the community? He would now call attention to the mode in which it was proposed to carry out that measure. The practical clauses of the Bill were Clauses 4, 5, and 7. By the Bill as it originally stood the Government would have been permitted to take possession of the whole of the telegraph lines of the country, the payment for them to be fixed by an arbitrator, who was to be appointed by the Government itself. He was however glad to find from the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he had seen the injustice which such a provision would, if acted upon, produce; but still he must say that, if the Government deemed it right that they should possess a monopoly of the telegraph lines the intention should be set forth plainly on the face of the Bill. Why, he should like to know, should not the measure be dealt with in the same way as the County Financial Boards Bill, so that the whole subject of the policy of the Government taking possession of the telegraphs might be clearly ascertained through the medium of the labours of a Committee upstairs? Believing that to be the wisest course to adopt, he begged leave, instead of moving as he had given Notice, that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months, to propose as an Amendment that the question of the expediency of purchasing the Telegraphs by the State be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. CRAWFORD seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the question of the expediency of purchasing the Telegraphs by the State be referred to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Leeman),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. GRAVES said, it must be admitted that the question under discussion was one which had two sides, and that the arguments on that side which was opposed to the views of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been laid before the House with considerable force and ability by the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Leeman), and were well entitled to consideration. He must, however, add that those arguments had entirely failed to remove from his mind the impression that the advantages which would be likely to be derived from the transfer of the telegraph lines of this country to the control of the Government would be greater than the disadvantages which his hon. Friend had described. In replying to the objections which had been urged by the hon. Gentleman against the Bill, he would, in the first place, observe that there was no such similarity as he sought to establish between the case of telegraph and that of railway companies, inasmuch as the House had, he believed, never required the former, in transferring their property, to come before it for its approval, the only consent they were compelled to obtain for the purpose being that of the Board of Trade. If that were so, he could not perceive that there was any great force in the argument that the Bill should be so dealt with as to be sent first to a Select Committee and then be brought before the House. He altogether differed from his hon. Friend, too, as to the number of persons who would avail themselves of the facilities afforded by the telegraph if the tariff of charges were reduced. As matters now stood, communication by telegraph in this country was a luxury which was confined to those who were able to pay for it, and it was because he desired to see the benefits which such persons enjoyed in that respect extended as widely as possible that he was so strongly in favour of the present measure. So far from concurring with his hon. Friend in thinking that the use of the telegraph would not under its operation be greatly increased, he believed that would be the result in a degree which the House could hardly conceive. In support of that opinion he might briefly state what had been the consequence of a reduction of the tariff in other countries. He found, for instance, that at the beginning of the year 1863 the Belgian rate for inland messages was reduced from 15*d.* to 10*d.*, a reduction at the rate of 33 per cent, and that the inland messages increased in that year on those of 1862 at the rate of 80 per cent. In the year 1866 the inland rate was again reduced from 10*d.* to 5*d.*, a reduction at the rate of 50 per cent, and the number of messages increased at the rate of 85 per cent. In Switzerland the inland rate was also, on the 1st of January, 1868, reduced from 10*d.* to 5*d.*, and in the first three months of this year the inland messages increased at the rate of 90 per cent on those of the corresponding period in 1867. In Prussia a like result had been observed. On the 1st of July, 1867, the inland rate for the first zone was reduced from about 9*d.* to 6*d.*, a reduction at the rate of 33 per cent. A slight extension of the limits of the zone was at the same time made. In the first month of the change the messages increased at the rate of 72 per cent; 70 per cent being due to the reduction of the rate, and 2 per cent to the extension of the zone. In France, in the year 1862, an uniform rate of 1*s.* 8*d.* was substituted for a rate varying with distance. The average cost to the French public of a message in 1861 was about 4*s.* 6*d.*, and in 1862 the average cost was about 2*s.* 11*d.*, the reduction being at the rate of about 35 per cent; and the messages increased at the rate of 64 per cent. It was therefore only reasonable to suppose that a reduction of the tariff would be followed by the same results in this country as it had produced in others. If he did not think that the investment would be remunerative he should be very sorry to advocate it; but, seeing the progress which the Post Office had made in respect to the conveyance of letters and the money-order and savings-banks systems, he did not think that there need be any fear that the investment would be unremunerative; for he conceived that the telegraphy of this country was capable of immense development. The objection which had been raised in connection with the railways was the weightiest and most difficult to deal with; and it was incumbent that it should be fully considered how in this matter the railway interest, or, rather, how human life might be protected. This was not a small question, and it ought not to be judged merely by a reference to the £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 which it involved. Increased facilities for communication meant the development of national resources, and by a large and comprehensive development of the telegraphic system an enormous boon would be offered to the trading and commercial energy of the country. Wherever the telegraphic and railway systems exist, traders are enabled to regulate their supply and their daily wants, and commercial industries were enabled to turn over their capital with great rapidity, and thus, as the resources of individuals were increased, so was the capital of the country. If the proposal had been to raise up a new Government Department for the control of telegraphy, he should have objected to it; but his confidence in the administration of the Post Office made him favourable to the proposition. There was, besides, an affinity between a letter and a telegram; the one was, in fact, but a more rapid form of communication than the other; and the perfect organization of the Post Office would enable the proposed system to permeate every village and hamlet. If there were any possibility of the telegraph being used by the Government for political purposes, in order to ascertain and thwart the views of their opponents, he should then say that the Bill ought not to pass; but the fear of exciting that indignation which was formerly raised in the country when it was known that a single letter was opened at the Post Office would, in his opinion, prove a sufficient check against any abuse of power. Moreover, he had too high an opinion of the honour of British Statesmen to believe that they would in any way invade the sanctity of telegraphic communication. This was not merely his sentiment, but it was the opinion of the late Mr. Ricardo, the originator of the most prosperous telegraphic company, who stated—

Mr. Graves

“To secure the honour and reputation of the British Government as a guarantee for the privacy of communications, necessarily more confidential than those conveyed under sealed envelope through the post; to establish a conviction that the pub-

lie are dependent, not upon the discretion of individuals, but upon the faith of a Ministry responsible at any moment to a vigilant Parliament, that there shall be no undue preference or precedence given even to the highest financial or most powerful influence in the land ; in fine, to substitute the safeguard of statesmen chosen by the nation for their talent and integrity, for that of men of business, however high their character, elected by a body of shareholders simply to pay them the highest amount of interest obtainable from the tolls levied upon the public ; to retain the telegraphic despatches of the various Departments charged with the maintenance of the honour and interests and tranquillity of the country inviolate and inviolable, instead of being passed through the hands of a joint-stock company, are advantages which no man can deny, and which Parliament and the people will not fail to appreciate."

Should there be any disinclination on the part of the public to subject their private communications to the supervision of a Government official, all difficulty on that score might easily be overcome by the use of cypher. With regard to the purchase of the existing telegraphic system, he heard with pleasure the Chancellor of the Exchequer state that it would be conducted on the principles of equity and justice. He thought that when the Government sought to acquire this property it should not be forgotten the owners were unwilling sellers, and it would be but fair that it should be taken under the ordinary conditions of compulsory purchase, and he would only support the measure upon the understanding that the private companies were to be dealt with in a large and liberal spirit. For years and years the telegraph companies were anything but prosperous, and it would not be dealing fairly with them, now that the tide of prosperity had set in, unless they were treated liberally. Allusion had been made to the fluctuations which had occurred in the price of these shares, consequent on the passing or withdrawal of this Bill. This, he thought, was not quite a fair light in which to view the subject. It was only proper to remember that the companies during the year had paid dividends which warranted the price. His opinion was that the dividends would rise every year even if the telegraph lines were left in the hands of the present companies, and the longer Parliament delayed the passing of this measure the more difficulty there would be in dealing with the subject. It had been alleged that some of the petitions in favour of the Bill had been got up by the Post Office officials. Now, he had presented a petition in favour of the Bill, signed by nearly every merchant and broker of any eminence in Liverpool, numbering altogether over 600, and he was told that every signature had been given spontaneously and unasked for. This was a recognition of the value which the commercial community placed upon the measure. More than thirty Chambers of Commerce had petitioned in its favour ; the Press supported it strongly ; and there was greater unanimity with regard to it than had prevailed with regard to any question which had been discussed in the present Session. On the whole, he believed that the advantages were greater than the disadvantages of the Bill ; that its passing would give immense satisfaction to the country, and that immense success would follow, both financially and otherwise.

MR. THOMAS CAVE said, he had no interest, either directly or indirectly, in any of the telegraph companies ; but, speaking from a public point of view, he thought the objections of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) were not such as should influence the House to reject this Bill. These objections were tenfold, and he should endeavour to reply to them seriatim. First, the hon. Member said that the safety of the public in railway travelling would be interfered with ; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer had clearly stated that the railway companies would still be allowed to use the private wires which they now had, and would therefore have the same means of communicating from station to station for the regulation of their traffic as heretofore. As to the objection suggesting Government espionnage, that was rather an appeal to popular prejudice than the use of fair argument. In his business experience he had found that espionnage was not always confined to the action of Governments, though he believed that in the hands of the Government they would be safer from it than they were at present. In a recent transaction respecting the insurance of a vessel in which he was interested, he was able to obtain by a moderate fee such information from a telegraph clerk abroad as led to the detection of a serious fraud ; and in this country he believed that the contents of telegrams were frequently communicated to parties interested in their contents, who were in that way able to obtain from the poorly - paid clerks information which defeated the object of sending telegrams at all. He hoped that too much weight would not be given to this objection, another answer to which was that, as the hon. Member (Mr. Graves) had suggested, a cypher might be used where secrecy was desired. A fourth objection raised by the hon. Member (Mr. Leeman) was the interference of this Bill with private enterprise. Such an objection no doubt required due consideration; but the same might be said of the Post Office, which they would all regret to see in any other hands than those of the Government. A fifth objection—that the telegraphic system had grown and that rates had been reduced under the present management—was really no objection at all. In fact, it proved the case of the Government, and showed the growing requirements of the public. He hoped that when this Bill became law, as in this or the next Session he felt confident would be the case, the telegraphic system would continue to grow, and still more rapidly than before; that the Government would extend the system to every Post Office throughout the country; and, with regard to rates, that a 2*d.* postage stamp would in time cover a telegraphic message from any Post Office in the United Kingdom. The hon. Member (Mr. Leeman) appeared to speak from a narrow point of view and rather as a railway special pleader; and he regretted to see a Gentleman of his high standing and ability seeking to advance the interests of a no doubt highly important, but also from their wealth and influence and power of united action, a body which might easily become highly dangerous to the public weal, and who required quite as much watching as the Government did. The sixth objection advanced by the hon. Member was that telegraphs could never be used by the uneducated in the villages; but if poor people there could not write, it was surely a great advantage to them that they should be able to speak through the telegraph. [Mr. LEEMAN said, that what he referred to was their condition and pursuits.] That still left the argument that it would be useful to those who could not write. The hon. Member had said the scheme would not pay; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to be a good judge on that point; and he had stated that it would not only pay the interest, but that there would be such a surplus profit as in twenty-nine years would clear off the entire capital debt. It was quite true the Government should not interfere with the interests of private persons; but he thought that subject to compensation of these interests they might do so for the sake of an immense public advantage. The hon. Member had also objected to the course taken by the Government in asking the House to affirm the principle of the Bill before sending it to a Committee upstairs. On that point he took direct issue with the hon. Gentleman, and maintained that the proper course was, in the first place, to ask the House to affirm the principle of the measure.

Mr. Thomas Cave

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. T. Cave) had not treated one of the objections of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) with the consideration which it deserved—namely, that which related to inquiry into the subject. He regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on both occasions when the Bill had been before the House, had felt himself under the necessity of curtailing his observations, and therefore had not been able to do full justice to his own proposal. On the occasion when the Bill was introduced there had been no discussion at all, and to-day the right hon. Gentleman had felt it necessary to be somewhat brief in his remarks on a subject, the importance of which, whatever their opinions might be as to the merits of the Bill, no one would undervalue. The right hon. Gentleman had attached too much importance to the petitions presented in favour of the Bill, though in the spirit of those petitions he (Mr. Goschen) quite concurred. It might be that it was desirable that this Bill should pass into law. But at present the House scarcely knew enough to affirm the principle of the Bill. He should not have felt able to vote against the measure if the hon. Member for York had persisted in his intention to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, because that would have been a declaration against the principle of the measure. But it appeared to him that it would be better that the whole subject should be referred to a Select Committee than that the Bill, in its present form, should be so referred; and for this reason, that if the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, it must of necessity be a hybrid Committee. It was necessary that the question of compensation to the companies should be dealt with very carefully. If they looked to the great importance of the measure, he maintained that it would be impossible without precedent that a proposal of such magnitude should be accepted without previous inquiry into the matter. He wished the House to understand that he was by no means hostile to the Bill; but there were many difficulties connected with the subject which ought not to be merely argued by counsel before a hybrid Committee, but the policy and expediency of which ought to be decided by the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had pointed out the importance of this Bill to the State as a financial measure. Well, that was a subject which could be argued better in the usual Select Committee than in a hybrid Committee, and it was a matter which would require the most serious consideration. The Committee would have to determine how far it might be wise to run the risk of loss to the State. The policy of the Government dealing with matters of private enterprise would also come under the general head of inquiry; but what he feared was this—that if the Bill were read a second time, the discussion on the principle would be considered at an end, and the main points to be afterwards argued would be with regard to the mode of purchase. He did not think that they had as yet arrived at the condition at which they were able to decide whether there should be purchase or not. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in thinking that the country was in the main in favour of the principle of the Bill; but he doubted whether all the difficulties in connection with the subject had been properly thought out. It would tend ultimately to the success of the measure that these matters should be inquired into, and that any difficulties which might exist should not be slurred over at this time of the Session. He put it to the House whether they thought it possible that this Bill should pass into law this Session; for they might judge from the speech of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) what a strenuous opposition would be offered to it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had suggested that, in dealing with private interests, it was better to settle the matter at once than keep it in suspense for another year. There was something in that argument; but still he thought it was too late to proceed with the measure now. It was scarcely possible that a Bill dealing with such vast private interests should pass into law in the course of six weeks or two months. He agreed very much with what had been said by the hon. Member for Liverpool

(Mr. Graves) that they could not exaggerate the importance of pushing the telegraphic system into every quarter of the country where it was possible. He did not think the hon. Member for York had done justice to the argument of the importance of such extension not only to trade, but to those whom trade supplied, when he contended that it was not so necessary to carry our telegraphic communication into remote places as some people believed. An immense importance was attached to the Bill by the great wholesale houses, who thought they could serve their customers cheaper, as they could economize capital, and need not keep as much stock on hand; nor did he doubt that this could be done without any loss to the State. He believed that Mr. Scudamore had been very moderate in his suggestion, and that the amount he calculated upon would be realized. The surplus of £210,000, estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as accruing to the State, arose, he presumed, from the charge of 1s. He was himself much in favour of a uniform rate; and there would possibly be less enthusiasm for the Bill amongst the commercial circles of our large towns if they anticipated that the result would be to enhance the rate of charge. In a very short time, probably, the returns would be such as to make the maintenance of the 1s. rate needless, and enable the charge to be reduced to 6d. He did not attach much weight to the argument of the companies that, owing to the large number of circulars sent by post in this country, the proportion between letters and telegrams in Belgium and Switzerland afforded no criterion; for he believed that, as soon as people got accustomed to them more money would be spent in telegrams in England than in other countries. The more the charges were reduced the more, he felt confident, would telegraphic communication be resorted to; and he did not think Mr. Scudamore's calculations were too sanguine. He believed that telegraphic communication was at present insufficient, that its extension was desirable, and that such extension under good management would prove remunerative. On those points, the weight of argument seemed to him to be all on one side. He was not, however, inclined to think that the working of the telegraphs in remote villages would be found so easy as some Members supposed; and he thought the House should be informed of the means by which, in the belief of the Post Office authorities, the system could be carried on. As to secrecy, greater precautions would have to be taken than were embodied in the Bill. The Post Office, no doubt, stood deservedly high in the estimation of the public; and when engaged in business he was struck by the rarity of cases of miscarriage or of blame being due to it. Indeed, he was convinced that the transfer of the telegraphs to any other Department would have encountered much more strenuous opposition. Now, the Bill incorporated the Electric Telegraph Act of 1863, thus applying to the Post Office the same precautions that were applied to the companies. He did not think there was likely to be any difference in point of discretion or virtue between Government clerks and companies' clerks; but there was a great difference as regarded their employers. A Government might have so great an interest in knowing the contents of telegrams and in applying to its own servants for valuable information, that clauses ought to be framed which would render such a course improbable or dangerous. By the Act as it now stood, any person divulging secrets intrusted to him for telegraphic conveyance was made liable to a fine of £20; but there were many secrets the divulging of which would be very inadequately punished by such a penalty, and he believed it would be necessary to make this offence a misdemeanour. He did not, indeed, apprehend a systematic disclosure of messages to the Government as was done on the Continent; but stringent precautions ought to be taken against any occasional instances of it. Another defect which he noticed in the Bill was that there was nothing to compel the Government to forward messages. At present the competition between rival companies afforded sufficient protection to the public on this head, and no doubt as a general rule the Government would desire to make as good a revenue as possible; but other motives might come into play which would more than counterbalance this. Under the Act of 1863 the Secretary of State might, by warrant, whenever it was expedient for the public service, take possession of the companies' works and make use of them for Her Majesty's service, the warrant requiring renewal, however, at the end of a week. Now, security must be taken against the permanent operation of such powers, and against allowing a postmaster at his own discretion to refuse at any time to transmit messages. These matters had not been considered sufficiently in the Bill before the House, which deserved the most serious consideration, and was worthy of the most serious inquiry. The principle of the Bill might be easily decided on; but weeks might be necessary for the due examination of the clauses and details. It appeared to him that there was no chance of passing the Bill this Session, and, regretting that this was the case, he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for York.

Mr. Goschen

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) threw a light upon a circumstance which occurred in the early part of the debate, and seemed rather peculiar. The hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) had given Notice of his intention to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. That was a natural course for him to take, because the hon. Member objected to the Bill, and wished to get rid of it. But some intimation appeared to be conveyed to him from other parts of the House and from right hon. Gentlemen on the front Opposition Bench, that they were not prepared to support him in his Amendment. Strongly enough, after the hon. Gentlemen had declared against the principle of the Bill, he sat down without moving his Amendment at all, but got up to move instead, without explanation, that the whole subject be referred to a Select Committee. It was observed that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen), who approved the principle of the Bill, and had argued in favour of it, handed to the hon. Member for York the terms of the amended Notice that he was to give. It was clear that some telegraphic communication had been passing between the Benches opposite which had rapidly altered the strategy of the hon. Member for York, and he congratulated the hon. Member on the promptitude with which he had executed a "changed front" on a very short notice. The hon. Member equally obtained his object whether his original Motion that the Bill be read a second time that day six months were carried, or his amended Motion that the whole subject be referred to a Select Committee. Practically, the result was the same, the only difference being that he would have had a difficulty in carrying his original Motion, but that he expected to get a large number of Members to vote for the amended Motion. The right hon. Gentleman thought there would not be time to pass the Bill this Session. That might be a very good reason for putting the Bill aside and getting rid of it; but it was not fair on the part of those who held this language to come forward and declare that they approved the principle of the Bill. The course which the right hon. Gentleman recommended had not been pursued in the analogous case of the Post Office Savings Banks Bill. His argument was that the Post Office Department were not such good judges of the mode of administering the details of the measure as a Select Committee of that House; but he contended that many of these matters were far better understood by the Executive Government, and might safely be left to the Department. It was incorrect to say that this measure had been hastily dealt with, because it had been under the consideration of the Government for a great length of time. Two years ago, when he was at the Board of Trade, this was one of the first matters brought under his notice. It was discussed by the public Press, and it could not be said in any sense to come as a surprise upon hon. Members. The House was prepared to discuss the principle, and was in possession of quite sufficient facts to enable it to discuss all the questions raised by the Bill. He thought that the hon. Member for Barnstaple (Mr. T. Cave) in a few sentences had completely answered the objections raised by the hon. Member for York. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) said it was impossible the measure could pass this Session; and, no doubt, if the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends were determined it should not pass, they would have very considerable means for preventing it. Certain matters might be referred to a Select Committee, but was not the general sense of the House in favour of the main principle of the Bill? If so, was it not fairly probable that, with a business-like treatment, the Bill might be passed during the present Session? All the questions which had been raised could be dealt with — some by the Committee of the Whole House, some by the Committee upstairs, and some when the Money Bill, which would have to follow this measure, was before them. Only let the House be told on what footing the question really stood; because it would be much fairer if those who wished to throw over the Bill voted for the original proposition to postpone it for six months than to vote for referring the whole subject to a Select Committee, which amounted practically to the same thing. The effect of that would be to cause a considerable inconvenience, so he was informed, to the telegraph companies. It kept them in a state of agitation and uneasiness for an unnecessary length of time, and it deferred a great social improvement, on which he believed the mind of the country was set, and which he believed would be very advantageous to the public; and all for a very insufficient and, to him, incomprehensible reason. The hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) had spoken of that as a measure which would be of use only to a very limited portion of the community, because very few people used the telegraph now, and he instanced the village tradesmen as not being likely to avail themselves of it. Now he (Sir Stafford Northcote) maintained that those were just the people to whom it would probably be a benefit if they could introduce the telegraph to every village and corner of the country. He could mention to the House his own case and that of others who were similarly circumstanced — namely, they were constantly in communication with a neighbouring town some miles distant, and the services of the tradesmen of which they occasionally required very rapidly. Where they had to write a letter and wait for an answer next day, they did not avail themselves of the services of those tradesmen; but if they could telegraph for the plumber, the glazier, or the blacksmith to go to them at short notice they would be glad to do so. Thus the system would be found to work in and extend itself in a very extraordinary manner. The argument of the hon. Member for York might have been urged, as he dare say it was urged, against the penny post. It was said they were sacrificing the interest of the country for the sake of the comparatively few people who wrote letters; forgetting that when they had the advantage of the lower rate of postage hundreds and thousands of persons would write letters who never wrote them before. So he believed it would be in the case of the electric telegraph when its advantages were held out to the country. For those reasons he opposed the Amendment, and he earnestly hoped that the House would assent to the Motion for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he would give no mere party vote upon that occasion;

but he confessed that he had never, in a tolerably long experience, felt so much difficulty in coming to a conclusion on any subject as he had done in reference to that Bill. As the representative of a great commercial interest, he ought to be one of the last persons in that House to interfere with the due progress of a measure calculated, in the estimation of those who proposed it, to confer a great social and commercial benefit on the community. At the same time he must claim the privilege of considering how far the measure was likely to effect the object for which it was introduced. He was one of those who were charged with the care of the interests of the telegraph companies whose property was about to be taken from them, and he was exceedingly desirous that the whole of the facts and circumstances on which that proposal rested should be clearly understood, not only by the House, but by the country, before they came to a decision upon it. It was appalling to look at the amount of literature on that subject with which they had been deluged. First they had a paper from Mr. Scudamore, and then one from Mr. Grimstone on the part of the telegraph companies. Then came a rejoinder by Mr. Scudamore, and another by Mr. Grimstone; and it was somewhat remarkable that there was not one fact stated by one of those two gentlemen which was not denied by the other. How was the House to judge in that matter? He claimed on the part of the public that they should not be led into a premature decision of that question. The only fair, legitimate, and proper manner of arriving at a decision on its merits was by having not the Bill only, but the whole subject in all its details, thoroughly threshed out in a Committee upstairs. For that reason he had cheerfully seconded the proposal of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman), that the expediency and the policy of that measure should be referred to a Select Committee. He could not have seconded his hon. Friend's original proposal that the Bill should be read the second time that day six months. He had been gratified to witness the eager and ardent manner in which the Secretary of State for India supported that proposal for taking into the hands of the Government the whole telegraphic system in England; but he could not help remembering that the other day, when he went with a deputation to ask him for a very moderate amount of assistance towards establishing improved telegraphic communication with the East the right hon. Gentleman met them with a blank refusal. The apparent inconsistency thus displayed tended somewhat to detract from the force of the right hon. Gentleman's arguments on the present occasion. The Post Office savings banks had been referred to; but there was a vast distinction between them and the present proposal. In the former case there was no attempt to deal with private property; whereas they were now asked to deal with an immense amount of such property, the owners of which, according to all precedent and justice, ought to have an opportunity of stating their case before a Committee. It was rather late in the day to go into the general question; but he wished distinctly to say that he was not then prepared to express any opinion on the principle of the Bill. He wanted to see what the real facts were. Mr. Scudamore had mounted on a hobby, and when a great man did that he was apt to be rather enthusiastic. On the other hand, Mr. Grimstone opposed, tooth and nail, everything advanced by Mr. Scudamore. He therefore wished to have the counter-statements of those gentlemen confronted and thoroughly examined in a Committee upstairs. A statistical comparison between this country and Belgium and Switzerland had been adduced; but the circumstances of those countries were not quite analogous. Our Post Office carried an enormous amount of what he must call trash, and much matter of that description was delivered by it for himself at his place of business, also at the Bank of England, and at his private residence, and likewise at his club. Some of these communications consisted of letters begging him to go to some charitable dinner or other, a matter in respect to which he was glad to observe in the Press that day the expression of an independent opinion; while others of them perhaps invited him to visit an Idiot Asylum. He might safely assert that the rubbish brought to him through the post in that way exceeded the number of real bond fide letters in the proportion of at least five to one. He would like to see these things inquired into, in order to ascertain whether the comparison between the quantity of letters carried in this country and in Switzerland and Belgium would really hold good. He wished, he might add, to know whether, in the event of the Government becoming possessed of the property of the telegraph companies, they would have, in addition to those lines of wire which the railway companies were permitted to use for their own purposes, a complete monopoly of telegraphic communication throughout the country? Would they, for example, take charge of those messages which were brought into the country by the submarine lines, such as the Atlantic Cable? If the answer to that question should be in the affirmative, he did not exactly see how they would very well be able successfully to conduct the amount of business which would thus be thrown upon their hands. Again, he understood that part of the work done by the telegraph companies consisted in supplying the London and other newspapers regularly with information as to proceedings which might have arisen in the country. He was told, for instance, that when the First Minister of the Crown visited Edinburgh last year the whole of the speech which he delivered there was transmitted to London by a telegraph company for the use of the newspapers. Were the Government prepared in like manner to undertake the business of reporting? If so, was it probable that they would report the speech which had been delivered the other day by his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), at Liverpool, with the same exactitude with which they would have given that of the Prime Minister? The subject was one in which the public was much interested, and, believing that it was one into which further inquiry was desirable, he should vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for York.

Mr. Crawford

MR. LIDDELL, having observed that the confidence which was reposed by the public in the mode in which the commercial affairs of the country were conducted by private companies was very great, said he thought further time should be allowed the public outside to express an opinion upon a measure by which it was proposed to make considerable inroad on that feeling, and with the extent and cost of the operations of which they were as yet unacquainted. The only great commercial concern in which we had experience, he added, of Government management was the Post Office, and it was not a satisfactory proof of their fitness to carry other commercial undertakings to a successful issue that that Department had remained for so long a time unprofitable in a monetary point of view, as had been stated by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman). The object which the Government sought to attain in reducing the charge for telegraphic communication was no doubt a good one, and the concentration of the various lines in one hand would no doubt facilitate that object; but then he should like to know whether the telegraph companies had hitherto shown that they were adverse to making such a reduction. Until a proposition of that kind was made to them and they refused to accede to it, he could not help being of opinion that their property ought not to be taken away from them in the hurried manner proposed. In making these remarks he must not be understood as speaking against the principle of the Bill, but only as arguing in favour of that full inquiry which the whole subject and the policy of this measure ought, he thought, to undergo at the hands of a Select Committee.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he rose to take part in the discussion chiefly in consequence of the speech which had been made by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for India (Sir Stafford Northcote), who he regretted should have thought it discreet or expedient, in dealing with a measure such as that under discussion, to speak of those Gentlemen who sat on the front Opposition Bench as acting in a body with a purpose prépensé to defeat the Bill. Against the use of such language he desired to enter, in the most distinct terms, his protest. So far as he was aware, those Gentlemen who at that moment occupied the front Opposition Bench were divided into two classes. One of them comprised the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman), who founded his objections to the Bill on the broadest basis which could be conceived. He knew that other Gentlemen in the House took the same view; but he had not himself that knowledge of details possessed by his hon. Friend, which would lead him to the conviction that the Bill now proposed was incompatible with the safe and satisfactory working of the railway system. He certainly approached the Bill with favourable prepossessions, expecting to find a practical measure; but he was not to be induced to accept advice that he did not think was good advice in regard to the mode of proceeding with reference to it. He was not convinced that the subject was sufficiently advanced for legislation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed his opinion with a care proportionate to the difficulty of the question ; but, considering that the matter had not gone through the ordinary process of inquiry previous to legislation, it was not possible for a complete case to be made out without many questions, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as well as his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India, had left untouched, being entered on. The Secretary of State for India had not given them the smallest light on any of those questions in the course of his speech. He (Mr. Gladstone) did not now speak of executory difficulties. He thought that it was quite evident, as regards a very large proportion of the country — namely, the population not dwelling in towns—that the present system of electric telegraphy was exceedingly defective. It was maimed and crippled in every point, from a want of independent and effective means for the distribution of messages. Messages were delivered as best they could, with great delay, and at heavy cost. It was also quite obvious that the Post Office possessed machinery which would afford immense facilities for the distribution of telegraphic messages, if there was no objection to it. An argument to which he attached considerable weight was that the business now carried on by a multitude of establishments competing at different points might be carried on by a single establishment more efficiently and at less cost. These were strong arguments for entertaining the question. And he was not free from official responsibility in the matter. He had very willingly and zealously promoted all the official inquiries that could tend to bring the matter into a state that would make it ripe for legislation. He felt great confidence—founded on experience—in the efficiency of the Post Office authorities generally, and more especially of that distinguished public servant, Mr. Scudamore, who had, perhaps, had more to do than any other person with the recent development of the Post Office for secondary purposes. He did not doubt at all that the promises in Mr. Scudamore's Report would be realized and fulfilled. He was ready to place confidence in the calculations presented to them on the part of the Government relative to the return to be obtained after payment of expenses, and he saw no difficulty in the financial part of the question respecting the means of providing the capital necessary for the purchase of existing interests, and the fresh investment of capital that might be required. But there were a number of questions that had not yet undergone elucidation, and which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be reserving for his reply ; but they were of such a character that the House was justified in asking that a clear light should be thrown on them, even before being called on to assent to the principle of the Bill. Serious difficulties, as yet unelucidated, were more matters for a Committee on the subject than for a Committee on the Bill. One question was—could the telegraphic system be given to the Government without giving the Government a monopoly ? If, however, the Government obtained a monopoly, a great deal might be said in favour of their possessing it, upon the same principle as they had the management of the Post Office. But the Bill did not go to that extent ; and the question was an exceedingly large one. Another question which arose was, whether there was any serious objection to a system which placed under the control of the Government that portion of the correspondence of the country which was open to the eyes of those who transmitted it. It was a serious question. He was far from saying they would not get over the difficulty ; but it was a serious and broad question, and a Committee on the Bill would find themselves in rather a false position in examining such a question, because it was one which more properly fell under the cognizance of a Committee on the subject. Was the Government competent to manage a system like that of the telegraphs, if it should be found to involve the necessity of working, not merely a fixed tariff and fixed regulations, as was the case at the Post Office, but also of dealing largely with discretionary arrangements with the conductors of the Press and others, analogous to those between railway companies and the people in business for whom they conveyed goods ? He believed that the present telegraphic companies, besides enforcing their ordinary fixed tariff, undertook other business, such as the collection of intelligence, which was conducted under voluntary arrangements ; and he owned that, however he might be disposed to commit to a Government Department the transaction of business fixed by a tariff, he thought they should hesitate before they resolved to engage it in a work which required the exercise of that discretionary power. Again—though this might appear like an old woman's apprehension—was it perfectly clear that the transmission of political intelligence—especially during the time of a General Election—could be safely confided to Government officials dismissible at pleasure? The mere order of priority in the delivery of intelligence might involve the most important political consequences. Was it quite clear, too, that a Department of the Government could be properly charged with the duty of considering and accepting or rejecting all supposed improvements in the system of telegraphy? He by no means gave an adverse opinion on these points; but he wanted light and knowledge. But examination was required to satisfy the House whether they could throw into the hands of the Government the main and principal charge of a system of this kind, in which science was continually bringing to bear on executory arrangements all the results of the active human mind. There were many matters connected with the Bill which, quite apart from any hostility to it, opened a wider inquiry than could be dealt with by a Select Committee upon the clauses, which must become a Committee on the whole subject raised by the hon. Member for York.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. AYRTON said, the first suggestion of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) was that the House should express an opinion upon the policy of the Bill; but, in compliance with the feeling of many Members on that side of the House, he concluded with a Motion that the House should not express any opinion upon the policy of the Bill. Thereupon the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) took an extraordinary course, for he declined to discuss this proposal, because it might have the same effect as one to postpone the second reading for six months. He could only account for this course by supposing that the right hon. Baronet was unable to deal with the considerations involved in this question. As one of the Railway Commissioners, he could not help remembering that a literary agitation was got up which suggested that the purchase of the railways in this country by the State would be a panacea, and that some gentlemen in the Post Office were active in that agitation.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

QUARANTINE AT SUEZ.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the fact that five days' quarantine have been imposed at Suez upon Officers and Men of the British Army returning from Abyssinia; and, if so, whether he will endeavour to obtain the removal of an impediment to the immediate transmission of the Men to a more invigorating climate, which may otherwise operate in so injurious a manner upon the sick and wounded of the British Troops?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that in April last the Egyptian Board of Health imposed five days' quarantine upon all vessels arriving at Suez from ports in the Red Sea; that quarantine to continue during the usual period of the return of pilgrims from Mecca. That arrangement would undoubtedly, if carried into effect, have imposed considerable hardship on British officers and men returning from Abyssinia. In consequence, however, of the representations of the British Consul to the Egyptian Government, permission had been obtained that they should be forwarded from Suez in trains provided for the purpose without any delay.

CASE OF MR EYRE.—QUESTION.

MR. LAMONT said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government now consider that the criminal prosecution against Mr Eyre has concluded; and whether they are prepared to defray the legal expenses Mr. Eyre has incurred in defending himself?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the first part of the inquiry of the hon. Gentleman as to whether the criminal prosecution of Mr. Eyre has concluded is one upon which I really cannot give an opinion. It is purely a matter of law, and upon such a point my own opinion would not be worth anything. With regard to the latter part of the question, I may say that, after the indictment against Mr. Eyre was thrown out by the Grand Jury, the Secretary of State, in accordance with an engagement expressed in the Despatch of his predecessor, dated February, 1867, that when the prosecution was concluded the Government would consider the question of reasonable expenses incurred by ex-Governor Eyre, wrote to that gentleman, and requested him to send a statement of the amount of those expenses.

MR. LAMONT: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that Her Majesty's Government will protect Mr. Eyre against further proceedings by the Jamaica Committee?

MR. DISRAELI: I must decline to give an answer to a hypothetical question. When the circumstances occur Her Majesty's Government will consider them, and be prepared to give an opinion.

MR. LAMONT: The Answer I have received not being what I was led to expect, I shall not withdraw the Motion of which I have given Notice, but shall postpone it till Friday.

COLONEL BROWNLOW KNOX: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether, in his opinion, Mr. Eyre is already protected by the Act of Indemnity passed by the Jamaica Legislature, and confirmed by an Order in Council; and, if not, whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill of Indemnity to protect him against further persecution by the Jamaica Committee or other persons?

MR. DISRAELI: I am sure my hon. and gallant Friend will, upon reflection, feel that a Question of this importance ought not to have been put without Notice having been given.

METROPOLIS — THE COLONNADE OF BURLINGTON HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is willing to withdraw from public sale the materials of the Colonnade and the Gateway of Burlington House?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in reply, that instructions had been given yesterday to withdraw the Colonnade and Gateway of Burlington House from the sale by public advertisement.

ASSISTANT BOUNDARY COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has seen a letter in The Times of yesterday from one of the Assistant Boundary Commissioners? He wished to know if one of the Assistant Commissioners was at liberty to write such a letter for publication in the newspapers, whether it would not be better at once to have the Reports of all the Assistant Commissioners on the Table?

Mr. Disraeli

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that a Motion had been made for the production of the Reports of the Assistant Boundary Commissioners, and they would shortly be laid on the table.

LAKE SUPERIOR AND THE PACIFIC, &c.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

SIR HARRY VERNEY, in rising to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon the capability for settlement and the best means of settling Her Majesty's Territory lying between Lake Superior and the Pacific, especially as to the provision for Telegraphic and other Communication through Her Majesty's Dominions from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean”—

said, the subject to which he invited the attention of the House affected territory extensive enough and fertile enough, according to the best authorities, to support a population as large as that of England, and it involved also the performance of a positive duty. This country was not justified in holding possession of vast regions and allowing them to remain in a lawless condition. It was incumbent on us to do what we could to afford protection to our fellow-countrymen and fellow-subjects in the countries that extended from Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains, and also to use our endeavours to civilize and christianize the Indians who roamed over them. And it was our interest also to do so; for not only were the countries to which he referred very valuable for their natural productions, but they bound together the Eastern and Western portions of British North America. The best communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific was through them, and the shortest way to China and Japan. There was no doubt that the communication with Eastern Asia would be by the regions to which his Motion referred; whether they would remain under the British Crown would depend on the measures taken or sanctioned by that House. The territory from Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains might be made very valuable to us in another point of view. What was the chief source of anxiety and danger to England at this time? Was it not hostility on the part of the Irish in Ireland and in the United States? And what did the Irish want? They wanted land? They left their homes and reached Nova Scotia and Canada, but they did not easily obtain fertile land in those countries; they passed through them, and in some of the Western of the United States, they obtained the land which they desired, and they settled there, too often with feelings embittered against or hostile to England. But between Lake Superior and the Rocky Mountains were millions of acres as fertile as any in the United States, and which it was our interest to give to emigrants from Ireland, Scotland, or England, at the cheapest rate; and, instead of hostile Irish in the United States, we should have loyal Irish in the New Dominion. The Irish in British North America were perfectly loyal; they enjoyed every freedom that good government could insure; and their countrymen, located on the rich lands in the regions of which he was speaking, would be loyal too; and the formation of only 200 miles of road would render their country accessible through British territory during eight or nine months of every year. Nature afforded remarkable facilities for water communication through these territories, across the whole continent of North America, by means of the St. Lawrence, Lake Ontario, Lake Huron (which it is proposed to connect by a ship canal) and thence to the western shores of Lake Superior. By means of this system of communication, the produce of the territories would be brought, without transshipment, from the North Western States of the Union, as well as from the New Dominion, to Liverpool; and it was worthy of remark that so important was this communication considered in the United States that half the capital required for the Ontario and Huron Canal would be subscribed by American citizens. This carried us half-way to the Rocky Mountains. The rest of that territory, from about the 90th to about the 117th meridian of longitude, consisted chiefly of the hunting-grounds of the Hudson's Bay Company, the greater portion of which was very rich land for agricultural purposes, and was called the Fertile Belt. The Red River, the Assiniboine, and the Saskatchewan watered those regions. There buffalo were found in abundance, and there the Indians hunted. The Hudson's Bay Company's servants had always been on good terms with the Indians, while the citizens of the United States had too generally been engaged in hostilities with them. But it must be remembered that the Hudson's Bay Company and the Indians had had the same interest—that the country should remain unsettled, the hunting-ground for the Indian, the resort of fur-bearing animals for the trapper. Whoever sought to settle the country, whether our own people or any others, must not expect the same amicable reception from the Indians as that which the servants of the Hudson's Bay Company had met with. The difference of King George's men and Boston men, hitherto maintained so much to our advantage, would not always be recognized. The Hudson's Bay Company's servants had brought to the natives those few products of civilization desired by them, and had received in barter all that they had to exchange. Settlers would destroy the hunting-grounds of the Indians, and would not be their customers for what alone they had been able to supply. Whoever the colonists and settlers in those regions, they would probably encounter difficulty and opposition from the Indians who roamed over them. Those difficulties would be made more serious; they might even deter colonists intending to resort there from Canada or Great Britain if the country were left without responsible rulers. People might be found who would think it their interest to prevent our fellow-subjects colonizing those countries, and who might prompt the Indians, and covertly aid them in their hostility. It appeared to him that the best chance of averting such evils would be afforded by having responsible authorities on the spot to negotiate with the Indians, and who should be armed with power to enforce law and afford protection both to natives and settlers. An offender was lodged in gaol at Fort Garry, the Red River Settlement, some few months since, and the following night the gaol was broken open by an armed mob and the prisoner released. The Government there was powerless, and the inhabitants of the settlement were, as he thought they had good right to be, very discontented. There was also much discontent in British Columbia and Vancouver Island. Those distant possessions of the British Crown felt themselves neglected. They were as yet loyal to her Majesty; they wished to be united with Red River and Canada, and to form an integral portion of British North America. One object of his Motion was to determine the best line and mode of communication between these colonies, now so widely separated, and to establish that which was the most desirable. He would not venture an opinion as to which was the best pass across the Rocky Mountains. Many had been examined, and he believed that we should obtain much more information respecting them. An enterprising and indefatigable explorer, who spent some years in examining the country at his own cost, had pointed out that which he considered to be the best, and he read an instructive paper on the subject at the Geographical Society early this year, and his opinion was also that of the latest authorities. Our information with respect to those countries was still imperfect; but we knew far more than we did at the time of the Ashburton Treaty, and when the boundary line was drawn. Our ignorance at that time had cost us the loss of extensive and valuable territory. He was himself in the Pacific nearly forty years since, and one of the routes which he might have taken to the Atlantic coast of America was by the Columbia river; according to the best map then procurable, Bruce's Atlas, it was the boundary of the British possessions. That which was now Washington State was laid down as British territory, and San Juan, an island in British waters. And now the United States had purchased the Russian territory of Alaska, to the north of our own territory, which ought never to have been Russian; discovered and named by Captain Cook and by Vancouver, but apparently never valued by our Government, while perhaps the Hudson's Bay Company were satisfied that the seaboard of the vast regions which supplied their trappers and hunters should be in the hands of any rather than of enterprising British settlers and colonists. That purchase might, perhaps, suggest to the inhabitants of British Columbia the facility with which they might be assailed, and their allegiances ought not to be forcibly transferred from Great Britain to the United States. He did not believe many hon. Members would permit such a transfer, or would hesitate to go to war if necessary to prevent such a conquest, and to protect our loyal fellow-subjects and their homes; our colonies were now fortunately under a Minister personally acquainted with the Queen's North American possessions, and therefore, he hoped, quick to discern and prompt to resist any attempted violation of any portion of them. His object in bringing

Sir Harry Verney

this subject before the House was that the Government might be urged immediately to adopt measures that would prevent any doubt existing on the part of our fellow-subjects in British North America respecting our sympathy with them, and would also put a stop to any depredatory measures on the part of our neighbours who might cast a wistful eye on countries whose value England seemed to ignore. He desired to maintain the most friendly relations with the United States. Not only did the welfare of both countries depend on it, but the advance of every great and good object—political, moral, and social, throughout the world. But friendly relations could only be secured by a clear understanding with the United States that we do not seek to obtain their territories, and that we will not permit them to take ours. Portions of their country would be very convenient and desirable to us; but we took no steps to possess ourselves of them. They also, no doubt, desired to have portions of ours, and naturally the very portions of value to our fellow-subjects. We, however, desired to render them still more valuable, and were not content to part with them. If citizens of the States cross the boundary from Minnesota, Dacotah, Montana, and Washington, they come into our country and place themselves under British law. It was an indisputable fact that Americans continually crossed it, and it was possible they would do so in such numbers as to make it difficult for us to retain the country in case of war with the States. Already rumours had arisen on that subject, though from quarters entirely unauthorized. He wished to avoid that and every other cause of disagreement with the States. The States had territory enough, and so have we. If we adopted the right measures to establish and maintain our authority the opinion of the world would be with us in case any question should arise as to our territorial rights. We might even assume that the Government at Washington would restrain their own citizens in any aggression; but if we permitted the settlement of foreigners in our colonies and did not maintain our Sovereign rights, we could not complain of the consequences of such settlement. British authorities in America, Colonial Ministers at home, the Government of the United States, and commercial bodies in both countries had all given attention to this subject. [The hon. Baronet proceeded to read extracts from official papers to show that whatever may have been our ignorance in times past we now know that on our side of the boundary, between Lake Superior and the Rocky Mountains, we possess vast regions extending over millions of acres, perfectly well adapted for settlement and cultivation; that the best communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean is through them; that they are watered by navigable rivers, affording the most easy and cheap transit to near the foot of the Rocky Mountains; that there is an easy pass across that mountain chain into British Columbia; that water and road communication can be opened at a small expense; that companies, consisting of wealthy and responsible men, partly American citizens, partly our own fellow-subjects, are willing to undertake and execute such works; and that when completed they would render it still more the interest of the States and of ourselves to live at peace with each other.] Surely we might believe that the power to wield such influence, to people, inhabit, and rule over these territories, had not been committed to us in vain. They were great talents. Were we not responsible for improving them? Should we not seek to carry into those countries the best of whatever we had here; above all, whatever might be the institutions adapted to the state of society that existed there, that British authority and obedience to law should be gradually introduced. He did not suggest that British institutions should be planted in a soil perhaps not fitted to receive them; but he believed that, whatever they might be, if British authority would make itself felt the high character of our countrymen would pervade them. He earnestly desired that British truthfulness, fortitude, and energy, respect and consideration for the rights of others, that the principles of morality and religion—the best safeguards of all that we prize the most highly here—should be implanted there and have every opportunity to flourish and bear fruit to the honour of the country which was their parent, and the welfare of the inhabitants of those distant regions, and, if he might so speak with reverence, to the glory of God.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to second the Motion, because having served for two Sessions on the Committee which sat on the Hudson's Bay territory, he could confirm the fact that so far from that country being wild and incapable of improvement, much of it, like the Saskatchewan Valley, was a splendid country, fit for habitation and settlement, and which would have been opened up long since by France, Prussia, Germany, or any other country but our own. It was a duty which devolved upon us to open it up, and one which ought not to be any longer neglected. It had been abundantly shown that, though covered with snow at some periods of the year, it contained deer, buffaloes, and other animals, and that it was capable of being made a very valuable territory. It would become one day the nearest route for the carrying trade with China and Japan, and knowing the immense value of that trade to this country, we ought to aid our Canadian fellow-subjects in obtaining a share of the benefit by directing some of the surplus capital of this country in the direction of those magnificent territories which, if much longer neglected, would soon become so peopled with citizens of the United States that, as in the case of Vancouver's Island, we should find one day that we had lost them. He was sure that, by wise and combined action with the Canadian Government, an immense mass of labour that in this country could not find employment, might be transferred to where it would be valuable both to the labourer and to the Empire. The United States, in the course which they had adopted with regard to California, had shown us an excellent example, and one which proved that if this question had fallen under their consideration, instead of our own, they would have dealt with it in a very different manner. The United States had constructed a railway direct to California, and were already doing much to develop the resources of that country. It was a reproach to us that the easiest access to our own Red River Settlement should still be through the United States by way of St. Paul's, when geographically a much nearer route might, at a trifling expense, be constructed from the head of Lake Superior, forming a link in the line of Pacific communication. We should be following a very unwise policy if we allowed such territories to slip out of our hands, by neglecting to encourage the Government of Canada to form a communication with the Pacific. He hoped that the Government would accede to the proposal of the hon. Baronet.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon the capability for settlement and the best means of settling Her Majesty's Territory lying between Lake Superior and the Pacific, especially as to the provision for Telegraphic and other Communication through Her Majesty's Dominions from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean."—(Sir Harry Verney.)

MR. AYTOUN expressed a hope that Her Majesty's Government would not accede to the Motion for the appointment of a Royal Commission to consider the best means of opening up the country between Canada and the Pacific. There were two reasons which might induce us to extend our territory. The first was that our military positions would be improved, and the second was, that it would be for the benefit of this country. Now, instead of improving our military position, it was a self-evident proposition that by extending our territory without materially increasing the population of the country we should be weakening it. The great source of our weakness in Canada was an enormous territory, with a scattered population. As regarded the benefit to be derived by the people of this country, the hon. Baronet (Sir Harry Verney) thought it would be of great advantage to the Irish, who could not find land in their own country, to find as much fertile land as they could desire in this new territory which he desired to open up. He was in favour of inducing and helping the people of this country who could not find employment here to go to some other country, either to our own colonies or to America; but he could not conceive any necessity for looking for new territories when we had such abundance of unoccupied territory already waiting for settlement. Canada, at the present moment, cost us £1,000,000 a year; and, some time ago, the House voted money towards the construction of an extensive system of fortifications, which it was expected that the colonists would complete, but they had never taken any steps towards that object. Everyone knew that it was impossible to induce colonists to bear their fair share of burdens of this kind, and yet the hon. Baronet asked the House to assent to his Motion, which evidently had for its object to lead the way to a further increase of British territory.

MR. ADDERLEY said, the Government were by no means blind to the value of the territory to which the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Harry Verney) related; in fact, he doubted whether any portion of Her Majesty's colonial possessions had occupied to a greater extent the attention of successive Ministers for years past. At the same time the hon. and gallant Gentleman had correctly stated that there was not sufficient information upon the subject at present existing in this country, and not sufficient national appreciation of the value of this territory to cause the pressure that he believed would yet be exerted upon the Government to bring about a settlement of the question. A territory lying at the distance of half the globe from us was not one of which the colonization could easily be undertaken. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the country in question was of the highest value to the people of England, and particularly to the poorer classes and those who were pressed by narrow circumstances at home. No doubt, such a magnificent country must be opened, sooner or later, to the enterprize of mankind. The world was increasing so rapidly in population that a vast tract like that could not long be suffered to remain a wilderness and preserve for wild animals in the hands of a trading company. This great tract was to England what the Far West was to the United States, and ought to stand to it in the same relation. The United States derived their enormous vigour from the fact that there was no pressure for land, and that if poverty overtook a man in one quarter he could easily move off to another where there would be scope enough for his energies; and in like manner this vast territory, if freely open, would afford a similar outlet for poverty and social crowding in the narrow limits of this island. In the interests of our fellow-subjects across the Atlantic, also, it was essential that this vast district should be settled. We had already a very large colony to the west of the Rocky Mountains, and no one knew better than the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Milton), who upon this subject had produced one of the most interesting and able books ever written, how essential it was to the development of the mineral wealth of British Columbia that the agricultural country lying to the east of it should have its wealth also developed, the two together forming, perhaps, one of the finest dominions in the world, but each being supplementary to the other. The hon. and gallant Gentleman and his Secunder had both blamed this country for its remissness in failing to open up this region. It was rather the habit of Englishmen to say that any other country would act better than their own; but happily upon this point their practice always contradicted their theory; and he must remind those hon. Members that the difficulty in the present case had arisen from the subjection of the district during so many years to a great trading company. The first necessity in opening any great region of that nature was to place it under some settled government; for nobody could say that the government of the Hudson's Bay Company over Rupert's Land was of a character to attract enterprise or emigration. Moreover, the enterprise which would naturally lead to the opening up of such a country had been stopped and prevented by the system of the trading company. Even if a good government were established there the hon. and gallant Gentleman was rather sanguine in his expectations of a rapid settlement. Canada, even yet, was not fully settled, and persons possessing capital to invest in land were not likely to push into regions far beyond while as yet Canada, which lay nearer, remained partially unoccupied. The day was yet distant, even if negotiations were concluded, when that settlement could be carried out which the hon. and gallant Gentleman so sanguinely expected. But that was no reason why they should not take every requisite measure for the attainment of the object in view. The best access to the territory, he fully believed, was, after conquering one obstructive region, in our own hands. He had not the slightest objection to emigrants coming freely from the United States to occupy the country; on the contrary, he believed that we might with advantage draw supplies of men from all countries of the globe. Our trans-Atlantic cousins came from a good race; and there was no finer race for occupying new territory than the Anglo-Saxon. But the country must remain under the sovereignty of Her Majesty; that, of course, was essential, and he supposed there was no one present who would not make this condition a sine quâ non. There were one or two great natural difficulties to be overcome soon after leaving Lake Superior; but as soon as these had been conquered, the rest of the country lay fairly open; and he entertained no doubt that ultimately the direct route through the British dominions would become the great thoroughfare of the world across to the West. Supposing the marshes near Lake Superior, to which he had referred, to have been made passable, upon the authority of the noble Lord (Viscount Milton) he believed that the easiest country lay beyond, and we had possession of the two most practicable passes over the Rocky Mountains. But the first thing to be accomplished was to make arrangements with the Hudson's Bay Company, for it must be obvious that their system was an absolute obstruction in the way of British enterprise. He did not blame the Company in the slightest degree for the course which they had pursued. Consistently with their own trading purposes, they had carried on their operations in the most honourable manner, and had introduced a government as efficient as circumstances permitted in so wild a country. It was pretty clear, however, that another and a totally different kind of government must be established before the country could be opened up with advantage, and negotiations having for their object the assumption both of the property and of the government of this wide tract of territory were going on at the present moment with Canada. The Government to whom the proposition came considered it was essential that the right to govern and the property in the land should be in the same hands; that the territorial rights of the Hudson's Bay Company, now 200 years old, and asserted by high legal authority, should be handed over to the Canadian Government upon terms that were just to both parties. These negotiations were retarded by the prorogation of the Canadian Parliament, which would not meet again until November; but he could not help thinking that there was a fair prospect of the solution of this difficult question to the satisfaction of all persons concerned. If this were not so, other steps must be taken, which he would not attempt now to indicate; but he looked forward with hope to the success of the negotiations now proceeding. In the first settlement of a new country some assistance is generally necessary from the mother country. Canada must assume the relation of "mother country" to this territory, and no doubt Canada would assist it liberally in surveying and the construction of roads, railways, and telegraphs, and all the first outlay in occupation. Certainly England would not undertake so distant an enterprise; but her race must have gone back in vigour if her greatest colonies could not sub-colonize, as they often had done in the case of the now United States. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir H. Verney) asked for a Royal Commission; but when he (Mr. Adderley) told him what had been done, he would see that they needed no Royal Commission; that information was not wanting, and that it was only necessary that the information in their hands should be applied. There had been a Select Committee in 1857, which recommended that the interest and wishes of Canada should be immediately consulted about the steps to be taken to extend, as they demanded, the Red River Colony. Then there were the elaborate Reports of Dr. Hind to the Canadian Government, and of Captain Palliser, who made scientific observations for the British Government, of the most elaborate and costly kind. He hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not press for a Commission to obtain further information, but would rather help the Government to make use of the valuable and full information already possessed. The negotiations to transfer both the territory and government of the Hudson's Bay Company to Canada would certainly be pressed to a conclusion as rapidly as possible, and he was sanguine that the result of them would be to promote in the most effectual way the important object the hon. and gallant Gentleman had in view.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Adderley) had given too glowing an account of the important territory in question, and he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman's opinion that the Hudson's Bay territory was to England what the Far West was to the United States. He did not think that the Hudson's Bay territory was our Far West. In fact, the whole of North America was our Far West, and Australia might be included under the head of our Far West. Hudson's Bay territory was indeed by no means the most important part of the Far West of England. As to the access to that territory, he had read most of what had been written on the subject, and he was of opinion that the great obstacle to the settlement of this territory had not been so much its possession by a trading company—which, no doubt, was a hindrance—as the difficulties of access interposed by nature between it and Canada. The arrangements of nature were most inconvenient, physical geography ran counter to political geography, and, in place of the extensive prairies of the United States, a region most difficult to traverse was interposed between the western extremity of Lake Superior and the valley of the Red River. It was by no means easy to establish continuous communication. Although the climate was extremely rigorous, and portions of the territory were unfit for human habitation, while the navigation of the Saskatchewan was so interrupted as to render the through passage of steamers impossible, there was yet a considerable extent of territory well fitted for settlement and colonization, which he hoped at no distant day would be peopled by British settlers. The question arose at whose expense this territory was to be opened up; and he was glad to hear his right hon. Friend say that the task of settling it would fall upon Canada. A section of the Canadian Federation Act provided for its admission into that Union; and pending the realization of settled government, it would naturally be admitted somewhat as "Territories" were brought under the Government of the United States. With this qualification he thought his right hon. Friend's statement on that part of the subject was very satisfactory. He perfectly agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary that there was no occasion for any such inquiry as had been proposed by the hon. Baronet (Sir Harry Verney). As the right hon. Gentleman had truly said, there was hardly any uncivilized portion of the globe which had been the subject of more careful inquiry than this territory; and in particular he would refer to the Canadian Commission, the expedition of Captain Palliser, who was sent out when he was at the Colonial Office, and the investigations of the Hudson's Bay Company, who had posts in every part of the country. Besides, there were many excellent books of travels, among which the works of Lord Milton and Dr. Cheadle occupied the foremost place. All possible information was already in our hands; and therefore, while he thanked the hon. Baronet for having brought this interesting subject before the House, he hoped the Motion would not be persevered with.

Mr. Adderley

VISCOUNT MILTON felt bound to say it was no longer a question of more or less difficulty with regard to making and maintaining a road, as the time had arrived when this country must consider whether it wished to keep in their present state of loyalty the colonies on the Pacific. He was very much astonished at the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the late Under Secretary (Mr. C. Fortescue). In his humble judgment, if anything were to be done in regard to establishing through communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we ought to look to the Pacific colonies rather than to Canada. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Fortescue) had very much understated the value of the territory which was the subject of this discussion, for he was in a position to state that the Fertile Belt was at least equal in value to Minnesota, one of the finest of the United States. The British Pacific colonies had no direct means of communication with one another, but derived even their food from the United States, although the interior of the country was well calculated to supply their wants. There was every year a great influx of Americans, who went to the gold mines during the fine season; and while we in this country had been pondering and wasting time the staple commodity of the colony had been, to a great extent, worked out and depreciated. This state of things was an injustice to those who had been induced to settle there. The gold went out of the country never to return, and no labour or improvement could replace its value. This had been going on for some years, and unless active steps were taken it seemed likely to continue. He had reason to know that there was a growing desire on the part of the colonists to join the United States; and he, for one, could not blame them for entertaining such a wish under the circumstances of the case. They derived their living from the United States, and paid for it with the gold which was obtained in the colony. With regard to native woods, he might say that he had not been through them himself; but he knew the Hudson's Bay Company always found it practicable to pass through them, as did the Indians a few years ago. The right hon. Gentleman, however, stated that such a thing was impracticable. [Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE remarked that he had said nothing of the kind.] It was clear, then, that it was practicable, and this was all he desired to show. The more southern road had been pressed for through the interest of Minnesota. That State joined the Red River Settlement, which was at present dependent upon Minnesota for its supplies, America having, unlike Canada, opened communications to its territory. The consequence was that there was going up in the Red River Settlement a feeling similar to that which was so general in British Columbia. He trusted the present discussion would not terminate in vague promises as to what would be done in the future; for the time had come for something more substantial to be given. Much as he disagreed with many things in the United States, it was but just to say that a great deal of the limited amount of prosperity in our Pacific colonies was due to the energy and enterprize of individual Americans. The various accounts sent home showed that the interior of British Columbia was one of the most promising and most fertile regions owned by Her Majesty; and if the resources of Vancouver's Island and British Columbia were to be developed it must be done by developing the resources of the interior, unless they wished to delay until the Americans had done it for them.

MR. CARDWELL said, he had listened with the greatest interest to the discussion, and was very glad to learn that the Government had no intention of issuing a Commission from this country to inquire into the subject. Not only was inquiry already exhausted; but a fresh investigation would reverse the policy settled by the Committee of 1857, whose recommendations were incorporated in the Act of Parliament passed last year with so much unanimity. The proposed inquiry, therefore, would be a retrograde step, and would be a fatal indication of a vacillating policy on our part. It would lead to false expectations, and do a great deal of mischief; and he was glad to hear, therefore, that it was not about to be sanctioned by the Government. On the other hand, he sympathized entirely with the spirit in which this Motion had been brought forward, and he learnt with great interest that negotiations were in progress to terminate the right and interest of the Hudson's Bay Company, so that the territory might be surrendered to the Government of Canada.

SIR HARRY VERNEY, in reply, said, he would not ask for a Commission if the Colonial Department thought they could effect what was desirable by a better mode. He trusted, however, that the subject would receive immediate attention.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD OR DRINK ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE.

MR. DIXON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the "Act for Preventing the Adulteration of Articles of Food or Drink, 1860," and to extend its provisions to Drugs, said, that the existing Act had entirely failed to carry out the wise intentions of Parliament, and the main reason was, that individuals were averse to prosecute tradesmen. The object of the present Bill was to make provision that the penalty which was already imposed upon those who knowingly sold adulterated articles, should be extended to the manufacturers of the adulterated articles; to render it compulsory upon districts to appoint analysts; and to apply the provisions of the law to drugs as well as to articles of food. But the most important clause was one to appoint some public officer whose duty it would be, on proper information laid before him, to prosecute persons suspected of making or selling adulterated articles. He believed that these provisions would make the law effective.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the "Act for preventing the Adulteration of articles of Food or Drink, 1860," and to extend its provisions to Drugs, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DIXON, Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA, and Mr. GOLDNEY.

House adjourned at a quarter
after Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, June 10, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Inclosure (No. 2); Poor Law and Medical Inspectors (Ireland); Investment of Trust Funds Supplemental.*

First Reading—Adulteration of Food or Drink Act Amendment* [161]; Inclosure (No. 2)* [162]; Judgments Extension* [163]; Investment of Trust Funds Supplemental* [164].

Second Reading—Revenue Officers' Disabilities Removal [76]; Married Women's Property [89]; Municipal Rate (Edinburgh)* [90]; New Zealand Company* [156].

Referred to Select Committee—Married Women's Property [89].

Committee—Burials (Ireland) [5]—R.P.; Voters in Disfranchised Boroughs* [128]; Consecration of Churchyards Act (1867) Amendment* [152].

Report—Voters in Disfranchised Boroughs* [128]; Consecration of Churchyards Act (1867) Amendment* [152].

Third Reading—Fairs* [126] and passed.

REVENUE OFFICERS' DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.

(Mr. Monk, Sir Harry Verney, Mr. Otway.)

[BILL 76.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MONK, in rising to move that this Bill be read a second time, said, he was astonished at the state of the Benches opposite—there being no one upon the Treasury Bench, and only six Members upon the Ministerial side altogether. When a Bill of this nature was before the House, he thought some Members of Her Majesty's Government should have been present to hear the arguments he intended to urge in support of it. [Cries of "Move!"] Under the circumstances, he should, without further preface, move that the Bill be now read a second time.

MR. OTWAY seconded the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY BILL

(Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Stuart Mill.)

[BILL 89.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Shaw-Lefevre.)

MR. LOPES, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, it had been introduced in a very plausible manner by the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre); but would, in his opinion, if passed, materially affect the existing relations between husband and wife, and introduce discomfort, ill-feeling, and distrust where hitherto harmony and concord had prevailed. As the hon. Member had stated in introducing the Bill, it was similar to one which had been introduced in 1857 by Sir Erskine Perry, and which received some amount of favour from the House, having been read a second time and afterwards referred to a Select Committee. But at that time there were admitted grievances with regard to the law of husband and wife. Thus, no facilities existed for obtaining a dissolution of marriage—a privilege then confined to the wealthy—and the earnings of a married woman deserted by her husband received no protection from the law. The Divorce Act of 1857, however, provided a remedy for these grievances, and since then little or nothing had been heard on this subject. Reference had been made to the fact that the law of the United States had recently been something like that proposed in the Bill. That change in the law had had but a short trial, and he was not at all prepared to admit that the institutions or the jurisprudence of the United States were suited to this country. He would rather appeal to English law, and ask whether, under it, the relations of husband and wife were not rightly adjusted, and whether the characteristics of an English home ought not to be preserved? It had been said that the present Common Law of the land pressed severely on the industrial classes, while wealthier people evaded its operation by settlements and by the help of Courts of Equity. But the proposal of the hon. Member to give the wife uncontrolled dominion over her property was not analogous to the operation of settlements, the object of which was not to protect the wife against the husband, but to protect the property brought into settlement, and make an inalienable provision for wife, husband, and children. Thus settlements tied up property, and prevented the very thing which the hon. Member desired—namely, that a wife should retain the absolute control of her own property. By the existing law the personal property of the wife passed upon marriage to her husband, as well as (to a limited extent) her chattels real, the husband having a right to deal with these while he lived, but not to dispose of them by will. With regard to the wife's realty, the husband was only entitled to the income; the destination of the property rested with the wife; he could only deal with it during his life with her assent, and subject to certain conditions as to her separate execution; and, after her death, if there were children of the marriage, he enjoyed her real estate for his life as tenant by the courtesy. On the other hand, the wife upon marriage obtained perfect impunity. Her husband became liable for her antenuptial debts; he was bound to support her children by a prior marriage; he was liable in the event of any action brought against the wife for civil tort, and any property purchased or acquired by him was subject, in case there was no will, to her thirds or dower. Thus there was nothing unequal or harsh in the law, which was consistent with the whole relations between husband and wife. It was founded on the principle that in return for the confidence of the wife the husband gave her protection and support; that he was most competent to deal with any property belonging to either; that there must be one head of the family, and that he was the proper head. That principle of law had worked well for centuries, and there was no reason why it should be altered. Now, the Preamble of the Bill was drawn with a very bold hand. It said—

“Whereas the law of property and contract with respect to married women is unjust in principle, and presses with peculiar severity upon the poorer classes of the community.”

And then the 1st clause went on to enact that—

“A married woman shall be capable of holding, acquiring, alienating, devising, and bequeathing real and personal estate, of contracting, and of suing and being sued, as if she were a feme sole.”

In his opinion such a change in the law was uncalled for, and would be most pernicious. Among the upper classes it would have no effect whatever, because they would still resort to settlements. But suppose the husband and the wife each had £500 a-year, and the marriage was not a well-assorted one. When the rent, taxes, servants, and other expenses of an establishment came to be met, what would happen? The utmost dissension. Again, suppose there was an extravagant wife, to whom the husband was, nevertheless, fondly attached. She might be arrested for debts, perhaps at the dinner-table, and the husband would either have to pay them or allow her to go to prison. The probability was that he would pay and be impoverished by this change in the law. But would the Bill be any real protection to the wife? Suppose a man married a woman for her money. According to the Bill he might still influence her after marriage to convey to him the whole of her property. Then it could not be doubted that women were more liable to be imposed upon than men. Take, for instance, such cases as that of Mrs. Lyon, and that of Mrs. Borradaile, who had actually paid £4,000 in order to be made “beautiful for ever.” He now came to the case of the industrial class. It could not be denied that in 499 cases out of 500 women of that class had not a halfpenny of their own, and what good could a Bill of the kind be to them? They would take nothing by it, but some liability. At present the wife could not be sued; but what was likely to happen if the Bill passed? The husband was away from home all day providing the means of subsistence for the family. The wife was the person who made the purchases for the house, and, being the contracting party, she might be sued. In that case she would not be likely to thank the hon. Gentleman for having introduced a Bill by which she took nothing except that very unpleasant liability. And then where a brutal husband was concerned did hon. Gentlemen think that when the wife got some money he would not go and take it away from her at once? His hon. Friend had provided some machinery for the protection of the wife by means of the County Court; but the man would get the money into his own hands long before that protection could be obtained. He maintained, therefore, that this Bill was uncalled for; that it would be inefficient and pernicious; and he honestly believed that if the married women of England were appealed to they would be found opposed to it. They would prefer that spirit of mutual confidence, which was the great element of happiness in marriage, to the possession of the most unlimited power over their property. He would like to know for whom the hon. Gentleman proposed to legislate? It was, in the words of the hon. Gentleman, for "the reckless, the improvident, the vicious, the self-indulgent, and the indolent—" [Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE: Husbands.] Well, but why were those reckless, improvident, and vicious husbands to be legislated for to the prejudice of the community? This was exceptional kind of legislation; it was legislating for a certain class to the disregard of the interests of the greater portion of the population, and therefore he begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. KARSLAKE, in seconding the Amendment, said he objected to the Bill as the most revolutionary measure that had been introduced to the House since he had had the honour of a seat in it. He objected to it on two grounds—in the first place, because it would effect an entire revolution in the social status of husband and wife; and in the next, because it would work a like revolution in regard to the law of property; and it was difficult to say under which head it was most open to objection. He would ask the House to judge of the Bill upon its own merits, and by that test to throw it out. There was an extreme discrepancy between the Preamble and the enacting part of the Bill.

Mr. Lopes

The recital in the Preamble was that the law of property with respect to married women was unjust in principle, and pressed with considerable severity upon the poorer classes of the community. Anyone would suppose from such a Preamble that the Bill was intended to amend the law with regard to the property of the poorer classes; but for every pound's worth of their property affected by the Bill there would be hundreds of thousands of pounds worth of property affected belonging to those classes upon whom, according to the Preamble, the law did not press harshly in any way whatever. Now, what were the objections to the Bill as regarded the first point? The law of this country had not grown up suddenly; it was the growth of ages, and they must go to the time of the Conquest to trace it to its source. It was founded upon the assumption that the husband and wife were one person—that position was denoted by the word "coverture"—that there should be but one head of the family, and that the husband should be that head. One of our best legal writers (Blackstone) had laid down more than once that such a state of things showed how great a favourite the woman was with the Law of England. The result of only one person being at the head of the family involved, according to text writers on law, "supremacy" on the one hand, and "subjection" on the other; or, as he would say in modern language, authority on the one hand, and obedience on the other. But the hon. Gentleman desired to alter the law—the growth of ages—and to make two heads of the family instead of one, which could have no other effect than that of introducing discord and confusion into family life. The second branch of his objection related to the law of property; and the revolution that would be brought about in that respect could hardly be conceived. The change proposed had been advocated with great plausibility. But it was the superficial character of the measure which enabled it to be presented to the House in a plausible form; and the moment they looked into the existing state of the law it would be seen how utterly impossible it would be for such a measure to work. He maintained first of all that the Bill was utterly unnecessary, for the existing law did full justice to married women; and next, that if the poorer classes of the community were subject to any injustice, the so-called remedy proposed in the Bill would not only not touch the evil, but would even aggravate it. There existed no necessity whatever for such a change; so far as the upper classes were concerned, for the rights of a married woman could be protected by marriage settlements; and any person who wished to make over to her individually any property had only to insert the words "for her separate use." Under the present law married women were better protected than they would be if this Bill passed, for they had the protection of trustees. On the other hand, the alteration now proposed would have no other effect than to take away from married women of the poorer classes a great part of the protection which was afforded by the existing law. The proposed Bill was unnecessary, and would prove inefficient, and even disadvantageous to those whom it was intended to protect. It would be wrong to give to a woman the sole possession of property as against her children. Then with respect to real estate, it was proposed that the husband should hold the land for an estate by the courtesy; which was inconsistent with the principle of the Bill. He objected also to the County Courts having jurisdiction to any amount in cases of quarrels between husband and wife. If this Bill passed, a hardworking journeyman, whose employment took him from home, might find, on his return, that his wife was in gaol instead of taking care of his family, and all on account of the very questionable benefit of her liability to sue and be sued, as if she were a feme sole. He contended that whatever inconvenience was experienced under the present state of the law might be easily removed by the introduction of a short Bill to extend the provisions of the Divorce Act of 1857, so as to give the magistrates the power of determining in cases of cruelty as well as in those of desertion, that the earnings of the wife, or any property which she might afterwards acquire, should vest in her. He begged of hon. Gentlemen opposite to re-consider the subject between this time and the next Session of Parliament; and if they did he trusted they would come to the conclusion that there was no necessity whatever for interfering with the law, which, he repeated, had ripened into its existing state after the lapse of many centuries. The only thing he could see in favour of the Bill was that on the back of it was the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Recorder (Mr. Russell Gurney), and also that of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill).

He entertained the very highest respect for the Recorder; but that right hon. and learned Gentleman was not in his place to state his reasons for supporting the measure, and with all deference to so high an authority as the hon. Member for Westminster, whose writings they had read with pleasure; he thought hon. Gentlemen would agree with him when he said that, in spite of that hon. Member's great ability and research, he had treated the matter as regarded husband and wife in a philosophical rather than a practical spirit. He recollected one passage in the hon. Gentleman's work on political economy which had struck him very much. The hon. Gentleman had mentioned in that valuable work that in cases where the husband and wife were most nearly assimilated in regard to labour—as, for instance, in handloom weaving—their condition was most precarious, and they were very badly paid. Where, therefore, there was an assimilation in the position of the man and his wife, poverty and consequent degradation were pointed out as the result. With reference to other passages in the hon. Member's work, he would say that he did not think the hon. Gentleman appreciated sufficiently the difference between a man and woman in this country. There were more things with respect to this important relation in heaven and earth "than were dreamt of in his philosophy." He did not mean to disparage the writings of the hon. Gentleman for they all knew that one of the greatest of philosophers had written the most fanciful and even the most irrational things with regard to women. In conclusion he would say here you have a building raised up by the labour of a great number of years; it existed as a whole—one great and entire edifice, but so far as he was able to understand this Bill, if it were passed in its present form, under the pretext of interfering with a few bricks or repairing a few rents, it would pull down the whole structure.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Lopes.)

MR. HEADLAM said, he should support the Bill. Whatever doubts he might have entertained on the subject would, he felt bound to say, have been removed rather than strengthened by the exaggerated statements of hon. Gentlemen opposite. They had spoken of a social revolution. But those who used that language in one place maintained in another that the Bill would have no effect whatever with regard to the larger portion of society. With regard to marriage settlements, they would continue to be made if the Bill passed, so that there was no pretence for saying that it would create a social revolution or produce domestic discord. There was no better proof of the hardship of the Common Law than the Judge-made law to which successive Chancellors had contributed, and which had materially mitigated it. The poorer class, however, could not afford to go to the Court of Chancery, and were exposed therefore to the full hardship of the Common Law. When that law sprang up personal property scarcely existed. There were no railway shares, for instance. It was therefore not unreasonable that a husband, on becoming liable for his wife's debts, should take possession of her effects; but even then an exception was made with respect to paraphernalia, and in the case of real property a wife's rights were to some extent recognized. He admitted that, practically, the present state of things, though anomalous, worked very fairly among the higher classes; but a serious evil existed with regard to the poorer classes, and he thought there was a decided necessity for legislation. He was not altogether satisfied with the changes proposed by the Bill, but he would vote for the second reading, if only for the sake of the 4th clause.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought that the question was one quite worthy of legislation, though he could not approve of all the provisions of the Bill. It was undoubtedly hard that a drunken husband should be allowed whenever he chose to sweep up all the earnings of a woman so unfortunate as to have married him; and he would support a provision by which a married woman should be permitted to put her earnings into a separate bank, from which they should not be withdrawn except by her consent, but it would be unadvisable to permit married women to sue or be sued separately from the husband, and he could not help thinking that if such a measure were passed it would give great facilities to fraudulent debtors to set their creditors at defiance. It would enable a man to use his wife's money in business, and if unfortunate to hand over her share at the last moment to his wife, and thus deprive his creditors of their rightful claim. To recognize a separate interest for the wife was contrary not only to our Common Law, but to the practice of ancient and modern States. The Bill would practically render marriage a common partnership, the wife enjoying all its advantages with none of its risks. He also feared that it would introduce the elements of discord into domestic circles, and lead to a great deal of immorality, because it would so free a woman from restraint that in any quarrel she might have with her husband she would be enabled to say, "I have my own property, and if you don't like me I can go and live with somebody who does."

Mr. Headlam

MR. POLLARD - URQUHART contended that cases of hardship ought to be provided for, and reminded the House of a noble poet who married a lady with a large fortune, the greater part of which, on their early separation, he spent in a way which could not be approved. No doubt such cases were exceptional, and hon. Members might perhaps recall the poet's lines—

"But oh! ye lords of ladies intellectual, Inform us truly, have they not henpecked you all?"

The liability of the husband for debts contracted by his wife before marriage was another question which required revision, for, as the same poet had said—

"The milliners who furnish 'drapery misses' gave such credit
That future bridegrooms swore and sighed, and paid it."

He hoped the Bill would be allowed to go into Committee, where the legal objections which had been offered might be considered.

MR. MELLY disputed the statement that 499 women out of 500 in the humbler classes possessed no property, remarking that 800,000 women were in receipt of weekly wages in factories, and one in four of the married women are employed in manufacturing industries. Protection against dishonest and reckless husbands was urgently required, and he was not terrified at the epithet "revolutionary," remembering how systematically it was applied by hon. Gentlemen opposite to measures designed to improve the social condition of the masses. In the homes of many thousands in the manufacturing districts the passing of such a measure would be regarded as an inestimable boon.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he believed that what he was about to say would represent the feeling of a large portion of the population of Manchester. The hon. Member on the opposite side (Mr. Lopes) who moved the rejection of this Bill, said that there were not 5 per cent of the married women of England in favour of the Bill. But if he (Mr. Jacob Bright) was not misinformed, some ten years ago a very similar Bill was before the House, and on the question of the second reading received the votes of a large majority of the House. Such a result would imply a strong opinion in favour of the Bill out-of-doors. Some important petitions had been presented, and he himself had presented a petition from Manchester signed by 5,000 persons in favour of this Bill. If they had party organizations such petitions would not be remarkable; but when no such organizations existed these petitions showed that there must be very strong reasons indeed in favour of the measure. An hon. Member spoke of the great danger of such a change, and of the difficulty of reconciling it to the general laws of the country; but he (Mr. Jacob Bright) believed that the laws of England would have to adapt themselves to the feeling among the people of what was just, and he was never more certain of anything than that the principle on which this Bill rested would ultimately receive the assent of the great majority of the people of England. He did not happen to be in the position which had been referred to by an hon. Member in having married a woman with a much larger property than himself. He could not agree with the hon. Member in thinking such a position a degradation; but he certainly should think it a degradation if he took upon himself to spend such property without the consent of the person whom he believed to be the rightful owner. If the House agreed that it was a discredit to the husband to spend the money of the wife against her will, the wife ought to be in such a position as would prevent such a thing taking place. If, indeed, it could be shown that women were mentally incapacitated from holding and managing property to the advantage of themselves and their families, he would acquiesce in the existing disqualification; but it was impossible to endorse such a proposition when they remembered that widows and unmarried women who, unfortunately were more numerous in this than perhaps in any other civilized country, possessed the full control of their property and managed it successfully. No doubt there had been recent instances of women investing their money imprudently; but they had invariably been preceded by numbers of the other sex, and some of the leading commercial men in the country had been sharers in their misfortunes. It was pointed out by the late Mr. Cobden that women in France generally held the purse, and it was the opinion of that great statesman that they had certain moral qualifications which entitled them to hold the purse. This was not in any sense a party question, and he was sure that if the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) went to a division hon. Members on both sides of the House would be found in the same Lobby with him. It might be a class question, but it was not so in any disagreeable sense. It was a class question only in this sense—that women of the upper classes had already to a great extent protected themselves, and the object was to enable those in the lower ranks to do the same. It would be easy to bring many illustrations to show the hardships of the present state of things. But it was hardly necessary, because everyone knew that where no protection was given wrong was inevitable. It would not be necessary, for example, to prove that if there was no law against burglary, burglaries would be committed. If married women were not protected they would be sure to suffer wrong. A letter that had been placed in his hands from a lady in Manchester gave some striking instances of the cruel and oppressive operation of the present law. One was that of a woman who had a good business as a shopkeeper, and whose husband sold off her stock-in-trade and household furniture, which were her property before marriage, and went away to America, leaving her quite destitute. This led to an application to a magistrate; but the magistrate could only say he was sorry, but there was no remedy, as the husband had not exceeded his legal power. Another was the case of an elderly lady of considerable property in Manchester, who had married a much younger man than herself. Her husband wasted all her property and deserted her. She was taken to the workhouse and died there. If she had had the power she would doubtless when half her property had been squandered have secured the remainder. The letter further mentioned that a woman employed by the writer as a laundress told her that during her husband's life, when she earned a pound or two she dared not put it in the bank, but had to conceal the money.

Canada women had received the protection which was now sought to be given them by this Bill, and in some of the most important countries in Europe women were entitled to much greater protection than they received here. It was well-known that the husband could not alienate the wife's freehold; if, then, land which was the property of women should be secured to them, Consols and bank shares or cash should also be secured to them; and, on the other hand, if the husband had the right to spend the wife's money invested in railway or bank shares, or in the bank, he had just as much moral right to alienate the land and squander the value of the freehold. If there were one title to the possession of property stronger than another, it was that which attached to what a man had himself created; but to his mind property created or earned by a woman was still more sacred, because she had given a much larger portion of her life for every pound sterling she earned than a man would have to do. Nature had put barriers in the way of her earning her own subsistence, and the law, instead of assisting her weakness, denied her the commonest protection. If the Bill were not now passed, he believed that the time was not far distant when either this or a similar measure would be passed. It would be an act of justice to women and children; and there could be no such act which was not also an act of justice to men, for the children of one generation were the men of the next. With an increase of independence, such as the Bill would secure, there would is not the slightest occasion for minute details or technicalities. This is a large question which we have to consider. Now, the Common Law is that the personal property of married women, whether possessed before or acquired after marriage, is not hers at all, but the absolute property of her husband, and the land of a married woman is for the benefit of the husband during his life, in the event of his surviving her, or her property, in case there are children, in case of marriage, till his death. Is this not so? The question is not whether it is stated by the hon. and learned member for Colchester (Mr. Karslake), but whether this can be traced up to a long period of ages in the most barbarous times, and whether it has been confirmed and consolidated and built up into an inviolable question is, on what is that edifice founded? Is it founded on justice and right, on equality and fairness, or is it founded on injustice, tyranny, and oppression? Surely is a very simple question, and there is no need to talk about disturbing the order in families and about destroying the husband's influence over the wife. He is saying in so many words that he would put the whole property of a married woman into the hands of the husband, and that he, like this House, the power of the purse, supplies whenever he thinks fit, and there is no chance of concord or agreement in the marriage state. Let us not have considerations of this kind, but let us have to go to those which are of his reach by taking the property away and giving it to him all at once. That is the simple state of the law. Now show me what crime there is in matrimony that it should be visited with the same punishment as high treason—namely, confiscation, for that is really the fact. The property is as much confiscated and taken from the woman and her children by the husband as if she had committed a capital offence; it is gone from her for ever. It is for those who uphold this, not to talk about social strife, but to show how, on any principles of equity and justice, it can be justified. Now let us take the opinion of mankind on the subject. Suppose a girl has a considerable property, and that she has a father or a guardian, what, in the view alike of those who oppose and those who support this Bill, is the duty of the father or guardian? Clearly to make a marriage settlement in order to protect her property. Why so, if the Common Law is just? The common sense of mankind, the natural affections of mankind, the practice of mankind, utterly condemn this law, and its operation is systematically avoided by special contracts made to remedy its injustice. Every marriage settlement that is made is a tacit protest against it. Well, now, what is the duty of the law?—for we sitting here as legislators have just as much a duty to perform as fathers or guardians. The only occasion when our duty comes into play is when from any reason, whether accident or improvidence, no marriage settlement is made; and what ought we to do? Why, surely we ought to put ourselves in loco parentis, and show towards the persons we are bound to protect just the same feelings of kindness and beneficence, and the same wish to protect and spare them from injury, which the parent or guardian is bound to show to his child or ward. We cannot make the same provision that they can, because we do not know the circumstances of each case, and can only deal with cases generally; but I maintain that where a change of condition has not been provided for by special contract it is the duty of the law to make as just a settlement as it can for the generality. And what is the most just settlement? Is it to give over the whole of her property to her husband? Is that discharging the duty we undertake? We have Courts of Equity to temper the severity of the Common Law, and which themselves order a settlement to be made in certain cases. A ward of the Court of Chancery has a settlement made for her by decree of the Court; and if a woman have a legacy left to her after marriage the Court will compel the husband to make a small settlement upon her. That is an admission on the part of the Court of Chancery that the present law is unjust. Thus the practice of mankind and the voice of the higher Courts are alike against it. In ordinary cases we allow persons to retain the property to which they are entitled until a case is made out for depriving them of it. Is there no practical mischief arising from the present state of things? Observe this, that the mischief does not occur through the negligence of the parties, but through the action of the law, because a woman is in a condition to make terms after marriage as well as before. But the law steps in, and that which occurs is principally and primarily owing to the operation of the law. Cases sometimes occur in which a man without a shilling marries a woman with landed property. He becomes the tenant for his own life by the courtesy of England. He takes a dislike to her, he studies the law of cruelty, and having adopted a course which just prevents her from getting a judicial separation, he drives her from her home, and his children with her, to live in poverty, and almost in need, where they are unknown, while he keeps a great establishment, perhaps on her estate and at her expense, and is a great person in the county. And that is done not through her fault or negligence, but by the iniquity of the law, which puts it in his power to do this by taking her property from her, and enables him to fatten upon the spoils of her whom he has sworn to love and cherish. Then there is the very common case of the legacy left to the wife and taken and squandered by the husband. We are responsible for this if we allow these things to be done. Let us put aside all questions of social policy and marital rights, and ask ourselves whether anything can be shown to justify us in taking away property from one person and giving it, without any consideration, to another? We are actually giving a premium to a man to run away with a girl and marry her without the consent of her parents. If a man makes honourable love to a girl the matter is carefully looked to by her parents and guardians, and her property is settled upon her. But if a man can induce a young woman to leave her father's house and marry him her property becomes his absolutely, so that it is to the interest of the man to marry her without the knowledge of her parents and without settlement. For these reasons I cannot let this Bill pass a second reading without bearing my testimony to the flagrant iniquity of the present law. Should we make such a law for India, or any dependency into which we were introducing a law of marriage? The hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) says that a husband might use the property of his wife so as to get credit; but if a woman allowed her husband to use her property in business she would become a dormant partner, and her property would be fairly liable to pay the debts thus contracted. I trust that my hon. Friend will persevere with his Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, I agree that we ought not to discuss this question from a party point of view; but although it may be necessary to give greater protection to married women in the disposal of their property and earnings, the change proposed to be made in the law by this Bill is so great that in its present form I am not prepared to assent to it. The right hon. Gentleman says that women in the upper classes are protected by a settlement made before marriage, and that this is the best proof of the errors and wickedness of the Common Law. But marriage settlements are framed not only to protect the wife; but to take care that on her part she does not make away with the property and prevent the children of the marriage from being benefited by it. A marriage settlement is never made for the benefit and protection of the wife alone. Hon. Members who have argued in favour of this Bill have forgotten the extent of the change which it proposes to make in the present law. It is true that the wife gives up a certain amount of interest in her property to her husband, but what does she get in return? Perfect immunity from the debts contracted by herself. A wife may order goods for which her husband must pay. The Bill proposes to treat the married woman as if she were a feme sole. What is the object of so treating her? That if the husband falls sick or otherwise and the wife can make an income, she is to be entitled to prevent the husband from spending a single shilling she gets. The next consequence is that she must be entitled to be sued in her own name. But if you sue the wife for the debts she contracts are you to sue the husband also? The husband will still be liable for the debts she contracts, so that you will have an action brought against her, and the screw will be put upon the husband so that he must pay the debts or allow the wife to go to prison. Again, if the husband refuses to provide for his children, he is under a Common Law liability to maintain them. But by this Bill, even if the wife should be earning an income of £3, £4, or £5 a week, the Common Law liability will still attach to the husband to maintain his children, while the wife will be under no liability to contribute to their maintenance. After this we come to the property of the married woman. The principle laid down appears to be that if no settlement is made at marriage everything that is the wife's will remain hers. She may engage in any trade or speculation and the husband will have no control over it. I do not think that this would be a wise or a prudent law. The next clause is also objectionable. It has a retrospective effect, and clauses of this kind always require great care and attention. Up to this time persons have married on the assumption that the law will dispose of their personal estate as it has hitherto done. But the clause alters the law by enacting that—

“Every woman married before this Act has come into operation shall, notwithstanding her coverture, have and hold all the real and personal estate her title to which shall accrue after this Act shall have come into operation, free from the debts and obligations of her husband and from his control and disposition, in all respects as if she had continued unmarried.”

So that persons who have married on the assumption that the estate shall belong to the husband will find that the Bill makes an entire change in the rights enjoyed by the husband. The next clause enacts that—

“The earnings of a married woman in any trade or other occupation carried on by her separately from the trade or other occupation of her husband shall be deemed to be her personal estate.”

Then comes a clause the extent and scope of which the hon. Member cannot have observed. A husband is not to be liable “for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage, and shall not be liable in damages for any wrong committed by her.” What is the effect of that clause? The effect of making the wife a feme sole will be that if the lady drives out in a carriage with the servants under her own control and the carriage comes into collision with anything or anybody, she commits a wrong possibly against some one. But is the wrong committed by her or by her husband? You say that the wife acts as a feme sole, and whether she has a shilling of her own or not, you are to sue her and not her husband. If a husband supplies his wife with a horse and carriage, and a wrong is thereby committed, is not that a wrong that ought to be redressed by the husband? Then it is said that a great deal of suffering exists among the lower class of women in consequence of the present state of the law. But why should you alter the whole law of England to meet particular cases? The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) has told us of the number of persons who have petitioned in favour of this Bill. No doubt the persons who sign these petitions think that the wrongs of a certain class ought to be redressed or remedied; but they could not have known the extent of the change which it proposed to make in the law of this country. The 20 and 21 Vict. contains a clause to the principle of which I entirely assent, and which protects women of the poorer class in the enjoyment of their earnings. I would be the first to assist the hon. and learned Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) in extending the benefit of that law, and in giving protection to the poorer classes, but I protest against making a change in the whole law to effect this object. The Bill, in fact, proposes such an immense change in the law as to make it necessary in Committee to strike out a great number of the clauses. By the Act to which I have referred—the Divorce Act—a clause which has been productive of very beneficial consequences enacts that where the husband has deserted the wife she shall be allowed to go before a magistrate and obtain protection for the enjoyment of her earnings. It may be that this clause does not go far enough, and that in cases of cruelty or ill-treatment arising from dissipation some further protection may be necessary, but the powers of the Divorce Act might be extended without altering the entire law of this country. I think that this Bill would create a great social change, and that you are proposing by it to put a married woman on the same footing as a man. If she is to be entitled to her separate earnings she ought, at least, to be equally liable to maintain his and her family. If these and other necessary alterations are to be made the Bill would, I fear, require more consideration than can be given to it in the present Session. I have considered the subject without party feeling, but the Bill goes far beyond what the hon. Gentleman really wishes to effect, and a much simpler measure would meet the hardships which, no doubt, often occur among the labouring classes.

MR. J. STUART MILL: Perhaps, Sir, those who, like myself, support the extension of political rights to women, should desire the rejection of this Bill, because it is quite certain that its rejection would give an extraordinary impulse to the movement for giving the suffrage to women which has already advanced with so much vigour. But I confess that I should like my own sex to have the credit of giving up unjust and impolitic privileges before they are brought under the influence of other motives than their own good feelings. The debate has produced several most gratifying expressions of feeling, more especially the able and persuasive speech of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) and the logical and high-principled address of the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe). The hon. and learned Member for Colchester (Mr. Karslake) said with great truth that the real authors of the Bill are not present, and he seemed to think they must be persons in whose eyes any change in existing institutions must be an improvement. I am sorry the hon. Gentleman has left the House, as I could have informed him who some of those persons are. I do not suppose the hon. Gentleman was aware that among the persons whom he was condemning were those eminent socialists and revolutionists the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War; the noble Lord having been, along with that distinguished Judge, Sir Lawrence Peel, a member of the committee of the Social Science Association by whom the Bill was drawn up which was introduced into the House by Sir Erskine Perry; and the right hon. Gentleman having taken the chair at a public meeting held in support of its principles. The hon. Gentleman is aware that the right hon. Recorder of London (Mr. Russell Gurney) is a supporter of the Bill, because his name is on the back of it; but he seems to think that Gentleman's absence intentional, though, as a lawyer, it is strange he should not have known that the Recorder's absence is caused by his presiding in his Court. That conscientious and feeling Judge was very desirous of being present, and would, from his judicial experience, have put the House in possession of the real effects of the present law, and afforded to the Attorney General and the hon. Member for Colchester some information as to the true working of that power in the Divorce Act to which allusion has been made. It is only in cases of desertion that this power comes into exercise, and that the magistrate has power to make orders of protection; but cases are continually happening, some within my own knowledge, in which the husband just avoids the amount of desertion which would enable the magistrate to give protection to the wife. He stays away for a sufficient time to enable her to accumulate a small sum, and then lives with her just long enough to squander it. As, however, the Attorney General has expressed a willingness to extend and improve the operation of that Act, I trust that he will himself introduce a Bill on the subject. There has been, indeed, on the part of the Legislature a wonderful overlooking of the need of some such protection. Even in cases where the words "to her separate use" introduced by the Court of Chancery for the wife's protection, have been employed, the sole effect of the words is that the trustees cannot pay the income of the settled property except upon the wife's receipt. That is a perfect protection if the wife is living away from her husband; but if she is living with him, the money immediately becomes the husband's income, and he has a right to take it from her the moment she receives it. A large portion of the inhabitants of this country are now in the anomalous position of having imposed on them, without their having done anything to deserve it, what we inflict as a penalty on the worst criminals. Like felons they are incapable of holding property. And the class of women who are in that position are married women, whom we profess a desire to surround with marks of honour and dignity. It seems to be the opinion of those who oppose the measure that it is impossible for society to exist on a harmonious footing between two persons unless one of them has absolute power over the other. This may have been the case in savage times, but we are advanced beyond the savage state; and I believe it is not found that civilized men or women cannot live with their brothers or with their sisters except on such terms, or that business cannot be successfully carried on unless one partner has the absolute mastery over the other. The family offers a type and a school of the relation of superiors and inferiors, exemplified in parents and children; it should also offer a type and a school of the relation of equality, exemplified in husband and wife. I am not insensible to the evils which husbands suffer from bad and unprincipled wives. Happily the sufferings of slavery extend to the slave master as well as to the slave. But if you want to give the wife the strongest possible motive to strain to the utmost her claims against the property of her husband, what step more effectual for this object could be taken than to enact that she should have no rights of her own, and should be entirely dependent upon what she can extract from the husband? It is only by doing justice to people that we can hope to prevent their encroaching on the rights of others. Would the hon. Member for Colchester accept for himself exclusion from all rights of property, on condition that some one else should pay his debts, and make atonement for his wrongs? The Attorney General certainly hit the weakest part of the Bill when he pointed out that, if the rights of husband and wife were to be equal, their obligations ought also to be equal. If the Bill gets into Committee it will be necessary to alter some of the clauses so as to establish an obligation equally on both parties. The Bill will no doubt require a great deal of consideration, not so much in regard to the omission of any of the clauses as to the addition of others. It is very true that if the Bill passes, many other alterations of the law will be necessary; for when the law is founded on a bad principle much re-adjustment is necessitated by the adoption of a good one. But if it should please the House to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, there are hon. and learned Gentlemen on both sides of the House quite capable of proposing such alterations as will make the Bill work smoothly.

Mr. J. Stuart Mill

Mr. DENMAN said, he could only agree to support the second reading of this Bill on the understanding that the whole subject was then referred to the consideration of a Select Committee. As the Bill at present stood it contained much that neither accorded with the existing principles of the law, nor the social happiness of the community. Many changes would be required in the Bill; many clauses of great importance were doubtful; many fresh clauses would be required, and a large amount of law was involved in the discussion. The technicalities with reference to the subject, he need hardly say, were but little known to the majority of the Members of the House. He doubted if many hon. Members knew what the courtesy of England meant, which was to be reserved by the Bill. Nothing but a Select Committee would be a sufficient tribunal for the consideration of this Bill in the first instance; and this was so important a subject that it also ought to be understood that even after the Bill came back from the Select Committee hon. Members reserved to themselves the right to support or oppose any portions of it. For his own part he thought much more good would be effected by altering the 20 & 21 Vict. than attempting to pass so sweeping and mischievous a Bill as the present was in the shape in which it had been introduced to the House.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he thought it a pity the author of the Bill had not considered that question in connection with the marriage service. After the speech of the hon. Member for Westminster it was impossible that the marriage service could remain as it was. A woman could hardly say that she would love, honour, and obey a man when it was distinctly averred by the hon. Member for Westminster that she was to be a feme sole. Instead of the words hitherto used in the marriage service, the woman should in future say she was to enter into a partnership with the man on equal terms.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE pointed out that the noble Lord who had just spoken appeared to have forgotten that the words of the marriage service were not now in harmony with the existing law, because they declared that the husband endowed his wife with all his worldly goods, whereas, in fact, everything which the wife possessed became her husband's. The tendency of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Colchester (Mr. Karslake) reminded him very much of the lines in "The Taming of the Shrew," addressed by Petruchio to Katharina—

"I will be master of what is mine own :
She is my goods, my chattels ; she is my house,
My household-stuff, my field, my barn,
My horse, my ox, my ass, my anything."

The question before the House was, after all, one which ought to be discussed upon social grounds. The first point to be considered was whether the Common Law was just or not; and the second was whether the Bill he proposed would remedy the evils, or at least one which would not be accompanied by evils equal to those he sought to remove. If he wished to condemn the Common Law he had only to go to the Courts of Equity for that purpose. If they looked at the decisions of the Judges of those Courts they would find them constantly speaking of the severity of the Common Law, and they had introduced a system under which, by means of marriage settlements, all the wealthy classes really escaped from its operation. The system, however, of settlements and trusteeships was quite inapplicable to persons of small means, on account of the difficulties and expenses attending it. It was particularly, however, with reference to the labouring and poorer classes that the evil effects of the Common Law were to be perceived. Since the introduction of the Bill he had received a great number of communications pointing out cases of hardship arising from the law, but would not weary the House by reading more than one or two of them. In a letter which he had received from the Rev. Septimus Hansard, the rector of Bethnal Green—a clergyman of great experience among the labouring classes—the writer said—

"My own experience leads me to believe that to raise the social position of women among the lower classes, by securing to them their separate property, would be of great benefit. Cases come before me constantly of idle and profligate men taking the earnings of the industrious wife for their own selves. Not long ago I had to help a poor woman through her confinement, who had saved from her earnings a little money to meet this emergency. Her husband was a drunkard, and finding she had a supply, ascertained the source, and beat her in her weak condition in the most brutal manner until she delivered up her money. I do not think he would have done this if he had not known that legally the money was his own."

Mrs. Phillips of Manchester wrote to him that that subject excited much interest among the working classes, many of whom had signed petitions in favour of the Bill remark that they had near friends or relations who needed its protection. One married woman in signing the petition, said—

"I have a husband who is a clever workman, and can earn good wages when he pleases, but I go out as a daily cook and make money. This he takes from me, leaving me penniless whenever he chooses. So I have left him, and for the present taken refuge with friends who would put me into some way of earning money but for fear of his coming and seizing all."

He admitted that these were exceptional cases; but still they were numerous; and it should be remembered that laws were wanted to restrain not the good and generous, but those who were the very reverse. The remedy of protection orders, referred to by the Attorney General, was wholly inefficient, many poor women naturally objecting to apply to a magistrate against their husbands. The right thing to do was to repeal the Common Law, which gave everything the wife had to the husband. It was said the measure would introduce divisions into families; but the experience of its working in America refuted that assertion. During the last twenty years almost all the Northern States had legislated in that direction, and had now arrived at the very point at which he wished to place the law of England. That was the case especially in New England, where the principle of his Bill had been in operation twelve years; and in regard to that experiment in New England, he had received a letter from Judge Washbourne, once the Governor of a State, and now the Professor of Law in an American University, in which he said—

“It is now more than twenty-five years that the subject of the independent ownership by married women of their separate property has been a subject of consideration by our Courts and Legislatures, and the course of action has from time to time uniformly been in the direction of a more rather than a less independent right over their property by married women. I believe any attempt to go back to the Common Law would find little favour at this day. So far as my own observation extends, I have seen no mischievous consequences growing out of the change. It certainly makes wives more independent in the matter of property than the Common Law did. But I have never known it to breed discord or discontent in families; it often saves a family from the consequences of the recklessness or misfortunes of the husband or father by saving from the reach of the creditors the estate which belongs to the wife. I am free to say that although I regarded the first inroad upon the Common Law as to the rights of husbands in their wives' estates with apprehension that it would cause angry and unkind feelings in families, and open the door for fraud, so far as his creditors were concerned, I am so far convinced to the contrary that I would not be one to restore that Common Law if I could.”

Similar testimony was given by the head of one of the largest manufacturing firms in New England, and also from Mr. Dudley Field, the eminent jurist, of New York. The latter gentleman said that in the State of New York the law had been changed twenty years ago as regards property, but had been extended to earnings only six years. The only part of the Union in which the new system had not been adopted was the Southern States, where, since the emancipation of the negroes, great dissatisfaction had arisen from the state of the law. Formerly, marriage being illegal between slaves, what property the masters allowed the negresses to hold was their own; but when the slaves were set free, and got married in great numbers, it was found that the black men were very willing to see their wives work while they themselves remained idle, because the law, like our Common Law, gave them power over the wives' earnings. The result was that the rage for matrimony abated, the negresses preferring to remain single and enjoy their own property as they did before emancipation. He had heard it stated that in some of the manufacturing towns of our own country where women worked for high wages a similar phenomenon presented itself—a matter which those who felt strongly about the sanctity of marriage would do well to ponder. There were many collateral questions, such as the extent to which the wife should contribute to the expenses of the household, and others into which he could not then enter, but which had been carefully considered, and with which, whether in Committee of the Whole House, or in a Select Committee on the Bill, he would be prepared to deal. The clause with reference to tenants by courtesy he was ready to omit from the Bill. In conclusion, believing that the measure would confer a great boon on the labouring classes, he hoped the House would not refuse it a second reading.

Mr. Shaw-Lefevre

Question put, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

The House divided :—Ayes 123 ; Noes 123.

AYES.

Akroyd, E.	Craufurd, E. H. J.
Allen, W. S.	Crossley, Sir F.
Amberley, Viscount	Davenport, W. B.
Baines, E.	Davey, R.
Bass, M. T.	Davie, Sir H. R. F.
Bazley, T.	Denman, hon. G.
Beaumont, W. B.	Devereux, R. J.
Berkeley, hon. H. F.	Dillwyn, L. L.
Blake, J. A.	Dixon, G.
Bonham-Carter, J.	Dimsdale, R.
Brady, J.	Duff, M. E. G.
Bright, J. (Birmingham)	Dutton, hon. R. H.
Bright, J. (Manchester)	Edwards, H.
Browne, Lord J. T.	Ewing, H. E. Crum-
Bruce, rt. hon. H. A.	Fawcett, H.
Buxton, C.	Fildes, J.
Candlish, J.	Fordyce, W. D.
Cave, T.	Forster, C.
Cavendish, Lord F. C.	Forster, W. E.
Cheetham, J.	Gavin, Major
Childers, H. C. E.	Gibson, rt. hon. T. M.
Clay, J.	Glyn, G. G.
Clinton, Lord A. P.	Gorst, J. F.
Cowen, J.	Gray, Sir J.
Cowper, hon. H. F.	Grenfell, H. R.

Greville-Nugent, Col.	Peel, J.
Hadfield, G.	Percy, Mjr.-Gn. Lord H.
Hankey, T.	Pim, J.
Harcastle, J. A.	Pollard-Urquhart, W.
Headlam, rt. hn. T. E.	Potter, E.
Henderson, J.	Potter, T. B.
Holden, I.	Power, Sir J.
Hornby, W. H.	Price, W. P.
Hughes, W. B.	Pryse, E. L.
Hurst, R. H.	Ramsay, J.
Hutt, rt. hn. Sir W.	Robertson, D.
Ingham, R.	Roebuck, J. A.
Jervoise, Sir J. C.	Russell, A.
Kavanagh, A.	St. Aubyn, J.
Kinglake, A. W.	Samuda, J. D'A
Lawson, rt. hn. J. A.	Samuelson, B.
Leatham, W. H.	Sherriff, A. C.
Leeman, G.	Smith, J.
Lloyd, Sir T. D.	Smith, J. A.
Locke, J.	Smith, J. B.
Lowe, rt. hon. R.	Stacpoole, W.
M'Laren, D.	Synan, E. J.
Mainwaring, T.	Taylor, P. A.
Melly, G.	Thompson, M. W.
Mill, J. S.	Trevelyan, G. O.
Moffatt, G.	Vernon, H. F.
Moncreiff, rt. hon. J.	Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Monk, C. J.	Vivian, H. H.
Moore, C.	Waldegrave-Leslie, hon.
Morrison, W.	G.
Neate, C.	Watkin, E. W.
Nicol, J. D.	Whitbread, S.
O'Brien, Sir P.	White, J.
O'Connor Don, The	Whitworth, B.
O'Donoghue, The	Winterbotham, H. S. P.
Ogilvy, Sir J.
Padmore, R.
Parry, T.
Peel, A. W.

TELLERS.

Lefevre, G. J. S.
Martin, P. W.

NOES.

Antrobus, E.	Eckersley, N.
Ayrton, A. S.	Edwards, Sir H.
Barnett, H.	Egerton, E. C.
Barrington, Viscount	Eliot, Lord
Barttelot, Colonel	Feilden, J.
Bass, A.	Fellowes, E.
Beach, Sir M. H.	Fergusson, Sir J.
Beach, W. W. B.	Floyer, J.
Beccroft, G. S.	Galway, Viscount
Bentinck, G. C.	Garth, R.
Bernard, hn. Col. H. B.	Goldney, G.
Booth, Sir R. G.	Goodson, J.
Bruce, Sir H. H.	Gore, J. R. O.
Bruen, H.	Gore, W. R. O.
Calcraft, J. H. M.	Graham, W.
Carter, S.	Graves, S. R.
Cartwright, Colonel	Griffith, C. D.
Cave, rt. hon. S.	Grove, T. F.
Chambers, M.	Guinness, Sir A. E.
Clive, G.	Gwyn, H.
Cochrane, A. D. R. W. B.	Hamilton, Lord C.
Cole, hon. H.	Hamilton, I. T.
Cole, hon. J. L.	Hardy, rt. hon. G.
Corry, rt. hon. H. L.	Harris, J. D.
Cooper, E. H.	Hartley, J.
Cox, W. T.	Hay, Sir J. C. D.
Dalglish, R.	Henley, rt. hon. J. W.
De La Poer, E.	Herbert, rt. hn. gen. P.
Dodson, J. G.	Hildyard, T. B. T.
Dunne, rt. hn. General	Hodgson, W. N.
Dyott, Colonel R.	Holmesdale, Viscount

Horsfall, T. B.	Paget, T. T.
Hotham, Lord	Patten, rt. hon. Col. W.
Howes, E.	Pease, J. W.
Huddleston, J. W.	Powell, F. S.
Hunt, rt. hon. G. W.	Pritchard, J.
Karslake, Sir J. B.	Read, C. S.
Kekewich, S. T.	Russell, Sir C.
Kelk, J.	Slater-Booth, G.
Kendall, N.	Scourfield, J. H.
Keown, W.	Seymour, G. H.
Knatchbull-Hugessen, E.	Simonds, W. B.
Knight, F. W.	Speirs, A. A.
Lacon, Sir E.	Stanley, Lord
Laird, J.	Stronge, Sir J. M.
Lamont, J.	Sykes, Colonel W. H.
Langton, W. G.	Taylor, Colonel
Lefroy, A.	Thorold, Sir J. H.
Liddell, hon. H. G.	Tottenham, Lieut.-Col.
Lindsay, hon. Col. C.	C. G.
Lindsay, Col. R. I.	Turner, C.
Lopes, Sir M.	Turnor, E.
Lusk, A.	Vance, J.
M'Lagan, P.	Vandeleur, Colonel
Mahon, Viscount	Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.
Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.	Waterhouse, S.
Mayo, Earl of	Welby, W. E.
Montagu, rt. hn. Lord R.	Whitmore, H.
Montgomery, Sir G.	Williams, F. M.
Morgan, O.	Wise, H. C.
Morris, G.
Neville-Grenville, R.
Noel, hon. G. J.
Paget, R. H.

TELLERS.

Lopes, H. C.
Hogg, Lieut.-Col. J. M.

And the numbers being equal, Mr. SPEAKER stated that he should follow the wise rule usually adopted in similar cases, by giving the House a further opportunity of considering the merits of the Bill at a future stage, and accordingly declared himself with the Ayes.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on June 23, Committee nominated as follows: Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Mr. LOWE, Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY, Mr. HEADLAM, Mr. BAGGALLAY, Sir JOHN SIMEON, Mr. BEACH, Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Mr. AYRTON, Mr. GOLDNEY, Mr. BAINES, Mr. BENTINCK, Mr. JACOB BRIGHT, and Mr. POWELL:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

BURIALS (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 5.]

(Mr. Monsell, Mr. Sullivan.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Monsell.)

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, under existing circumstances, it was advantageous to proceed further with this Bill this Session? When it was under the consideration of the House last year, he (the Earl of Mayo) stated that he was favorable to its principle. Since then a considerable and influential deputation from the North of Ireland had waited upon the Lord Lieutenant and himself, and expressed themselves strongly in support of this measure. He (the Earl of Mayo) informed them that though he had declared himself in favour of the general principle of the Bill, he nevertheless thought that many alterations ought to be made in it before it became law. The question had, however, now assumed a different form. It was most probable that in the next Session a discussion would arise involving the very existence of the Church in Ireland. Seeing, then that such a measure was likely to be so soon discussed, he submitted to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell) that it would be more desirable to let the matter rest until the new Parliament had decided upon the great constitutional question, which would no doubt be shortly submitted to it. The grievance complained of in the present Bill was really, after all, not a very serious one. By the Act known as Lord Plunket's Act permission was given to persons of all creeds to bury, without asking leave of the incumbent, their dead in the burial-grounds to which the Bill related. Conditions were, however, imposed with regard to the burial service. In respect to the reading of any other burial service than that of the Established Church it was required that a formal application should be made to the minister of the parish for leave to read such service. But it was further provided that in case any incumbent should refuse to allow such interments, he should be obliged to state in writing to those who made application for permission his reasons for that refusal as well as to transmit a copy of those reasons to the Bishop of the diocese, so that the refusal could not be a matter of course, but must be based on sufficient grounds. Some hardships had, no doubt, arisen under the operation of the present law, and he by no means wished to defend the conduct of the incumbents in some of those cases; but, on the whole, the causes of complaint were very few, and under the circumstances to which he had referred he trusted his right hon. Friend would see the expediency of acceding to the appeal which he made to him for the postponement of the Bill.

MR. MONSELL said, he had no wish to re-open the discussion on the principle of the Bill, which the House affirmed on the second reading; but if the noble Lord had been present on that occasion he would have been aware that great hardship had been inflicted by the existing law, especially on the Presbyterians. It would be a great disappointment to the people of Ireland if immediate steps were not taken to provide against the continuance of the grievance of which they complained. In whatever way the question of the Established Church should ultimately be settled, he saw no reason for not proceeding with the Bill on the present occasion.

The Earl of Mayo

MR. NEWDEGATE denied that there was any case of hardship proved to justify the present Bill, except it was considered a hardship that the Roman Catholic priests—the arrogance of whose disposition was well-known—should be compelled to ask permission of the clergyman of the parish to read their burial service over their dead in the Protestant burial-ground, which was the property of the Church. He did not think that the project of the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his party for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Episcopal Church in Ireland would ever become law. But even supposing that it should become law, this property—like all the other property of the Church—would fall into the hands of the Executive, to be disposed of at the pleasure of Parliament. It appeared to him that the appeal of the noble Earl to the right hon. Gentleman opposite was reasonable. The right hon. Gentleman and his Friends either believed or did not believe that the property of the Irish Church would fall into the hands of the Executive, and if their anticipation was well-founded, Parliament would ultimately have the disposal of it in any way it deemed fitting. Then there was no reason for proceeding further with this measure. If they did not believe it their grievance amounted to this—that it was a degradation to the Roman Catholic priests to have to write a letter to the owner of a graveyard for leave to read the burial service over the remains buried in it. He looked upon this Bill as a part of the system of aggression to which the Church of England was now exposed. The people of this country were gradually conscious of the fact that, under the plea of grievance, aggression upon the rights and property of the Church was constantly perpetrated.

MR. SYNAN said, that the instances of hardships drawn from the North of Ireland alone had induced the House, on the second reading, to affirm the principle of the Bill. It was not so much the Roman Catholics as the Dissenters in Ireland who demanded this measure.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he could not see why the progress of the Bill should be at all affected by the question whether the Irish Church was or was not to be disestablished. In the former event the churches would, in accordance with the plan of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, still remain in the hands of the Protestant clergy, and there would in that case be the same need for such legislation as his right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick proposed as now.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Where Burials of Persons not belonging to United Church of England and Ireland take place in Burial Grounds of such Church, Priest, &c., of other denomination may perform Service).

MR. LEFROY moved the following Amendment in line 22, after "chapel," to insert—

"Nor within one hour before the commencement or after the conclusion of such celebration, nor during the time at which the incumbent or minister of such church or chapel, or any other minister or other ecclesiastical person, shall be performing the burial service in such churchyard or graveyard: Provided also, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize the burial of any dead body within the walls of any church or chapel, or within twelve feet of the outside of wall thereof."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MONSELL moved to insert, in line 23, after the word "chapel," the words—

"Nor during the performance of any other burial service in the said churchyard or graveyard."

LORD JOHN BROWNE moved to add at the end of the clause the words—

"Provided always, That nothing in this Act shall confer any right of burial where no such right already exists."

Amendments agreed to.

MR. VANCE moved an Amendment that a day's notice, in writing, of burial, should be given to the officiating minister of any such church or chapel.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

Provided always, That notice in writing of the day and hour at which such burial is intended to take place shall have been given by such priest or clergyman of such religious denomination one day at least before such burial to the officiating minister of such church or chapel, or shall have been left at his place of abode."—(Mr. Vance.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. MONSELL objected to the Amendment as unnecessary.

MR. HENLEY said, that when the second reading of the Bill was under discussion he pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman the necessity there was for providing some means to preserve order and prevent collision between parties of different religions. He thought the most ordinary feelings of decency would recommend such a course. Whether the present provision was the best adapted for that purpose he did not know; but he thought some provision ought to be adopted.

MR. CANDLISH was afraid that in certain circumstances the notice would be more likely to cause disorder than to prevent it, as in the case of the funeral being, however unavoidably, behind the time fixed.

MR. VANCE said, he would alter the word "burial" in his Amendment to "religious service."

Question put, "That the words, as amended, be added to the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 91; Noes 122: Majority 31.

MR. ORMSBY GORE said, it would certainly be necessary that some notice should be given, and he would propose the addition of the following words:—

"Provided always that notice in writing of the day and hour on which such burial is intended to take place shall be given to the police by such priest or clergyman at least twelve hours before such burial."

MR. LAWSON said, that the adoption of the Amendment would invite collision between contending parties.

MR. ORMSBY GORE intimated that if the right hon. Gentleman could effect the object he desired to accomplish in proposing the Amendment by the insertion of different words he would be perfectly satisfied.

SIR HENRY WINSTON-BARRON asked what was to be done in the case of a parish where there was no Protestant clergyman and no Protestant Church. That was the case of a parish in the county of Waterford.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that the Bill was only intended to apply to Protestant churchyards, and not to the case to which the hon. Baronet referred. Matters of this sort should not be hurried on for an ulterior purpose.

MR. VANCE said, it should be the object of all classes to prevent collision in the churchyards; and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell), as he had rejected the Amendment proposed, should bring up a clause of his own on the subject. A great deal of ill-feeling would be created, and a great deal of outrage would occur, should this Bill be passed in its present shape.

MR. MONSELL said, that he had already brought up a clause founded upon a suggestion made on the second reading by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) to prevent two funeral services going on at the same time. He felt the same interest as the hon. Gentleman in the preservation of law and order, and he thought that the means he had adopted for that purpose were sufficient. Was it to be supposed that any ministers of religion would take a course that would cause disturbance? There had not been any disturbance under the existing law, and he thought the danger of disturbance was not increased, but rather diminished, by this Bill.

MR. VANCE remarked that contending parties might unwittingly and without knowledge meet in the churchyards, and under such circumstances a collision would be inevitable.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

MR. LEFROY proposed to insert the following clauses after Clause 1:—

"It shall not be lawful for any person to enter the churchyard or graveyard attached or belonging to any rectory, vicarage, church, or chapel of such church, for the purpose of opening or making any grave in such churchyard or graveyard, or to open or make any such grave, unless such person shall be the sexton of such church or chapel, or shall be duly authorized thereto by the incumbent or minister of such church or chapel.

(Penalty for offences against this Act).

"Every person who shall offend against this Act shall be liable, upon a summary conviction for the same before any justice of the peace for the county, riding, division, liberty, city, borough, police district, or place where the offence shall be committed, to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds for every such offence."

Clause brought up and read the first time.

Mr. Darby Griffith

MR. MONSELL opposed the clause.

Question put, "That the Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 73; Noes 123: Majority 50.

MR. J. COLE moved the insertion of the following clause:—

"Nothing herein contained shall authorize the burial of any person not belonging to the United Church of England and Ireland in any churchyard or graveyard where heretofore no such burial has ever taken place, and when there exists within the parish another churchyard, graveyard, or burial ground in which persons not belonging to the United Church of England and Ireland can be buried under the provisions of this Act."

MR. MONSELL said, he had no objection to the clause.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE moved the following clause:—

(Form of burial service). :

"That it shall not be lawful for any priest or minister authorized by this Act to perform the burial service, to use any ceremonies, or perform any acts other than read, or say the burial service which it would not be lawful for a minister of the Established Church to use or perform."

He should have no objection to the addition of the words after "service" of "appertaining to the Church to which he belonged;" but he was anxious that it should not be able to be said that Members of the Established Church would allow the ministers of any religion, Hindoo, Mahomedan, or any other, to go to any churchyard and perform their objectionable rites there without the permission of the parish minister.

MR. MONSELL said, he concurred in the object the hon. Member had in view, but did not think the proposed clause would accomplish it. He hoped the clause would be withdrawn, and he would promise that a clause should be introduced to prevent the performance of anything beyond a regular burial service.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

INCLOSURE (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bill to authorize the Inclosure of certain Lands, in pursuance of a Special Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON and Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 163.]

POOR LAW AND MEDICAL INSPECTORS
(IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Earl of MAYO, Bill to extend the powers of Poor Law Inspectors and Medical Inspectors in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by The Earl of MAYO and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND.

INVESTMENT OF TRUST FUNDS SUPPLEMENTAL
BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HENRY B. SHERIDAN, Bill to supplement the Investment of Trust Funds Act, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HENRY B. SHERIDAN and Mr. AYRTON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 164.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, June 11, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2)*
(139); Lee River Conservancy* (140); Fairs*
(141); Salmon Fisheries (Scotland)* (142).
Third Reading—Sea Fisheries* (125), and passed.

ARMY CHAPLAINS BILL.—(No. 116.)
(The Earl of Longford.)

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee."—(The Earl of Longford.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he wished to make a few remarks, as, owing to a mistake, he had not been present on the occasion of the Bill being read a second time. The noble Earl (the Earl of Longford) then stated that the Bill had been submitted to him, and that he had intimated his general approval of it. Now, the main object of the measure undoubtedly had his entire approval; for it was highly inexpedient that the army chaplains should be subject to the control of the parochial clergy, and it was desirable that the army chaplains should be subject to some Bishop. Those two points were aimed at by the Bill, which, however, contained some provisions that called for very serious and careful consideration. One alteration which he had suggested in the 4th clause had not been introduced. That clause enacted that after any scheme for constituting a precinct or district had been laid before the Queen in Council, and there ratified—

"Such precinct or district shall thereafter be and be adjudged and taken to be, a Royal Peculiar, and shall be for all ecclesiastical purposes under the immediate and exclusive jurisdiction of the Crown."

What he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) had suggested was the insertion after "jurisdiction" of the words "of an ecclesiastical authority appointed by the Crown." This would make a great difference, as it would place the jurisdiction in proper hands. As regards Royal peculiars, it was very doubtful what authority was to be exercised. These matters were of no slight importance, and he trusted, therefore, that they would be carefully considered in Committee.

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL thought very great inconvenience would arise from the establishment of Royal peculiars—indeed, all recent legislation, as far as he had observed, had been to diminish these exemptions from regular ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It was very difficult even for ecclesiastical lawyers to define exactly what they were, and certainly the establishment of Royal peculiars in the way apparently contemplated by some of the clauses of the present measure was wholly unprecedented. He trusted therefore their Lordships would give their serious consideration to those provisions of the Bill. He was still unconvinced that the Bishop of the diocese in which these districts were situate was not the authority with whom the Crown ought to communicate when necessary. In his opinion, there was no need to go further in order to carry out the general principles of this Bill than to make the districts within which it was desired the chaplains should officiate extra-parochial, and to leave them subject to the general authority of the Bishop of the diocese. The 6th and 7th clauses provided for the appointment of army chaplains by the Secretary of State, and defined the limits within which they were to officiate. Thus far no one could object; but there was no reason why the Bishop of the diocese should not, in case of any offence being committed against the laws ecclesiastical, be invited by the authorities of the Crown to exercise the powers with which he was legally invested. Nay, more, the general authority of the Bishop of the diocese, especially in spiritual matters, ought clearly to be considered. In such a practical matter as confirmation, for example, it was surely desirable that the Bishop of the diocese, and not a Bishop coming from without should administer the rite to the persons who needed it in these districts. Thus, then, he saw no reason whatever why their Lordships should not be content to establish extra-parochial districts, reserving to the Crown the power of appointment under the 6th and 7th clauses, and leaving the Bishop of the diocese with his general episcopal powers to be called in when needful.

EARL GREY was understood to express a doubt that the position of the Presbyterian military chaplains might be unfavourably affected by the Bill.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, the Bill applied only to consecrated not to unconsecrated buildings. The Bill was not intended to exempt military chaplains from episcopal jurisdiction; but on the contrary to provide for them more effectual superintendence. It was the privilege of every incumbent to have his own Bishop and his own diocese. But the case of the army chaplains was an exception; they were a moveable body, and they complained—as they had complained for years—that they were in the special care of no one; that there was no Bishop to whom they could look up for advice and guidance. He did not think that that would be remedied by placing them under the jurisdiction of the several Bishops in whose diocese the stations might happen to be placed. His own suggestion had been that all the camps and barracks, should be made peculiars under the charge of one Bishop—of the Bishop of London, for instance. But a Bishop of London might find that a jurisdiction over so widely scattered a body might be too much in addition to his ordinary diocesan duties. He had, therefore, come to the conclusion that the plan proposed by the Bill was the best—namely, to make each district or precinct a Royal peculiar, leaving it to the Crown to appoint any Archbishop or Bishop to be dean of the peculiar to whom the Secretary of State might refer any matter that might arise touching the ministrations of the army chaplain within it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR desired to remind their Lordships that until recently we had not had in this country extensive military stations or camps. But in every other country, where there was a connection between the Church and State, an encampment in the field was exempted from the ordinary territorial jurisdiction of the episcopacy. Under the jurisdiction of the Crown, some Bishop, generally a suffragan, was appointed to perform episcopal duties in respect of the encampment. There were three sorts of “peculiars”—a Royal peculiar, an Archbishop’s peculiar, and a Bishop’s peculiar. The result of making the English encampments Royal peculiars would be that the peculiar jurisdiction would be exercised by a Bishop, whom the Crown would appoint dean of the Royal peculiar. Having a Bishop so appointed by the Crown would secure uniformity in the exercise of episcopal jurisdiction over the army chaplains. Besides, there would be the difficulty in vesting the jurisdiction in the Bishop of the diocese that an encampment, if extensive, might be in two dioceses. The Amendment on the 4th clause, suggested by the most rev. Primate, could be considered in Committee.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he was of opinion that the object of the measure was a good one; but, after listening to the explanation of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, it appeared to him that the fundamental conception of the Bill was at variance with the whole of the Church system in this country. He could not understand what were the difficulties this Bill was framed to meet, nor could he see what injury would be inflicted by having the army chaplains placed under the control of the Bishop in whose diocese they might happen to be stationed. It was said that they were liable to be removed from one diocese to another. The same might be said of all curates. It was suggested that great inconvenience would arise from the introduction of different rules. If, indeed, there was room for individual action on the part of the Bishops he could see that inconvenience might arise from different rules existing together. But this was not so. The only subject of appeal to the Bishop as against the clergyman would be some breach of ecclesiastical discipline; but the determination of such a question would be governed by ecclesiastical law, and would not depend upon rules made by any particular Bishop. There was, therefore, no gain in creating for this purpose a wholly new machinery. The object of the Bill was not that the chaplains should be removed from the power of the Ordinary, but that they should be removed from the power of the common Ordinary, and put under the jurisdiction of another. The system of peculiars was one which we had inherited from the days of the Papacy. The Pope claimed the right to remove the power of the Ordinary from the Bishop in whom it had been vested and to confer it on another authority—on religious houses in some instances; but it would be a new thing for Parliament to step in and exercise the semi-spiritual power of removing army chaplains from the power of their proper Bishop and putting them under the control of another—we should then have the spectacle of one of our Bishops exercising episcopal power in the diocese of another prelate. Let them take the case of the great camp at Aldershot. It was in the diocese of Winchester, and the Bishop of that diocese looked upon himself as the Bishop of the camp, confirmed the soldiers' children, and performed other episcopal functions there; and another Bishop could not be introduced without a grievous interruption to the whole system of the Church. And the only reason assigned for this interference was that given by his most rev. Friend (the Archbishop of York) that the army chaplains were not now in a position where they could look for the same amount of episcopal patronage as other curates. [The Archbishop of YORK: No, no! I said "advice and guidance."] As to the argument drawn from the fact that the chaplains were liable to be moved about from one station to another, that was no more than happened to the other curates of the Church. It was no uncommon thing for a curate to be in his diocese one week and in that of London on the week following. That being the case, he could not see that the fact that, like all curates, they were liable to removal should prevent the army chaplains from being placed under the spiritual jurisdiction of the Bishop of the diocese, to whom they might apply for advice and guidance. But it was said that the War Office would be put to great difficulty in having to communicate with so many different persons. He did not see what it would have to communicate with them for. The War Office appointed the army chaplains, moved them from one encampment to another, and removed them from their appointments if necessary. These things were not in the hands of any Bishop; they were in the hands of the War Office, and the exigency of the case required that they should be so. Except the War Office meant to transfer its authority in these matters to the Bishop of the diocese, he did not see that there would be any communication between that Department and the Bishops unless in the rare case of a breach of ecclesiastical discipline being alleged, when the decision would be in accordance with settled ecclesiastical law. He knew that the Bishop of Winchester appreciated most highly the opportunity which the episcopal functions exercised by him in the camp at Aldershot gave him of doing good among Her Majesty's troops, and would be most sorry to be deprived of it. He repeated that he did not see why the army chaplains should not be placed under the spiritual jurisdiction of the Bishop of the diocese; but, at the same time, he thought they ought to be extra-parochial: the clergyman of the parish should have no power to interfere with them in the discharge of their duty as chaplains to the army. He was satisfied that the Bill ought to be confined to that point alone—all the rest might more conveniently be done by the Bishop of the diocese than by any other authority.

The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he was glad this discussion had taken place, for the subject was an extremely difficult one; but he could not help thinking that there was another view of the matter than that which his right rev. Brother (the Bishop of Oxford) had just put forward; and that if some of the parochial clergy could be present to look after their interests, they would be able to show as conclusively that it was improper for a place to be taken out of a parish as the Bishops had shown that it should not be taken out of a diocese. As to the evil of peculiars, in the system of the Church of England there were peculiars at the present moment. There was one very notable instance just over the way. Westminster Abbey was a peculiar, and a peculiar it was likely to remain to the end. His right rev. Friend would no doubt remember that there was a time when the Bishop of the diocese proposed to reduce it within his jurisdiction; but he was met by a certain formidable Dean of Westminster, who came forward and successfully defended the rights of his Chapter, and a peculiar it was allowed to remain. And that was not the only instance of a peculiar; for if he rightly read the law, every Bishop's house in which he resided as his see-house outside of his diocese was his peculiar, and was not under the control of the Bishop of the diocese; so that the Bishop of Winchester, who had a house opposite his in St. James's Square, lived in his own peculiar, and not under his (the Bishop of London's) jurisdiction. Then there were several Royal peculiars in London. His venerable predecessor when he resigned the see, still continued, by Her Majesty's request, to hold the office of Dean of the Chapels Royal, and continued to exercise his authority with great benefit to all connected with the Chapels Royal; and he had never heard any doubt expressed as to the legality of that course. No doubt, the tendency of recent legislation had been to diminish these peculiars, but that was only on the ground of their inconvenience; and if their Lordships found that, in the present instance, it would be a convenience to create peculiars, the same reason that was good for abolishing them would be good for sanctioning them. The question was—whether there was any other equally efficient way of attaining the proposed object? It might be said that the chaplains of prisons and workhouses were in the same position as army chaplains. But the cases were not parallel. From correspondence which he had held with army chaplains, he knew that they felt a great want of episcopal authority to whom they could refer; they considered themselves treated to some extent as civilians and wished to be recognized in their ecclesiastical status. Correspondence from one of these gentlemen reached him one day from Woolwich and another day from Hounslow; the very nature of their office rendering them liable to be moved continually from diocese to diocese. It was true that the clause did not in terms refer to consultation with a Bishop; but the reference to the jurisdiction in case of offences carried with it the meaning that the dean of the peculiar was to be the Bishop to whom army chaplains were to have access upon all questions of difficulty. What they wanted was some one Bishop whom they could consult on all emergencies, and they would not have the same feelings if they were to be brought into relations with every Bishop in England. Neither did he see how the business of the War Office was to be conducted if a correspondence were to be carried on with the Bishops of all the dioceses in which army chaplains might happen to be placed for a few days.

The Bishop of London

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, seeing that every speaker had differed from the other as to the precise manner in which an object upon which they were all agreed should be carried out, suggested that the Bill should be placed in the hands of a Select Committee, who would soon agree as to the best mode of rendering the details of a valuable measure generally acceptable.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not agree with his noble Friend. The differences of opinion to which expression had been given were confined to a single point, which he thought their Lordships could decide quite as well in the House as in a room up-stairs. The sole point was whether jurisdiction over these army chaplains should be reposed of necessity in the Bishop of the diocese where the camp was situated, or in a Bishop to be assigned by the Crown. With reference to the argument of his right rev. Friend (the Bishop of London), it had always seemed to him that a very strong case was capable of being made for the minister of the parish in which the camp was established, the army chaplain being well paid for his services among the military, while the parish clergyman, who received no extra pay, had thrown upon his hands the followers and off-scourings of the camp. But if the necessity of the case compelled them to disregard strict rights, and even inconvenience to the minister of the parish, the argument as to interference with the diocese could hardly be insisted upon. As to episcopal superintendence over a number of peculiars, that difficulty had to be met and surmounted already. He understood that in the province of Canterbury there were as many as 100 peculiars. [The Archbishop of CANTERBURY was understood to dissent.] Well, at all events, a considerable number. After all, the whole question resolved itself into one of work, and whether it was not better to subject all army chaplains to a common head.

EARL STANHOPE said, he thought the matter was one which might be very conveniently considered in a Select Committee.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK thought it was quite unnecessary to refer the Bill to a Select Committee; the point in dispute was fundamental and very narrow; their Lordships could express an opinion on it at a moment's notice without any inquiry whatever.

EARL NELSON said, he did not think that any one of the episcopal Bench could possibly find time to supervise the military chaplains over the whole country. It would be quite a different thing if it were proposed to make the Chaplain General a Bishop, and give him episcopal jurisdiction over these chaplains.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD urged that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM suggested that the debate be adjourned. The Under Secretary for War (the Earl of Longford) had been compelled to be absent from sudden severe indisposition, and had asked him to take charge of the Bill; but it was evident his noble Friend was at the time unaware of the views of the Bishops on some portions of the measure. The points raised were very important, and as he had not ascertained the opinion of the War Department on them, he thought it best to suggest the postponement of the Order until to-morrow, when he hoped to be better furnished with the views of his noble Friend. Considerations of a legal nature, he believed, made it unadvisable to put off the Bill until Monday. He moved that the debate be adjourned.

LORD REDESDALE suggested that all proposed Amendments be printed, that their Lordships might better understand the rather complex issues raised.

Further debate adjourned until To-morrow.

SALMON FISHERIES (SCOTLAND) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law relating to Salmon Fisheries in Scotland—Was presented by The Duke of Richmond; read 1st. (No. 142.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, June 11, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Registration (1868); Ecclesiastical Commissioners*; Drainage Provisional Order Confirmation.*

First Reading—Registration (1868)* [167]; Ecclesiastical Commissioners* [168]; Drainage Provisional Order Confirmation* [169].

Second Reading—Local Government Supplemental (No. 3)* [121]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 4)* [159]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 5)* [160].

Referred to Select Committee—Local Government Supplemental (No. 3)* [121].

Committee—Boundary [78]; Court of Chancery and Exchequer (Ireland) Fee Funds* [146]; R.P.; Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement (Loans) Act Amendment* [133]; Duchy of Cornwall Amendment (on re-comm.)* [136].

Report—Boundary [78-165]; Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement (Loans) Act Amendment* [133]; Duchy of Cornwall Amendment (on re-comm.)* [136].

Considered as amended—Representation of the People (Scotland) [166]; Consecration of Churchyards Act (1867) Amendment* [152]; Voters in Disfranchised Boroughs* [128].

EGYPT—THE VICEROY AND THE SOCIÉTÉ D'AGRICOLE.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been called to a statement made in the City Article of The Times of June 6, relative to the conduct of the Viceroy of Egypt towards the shareholders of the Société Agricole et Industrielle d'Egypte, if that statement be correct; and, inasmuch as the Government of the Viceroy is now trying to raise a loan in this Country, whether Her Majesty's Government have any objection to state the steps they have taken on behalf of British subjects who have been thus treated?

LORD STANLEY, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the statement in the City Article of The Times of June 6, alluded to by the hon. and learned Member, and he (Lord Stanley) had received representations on the same subject from a company calling itself the Egyptian Commercial and Trading Company of London, and also from other parties. In consequence of those representations, Colonel Stanton had been instructed to bring the matter under the attention of the Egyptian Government. All the papers connected with the subject were in the hands of the Law Officers of the Crown, and at present he could not answer more in detail.

ARMY—MILITIA QUARTERMASTERS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has had under his consideration the grievance under which Quartermasters of Militia suffer by not being allowed any retiring allowance or pension, some of them having served their Country for upwards of fifty years; and whether he will remedy this by a Clause in the Militia Pay and Clothing Act?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that the case of the quartermasters of Militia had been very frequently brought under his notice; and there were several instances, undoubtedly, in which not only hardship to individuals, but considerable inconvenience to regiments, arose from the great age at which some of those gentlemen arrived in consequence of not having the power to retire on a pension or retiring allowance. He therefore quite admitted that the case required some consideration; but he could not consent to remedy the grievance in the way suggested by his hon. and gallant Friend. It would be a very irregular mode of proceeding if he were to attempt to increase the expenditure of the country by introducing such a clause into an annual Act of the kind.

THE FOREIGN CATTLE MARKET. QUESTION.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the five Foreign Cattle Market Commissioners who may be appointed under the provisions of the Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market Bill are to be paid out of monies to be provided by Parliament; and whether, in case the Commissioners should be the market authority, and the market should not pay its expenses, it is intended that the deficiency shall be charged upon the public Revenues; and, whether he proposes to introduce a Money Clause in the Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market Bill to provide for the above charges?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that he understood from the Privy Council that they supposed the Foreign Cattle Market would be self-supporting. At all events, he did not propose to place any sum on the public expenditure, either for the payment of the Commissioners or the expenses of the market.

EGYPT—QUARANTINE.—QUESTION.

SIR J. CLARKE JERVOISE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, seeing that the Egyptian authorities have removed the quarantine restrictions on arrivals from Abysssinia, Whether the impediments to the navigation between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean have been removed; and whether the Correspondence on the subject with the Turkish Government will be distributed, and when?

LORD STANLEY, in reply, said, he did not see any close affinity between the two Questions put by the hon. Baronet; but he might observe that those restrictions, although they had been modified, in favour of our troops returning from Abyssinia had not been removed altogether. With regard to the impediments to the navigation between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean, he had stated some weeks ago that representations upon the subject had been addressed to the Turkish Government, but he had as yet received no answer to those representations. When the Correspondence was concluded, he would be prepared to lay it before the House.

DUNSTABLE ROAD.—QUESTION.

COLONEL W. STUART said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the Provisional Order, in the case of the Dunstable Road, referred to in page thirteen of the Seventeenth General Report on Turnpike Trusts, fixes a day for the expiry of the Local Act of 1821; and, if not, if he will include such Local Act in the Fourth Schedule of the Continuance Act, so that the parishes and parties at the cost of maintaining the road may have the opportunity of stating their grievance to the Select Committee on the Continuance Act?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he must complain of the inconvenience of putting Questions with respect to Committees on Bills which stood for Committee a week hence. With respect to the Dunstable Road case, that, inasmuch as the debts were between £3,000 and £4,000, the local Act could not be included in the Fourth Schedule of the Continuance Act.

COURTS OF JUSTICE—NATIONAL GALLERY.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is true that Mr. Street has been appointed architect of the Law Courts, and Mr. Edward Barry of the National Gallery; and, if so, whether those gentlemen have been informed of their appointment; and whether it is proposed by Her Majesty's Government to ask the House for Votes on account towards the erection of those buildings?

Mr. SCLATER - BOOTH: Sir, it is not only true that Mr. Street has been appointed architect to the Courts of Justice, but he has received official notice of his appointment. Mr. Edward Barry has also been appointed architect for the National Gallery, and has received private notice of his appointment, but I believe the official letter has not yet reached him. A Vote has been taken for acquiring the site of the National Gallery, and no other Vote will be taken this year. I also laid on the Table an Estimate, and afterwards took a Vote on account of the site for the Courts of Justice; and I believe no further Vote will be required within the present Session, but it is possible some small sum may be required at a future period.

Mr. BOUVERIE said, he wished to ask whether the hon. Gentleman will lay the Papers connected with the subject on the Table?

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH replied that they had been already moved for by the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck).

AGRICULTURAL LABOUR, &c.

QUESTION.

Mr. FAWCETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Reports of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the condition of Persons employed in Agriculture will be ready for publication; and also to ask a similar Question in reference to the Report of the Commissioner appointed to inquire into the operation of the Print Works and Bleach Works Act?

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that he had been informed that both those Reports would in all probability be laid on the table before the end of the Session.

SIR CHARLES DARLING.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether there is any truth in the Reports which have appeared in the public journals that Sir Charles Darling has withdrawn his letter announcing his retirement from the public service, with a view to receiving a pension under the Colonial Governors Act?

Mr. ADDERLEY: It is true, Sir, and will appear in the promised additional Victoria Papers, that Sir Charles Darling has written to express his wish to retract his relinquishment of the Queen's service, which, he had been told, must be the inevitable concomitant of his accepting any grant from the Colony.

REGISTRATION BILL.—LEAVE.

FIRST READING.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY: In moving for leave to bring in a Bill to facilitate the registration for the present year, I will endeavour to notice as briefly as possible the details which it will be necessary to lay before the House. Hon. Members are aware there are a great many steps which have to be taken with a view to the registration of voters, both in counties and boroughs, beginning with the step which was taken yesterday—namely, the issuing of precepts to overseers, giving them instructions how to proceed. From that time various steps have to be taken by overseers and other public officers until the publication of the list upon the 1st of August. First there are notices issued on the 10th of June persons are to send in claims; these claims have, in the ordinary course, to be sent in on or before the 20th of July, and by the last day of July overseers have to revise the register and prepare the list of claims, in order to publish such list on or before the 1st of August. I am speaking now of counties; but the preliminaries in boroughs are in many respects the same, though more steps have to be taken. After that there is the publication of the list for a fortnight, including two Sundays, to allow persons to inspect it, and then come the objections. Practically, therefore, we may say that the time is fully occupied until the end of August or the beginning of September. At present the revision commences in boroughs on the 15th, and in counties on the 20th of September, and it is necessary that some time should elapse between the publication of the lists and the commencement of the revision, in order to allow of communications between Revising Barristers and the clerks of the peace, and others, as to the time which will be occupied in particular places. The revision, therefore, cannot begin immediately after the publication. In considering the question how far it is possible to shorten the interval between the dates at which the various steps or processes are fixed, I confess that I have felt there is very little opportunity of shortening those occupied in the preliminary making out of the lists. So many persons are affected by them; and the House must remember that we have disfranchised seven boroughs, which cannot be put into the counties until the Scotch Reform Bill has received the Royal Assent, because the disfranchisement will not till then have been completed, and therefore time must be given to send in claims in those cases. Moreover, until the Boundary Bill is passed, it is not certain with respect to many voters whether they will be within counties or boroughs. In those cases, again, time must be allowed, and under these circumstances it appears to me—the question will be for the consideration of the House in Committee—that there is no possibility of shortening with advantage that which is preliminary to everything, the thorough making out of the lists, so that everybody who is entitled may have an opportunity of making their claims, and everybody also may have opportunities of objection equal to those which are given under present circumstances. Probably, with increased numbers, at least as much time will be required as at present, and I have not attempted to shorten it. I propose, therefore, that the revision shall commence both in counties and boroughs on the 14th of September. I have taken that day, because at least one Sunday must intervene for the purpose of publishing the lists, and though it might possibly be done by the 7th or 8th, it is more advisable to compress the revision; for you can multiply the Revising Barristers more easily than you can interfere with the voters, who are not so capable of taking care of themselves, and might fall into mistakes. It seems to me, therefore, most advisable to compress the revision, and I think that with an increased number of Revising Barristers, three weeks will be sufficient. I have proposed in the Bill an addition of one-third to the number; but that will be for the consideration of the House, and possibly the best plan will be to enable the Judge who remains in town to appoint additional barristers where they are wanted, for the Judges on circuit go abroad or to different parts of the country as soon as their labours are finished. It seems advisable, therefore, to place in the hands of the Judge who remains in town the power of sending additional Barristers, upon the application of other Revising Barristers,

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

where there is a pressure of business, so as to complete the revision within the time I have stated. One of the great difficulties hitherto in connection with the completion of the lists has been that, in consequence of the necessity of numbering the lists from the beginning to the end, the printing could not be begun until the whole revision was complete. If, however, Revising Barristers are allowed either to number by parishes and send in parishes to the clerk of the peace as they are completed, or to number by polling districts and send them in as they are completed, the printing might be begun almost within a day or two of the commencement of the revision, so that both might proceed together; and though so long a time as the present could not be allowed for printing, it might be completed by the last day of October, thus allowing from the 14th of September to the last day of October. Having got so far, and the lists being completed, the next step will be to let them get into the hands of the public for the necessary purposes of the elections. I think it would not be proper to issue the writs immediately on the publication of the lists. It seems to me that at least seven or eight days should elapse; that interval, however, I think, would be sufficient, because we all know that registration agents more or less supply themselves with the lists beforehand, and that they know a good deal about the results of the registration before the lists are actually published. I should also propose that, instead of thirty-five days being required between the proclamation and the meeting of the new Parliament, that period should be reduced to twenty-eight days. In that way, it seems to me, the new Parliament might assemble by the 8th or 9th of December. There would then be sufficient time to swear in the Members in the course of that week, so that on the 14th of December we might proceed with whatever business the House might think proper to take. For my own part, I wish the meeting of Parliament could be still more expedited; but I do not believe that, with justice to the voters, it is possible further to facilitate matters. It would not be just to shorten the time in which the voters are to send in their claims, especially when it is considered that we have not settled by Act of Parliament who are to be the voters in the counties in which we have disfranchised the seven boroughs, and who cannot come into the list as county voters until the

Scotch Bill is completed. Also the claims of lodgers must be considered. The consideration of these will not begin until late, and they will take more time than is usually occupied. I have not felt that I could recommend the House to cut off any period of the time allowed for claims; but with respect to the revision, printing, and proclamation, I really believe that in the way I have suggested matters may be expedited. What, after all, is it that the House requires? The House wishes that a decision should be come to as early as possible as to whether or not certain principles are to prevail in the ensuing Parliament. Well, we wish also for as early a decision as possible, and I believe it might be arrived at in time to allow hon. Members to get to their homes again before Christmas. This would also allow—what I think would be only justice to any Ministry, whichever side might be in power—six or seven weeks to prepare for the meeting of Parliament in February, and to decide on the measures they might think proper to propose in the course of the Session. I can assure the House that I really believe this can be done, and I have brought forward what I believe are the most feasible means for bringing it about. There may, I am aware, be an objection that there will be no appeal from the Revising Barristers to the Court of Common Pleas. It must be remembered, however, that an appeal can only be allowed by the Revising Barrister; and I believe that in such cases the names are almost always inserted on the list, and that if an election comes on those persons may vote, the subsequent decision of the Common Pleas in no way affecting the validity of such votes. Nothing material, therefore, depends upon the hearing of appeals. If the House wishes for more information as to the details, I am prepared to give it. With regard to the Bill, I propose to fix the second reading for as early a day as the House will permit, and immediately afterwards to refer the Bill to a Select Committee to examine the details. That examination would not, I believe, occupy more than a few hours, and thus we might arrive as rapidly as possible at the object which we all have in view. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) proposed a preliminary inquiry; but by referring the Bill to a Select Committee I think there will be more prospect of coming to a definite and reasonable conclusion than in any other way. There are some small Amendments in the Bill which I need not enter into until the second reading. The object of them is to effect certain improvements in matters connected with registration, and to get rid of certain doubts which have been raised. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: The statement of the right hon. Gentleman, although very brief, has been perfectly clear and intelligible; and we have likewise come to the subject with very great advantage on account of some previous discussions which have brought all the points of it with considerable clearness to the minds of hon. Members. As far as I am able to judge, the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman has been conceived with an earnest desire to meet the two great objects that are in view. In the first place it gives full and ample time for the registration of voters, and to make an arrangement that would run no serious risk of interfering with the legal and formal exercise of those electoral rights which have been conceded by statute to the people of this country to take part in the election of representatives. If the right hon. Gentleman entertains a doubt—and I think there is great ground for doubt—whether the previous stages down to the commencement of the revision can be shortened, he has certainly erred on the safe side—if I may so speak—in leaving perfectly intact all the time now allowed for the completion of those lists. Diligence will be required, and in a degree even greater than usual, on the part of the officers concerned, on account of the augmented number of electors; but we have no reason to doubt that that diligence will be shown. With regard to the subsequent stages, I think the plan of the right hon. Gentleman is a good one, and that by an inquiry before a Select Committee the expenditure of considerable time will probably be saved in the House itself. If that were done, it would enable the House to carry this bill through its various stages without any lengthened discussion. It is plain that we are all agreed upon its objects—first, the facilitation of the registration, and, secondly, a dissolution of Parliament at as early a period as possible. The right hon. Gentleman has himself given what is really the most conclusive practical reason for desiring an early dissolution. We are going to submit a very great issue to the country. We have been compelled, in consequence of the necessity for submitting that issue, to main very considerably the objects of the present Session. The Government have, with very great propriety, withdrawn important measures which they had prepared for the consideration of Parliament; and it is possible that they may likewise have to withdraw other important measures. Now, if this heavy arrear of business is to pass over until 1869, and if that year is to bring—as every year does bring—its own great and proper subjects for discussion, it is most important that the Administration which is to be responsible for the general conduct of the business of the country should have some time for the preparation of the measures to be submitted. And that observation applies quite as much to the present Administration—supposing that the verdict of the country should be favourable to them—as to any other Administration which may take their places. I am quite sure, from old experience, that it will not be practicable for the Government to make much progress either in the preparation of the Estimates or their measures until they know whether they are to be the parties responsible for carrying them through. So far as I am concerned—and I venture to say it is an opinion generally shared on this side of the House and in other places—I think it will be for the general convenience to fix on the earliest possible day for the second reading of the Bill, after we have seen the Bill and have had one or two days to consider its details; so that it may pass through the ordeal of a Select Committee. When it has assumed the best form of which it is capable, we can then enter upon a discussion of the provisions of the Bill. For my own part I shall be ready to use every effort to forward the progress of the measure.

MR. BOUVERIE: I think I am entitled to say that the remarks I made a few weeks ago as to the possible date at which the new Parliament might assemble were not conceived altogether in that unjust spirit towards the Government which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government on a subsequent occasion chose to assert. He said that my suggestions were conceived in a sceptical spirit, and that my conclusions were not to be depended upon. But the Home Secretary has now come just to the same conclusion as myself, within a day or two, as to the date at which it will be possible to take a dissolution of Parliament. There is one point mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman as to which I am still sceptical—as to shortening the dates for the return of the writs. There will be no difficulty in carrying out this suggestion in regard to the whole of England and the bulk of the Irish and Scotch seats. The real difficulty in shortening the thirty-five days would be in respect to Shetland and the Orkney Islands. I have not been there myself; but I know those who have, and I understand there is a stormy sea to be crossed, which is at times so rough in the winter that no steamboat can go, and it sometimes takes a week or ten days at that season of the year to cross between Orkney and Shetland. The Scotch Reform Act fixes by a special clause no less a period than thirty-five days as the maximum. The sheriff is to have the election proclaimed, and the poll taken within thirty days from the time at which he receives the writ. If that period has been fixed after due consideration, the period of twenty-eight days for taking the election in the Orkneys will not be sufficient in case of bad weather.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman proposes in the Bill to deal with Ireland. If not, I hope the Chief Secretary for Ireland will be prepared with clauses to be introduced into the Irish Bill for the purpose of shortening the registration.

THE EARL OF MAYO: I have made deliberate inquiries on this subject. It will be necessary to introduce a separate Bill for Ireland, and I apprehend there will be no difficulty in arranging so that the Irish elections shall be fixed for about the same time as the English elections.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law of Registration so far as relates to the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight; and for other purposes relating thereto, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY and Sir JAMES FERGUSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 167.]

BOUNDARY BILL—[BILL 78.]

(Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, June 28.]

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Alteration of Boundaries of old Boroughs).

MR. HIBBERT, in rising to move an Amendment to carry out the recommendation of the Select Committee, said, that when the Boundary Bill was previously before the House he had moved the omission altogether of the 4th clause. He had regarded the appointment of a Select Committee as a kind of compromise. He had thought that that Committee had been appointed with the full consent of the Government, and that whatever conclusions they might arrive at would be accepted by the Ministry. He regretted to find that this was not the case. The Committee had acted with diligence and impartiality, and the Government would be justified in at once accepting their Report in the place of the recommendations of the Commissioners. What the Government had to do was to expedite the remaining business of the Session as much as possible; and that would best be done by accepting the recommendations of the Committee; because otherwise there must be considerable discussion and a great deal of time must be lost. The object of his Amendment was to carry out entirely the recommendations of the Select Committee so far as the towns named in it were concerned. With regard to these fifteen boroughs, the Committee recommended that the boundaries should not be altered. The Commissioners had certain Instructions given to them by the House, but they were very vague and indefinite, and were certainly such as to allow the Commissioners to make the recommendations they had done. The House, however, when they came to legislate on matters of a permanent character, were justified in not laying down boundaries that would not give satisfaction. In the case of Oldham, which was something like eighteen square miles in extent, the Commissioners recommended that the borough should include an adjoining district with about 6,000 inhabitants; but the Assistant Commissioner recommended a still further extension—namely, the addition to Oldham of a considerable portion of agricultural Yorkshire, because some houses lay on the other side of the border of the county. The Assistant Commissioner had an opportunity of stating his views before the Select Committee; and, as Member for Oldham, he had himself also appeared before them, and the Committee had recommended an alteration of the boundary of Oldham that had been proposed by the Commissioners, and that was satisfactory to most of the parties concerned. There were fifteen large towns in regard to which the Committee recommended no alteration of boundaries, among which were Birmingham, Manchester, Wigan, Nottingham, and others. The Committee had the Assistant Commissioners before it, and also the Members for those places, together with the memorials from the inhabitants; and the conclusion to which it came—at which he was not surprised—was that, so great was the difficulty of making extensions of those large towns that it would be better their boundaries should not at present be dealt with, but be left over till some future time. When the House considered what a borough was, it would see that the Committee was perfectly justified in its conclusion. Some persons thought a borough represented trading and commercial interests, and a county agricultural interests; but if they looked into the facts they would find that to be far from the truth. Our whole borough system was a complicated system of anomalies. The boroughs of largest area were agricultural, and the smallest were mercantile and manufacturing. That made it very difficult to deal with the boundaries. Of the English boroughs, there were eighty in which there were more acres than houses, and it could not be said that they represented trading and commercial interests. For example, Cricklade comprised fifty parishes, and had an average of twenty acres to each house. New Shoreham, Wenlock, and Wilton presented illustrations of the same character. It was not easy to say what a borough really was; and when they came to deal with places like Liverpool, Manchester, and Marylebone a very great difficulty must arise in extending their boundaries. The Commissioners had proposed to add to constituencies already overgrown populations of 20,000 and 30,000, which, if they had a claim to be represented, were entitled to have a separate Member for themselves. If the recommendations of the Commissioners were adopted in their entirety they would land us before long in electoral districts. The Report of the Commissioners carried us a step further to electoral districts, but to electoral districts that were decidedly unequal. He would take the case of Liverpool, which by the last Census had 443,000 inhabitants, and was supposed now to contain 500,000. Its present number of electors was 20,618, and by the Reform Act of 1867, 20,000 additional persons would be eligible to get upon the register, which would give a total of something like 40,000 voters. Well, the Boundary Commissioners recommended that West Derby and several other adjacent districts, having together a population of 43,233, should be added to the already overgrown borough of Liverpool. If that outlying population was to have justice done it, it wanted an additional Member. Again, the borough of Birmingham contained 350,000 inhabitants; it had 15,000 electors, and it was supposed that under the Bill of last year 35,000 more persons would be eligible to be put upon the register. The Commissioners proposed to add to the existing boroughs, Aston with 20,000 inhabitants, and Balsall Heath with another 10,500. The people of Aston had memorialized the House against the annexation, 4,500 of its male inhabitants having signed the memorial; and the people of Balsall Heath had also petitioned very numerously against it. The inhabitants of those districts admitted that they were engaged in trade, and formed part of the town of Birmingham; but they claimed, if they were to be represented, to have a Member of their own. Then, Manchester had 383,000 inhabitants with 21,000 electors already, and upwards of 35,000 more persons eligible to become electors under the new Reform Bill, thus giving a total constituency of some 57,000 voters. At present Manchester had boundaries which were well-known and properly defined; but the Commissioners proposed to add to it portions of seven townships with 37,000 inhabitants—a very objectionable proceeding. Indeed, the Commissioners admitted that to draw the boundary in the case of Manchester, so as to include all the outlying places which ought to be included, was a matter which presented very considerable difficulties. It could not be otherwise, because it was impossible to say where one town ended and another began. There were, he might add, other instances not connected with such large towns as he had mentioned, which he might lay before the Committee in support of the view which he took, but which he would not trespass upon their time by mentioning. He would, instead, briefly advert to the difference of population which would, if the scheme of the Commissioners were carried into effect, exist between counties and boroughs. Middlesex had now a population of only 368,424 persons, but the new borough of Chelsea and Kensington would take from it a considerable number of that population; and, as if that were not sufficient, it was proposed to abstract from it 28,000 more, and add them to Marylebone. Again, in the case of South-West Lancashire, which had now a population of only 263,000, it was proposed to take out of that number 20,000 and add them to Liverpool, which had already a population of 500,000, and which would then have 520,000 inhabitants, while West Lancashire would have only 243,000. It ought, he thought, to be left to a future Parliament to say how the case of those larger towns should be dealt with; and to determine whether the plan of dividing them would not meet the difficulties which beset the question better than adding great numbers to places which were already overgrown. Instead of finding fault with the recommendations of the Committee, he thought the House ought to express its thanks to them for getting it out of a difficulty. He hoped, therefore, his present proposal would receive the assent of the Committee.

Mr. Hibbert

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 16, to leave out the words "old Boroughs specified in the First Schedule to this Act annexed shall be altered in manner therein mentioned," in order to insert the words "viz Abingdon, Ashton under Lyne, Aylesbury, Barnstaple, Bath, Bewdley, Blackburn, Bolton & Moors, Bridgwater, Brighton, Cambridge, Chatham, Cheltenham, Chester, Chichester, Cirencester, Coventry, Derby, Droitwich, Dudley, Durham, Exeter, Finsbury, Gloucester, Greenwich, Guilford, Halifax, Hastings, Hertford, Huddersfield, Kidderminster, King's Lynn, Kingston upon Hull, Lewes, Macclesfield, Monmouth District, Morpeth, Newport (Isle of Wight), Northampton, Oldham, Oxford, Penryn and Falmouth, Peterborough, Plymouth, Preston, Richmond, Rochdale, Salisbury, Stafford, Stamford, Stoke upon Trent, Stroud, Sunderland, Taunton, Wakefield, Walsall, Wilton, New Windsor, Worcester, Beaumaris District, Cardiff District, Cardigan District, Carmarthen District, Carnarvon District, Denbigh District, Flint District, Merthyr Tydvil, Pembroke District, Swansea District, shall be altered in manner specified in the First Schedule to this Act annexed."—(Mr. Hibbert.)

MR. ADDERLEY said, he thought a considerable amount of time might be saved in discussing the comparative merits of the Reports of the Committee and the Commission if the decision as to which of them should in the main be adopted were taken upon the Amendment which had just been moved. The hon. Gentleman in moving that Amendment advocated the adoption of a principle totally different from that proposed by the Commission in dealing with the large boroughs, and he should briefly state why he differed from the views which he had advanced. In doing so he would take the case of Birmingham, with which he was best acquainted, and which he regarded as affording a good illustration of the question at issue, premising that he believed the hon. Member for that town was very much the originator of the appeal which was made from a Parliamentary Commission to a Select Committee, and that he had managed to indoctrinate that Committee with the principle which he advocated. ["No, no!"] That was his opinion, and it was of the utmost importance that the Committee should be clearly aware of the issue before it, which was whether those large towns throughout the country which had greatly increased since they had been enfranchised should be treated as integral towns, or whether, to follow out the hon. Member's own view, a new system of representation should be commenced in this country, tending to the creation of electoral districts, and having for its basis the representation of numbers. [Mr. BRIGHT: That is not my principle at all.] Birmingham, as the Committee knew, had very largely increased in size and population since it was enfranchised, and there was the singularity about its case, that none of the reasons applied to its disintegration which had been so clearly stated a few nights ago by the Chairman of the Select Committee as having induced him and his Colleagues to arrive in particular instances at the new idea of ignoring the growth of towns. It was, in the first place, alleged that a borough should have some property in that portion of the town which it was proposed to identify with it. Now, the borough of Birmingham had property in Aston to a very considerable extent. It had bought its principal park there, and its rates and jurisdiction extended over it. It was, in the next place, contended that there should be identity of interest and character between the old borough and the part of the town proposed to be amalgamated with it. In the case of Birmingham there was the most perfect identity in every respect, so that no distinction could be drawn between the one and the other. In fact, it was impossible to draw any line between that part of the town which it was proposed to include and the old borough. It was further contended that it was important that the political and municipal boundaries of a borough should coincide; but surely a very easy way of doing that was after rectifying the one to bring the other up to it. But how, he would ask, did the hon. Member for Birmingham wish the Committee to deal with the town which he represented? In the first place, by means of the influence which he most deservedly possessed in that House, he had last year succeeded in procuring for Birmingham an additional representative on the ground of the increase of its population. Now, he should not waste the time of the Committee by protesting incidentally against the principle which, under the influence of the hon. Gentleman, had been, he thought, too much adopted by the House, that representation should simply be measured by the number of a population, who should be indicated by Members per so many thousands to act as mere counters in a division, and not, as heretofore, give a voice to every locality to take part in a consultative council. But, be that as it might, it required the audacity of a party who consider themselves possessed of a dictatorial majority to make the monstrous proposition that the representation of a town should first be increased on the ground of its increased numbers, and in the same breath to contend that the numbers in the represented area should not be increased at all. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members might cry out "No!" but that was the fact. Birmingham had had a third Member heaped on it upon the numerical principle and now its increased numbers were refused to be included in the represented borough. He must also call attention to the point upon which great stress was laid by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire—that the investigations before the Select Committee was not an appeal from the decision of the Commissioners, because the Select Committee had fresh ground on which to form their judgment. It was true, on the contrary, that the Committee were not so well-informed as the Commissioners, and had not the same grounds to form their judgment on. But what constituted the fresh ground? Why, the wishes of the inhabitants of districts proposed to be added to boroughs; but the wishes of the inhabitants had never before been considered as an element of consideration in deciding the question of enfranchisement or disfranchisement, which question had always been governed by great reasons of State. It seemed to be absurd to appeal to the wishes of the inhabitants of suburbs; for their wishes, no doubt, were that they might enjoy the advantages of an adjoining borough without being subject to increased taxation. He was present during the inquiry before the Assistant Commissioners at Birmingham, and he could state that that was the sole objection which any portion of the contiguous community had to be identified with the rest of their town. It appeared indeed from this that the value attached to the franchise was not considered equivalent to the burden it entailed; but such calculations were out of place in deciding the representation of a town. But what he chiefly wished to expose was the contrast between the grand principles of extension of the franchise enunciated by professed Reformers, and their resistance to any such extension when it comes in their way. The hon. Member for Birmingham had placed himself before the House and the country at large as the advocate of the greatest possible extension of the suffrage. The hon. Member had taken to himself the credit of the Reform Act of last year, and, in blowing his own trumpet as the champion of Parliamentary Reform, he had insisted that the essential principle was that in a free country the greatest possible number should have the rights of citizenship. He enunciated that principle in the Liverpool Theatre only a fortnight ago. But applying that principle to the present question as relating to Birmingham; if Birmingham were treated as an entire locality a great accession of numbers would be the result of the Bill of last year: 6,200 inhabitants would have the franchise given to them, if the town had been treated as the Commissioners proposed to treat it. But the hon. Member for Birmingham's grand principle was abandoned by him as soon as he found that it would operate against his object to keep half the town of Birmingham for leavening the county with. He prefers, with two Colleagues, representing only half the town, that the other half may get two more Members by swamping the county. Town and county are so far different interests, that the one has always been considered the movement, the other the conservative interest; and to crush the latter the franchise of 6,200 citizens is sacrificed though they were considered the more intelligent of the two. He hoped that the hon. Member would never enunciate those grand principles again, now that we knew the difference between his principles and his practice; and that when he found an extension of the suffrage inimical to his interests he became as active a disfranchiser as he had ever depicted the extremest Tory to be. The hon. Member was arguing the other day in the spirit of Pericles "that it was essential for the success of a free country that in every part the greatest number possible should take an interest in public affairs." But across this noble sentiment now intervened the object of the hon. Member to swamp the influence of the county. The hon. Member felt, no doubt, that the present limits of the borough of Birmingham was quite sufficient to carry three of his senatorial indexes of population, and he wished to reserve one-half of the community which could not be distinguished from the other half, in order that for more counters on his side of the House of Commons might be got out of Birmingham in the name of the county constituencies of Warwickshire and Worcestershire, so that, in fact, Birmingham would have seven representatives — three elected for half the town and two for each of the adjoining county divisions. For his (Mr. Adderley's) part he preferred to sustain the recommendation of the Commissioners, and he maintained that those who did so were the real Reformers. On the broad principle of extending the franchise to the greatest possible number, the Ministerialists were now proved to be the Reformers, and the Opposition the disfranchisers. If the principle of the Committee were adopted enormous numbers in the aggregate of the boroughs now under discussion would be excluded from the franchise; while large numbers would be admitted if these urban areas were included in the boroughs to which they belonged, and were properly recognized, as in fact they are, according to the Report of the Commissioners. The unwieldy size to which some of these boroughs had grown was no argument for using parts of them to swamp the counties, though it might be an argument for dividing the largest towns, such as Manchester and Glasgow, into two urban constituencies. He had treated Birmingham as a sample of the other boroughs, and as a sample he considered that it afforded a strong and unanswerable argument in favour of the recommendations of the Commissioners and against the proposal of the Committee to upset them, and in the division about to ensue the issue might fairly be taken on the general principle.

Mr. Adderley

MR. BRIGHT: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) has undertaken, I presume, to answer some observations which I made in the House on this subject a few nights ago. I wish he had been a little more accurate. He has said many things which I will not contend against by argument; I shall simply contradict them. For instance, he said that I was the author of the Select Committee. I understood that the Committee was proposed from his own Benches—and I supported the proposition for it, as I do frequently support propositions from those Benches, when they seem to me judicious for the purposes of the House. The right hon. Gentleman said further—I do not give his exact language, but he intimated that I had forced my views regarding this matter upon the Committee—that I indoctrinated them, I am told, was his expression. I do not know whether he means that I entered into any conspiracy with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) on this question. What I did was just what the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) did. I appeared before the Committee, at their request and by their permission, to state what I thought on this matter. All I have done is before the House and before the Committee. I will not say my arguments had no effect; but at least the facts of the case were sufficient to justify the conclusion at which the Committee arrived. He said, further, that I had been in favour of driving towards electoral districts. The general impression out-of-doors is that the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues are driving in that direction; but I have never advocated electoral districts, nor a representation exactly in proportion to numbers. All I have said is that numbers must be taken into consideration in agitating the question of the distribution of seats; and if on such a point the right hon. Gentleman will have no regard whatever to numbers, there will come a day when numbers will speak to him in a voice which he will be just as little able to resist as he and his Colleagues were able to resist a certain voice that made itself heard last year. Well, then, he further stated that, seeing I was an advocate for the widest extension of the franchise, it would be most inconsistent in me to oppose an extension of the borough boundaries, as this would extend the franchise to a much larger number of persons than would receive it if the disputed districts were still to be assigned to counties. Now, the right hon. Gentleman never heard me advocate the widest extension of the franchise. The extension which I have advocated ever since I have been in Parliament is precisely that extension which he and his Colleagues adopted in the Bill of last year. Therefore these are charges which, to those who know me are, on the face of them, absurd; and the right hon. Gentleman, speaking on behalf of the Government, ought really to be more careful when he makes them. Throughout the whole of his speech he has been imputing motives to me which I am not conscious of having incurred the blame of. It can be no disadvantage to me to see the population of Birmingham doubled; it does not cost me anything for my seat; but it costs much to those who return me here, and therefore I am anxious that their expenses should not be increased. It would not make me sit any more or less certainly for Birmingham whether you added to its numbers or not; but I presume it will be admitted that if the population of Birmingham be increased by one-half, or be doubled, to a certain extent the representatives of so great a population would have, I will not say a corresponding increase of weight, but in some degree an increased influence in this House. Therefore I have no object whatever, but that we should do that which is just towards the population of Birmingham, and I shall argue the question exactly the same as if it referred to the population of Manchester. Now, the right hon. Gentleman's motives are obvious. He has no influence whatever in Birmingham, nor has the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, though he says he rejoices that he is the representative of the county, and that he has many friends in Birmingham; but he has nothing whatever to do with the borough in matters of representation. What he has to do, however, is this. He knows, or believes, that the question now before the House will affect in some degree the balance of power in the two counties; that the manor of Aston, being in North Warwickshire, gives a considerable number of votes to that county, and no doubt, with the increase of votes under the Act of last year, will greatly strengthen the hands of the Liberal party; while the same process will occur in the division of East Worcestershire, where I believe the district of Balsall Heath is situated. The right hon. Gentleman was very free in imputations of motives to me, every one of which was contrary to the fact; but he will not deny that his motive is to weaken the party to which he is opposed in the counties of North Warwickshire and East Worcestershire; that is the whole object of the fight he is making. Now, I have stated the figures before, but I can repeat them in a sentence. The right hon. Gentleman, in his multifarious knowledge of this matter, did not give the House any one of the figures important to its decision. He should have told us that North Warwickshire had a population of only 120,000 with two Members, and that Birmingham had a population of 350,000, and if this plan were carried out would have more than 380,000, and was rapidly increasing. With three Members still given to them, in that division at the beginning of December, to which, no doubt, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) is anxiously looking forward, Manchester or Birmingham will count for but one vote, and will be equal in influence to the most wretched borough still retained in the representation. North Warwickshire has two Members, and the proposition is to take 25,000 from North Warwickshire, with its population of 116,000, and add them to Birmingham, with its population of 350,000. If the Government advocates in the House of Commons measures that will increase these gross inequalities, I want to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman or myself is the greatest promoter of that change which he has described by the term "electoral districts." You may be quite sure that if this policy is pursued, the very next time it is my privilege to stand before my constituents in the Town Hall of Birmingham I shall have to point out to them how the right hon. Gentleman, his Colleagues, and his party have forced a vast increase of population upon them, with a corresponding decrease in the population of the surrounding districts, but without giving to Birmingham any corresponding increase of power in this House. I say the right hon. Gentleman is not pursuing a wise course in advocating the views he has taken in this House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole), at the conclusion of the admirable speech he addressed to the House the other night—I call it so not because it agreed with my views; but because it was admirable in every respect

Mr. Bright

—made an observation upon a point which I have once or twice mentioned, and spoke of the importance of having the boundaries of boroughs well-defined, without at the same time drawing too sharp a line between them and the neighbouring county, so as to make the borough Members represent one great interest in the country, and the county Members another great interest. I have said before, and I repeat it now, that whenever this House comes to be so divided, it will be one of the most calamitous things that ever happened for our Parliamentary system, and those who will suffer the most from it are the right hon. Gentlemen who are now striving in that direction. The right hon. Gentleman the First Minister reminds me of a passage in the life of a celebrated statesman, of whom some have said—I know not with what authority—that he made his profit by varying his course according to the vicissitudes of the times in which he lived. After the death of Queen Anne, when Bolingbroke was deprived of power, he denied many of the charges made against him; but he acknowledged that he had intended to make a very important change in the representation, and that he—

"Wished to restrain the influence of the monied interest in the Legislature and matters of State, because the country gentlemen were vexed, put to great expense, and were baffled by the traders in their elections."

Fortunately, political calamity overtook the author of this scheme, and he had no opportunity of carrying out its principle; but that is the principle of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. He has over and over again stated it to the House in different words, but coming to the same meaning; that is, by altering the boundaries of boroughs he wishes to give the country gentlemen and the landed interest a more exactly defined and influential power in Parliament than they had hitherto possessed. He would be the worst enemy of the country gentlemen and the landed interest if he could by possibility carry out that principle. But fortunately there is a power in the House and in the country which will prevent him. There is no Select Committee, no ingenious Minister, no ready tools, no Spofforth, who can so manipulate the boundaries of boroughs in this country as to bring about a change in the preponderance of political power. In the case of Birmingham there is no proof that the change proposed will lead to any party advantage; but there can be no doubt that it would be a great inconvenience as far as Birmingham is concerned; and therefore I oppose it. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) said, "You are not Reformers; we are the real Reformers." Well, the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends take so many new faces that one hardly knows where to fix them. Does he know that in one of these outlying districts in Birmingham, out of 6,000 occupiers 4,600 have petitioned not to have the franchise which the right hon. Gentleman wishes to thrust upon them? There is only one other point I need mention. I have heard it said that if we would only consent to allow the sacrifice of Birmingham, hon. Gentlemen opposite would compromise with us and allow the decision of the Committee to be taken in block. ["No!"] I do not know whether that is true or not; but if it be true, I appeal to hon. Gentlemen whether that is a very honourable and very noble sentiment. It cannot be that hon. Gentlemen opposite have such an interest in North Warwickshire, East Worcestershire, or Birmingham, as to make that an exception to the policy they would adopt in the rest of the boroughs. I trust that in this House—discussing the question with fairness but with earnestness—I have not made myself liable in any degree to such personal feelings that hon. Members opposite wish through me to injure and stab the constituency I represent. I am satisfied that the House will do itself credit by accepting the decision of the Committee to which this question was referred, and—I speak without hesitation, though I do not pretend, as the right hon. Gentleman says, to represent the great body of the people—that if the decision of the Committee be adopted as it stands, the House will act in accordance with the views of the vast majority of all the population of the districts which are concerned in this question of boundaries. I say no more; but I hope that the Committee will accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert), for which I shall vote with the greatest pleasure.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY: I shall not, in the few observations which I have to make upon this question, impute any motives to any Gentlemen on either side of the House in the views which they have expressed. I should have been glad, indeed, if I could have avoided taking any part in this discussion. It is not pleasant to find one's work in the Boundary Commission pitted against the Report of the Select Committee presided over by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole); and what makes it especially unpleasant is that, while in a matter in which I have been engaged during many months with men of wholly different politics, and have not heard during that time a single party observation, the discussion has now, in a very great degree, assumed a party character, and the question is to be decided apparently according to the strength of parties, without reference to the particular merits of the question at issue. Having been responsible for the Report of the Commission that is laid on the table, I think it due to myself, to my brother Commissioners, and also to those by whom we were appointed, to state the grounds upon which we proceeded in the consideration of the matters referred to us, and to show what appear to me sufficient reasons why this wholesale disagreement with the recommendations of the Commission should not be at once adopted by the House. It has been stated during the discussion that the Instructions we received were imperfect, and that consequently our Report could not be adopted. I am not going to enter into that question; but it will be remembered that those Instructions, whatever they may have been, were not given merely by this House, but by Parliament, and that it was on the faith of those Instructions being followed out that the Reform Bill of last year was passed. But I contend that the principle upon which we acted was not only sanctioned by Parliament, but it was the right principle. As I understand it, it was that in future those who were to sit here, with all the weight and importance to be given to them as appearing for great towns, should be in fact the Members for those towns. I do not mean to make any personal allusion—I should be sorry to say anything which might appear to be of a personal character—but I must repeat that the principle, as we understood it, was this—that the Members for Birmingham and Manchester should be elected by the towns of Birmingham and Manchester, and that while they had all the weight and importance given to them as the representatives of those great towns, they should not be elected merely by a portion of the towns, and represent in fact only a portion of them. I think that is a right principle on which to proceed. Well, what are the objections to such a course? The main gether by municipal ties. I admit that was the principle in force previously to the passing of the Reform Act of 1832, but no such principle was acted upon by the framers of that Act, nor has any such principle been recognized since that time. When we entered upon the inquiry we found no less than fifty boroughs in which the boundaries, municipal and Parliamentary, were different. Since the time of the Reform Act we have had various great towns incorporated by the Crown, and in those cases it has not been thought necessary that the Parliamentary boundary should be followed. The great town of Manchester, which has been referred to, was incorporated some years after the passing of the Reform Act. The Parliamentary area included between 6,000 and 7,000 acres, but the district incorporated consisted of only 4,000. The same thing has been done with other towns. The Parliamentary borough of Brighton was created by the Reform Act, and included a large and populous district called Hove; but when, some years afterwards, Brighton was incorporated Hove was excluded. The same thing happened with the town of Warrington. These are three cases that I happen to remember; and in none of them was the Parliamentary boundary taken as the boundary of the municipality. Therefore I say it is idle to contend that we are to be bound by the municipal limits; we have not been bound in that way hitherto; Parliament has not considered itself so bound, nor has the Crown considered itself so boundary also, and then we shall be the municipal rates." The result of the representations then made, and I put it to the House, was that the "wishes of the inhabitants" should not be allowed to influence us. It was wrong, indeed, in the idea that it was because the cases of Brighton and Warrington, which I have cited, show that it was no consequence that, if taken within the Parliamentary boundary, they would become subject to the municipal rates. There was a great dread that it would be the case. In many instances the boundary had gone just outside the municipal boundary in order to avoid the rates, while they had themselves the benefit of the town's expenditure. In cases they would no doubt be taken, within the municipal boundary. But in the one case or other the fear was either groundless or unreasonable. It was groundless where the outlying district formed part of the town; it was unreasonable where it did, because it was not that in the latter case the district exempt should share the burden of the rates who had now to pay all the rates. Another objection was urged with great force by the member for Birmingham was for the comparative populations of the district from which the district was proposed to be taken, and of the borough to be added. T

the electors were taken from that particular portion of Birmingham already included in the Parliamentary borough. The number in the other districts was also very considerable, and would be immensely increased by the reduction made in the qualification for the franchise last year. In that particular division we were informed by a gentleman of great knowledge and experience that the county constituency from the qualifications for the town of Birmingham would be nearly doubled in consequence of the change made last year. The county Members represent not only the constituency derived from the population of 116,000 in North Warwickshire, but also the constituency which exists within the borough, and by which the election is very materially influenced. Nor was the case of North Warwickshire a singular one. In many of the counties affected by our recommendations the proportion of town to county voters on the County Register will be found to be much larger. In South Lancashire, out of 21,555 voters on the Register, 8,783 derive their qualifications from represented towns; in Middlesex, 6,137 out of 14,847; in South Hants, 2,858 out of 5,677; in North Durham, 3,189 out of 6,042. I hardly know what other points there were to which I need refer; but there was one thing which was referred to by the hon. Member for Birmingham on a former occasion, and on that I would wish to make a remark. The hon. Gentleman spoke of the great interest which seemed to have been taken in his town; and he referred especially to a visit paid to Birmingham by one of the Commissioners, Mr. Walter, and seemed rather to throw a slur upon that gentleman, as if there had been some kind of undue feeling in the matter. The fact was that there was a certain degree of fear entertained of the opposition which we anticipated from the hon. Member, and there was a considerable anxiety on the part of the Commission that no part of the town population should be included in the limits of the Parliamentary borough which did not, beyond all question, belong to it. When, therefore, an enlargement of the boundary was suggested, and before it was adopted, one of the Commissioners kindly went down with the Assistant Commissioner in order to look over the ground before we came to a final decision; and the result was to make out a clear distinction between one of the districts proposed to be added and the two others which we finally recommended. I think, therefore, the hon. Member had no reason to complain of anyone, or to suggest that the visit was made with any other view than what was perfectly fair towards the town of Birmingham. Then it was said it was exceedingly undesirable to draw a strict line between the urban and rural population. I fully admit it, and I may refer to one part of our labours to show that that feeling was entertained generally by the Commission. When counties were to be divided, as it would be easy to see, one of the points kept in view was not to draw a too hard and fast line between the urban and the rural population, but to have an admixture of both in each division. We felt at the same time that practically the principle of county and borough representation proceeded upon the fact of there being some distinction between the population of the county and the borough. What we felt throughout the whole matter was this — that we had to consider what really did form a part of the town, in order that for the future the Member for Manchester should represent the whole importance of Manchester. There was another point to which we felt bound to attach importance. We felt bound to look to what districts there were the inhabitants of which ought for the purposes of elections to be included. In that matter it seemed to us that the course we were to pursue was one of enfranchisement. What would be the effect of adopting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert)? Why, between 30,000 and 40,000 persons would be excluded from the Parliamentary franchise, and thereby kept, as we used to be told last year, outside the pale of the Constitution. Now, is it desirable that such a thing as that should be done merely that there might not be an increasing inconvenience at elections in consequence of the large constituencies which would be created. Birmingham, with all these additions, will not be so large as several other boroughs; and, therefore, I do not think that the size is sufficient reason for depriving that large number of people of the franchise. I do not wish to go particularly through the different boroughs; but I will take one instance, just to show how undesirable it would be to adopt the Amendment proposed. I will take the town of Nottingham, and I will refer to perfectly independent testimony on the subject—namely, the Report of the Municipal Commissioners, who were appointed so far back as 1837, to inquire into the different municipal boundaries. What was their Report as to Nottingham? It said—

“The increasing population, unable to find room within the limits of the town, has resorted to the neighbouring parishes of Radford, Linton, and Sneinton, and in these three parishes upwards of 20,000 people, closely connected in every way with the town of Nottingham, are now congregated. New Sneinton forms actually a portion of the town of Nottingham. New Radford may also be said to form a portion of the town, though the connection is not quite so close as is the case at Sneinton. The remaining population of the three parishes occupy blocks of buildings lying detached at small distances from each other. Their proposal, therefore, was to add Sneinton and parts of Linton and Radford to the town of Nottingham.”

These are the very districts which we proposed to add. Will it be contended that thirty years afterwards they cease to form part of the town of Nottingham? It was then recommended that they should be brought within the municipal boundary, because they essentially formed part of the town, and it is now proposed to exclude them from the Parliamentary boundary, though every year that has passed has tended to unite them more closely to the town of Nottingham. The only reason for this that I have heard urged is that Nottingham is a county of itself, and that the freeholders in Nottingham have a vote for the borough instead of the county. By the Reform Act it was provided that the freeholders in districts added to such towns should in the same way vote for the county, while no such provision is contained in the present Bill; and for no better reason than this thousands of working men are to be deprived of the franchise. The recommendation of the Commissioners in 1837 was not carried out, because at that time the Government was very weak; for then it was felt, as we have since learnt, what a misfortune it is to have a weak Government. Lord Melbourne, indeed, was reported to have said that, however opinions might differ as to whether a Whig or a Tory Government was the best, certainly the worst of all Governments was a weak Government. The Bill then drawn was abandoned because the Government, from their state of weakness, could not carry out the views they entertained, opposed, as they were, by some of their ordinary supporters. I will only add a word or two to remind the House what were the views entertained on this subject by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) last year. At that time the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) proposed that the Parliamentary and municipal boundaries should be conterminous, and the hon. Member for Oldham said—

Mr. Russell Gurney

“He could not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham that it was desirable that the boundaries of the Parliamentary boroughs should always be conterminous with those of the municipal boroughs. There were many large and growing towns situated outside of the municipal boroughs to which the franchise ought, in his opinion, to be extended, though the inhabitants would not desire to be incorporated with the municipalities. . . . The borough which he represented (Oldham) was an instance of this, and he thought it was a fortunate thing that the Parliamentary area was made so wide in 1832, for otherwise those townships would virtually have no representation.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxviii. 277-8.]

I now appeal to the hon. Member for Oldham, and I appeal to this House, not to inflict upon the inhabitants of the districts forming parts of the towns of Birmingham, of Manchester, of Bristol, and of Nottingham, what he considered to be virtual disfranchisement, but to extend to them the same protection which he last year rejoiced had, in 1832, been extended to the people of Oldham.

SIR HEDWORTH WILLIAMSON expressed regret that a Member of the Government, the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Adderley), had spoken in a manner calculated to excite party dissension on a subject which ought to be treated with judicial calmness and fairness. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Russell Gurney) said that in doubtful cases the Commissioners had yielded to the wishes of the inhabitants; but in the case of South Shields, and other places in which he (Sir Hedworth Williamson) was most interested, he was afraid that had not been the case. The right hon. and learned Gentleman omitted a very material point—namely, that if these places were annexed to the boroughs they would be debarred of their privilege of being able to collect their rates on the compounding system. Much stress had been laid upon the fact that the Commissioners had been very careful not to recommend annexation of any place to a borough when it was not closely allied to it; but this had been done at Gateshead. In this instance a place had been tacked on to a borough which did not wish to receive it. The interests of the two places were opposed; the outlying districts had their own Board of Health; they had borrowed money for their own improvements, and the borough also had borrowed considerable sums of money from which the outlying districts could receive no benefit. He hoped the Amendment of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) would be accepted, which would render it unnecessary to bring forward the Motion of which he had given Notice, for the omission of South Shields and Gateshead from Schedule A.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT said, he was one of those who really thought it a great mistake to refer this matter from the Commission who had bestowed on it seven months of great labour to a Committee which disposed of the whole question in eleven days. He could only say, for himself, that the notice he received to appear before the Committee did not reach him till the evening of the day on which he was to go before them. He wished to recall to the attention of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) the words he had used in thanking the electors for his unopposed return at the last election. The hon. Member then said—"We have had a very quiet time here; don't let it be quite so quiet next Thursday"—the day of the election for North Warwickshire. The hon. Member added, "You are non-electors; it is true you have got no votes, but you have got influence; let it be felt." He was happy to say, however, that although at the election for North Warwickshire there was a considerable amount of animation, yet it passed off without any very serious consequences. Under these circumstances he was glad to hear that the hon. Member had no intention that the changes proposed should have the effect of interfering with the election for North Warwickshire. His party were in a minority in Birmingham, and he thought that if the recommendations of the Commissioners were carried into effect that minority would become larger. [MR. BRIGHT: Smaller.] He hoped that, if the hon. Member for Birmingham did not propose to interfere with the election for North Warwickshire, he should again be returned as the representative of that constituency.

MR. BRUCE: I am not at all disposed to undervalue the differences that have arisen between the Committee and the Commissioners; but I think there is a tendency greatly to over-rate the importance of the changes that have been proposed. Those who have listened to the speeches of the right hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) and of the right hon. and learned Gentleman

(Mr. Russell Gurney) would almost be of opinion that the present Members for Birmingham, Manchester, and Liverpool are not really the representatives of those great populations, but are simply the representatives of the nucleus of great modern towns. ["Oh, oh!"] What are the facts? Birmingham has a population of 350,000, and the increase of population within its Parliamentary limits in thirty years has been from 152,000 to 294,000. Within these limits there is an unoccupied area, pointing to the possibility and probability of a further increase of 200,000; so that there is no reason why the future Members for Birmingham should not be the representatives of 550,000 people within the limits of the existing town. The evidence taken before the Assistant Commissioners proved that fact. What did the Commissioners propose to do, in order to render the Members for Birmingham the real representatives of that borough? Why, they proposed to add to the existing population an additional population of 35,000. They also proposed to add 35,000 to the 400,000 forming the the present population of Manchester, and 25,000 to the 500,000 forming the present population of Liverpool. In these cases it may be assumed that the Commissioners had followed the overflow of the population of the boroughs, and these proposed additions might have been fairly made upon that ground, had it not appeared to the Committee that there were weighty counterbalancing reasons why the recommendations of the Commissioners should not be followed. The case is still stronger with regard to the metropolitan boroughs of Marylebone and Lambeth. The Commissioners proposed to add Hampstead, with its 28,000 inhabitants to Marylebone, which already contained 436,000 persons. But can Hampstead be regarded as the overflow of Marylebone? The population of Middlesex has been reduced to 179,000 by the recommendation of the Commissioners, and it would be further reduced to 151,000 if the population of Hampstead were to be also subtracted from it. But even this case is weak when compared with that of Lambeth. This borough has a population of 319,000, and it is proposed to take Clapham and several other distant suburbs of London out of the small divisions of East and Mid Surrey for the purpose of adding an additional population of 57,000 to that borough. But this is the least objectionable part of the proposal. East Surrey was divided by the reluctantly that I am obliged in these instances to disagree with the Commissioners. I cannot shelter myself under the statement that the Committee disagreed with the Commissioners simply and solely on matters of detail — they differed on matters of principle, because they believed that the addition of Clapham and Hampstead to the boroughs I have mentioned were not the additions contemplated by the House. With respect to the boroughs of Gateshead, South Shields, Tynemouth, Portsmouth, and Warwick, in every case the evidence showed that the population proposed to be added to the existing boroughs was not the overflow of the old boroughs, but were independent populations which would have existed whether the old boroughs existed or not. The case of Nottingham stands on peculiar grounds. North Nottinghamshire, is one of the most remarkable counties in England. The borough of East Retford has a larger population than the whole of North Nottinghamshire, which has a population of 95,000, from which it is now proposed to take a population of 20,000 in order to add it to Nottingham, which has already a population of 80,000. I believe, Sir, that I have said sufficient to show that there were valid reasons for what the Committee did, and inasmuch as our decisions were unanimously arrived at, and were not in the slightest degree the result of party feeling, I trust that they will be confirmed by the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the right hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr.

the people, not of North w of Birmingham, crowded be respectfully asked Her Maje few words to them, and he this request was granted. houses of this Birmingham risen rapidly around the Pa House of Aston. The peop ham felt that this Park and these means of recreation a had been made their own. tion had bought the Park House, and it was as much as the Town Hall of Birn The practical incorporation the town of Birmingham h on for years. He held in extract from the Post Office Birmingham and the Mid for 1864, when this questi arisen. Speaking of Aston, “Aston is a village adjoining the North. . . . The village its once retired and rural aspect ; sorbed by the extensive improve tional streets added to Birmingham at no remote period to form pa The Hall, built by Sir Thomas H the grounds attached, are in the p Aston Park Company, and are &c.”

Since that date, the Corpor mingham had bought the p made it their own. The C for 1841 showed that the pop parish of Aston, the most pop of which was the Manor, amo to 45,718, that in 1851 it ha was furnished by these Census Returns. The hon. Member for Birmingham seemed to think that there was something illiberal in the course which he (Mr. Newdegate) had adopted. He might, however, remind the hon. Member that he had supported the Motion for giving four Members to Birmingham. Previous to that he had advocated the addition of another Member to the representation of North Warwickshire; but then it should be remembered that North Warwickshire included the representation of the freeholders and leaseholders of Birmingham, Coventry, and Tamworth, while it contained Rugby with more than 7,000 of town population, Foleshill with 8,000, Bedworth with 7,000, and Nuneaton with more than 7,000 inhabitants: these were places having large town populations of their own. Indeed, the constituency of North Warwickshire was to a great extent a town constituency. He felt bound to say that after the speech which the House had heard from the right hon. and learned Commissioner (Mr. Russell Gurney) that evening, that however great might be his respect for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), he, for one, could not accept the authority of the right hon. Gentleman when it was opposed to that of Lord Eversley, who for sixteen years had been the respected Speaker of that House—the less, when he remembered that the Select Committee over which the right hon. Gentleman presided had sat for eleven days, while the Commission at the head of which Lord Eversley had presided and pursued their inquiries for seven months, whatever might be the decision of Parliament on this subject. As far as he himself was concerned, he, in former days, had polled a majority in the Birmingham district, and he believed he should be again returned. Strangely enough, the hon. Member for Birmingham seemed to accuse him (Mr. Newdegate) of being in favour of laying the foundation for an arbitrary separation between the borough and the county constituencies, and the establishment of equal electoral districts. The hon. Member seemed to have forgotten that in 1859 he (Mr. Newdegate) had opposed the Reform Bill of Lord Derby's Government because it would have had that effect. Such would probably, however, be the ultimate result, if the House did not regard and rightly apportion the constituencies according to the overflow of the populations of the large boroughs. He believed that the best course the House could now pursue was to adopt the suggestion which had been made by the Prime Minister, and to consider each case upon its own merits; because, in most instances, there were differences between these cases, the existence of which it was essential to remember if they desired to arrive at a satisfactory decision.

MR. OSBORNE: I think it important that the Committees should recollect one thing—that however great, populous, and distinguished the borough of Birmingham and the county of North Warwickshire may be, that is not the only point we have to consider. Hitherto, indeed, in this debate we have heard nothing but “Birmingham” and “North Warwickshire,” which have been perpetually dinned into our ears. I must say that I, for one, should be very sorry if, by any vote of mine, I imperilled the return of the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), whom everyone respects, and whom I look upon, in his way, as a representative man of the bigotry of the country. The class ought to be represented, and if I thought so undesirable an end were likely to be attained, I should hesitate before I voted on this question; and for one reason—that I always like to see him in his place. But there are other interests involved besides those of Birmingham and North Warwickshire; and when the hon. Member said that after the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Southampton (Mr. Russell Gurney), there could be no doubt on the subject, and when the hon. Member appealed to the authority of Lord Eversley, because the Commission of which the noble Lord had been the Chairman had sat for seven months, he forgot to tell the House that a Special Commission which had to deal with considerations affecting 130 boroughs must necessarily take longer than a Committee which had the benefit of their labours, and had only to deal with and determine questions affecting twenty-nine boroughs. And when he alludes to the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Southampton, who was one of those Special Commissioners, and who I believe is the real presiding genius of that Commission, I must say I think that that speech was a most extraordinary one as coming from a Judge. It appeared to me as if the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, enacting the part of Hamlet, had exclaimed—

“Come, the Recorder!”

Now, who was the author of the Select Committee? Why, it was the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department who suggested the appointment of the Select Committee. And what was the course suggested by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder on that occasion. Did he make any objection to the proposal? No. He rose in his place, and although he no doubt felt sore at the suggestion, he gave it his assent, an assent in which he was backed up by his shadow—a rather substantial shadow—the hon. Baronet the Member for the West Riding (Sir Francis Crossley). Now, however, the right hon. and learned Gentleman comes down to the House and makes an elaborate attack upon the Report of the Committee. Is that the part of a Judge! Is that worthy of the Judicial Bench? Why, I am convinced that neither the boroughs concerned nor the country will be satisfied with the decision to which he has come. One word with respect to the Report which has been so much lauded. Really, it would appear that we are to bow down before these Commissioners because one of them was formerly the Speaker of this House. I venture, however, to object to their Report in many instances, and, remember, it has never yet been discussed or criticized in this House; for when we were going to criticize and discuss it up jumped the Home Secretary and said, “The Report is challenged; let us have a Select Committee.” Well, we appointed a Select Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman certainly said something which conveyed the idea of finality to my mind, and I think to the minds of many hon. Gentlemen. But now what is the course pursued? Why, this Report is to go for nothing. It is found, I suspect, not very convenient to North Warwickshire, and we are called on to set aside the recommendations of the Select Committee, and swallow the whole of the monstrous Report of the Commissioners. Now, what was the course adopted by these Commissioners? There is no doubt that the Instructions given to them on the part of this House were most injudicious and defective. They had no power to remove anomalies or revise areas; they were simply told that they must enlarge the boundaries in the old boroughs. They had nothing, mark you, to do with the enfranchisement. That question was introduced by the right hon. and learned Recorder, but it was no part whatever of their Instructions; they were merely told that they must enlarge the boundaries of the old boroughs. The right hon. and learned Recorder went on to say that so particular were they—and I am sure we, the other boroughs included, highly feel the compliment—that they sent one of their own body down to Birmingham (Mr. Walter), that he might inspect Birmingham on the spot. Well, all I can say is that I wish the learned Recorder had paid the same compliment to Nottingham; for if he had he would have avoided falling into a very material error in quoting the paper of 1837, in which he says the municipal authorities wished the portions which he mentioned to be included in the town. They did so for this reason, that at that time the town was so shut in by various Acts of Parliament that the people had nowhere to build on. Since 1837, however, a new Inclosure Act has been passed, giving them full liberty to extend themselves. I regret that the learned Recorder, after firing his shot, bolted from the House and did not wait to hear the answer. The Commissioners went on the principle of appointing that inevitable feature the barrister of seven years' standing and the Royal Engineer to go down to the boroughs; and in many places they have made the grossest mistakes. The House is anxious to divide, and I will therefore only give a few instances. There is Rochdale, the Representative of which I see sitting below me. Rochdale is the only borough in the kingdom which has a circular boundary. With its Member and all, I think it is totus teres atque rotundus. That borough only consisted of 1,200 acres, and no fault had ever been found with its boundaries—indeed, they had recently been adopted for the municipal borough on Rochdale becoming a municipality; but, because a seven years' barrister must have something to do, the Commissioners have altered the whole boundary and extended the area to 4,000 acres; for what purpose nobody knows, except that they felt they must do something. Again, what have they done in the case of Chester? They have lugged in part of the county of Flint—they have actually introduced Wales into England. Very few hon. Gentlemen will take the trouble to wade through this enormous book; but everybody says, "Beware of Birmingham." There are hundreds of other instances, however. Take Dudley, which is a very peculiar borough. It is an outlying portion of Worcestershire; but it is a very considerable borough. And what have the Commissioners done? They have lugged in several adjoining counties to increase the area. As to saying that this Report can ever stand, if the next Parliament be enlightened—I say "if"—I shall be very much surprised if it can stand their supervision. Do what we will, come to what conclusion we may on this subject, I am very much mistaken if this whole question of boundaries is not materially overhauled and altered in the next Parliament. What are the object and end of the Commissioners' Report, of which we have heard so much? Why, to prejudice the county representation and to create boroughs so monstrous that it is impossible that they should continue to return so limited a number of Members. Just let us look at the county representation—how it is influenced in the case of West Kent, Surrey, and Middlesex. Look at Marylebone, what a borough you are making! Why, even with the great exertions of the two hon. Members, with their great powers of speaking and canvassing, I doubt very much whether they will compass the canvassing and speechmaking that will be necessary. I say nothing of the increase of that class of the creation known as "Nottingham lambs." If 31,000 people are to be added to the borough of Nottingham, I hope the learned Recorder and his Colleague the hon. Baronet will give up their seats and canvass Nottingham, for I will not. Look again at Birkenhead, which is a new borough, the boundary having been settled as recently as 1861. These Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners, who have been so much lauded and bespattered with butter in the shape of fulsome praise. What have they done? They were obliged to do something, and so they have taken a parish on the other side of the natural water boundary and lugged it in against the wishes of the inhabitants. But we are told, forsooth, by the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Adderley)—it is not the first time he has been put up and afterwards disavowed, as I hope he will be to-night—that these people are not to be consulted, for that their opposition springs from an ignorant impatience of taxation. Well, what more valid reason can there be? Why are these people to be included in these monstrous boroughs because they do not choose to be exposed to excessive taxation? The right hon. Gentleman was very free in imputing motives; and when an election is coming on he always imputes motives to the hon. Member for Birmingham. I read a part of the speech he made at his last election for Staffordshire, and I tell him he ought to be very careful how he imputes motives. He hinted that gentlemen wanted to be made County Court Judges or had a high ambition of that sort. Now, I say nothing of the kind. I believe that before this attempt to upset the decision of the Committee everything went smoothly, and no partizanship was displayed. The Home Secretary, by the way, has been unusually silent on this child of his, this Select Committee; for it was his child, remember; it was adopted by him, and the godfather was the Prime Minister; but it is now a foundling, and has been left at the Foundling Hospital. Everything went smoothly till then, and the Recorder sat conveniently quiet; he did not defend the Commission at all, but now he gets up and makes a speech which ought to have been made before the Select Committee was proposed, and talks about the just influence of counties and towns. Why, there are thirty boroughs in England which, properly speaking, are not towns at all. In no sense are they towns; they are agricultural divisions of counties. The other night we adopted what on the part of a Conservative Government was a most harsh and parricidal measure. We destroyed seven small boroughs. Now I, for one, have never been an advocate for destroying the smaller boroughs; for I think the great beauty of the representation of this country is that there should be a mixture of small and large places. The Government, however, assented to the most un-Conservative act of destroying these small boroughs, and handing them over to our acquisitive neighbours in Scotland. But what are really the small boroughs? They are not towns like Wells and Thetford, which have small boundaries. No, the small boroughs are those towns like Eye, Woodstock, Warcham, Launceston, Droitwich, and Aylesbury. [An hon. MEMBER: Northallerton.] Yes, and Northallerton, which was a great place in the old coaching days, but since the introduction of railways has been declining. These so-called boroughs are streets and hamlets with agricultural divisions, and what is the object of them? To increase the power of the landed interest—an interest to which every consideration should be given, but do not let it absorb everything under pretence of these being towns. They are no more than small and, in some instances, large divisions of counties; look at Wareham. ["Divide!"] I will divide in a minute; but I must say something more unpleasant to you first. The hon. Member who cries "Divide!" is not the Member for Wareham; but I believe he is Member for a small borough, and I have my eye upon him. I have no doubt he would like his borough divided and another Member given to it. I am obliged to the hon. Member for East Retford (Viscount Galway) for his attention. I hope he will make a defence for that most monstrous of all places. It is in the county, the capital of which I represent, and a most monstrous job it is. It is really an agricultural division, yet he sits there under pretence of being a borough Member. Why, there is nothing of the borough about him; he is a county Member to all intents and purposes; he speaks, votes, listens, cheers, and cries "Divide!" like a county Member. East Retford is not a town at all; it is a decaying place with 1,600 inhabitants. I will take the hint of the hon. Member, for it is difficult to speak on these subjects without appearing to be personal to the Members who represent these towns. I do not come here like the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) who calls himself a real Reformer. He is a real Reformer, forsooth; the real Simon Pure, who has been opposing Reform all his life, and, as Under Secretary for the Colonies—he ought to have been Secretary long ago—he comes down and says he is a real Reformer. Now, I call upon the real old Reformers in the House—not the perverts, not the Puseyites of Parliament—I call upon them to come forward and assist the Home Secretary, who is being very much ill-used by his Leader and party, as he often is, in adopting the Report of the Select Committee.

Mr. Osborne

VISCOUNT GALWAY, after the personal allusion of the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) could not help saying a few words. The hon. Member said that he (Viscount Galway) wished East Retford to be divided, and to have a third Member. [Mr. OSBORNE: No; a second Member.]

Mr. Osborne

That showed how much the hon. Member knew about the matter. There were two Members at present. He had only to say that if he did want a third Member it would not be to have a buffoon for one. ["Order!" and "Chair!"] [Mr. OSBORNE: He is quite in Order.] Many hon. Members knew the peculiar circumstances in which East Retford was placed. [Mr. OSBORNE: They are very peculiar.] East Retford was once, perhaps, one of the most corrupt places in all England. It, however, it had been disfranchised and the two Members given to Birmingham probably the Reform Bill might not have been passed. He might tell the House that at every election for East Retford there was read, by Act of Parliament, a sort of reminder that they were once the most corrupt borough existing. East Retford was then enlarged by the addition of the hundred of Bassetlaw, and when the Boundary Commissioners visited the place they admitted that it had been one of the most judicious extensions they had seen. If any Gentleman would look at the map he would admit that the boundary could not be altered in justice to all the inhabitants. It certainly did take a large portion from North Notts; but the inhabitants were represented by two Members, and it could not be denied that a great many more persons enjoyed the franchise than if East Retford were merged in the county.

MR. A. PEEL said, that the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) proposed to take out of the Report of the Commission almost everything that gave it any political value. ["Divide!"] He admitted that he was personally and politically interested in the matter; but he trusted that the Committee would allow him to give a reason why the Report of the Commission should be abided by, and not the Report of the Committee. It was all very well for the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) to say that the House had arrived at a complete state of stultification; but that charge came with a bad grace from that (the Opposition) side of the House, because if the Motion for the Select Committee did not absolutely come from that side, a very considerable pressure was put upon the Government to appoint that Committee. He did not wish to make the least insinuation against the Committee; but they had acted under different Instructions from the Commissioners. The Commissioners acted up to their powers; but the powers of the Committee were almost indefinite, and the Committee came to a decision with a preconceived idea of what their duties were under the Instructions given to them. One reason in favour of adopting the recommendations of the Commissioners was that particular and exceptional cases were much more certain to be properly considered in that case than if the House adopted the Report of the Select Committee. ["Divide!"] He would venture in two minutes to state a particular case. The Commissioners recommended that the town of Leamington should be added to the town of Warwick. Thirty years ago a Committee of that House recommended that Leamington should be added to Warwick. They predicted that in a few years the two towns would be united, and this prediction was now realized.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 148; Noes 184: Majority 36.

AYES.

Adderley, rt. hon. C. B.	Egerton, E. C.
Annesley, hon. Col. H.	Fellowes, E.
Archdall, Captain M.	Fergusson, Sir J.
Baggallay, R.	Finch, G. H.
Bagge, Sir W.	Forester, rt. hon. Gen.
Bagnall, C.	Galway, Viscount
Barnett, H.	Garth, R.
Barrington, Viscount	Goldney, G.
Beach, Sir M. H.	Gooch, Sir D.
Beach, W. W. B.	Goodson, J.
Beecroft, G. S.	Gordon, rt. hon. E. S.
Benyon, R.	Gore, J. R. O.
Bourne, Colonel	Gore, W. R. O.
Brett, Sir W. B.	Gorst, J. E.
Capper, C.	Graves, S. R.
Cartwright, Colonel	Gray, Lieut.-Colonel
Cave, rt. hon. S.	Grey, hon. T. de
Cecil, Lord E. H. B. G.	Guinness, Sir A. E.
Clinton, Lord A. P.	Gurney, rt. hon. R.
Cole, hon. H.	Hamilton, Lord C.
Cole, hon. J. L.	Hamilton, Lord C. J.
Corrance, F. S.	Hardy, rt. hon. G.
Corry, rt. hon. H. L.	Hardy, J.
Crossley, Sir F.	Hartley, J.
Cubitt, G.	Hartopp, E. B.
Dalglish, R.	Harvey, R. B.
Dalkeith, Earl of	Hay, Sir J. C. D.
Davenport, W. B.	Herbert, rt. hn. Gen. P.
Dickson, Major A. G.	Hervey, Lord A. H. C.
Dimsdale, R.	Heygate, Sir F. W.
Disraeli, rt. hon. B.	Hildyard, T. B. T.
Du Cane, C.	Hodgson, W. N.
Duncombe, hon. Colonel	Holmesdale, Viscount
Dunne, rt. hon. General	Hope, A. J. B. B.
Du Pre, C. G.	Horsfall, T. B.
Dyke, W. H.	Hotham, Lord
Dyott, Colonel R.	Howes, E.
Eckersley, N.	Huddleston, J. W.
Edwards, Sir H.	Hunt, rt. hon. G. W.

Karslake, Sir J. B.	Peel, A. W.
Kavanagh, A.	Pugh, D.
Kekewich, S. T.	Read, C. S.
Kelk, J.	Robertson, P. F.
Kendall, N.	Russell, Sir C.
King, J. K.	Schreiber, C.
Knox, Colonel	Selater-Booth, G.
Knox, hon. Colonel S.	Scourfield, J. H.
Langton, W. G.	Selwin-Ibbetson, H. J.
Lanyon, Sir C.	Severne, J. E.
Leader, N. P.	Seymour, G. H.
Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.	Smith, A.
Lefroy, A.	Smollett, P. B.
Lekh, Major C.	Stanhope, J. B.
Lennox, Lord H. G.	Stanley, Lord
Liddell, hon. H. G.	Stopford, S. G.
Lindsay, hon. Colonel C.	Surtees, C. F.
Lindsay, Colonel B. L.	Talbot, C. R. M.
Lopes, H. C.	Taylor, Colonel
Lowther, J.	Thompson, A. G.
Mahon, Viscount	Thorold, Sir J. H.
M'Lagan, P.	Thynne, Lord H. F.
Mayo, Earl of	Turner, C.
Montagu, rt. hn. Ld. R.	Turnor, E.
Montgomery, Sir G.	Vance, J.
Morgan, hon. Major	Walrond, J. W.
Morgan, O.	Waterhouse, S.
Morris, G.	Welby, W. E.
Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.	Whitmore, H.
Newdegate, C. N.	Wise, H. C.
Newport, Viscount	Wyld, J.
Noel, hon. G. J.	Wyndham, hon. H.
Northcote, rt. hon. Sir	Wyvill, M.
S. H.

Pakington, rt. hn. Sir J.
Parker, Major W.
Patten, rt. hon. Col. W.
Paull, H.

TELLERS.

Powell, F. S.
Greene, E.

NOES.

Acland, T. D.	Carter, S.
Adam, W. P.	Cave, T.
Agnew, Sir A.	Cavendish, Lord E.
Akroyd, E.	Cavendish, Lord F. C.
Allen, W. S.	Chambers, M.
Amberley, Viscount	Cheetham, J.
Ayrton, A. S.	Childers, H. C. E.
Aytoun, R. S.	Clay, J.
Baines, E.	Clement, W. J.
Barclay, A. C.	Clinton, Lord E. P.
Barnes, T.	Cogan, rt. hn. W. H. F.
Barry, C. R.	Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
Bazley, T.	Coleridge, J. D.
Beaumont, W. B.	Collier, Sir R. P.
Blake, J. A.	Cowen, J.
Bonham-Carter, J.	Davey, R.
Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.	Davie, Sir H. R. F.
Bowyer, Sir G.	Denman, hon. G.
Brand, rt. hon. H.	Devereux, R. J.
Bright, J. (Birmingham)	Dilke, Sir W.
Bright, J. (Manchester)	Dillwyn, L. L.
Briscoe, J. I.	Dixon, G.
Brown, J.	Duff, M. E. G.
Browne, Lord J. T.	Earle, R. A.
Bruce, rt. hon. H. A.	Edwards, H.
Buller, Sir A. W.	Egerton, Sir P. G.
Burke, Viscount	Ellice, E.
Butler, C. S.	Enfield, Viscount
Buxton, Sir T. F.	Erskine, Vice-Ad. J. E.
Candlish, J.	Evans, T. W.
Cardwell, rt. hon. E.	Ewing, H. E. Crum-
Carington, hn. W. H. P.	Eykyn, R.
Carnegie, hon. C.	Foljambe, F. J. S.

Fordyce, W. D.
 Forster, C.
 Forster, W. E.
 Fortescue, rt. hn. C. S.
 Foster, W. O.
 French, rt. hon. Colonel Gibson, rt. hon. T. M.
 Gilpin, C.
 Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.
 Glyn, G. G.
 Goldsmid, J.
 Goschen, rt. hn. G. J.
 Graham, W.
 Gray, Sir J.
 Greville-Nugent, Col.
 Grey, rt. hn. Sir G.
 Grosvenor, Earl
 Grove, T. F.
 Hadfield, G.
 Harris, J. D.
 Headlam, rt. hon. T. E.
 Henderson, J.
 Hodgkinson, G.
 Hodgson, K. D.
 Holden, I.
 Howard, hn. C. W. G.
 Hughes, T.
 Hurst, R. H.
 Hutt, rt. hon. Sir W.
 Ingham, R.
 Jackson, W.
 Jervoise, Sir J. C.
 Kinglake, A. W.
 Kinglake, J. A.
 Kinnaid, Hon. A. F.
 Labouchere, H.
 Laird, J.
 Lamont, J.
 Lawrence, W.
 Lawson, rt. hon. J. A.
 Leatham, E. A.
 Leatham, W. H.
 Leeman, G.
 Lefevre, G. J. S.
 Lewis, H.
 Lowe, rt. hon. R.
 Lusk, A.
 Lyttelton, hon. C. G.
 MacEvoy, E.
 M'Laren, D.
 Martin, C. W.
 Martin, P. W.
 Melly, G.
 Milbank, F. A.
 Mill, J. S.
 Mills, J. R.
 Milton, Viscount
 Mitchell, T. A.
 Moffatt, G.
 Monk, C. J.
 More, R. J.

Morris, W.
 Neate, C.
 O'Brien, Sir P.
 Onslow, G.
 Osborne, R. B.
 Owen, Sir H. O.
 Padmore, R.
 Paget, T. T.
 Palmer, Sir R.
 Parry, T.
 Pease, J. W.
 Pelham, Lord
 Philips, R. N.
 Pim, J.
 Pollard-Urquhart, W.
 Portman, hon. W. H. B.
 Potter, E.
 Potter, T. B.
 Price, W. P.
 Pryse, E. L.
 Ramsay, J.
 Rearden, D. J.
 Rebow, J. G.
 Repton, G. W. J.
 Robertson, D.
 Rothschild, Baron L. de
 Russell, Sir W.
 St. Aubyn, J.
 Salomons, Mr. Ald.
 Samuelson, B.
 Saunderson, E.
 Sheridan, H. B.
 Sherriff, A. C.
 Smith, J.
 Smith, J. B.
 Speirs, A. A.
 Stirling-Maxwell, Sir W.
 Stock, O.
 Stone, W. H.
 Stuart, Col. Crichton-Sykes, Colonel W. H.
 Taylor, P. A.
 Thompson, M. W.
 Tollemache, J.
 Vernon, H. F.
 Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
 Waldegrave-Leslie, hon.
 G.
 Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.
 Warner, E.
 Watkin, E. W.
 Whatman, J.
 Whitbread, S.
 White, J.
 Whitworth, B.
 Winterbotham, H. S. P.
 Woods, H. [183]

TELLERS.

Hibbert, J. T.
 Williamson, Sir H.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HORSFALL moved as an Amendment, to insert "Liverpool."

MR. HIBBERT opposed the Amendment, which would undo the vote just come to.

Amendment negatived.

MR. A. PEEL moved, as an Amendment, to insert "Warwick." Its case was exceptional, and the Amendment was favoured by the Commissioners and by the Chairman of the Committee.

Amendment negatived.

MR. POWELL moved, as an Amendment, to insert "Wigan" after "Walsall." The Commissioners proposed to add Ince, with 6,000 people, to a borough of 37,000 inhabitants. The people of Ince followed the same pursuits as those of Wigan, cotton manufacture and mining. The mines under Ince were the same as those under Wigan, and it was impossible that the two populations could be more completely identified than they were.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, after the word "Walsall," to insert the word "Wigan."—(Mr. Powell.)

MR. BRUCE objected to Wigan being inserted, and said that the case of that borough had been considered by the Commissioners.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said there was a close connection between those districts and Wigan.

Question put, "That the word 'Wigan' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 91; Noes 131: Majority 40.

MR. POWELL said the division which had just been taken, and which he ventured to challenge, was a proof that, whatever might have been the case with reference to boundaries under the Reform Act of 1832, the boundaries now being settled in connection with the Reform Act of 1867 were essentially the results of partizan strife. What had occurred that night showed that the boundaries of boroughs, so far as they had been brought into dispute as between the Committee on the one hand and the Commissioners on the other, were not decided upon principles of justice, nor according to the wishes of the population interested, nor upon grounds which would bear debate; but the controversy had been settled by overwhelming majorities in the Lobby, and by the suppression of discussion within the walls of that House.

MR. GILPIN said, the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken so warmly, and with whom evidently, in his own opinion, wisdom would die, was no doubt much disappointed because he had been left in a minority; but he should remember that the business of that House never could be transacted unless the decisions of majorities were respected. He had considered the case of Wigan as attentively as the hon. Gentleman, and claimed to exercise as independent a judgment upon it. In the exercise of such a judgment he had gone into the Lobby against the Amendment to include Wigan, and if the Question were again to be decided he should do so once more.

MR. C. WYKEHAM MARTIN moved to insert "but for such purposes only" after line 20.—Agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 (Alterations of Names of Divisions of certain Counties).

MR. SELWIN-IBBETSON moved, after "Cheshire," to insert "Essex."—Agreed to.

MR. HOWES moved, after "Cheshire," to insert "and Norfolk."—Agreed to.

MR. SELWYN-IBBETSON moved, after "West Cheshire," to insert "North-West Essex shall be called West Essex, and North-East Essex shall be called East Essex."—Agreed to.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. WATKIN said, he should divide the Committee. He objected to the alteration of the title of one of the divisions of Cheshire from North to East Cheshire, and unless that was altered he should divide upon the whole clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 11, inclusive, agreed to.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY moved the insertion of the following new clause:—

(Explanation of the contents of the Hundreds of Pirehill, in Staffordshire.)

"Whereas by Schedule D. annexed to the 'Representation of the People Act, 1867,' the Division of North Staffordshire includes the Hundred of Pirehill North, and the Division of West Staffordshire includes the Hundred of Pirehill South: And whereas doubts are entertained as to the contents of the said Hundreds: Be it Enacted, That for the purposes of the said Act, the Hundreds of Pirehill North and Pirehill South shall respectively be deemed to consist of the Parishes and places in that behalf set forth in the Fifth Schedule annexed hereto."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

VOL. CXCII [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. C. WYKEHAM MARTIN moved the insertion of the following new clause:—

(Alteration of Boundaries of old boroughs not to affect rights connected with such boroughs.)

"No alteration of the Boundaries of any of the old boroughs specified in the First Schedule to this Act annexed shall in any way divest, prejudice, or affect any estate, interest, right, or title of Her Majesty, Her heirs or successors, or of any corporation, company, or person, in or to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments, or other property of any description, whether real or personal, situate within, or held, exercised, or enjoyed in respect of or in connection with, any of such old boroughs."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that nothing contained in the Bill would alter the rights of property, and the proposed clause was therefore unnecessary.

MR. C. WYKEHAM MARTIN, after the assurance of the hon. and learned Gentleman, would ask leave to withdraw the clause.

Clause withdrawn.

First Schedule, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Second Schedule (New Boroughs).

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the words "The township of Darlington (with the exception of the detached part called Oxen le Field):

The Township of Cockerton: and

So much of the township of Haughton le Skerne adjoining the township of Darlington as is included within the following Boundary (that is to say):

From the eastern angle in the road from Darlington to Yarm of the Boundary between the townships of Darlington and Haughton le Skerne, eastward along the north side of the said road to the point at which it meets Lingfield Lane; thence northward along Lingfield Lane to the point at which it joins the turnpike road leading from Darlington to Stockton; thence in the same direction in a straight line crossing the said road and the River Skerne, west of and near to Haughton Bridge, to the point at which a small rivulet there enters that river; thence up the said rivulet (which forms the western boundary of the playground of Haughton National Schools, and of the graveyard of St. Andrew's Church) to Hardcastle Lane; thence northward and westward up Hardcastle Lane to the point at which it joins Back Lane; thence, westward, along Back Lane for about one hundred and sixty-six yards to the point in it opposite to the angle of the Boundary between the townships of Haughton le Skerne and Cockerton; thence, southward, about sixteen yards to the said angle."

in order to insert the words "Municipal Borough of Darlington."

MR. FREVILLE-SURTEES opposed the Amendment. The universal opinion was in favour of the boundary proposed by the Commissioners, in proof whereof he stated that he had presented a petition to that effect signed by 1,400 persons.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 105; Noes 135: Majority 30.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Third Schedule agreed to.

Fourth Schedule (Places appointed for holding Courts for Election of Members).

MR. WATKIN moved to substitute Stockport for Macclesfield as the place of nomination for East Cheshire.

MR. E. EGERTON said, the subject had been well considered by the Boundary Commissioners and by the Combe Quarter Sessions, who had decided in favour of Macclesfield as the place of nomination for the division of the county. If Stockport were made the place of nomination, half of those who held up their hands at an election would be inhabitants of Lancashire and not of Cheshire.

MR. CHEETHAM said, Stockport is the centre of a population of 120,000 of the people of Cheshire.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, that the subject had been very fully considered by the Boundary Commissioners; and they had come to the conclusion that for many reasons Macclesfield was preferable as a place of nomination for the division of the county to Stockport, which was situated on the borders of the county. It was as well that when there was a nomination those who held up their hands should be inhabitants of the county for which the election was held.

Amendment negatived.

MR. HARDCASTLE moved the insertion of "South Essex" in the second column after "North East Essex," and the insertion in the third column of Stratford after Colchester.

Amendment negatived.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Fifth Schedule (Explanation of the Contents of the Hundreds of Pirehill in Staffordshire).

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY moved the insertion of the Schedule.

Schedule agreed to.

MR. DISRAELI said, he had not anticipated that they would make so much progress as had been made that evening, and he was not prepared therefore to move a clause he wished to have inserted with reference to the compound-householder. He would put the clause on the Paper to-morrow, and propose it on Monday.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 165.]

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM—
REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
(SCOTLAND) BILL—[Bill 164.]
(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson).

CONSIDERATION.

MR. NEATE rose to move the following clause:—

"Whereas the county of Sutherland does not now contain but is capable of containing a sufficient number of independent owners or occupiers to form a fit constituency for the exercise of the franchise, the right of the county of Sutherland to return a Member to Parliament shall from and after the passing of this Act be suspended until Parliament shall otherwise direct."

The proposal that Sutherland, with only 181 electors, should retain its Member, had never been brought before the House in its naked deformity. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had said a great deal of what Sutherland was not, but might be; and this clause was exactly in conformity with the right hon. Gentleman's views, for it proposed the suspension of the seat until these bright prospects were realized, and Sutherland became really less of an estate and more of a county. At present, in an electoral sense, it was nothing but a stagnant pool. The number of its voters and its population had declined; and the next lowest county population in Scotland was that of Bute, which had 510 electors against 181 in Sutherland. Even if Caithness were added to Sutherland it would still be in population and electors among the four lowest of the Scotch counties. He was not adverse to the representation of the agricultural population of Scotland, and no class of men would return better Members than the Scotch farmers, but they were not represented in this case. He protested against the sort of compromise that had taken place on this question. Parliament had taken the nomination boroughs from the English Dukes, but the Scotch Dukes were archdukes, whom nobody seemed to dare to look in the face. He hoped that the House would not allow any Duke, Scotch or English, to make a solitude and call it a county. If ten Members were prepared to go into the Lobby with him he would go.

MR. WHITE seconded the Motion.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

MR. FAWCETT wished to say a word or two. He never gave a vote in that House with more pleasure than the other night, when this question was brought before them; nor did he ever hear a speech with which he so entirely disagreed as with that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. There was not a single argument in it which the duty of a Liberal Member would not lead him to oppose. All the arguments which applied to small English boroughs like Honiton and Arundel applied with far greater force to the county of Sutherland. By retaining a nomination county like this Parliament was encouraging the aggregation of large landed estates, because the possession of such estates was thereby associated with political power. From what he had heard he doubted whether out of the constituency of 181 there were twenty independent electors in Sutherland, and he (Mr. Fawcett) was determined to challenge a division. The great question of re-distribution had yet scarcely been touched, and it would be useful, in the Reformed Parliament, to have a case of this kind to give point to the argument.

MR. CARNEGIE protested against imputations on the independence of the Scotch tenantry, who were not so subservient to landlord influence as some Gentlemen wished to make it appear.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he was one of those who supported the union of Sutherland with Caithness; but, as the House had expressed an opinion against that, he hoped his hon. Friend would not put the House to the trouble of a division upon a clause, the effect of which would be to deprive Scotland of one Member.

MR. M'LAREN said, he could not support the Motion in its present form, as in its present form it would extinguish a Member. It did not propose to unite Sutherland to another county, nor to give its Member to another constituency, as was proposed on former occasions. But if the hon. Member would alter his Motion he would support it.

Motion made, and Question, "That the said Clause be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

MR. CRAUFURD moved the following clause:—

(Register of voters under this Act to be the register for election of town councils.)

"The register of voters for each burgh made up in pursuance of the Registration Acts and this Act shall be the register of voters for the election of the town council in such burgh under the Acts third and fourth William the Fourth, chapters seventy-six and seventy-seven, and twentieth and twenty-first Victoria, chapter seventy, section eight; and every man who is registered as a voter in such register shall be entitled to vote in the election of the town council of such burgh in pursuance of the provisions of the said Acts."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not agree to the insertion of such a clause in this Bill which proposed to deal only with the election of Members of Parliament. The matter of the municipal franchise had been considered by the Government, and they were of opinion that a separate Bill should be introduced on the subject. In a great many boroughs the Parliamentary limits and municipal limits were different, and it would be necessary to delay the municipal elections, as the Register would not be completed in time for these elections, which take place in the beginning of November.

SIR JOHN OGILVY asked if the Lord Advocate would introduce a Bill this Session?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the matter would be taken into consideration.

MR. CRAUFURD said, they should have a positive pledge from Her Majesty's Government that they would bring in a Bill this year.

MR. DALGLISH urged the importance of providing for the election of municipal representatives as soon as possible.

MR. M'LAREN said, that the House ought to receive an assurance from the Government either that they would accept the clause or make the necessary provision by a separate Bill for the re-election of the municipal body.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that the Lord Advocate had already given an assurance that the subject should be attended to.

MR. MONCREIFF said, that as the election to the municipal body would no longer be made from the electoral roll. it was necessary that a supplementary Bill should be introduced if his hon. Friend's clause was not accepted.

THE LORD ADVOCATE repeated that the question could be most conveniently dealt with by a separate Bill.

Motion made, and Question, "That the said Clause be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

Schedule A (Boundaries of Glasgow) agreed to.

Clause 10 (Boundaries of Glasgow) struck out.

Clause 16 (Dwelling Houses to be specially entered in Valuation Rolls).

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 12, after the word "occupiers," to insert the words "and the names of all such tenants and occupiers shall be transferred by the parochial board to the poor rates assessment roll."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

Bill to be read the third time upon Thursday next, and to be printed. [Bill 166.]

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY, Mr. MOWBRAY, and Sir JAMES FERGUSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 168.]

DRAINAGE PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under "The Drainage Act, 1861," ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES FERGUSON and Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 169.]

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, June 12, 1868.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Report—On Compulsory Church Rates Abolition. (No. 143.)

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Fine Arts Copyright Consolidation and Amendment * (145).

Second Reading—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2) * (139).

Committee—Army Chaplains * (116-146).

Report—Compulsory Church Rates Abolition * (55-144).

Mr. Moncreiff

SOUTH-EASTERN AND LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAIL- WAY COMPANIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose to move as an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. The Bill in his opinion was of such a character and so seriously affected the public interests, that objection ought to be taken to it at once, so that their Lordships might see the full effect of its provisions before they referred it to a Committee. He objected to the Bill both in its principle and details—it was a retrogressive step in the policy that had hitherto been pursued with regard to railways. He did not mean to imply that our past policy in regard to railways had been the right one—indeed, he had for many years thought that the system on which the railways of this country had been constructed was a most unfortunate one, involving as it did in so many cases the maximum of expenditure for the minimum of result; and no cases had so strongly exemplified his opinions as those of the three railways, the London, Chatham and Dover, the South-Eastern, and the London, Brighton and South Coast; for although the name of the London, Chatham and Dover Railway did not appear in the title of this Bill, there was a clause in it the purport and object of which was that that railway should be, not amalgamated, but combined with the others, as against the public, in the federation which it was the object of this Bill to establish. Properly speaking, this was not an amalgamation, but a federation Bill. It was essentially the nature of railway companies to create to a certain extent a monopoly, and it was the object of the Bill to establish throughout a large portion of the South of England a complete monopoly which could not be interfered with. These three railways had competed in that extravagance which the existing system of legislation with regard to railways fostered and encouraged, until they had been brought to the verge of ruin; and they were now compelled by the force of circumstances to combine and endeavour to regain from the public the large sums of money they had thus recklessly spent. At all events, this had been openly stated, though he would not trouble their Lordships by reading newspaper extracts on the subject. He was not opposed to amalgamation, even under the present system, to a certain extent and under certain circumstances. In very long lines going from the North to the South or from the East to the West, it was very convenient to the public and economical both to the public and the companies that what was termed an amalgamation should be made. But this case was nothing of the kind, for in the districts affected by the present measure there was no continuous line which called for such an arrangement. The lines in question had been sanctioned by Parliament more or less for the very purposes of competition, and the Companies having ruined themselves, now combined in order to raise their prices and powers of charging fares and tolls in a manner which he boldly asserted was wholly without precedent. And here he would point out to their Lordships that this measure affected not only the public of England but also the public of Europe; because the district over which these railways passed served the seaboard from which we communicated with France and the Continent. Then again, the Bill would affect not the wealthier classes exclusively who could afford to pay, but would press with great severity on the working and lower classes, especially those who resided in the suburbs of the metropolis. It was their own mismanagement that had brought these companies into difficulties, and now they wanted the public to refund them the expense of their extravagance; and they not only asked for a monopoly of the district through which their lines ran, but for the power of at once charging whatever they pleased. It was stated in the newspapers that these Companies had already raised their fares to the maximum allowed by law, and reference to Bradshaw showed that these statements were well founded. This Bill, however, would empower the directors to charge 1½d. a mile for third class passengers by ordinary trains; while, with regard to first and second class passengers by express or fast trains, running at the rate of forty miles an hour or upwards, they proposed that an additional charge without any limit whatever might be imposed. They had the power of reducing the number of trains as they pleased, and if such a power were granted the consequence would probably be that there would be only the smallest possible number of the slowest ordinary trains stopping at every station, and express trains for which an unlimited charge might be made. In fact, there would be the maximum of price and the minimum of accommodation. The Bill also authorized the Companies to impose an additional charge on all passengers to and from metropolitan stations within four miles of Charing Cross—namely 1s. for first class, 9d. for second class, and 6d. for third class passengers. They talked of the hardship inflicted on the working classes by causing them to live in overcrowded dwellings in towns; but what was that to the hardships imposed on those who had gone to live in the country on the faith of low railway fares, and then found the rates raised upon them? This was totally different from the case of a new railway, where the conditions of using it were fixed for the first time; this was a case of railways that were made and the conditions fixed; and now the managers came before Parliament and asked for additional powers of charge. He did not think it at all unreasonable that higher rates should be charged for passage of the necessarily costly bridges over the Thames, and for convenient stations at the London termini; but with every wish that the metropolitan termini and bridges on all the stations on a line should be what they ought to be, he could not but think that in respect of such works some of these Companies had been very extravagant. There had been a waste of money on bridges and stations which would have gone far to furnish an extensive district in the South-west with lines which had been abandoned but which were much required. The Companies which presented the Bill now before their Lordships sought by the Bill to recoup themselves for their vast outlay on bridges and stations; but this was an expenditure the effect of which on the profits of the lines they ought to have considered before they incurred it. It was rather hard that they should now ask for Parliamentary powers to enable them to make the public pay for their extravagance. They now said in effect, "You (the public) must repay us the money which we have squandered." Neither did he think that the districts through which the Companies' lines passed had been so well supplied with railway accommodation as Parliament intended. Powers to make useful railways had been obtained; but the Companies having come to a stand, were obliged to apply to Parliament for relief, and, under the circumstances, Parliament had wisely granted it. He believed, however, that several of those railways might have been constructed in an efficient manner for one-half the money which railway companies had recklessly spent in works which had been made unnecessarily expensive. The Bill had only been put down the previous day for second reading, and that day was the last on which a Private Bill could be read the second time, and therefore he had not much time to learn what was the position of the Bill with regard to opposition; but he had learned that there were petitions against it presented by the Victoria Station Company and by individuals; and he had no reason to doubt that these petitions were genuine, and would be brought before the Committee; he had no doubt either that their Lordships would select an intelligent Committee to consider them, if the Bill were allowed to proceed; but then it was to be remembered that there would be nobody there to represent the general public. At the moment he was speaking those petitions might be diminished; the petitioners might be bought off. There would be nothing wrong in that. If a man had a grievance, when that grievance was redressed he was satisfied; but what was to satisfy the middle class men and the artisans, who coming up to the metropolis from day to day to their avocations, returned in the evening to their homes? Who would look after the interests of those who went from year to year to the Continent? Who would represent the interests of the public in the district at large? Nobody. He did not believe, indeed, that if the Bill did go into Committee, it would be suffered to come out again without great alterations; but he thought it better to call their Lordships' attention to it at this stage, and feeling as he did that the Bill ought not to go on, he thought it more honourable and equitable, and just to all parties, that the Bill should not be read a second time. He therefore moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months.")—
(The Marquess of Clanricarde.)

LORD WHARNCLIFFE said, he had not been able to hear all the observations addressed to their Lordships by the noble Marquess; he had, however, heard many of his statements, and though he concurred with him in thinking that there were objections to certain provisions of the Bill, he did not agree with the noble Marquess in thinking that their Lordships would be acting in the interests of the public by refusing to send it before a Select Committee. In his belief the great object to be considered in a Bill of this kind was—first that the public should be better served by the starting of trains at different times; and the other was that the ruinous competition that had been carried on might be put an end to. If these three Companies could act upon such an arrangement it must turn out to be for the advantage of the public in the greater economy and better management of the line. No line could be managed to the advantage of the public which did not pay the shareholders. Now there could never be economy where two competing lines started trains in opposition to each other from the same points and to the same points. There were in this instance two lines to Dover, and these competing lines caused a great waste of expenditure for a purpose that might be equally well served by the starting of one train. By amalgamation, or working arrangements, traffic of this kind could be worked with greater convenience and safety to the public. Such arrangements enabled directors to diminish their working expenses; and their Lordships knew that when shareholders got a fair return for their investments in a railway they could afford to do more justice to the public. He agreed with the noble Marquess in thinking that some of the charges in the Bill were too high; but this was a matter which could be dealt with by a Committee. He hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would read the Bill a second time.

The Marquess of Clanricarde

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I think this Bill ought to be read a second time, and in the ordinary course referred to a Select Committee. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) in moving his Amendment, admitted that he was taking a very unusual course; and he said his only justification for that course was that he thought it would be fairer to all parties to reject the Bill on the second reading. I differ altogether from the noble Marquess in that conclusion, because I believe that it would be best for all parties that the Bill should be read a second time. To the general principle of amalgamation I am not opposed. Further, I think the tendency of our legislation of late years has been in that direction. I find by a Return which I recently laid on your Lordships' table, that since 1860 there have been no fewer than 163 Bills for amalgamation, and 352 for working arrangements, which Bills extend over something like 9,000 miles of railway. Therefore, the principle of this measure is not a novel one, or one founded on a principle which has not received some amount of favour at the hands of your Lordships and the other Branch of the Legislature. In many cases, I believe, the effect of such Bills is to benefit the Companies and the public. By enabling the Companies to work the line with greater economy, they enable it to serve the district and the public better—always supposing that the Bill is thoroughly sifted, with the view of seeing that the interests of the public, as well as those of the shareholders, are provided for. At the same time I am bound to admit that there are many provisions in this Bill which require very attentive examination. The other day I had the honour to receive at the Board of Trade a large and influential deputation from Surrey, Sussex, and other districts of the country affected by this Bill, and the members of that deputation urged on me the necessity of the progress of the Bill being arrested; but I must add that as far as I could gather all the objections of the deputation were objections of detail and not so much against the principle of amalgamation or working arrangements amongst companies. I followed the noble Marquess in his observations, but I could not gather from anything he said reasons which, in my opinion, ought to induce your Lordships to reject the Bill on the second reading; for, after all, his objections to are objections of detail. If the principle be right that companies should be amalgamated, or working arrangements should be entered into by them, by means of which a large saving may be effected, there seems to me to be no reason why this Bill should not go before a Select Committee, who could deliberate on the points now put forward as matters of objection to its provisions. I quite agree with the noble Marquess, in the first place, that the tariff of charges is objectionable, and ought to be revised. I quite agree also that the clause concerning the termini is an objectionable one, and one that ought to be left for re-consideration. The clause which enables towns to object to what they consider a new service, and not so favourable to them, ought, I think, to be very much extended, and to apply to the other towns on the line as well as to the four mentioned. These are points which may usefully be left to the Committee on the Bill to consider; I do not wish to be supposed to dictate to them, but merely to throw out the views which occur to me, and which might meet many of the objections of the noble Marquess. Whether the provisions of this Bill, in case it should pass the Legislature, should not be liable to revision at the expiration of a certain time, just as would happen under the Lands Clauses Act in the case of an agreement sanctioned by the Board of Trade is, also, I think, matter for consideration. In such cases, at the end of ten years, the agreement is re-considered; and parties aggrieved have the opportunity of complaining and of insisting upon alterations before a new agreement is entered into. If some such clause as that were introduced into this Bill, it would meet a great many of the objections of the noble Marquess. I believe that the Committee will be fully competent to decide, upon the evidence put before them, whether the amalgamation ought to be effected or not; and, in my opinion, the evidence will be laid before them far more clearly than it would be possible to lay the facts before your Lordships in a mere statement in this House. I therefore hope your Lordships will consent to give the Bill a second reading, and allow it to go before a Committee in the usual manner.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he was glad that this question of amalgamation had been raised not in Committee but in the Whole House; and he must express both his great satisfaction at the tone of the present debate, and his regret that the Legislature had not earlier laid down more intelligible principles for the guidance of its Committees in a matter of such great importance. Up to the present moment it was quite uncertain, and depended upon the constitution of any given Committee, whether the fact of a railway coming before them as a competitive line, formed a recommendation or an objection in the eye of the Legislature. He could not help feeling that both Houses of Parliament had to a certain extent neglected their duty, and had been in the habit of "shuffling off," if he might say so, upon Committees of their own body the decision of questions of principle upon which it would have been their duty, and would have been much to the advantage of the country at large, had they expressed some definite and clear opinion for the guidance of their Committees, since for want of such guidance the decisions of Committees, though composed of most conscientious, intelligent, and painstaking Members, had been in the highest degree incongruous and conflicting. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) objected to the principle of amalgamation—that was to say, the suppression of competition between railways through a large tract of country. But, for his own part, he believed that we were only now arriving by means of amalgamation at the reasonable principle which ought to have guided railway legislation from the commencement. As he had ventured to state in Parliament and elsewhere, more than twenty years ago, in the case of gas and water supply, and of railways, the companies undertook a duty which could not be economically or advantageously carried on upon any principle but that of a monopoly—that was to say, employing one capital, instead of half a dozen, to do the work for which capital was required; the public interest being protected by very stringent regulations enforcing adequate service and limiting the charges to a reasonable amount. Till very recently the whole of our legislation on this subject was of the most haphazard character, and hundreds of millions of money had been squandered in needless contests. It was therefore satisfactory to find an increasing tendency to recognize the principle of amalgamation and of monopoly under certain circumstances. But while he expressed his satisfaction at the gradual adoption of the principle of amalgamation, he must admit that the noble Marquess had rendered great service in calling attention to the impudent provisions brought forward by these railway companies, and proposed to be imposed upon the public to compensate them for the money which they had squandered in the most improvident and ruinous contests. Much of this, no doubt, was due to the neglect of their duty by the Legislature, which had led to so many of such contests; but he did not think the public ought ever to be called upon to pay, either in the shape of increased passenger or traffic charges, for wasteful expenditure upon foolish decoration or upon branches, or for that jobbery or positive fraud which had recently been detected in the accounts of some railway companies. He agreed with an admirable remark made by a noble Lord, formerly President of the Board of Trade, on a former occasion—that this power to impose at will additional charges on traffic was equivalent to the imposition of heavy import and export duties, which were liable most injuriously to affect our trade and manufactures in their present severe competition with the various nations of the world, and were none the less annoying to the payers of them because the proceeds went not into the Imperial Treasury, but into the pockets of some grasping company. He quite agreed with what had been said as to the helplessness of the public in matters of this kind. Though the whole public body might be deeply interested in particular clauses of a Railway Bill, it did not affect any one individual so severely as to make it worth his while to undergo what he himself knew from sad experience to be the great inconvenience and serious cost of appearing before a Parliamentary Committee; and, therefore, unless the Chairman of Committees and the Members of Committees who might be appointed did justice, not only between the two parties represented by counsel—who might beat issue upon particular points, and yet perfectly ready to join in the plunder of an unsuspecting public—but also kept in view the interests of third parties, not represented before the Committee, they would fail in their duty as guardians of the general interests. As in times past the public would be liable to be grossly maltreated and cruelly plundered by companies, to whom, under certain restrictions, it would have been much more wise to give a practical but carefully regulated monopoly. Amalgamations, if properly watched and restricted, were of advantage to the public as well as to the shareholders by introducing system, order, and economy into the working of one great branch of the public service.

Earl Fortescue

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER believed that working arrangements such as were contemplated by the Bill might be made very advantageous for the public. Great inconvenience had been suffered by the district through which these lines passed from the competition of the three systems of railways dealt with by this Bill. Representing, as he might be said to do, the public interest in one of the counties affected by the Bill, and also being a frequent traveller upon all three lines of railway, he trusted their Lordships would not refuse a second reading to the measure. The Bill contained many matters of detail to which reasonable objections had been made, and which it was most desirable should be considered by a Select Committee; but he thought it for the public advantage that the Bill should be read the second time.

LORD REDESDALE said, he quite concurred in the opinion that the Bill should be sent to a Select Committee, because to do otherwise would be to act contrary to the usual practice. The circumstances attending this Bill were, however, such as to increase the regret that he had often expressed that we had no efficient Railway Board in this country to report on schemes for the guidance of Parliament. The noble Earl had said that the House could most properly take these matters into its own hands: but that was impossible; each case rested on grounds peculiar to itself, totally beyond the power of Parliament adequately to weigh without the assistance of some specially qualified tribunal or some competent public officer. Proceeding to deal with the Bill, he was, as a rule, in favour of amalgamation in certain cases; such as those, for instance, which formed continuous lines out of London to distant parts of the country, either direct or by branches connected with the main line, because amalgamation in such cases resulted in greater accommodation to the public from the working and management being uniform. But the amalgamation proposed by this Bill of great lines running to the South and East was of a totally different character, distinct from anything that had ever been heard of before. It proposed to unite all the lines running from the centre of London to the South-eastern district into one great concern. Hitherto the principle of such amalgamations as had taken place had been of an exactly contrary character; and, under any circumstances, it had more than once been discovered, even by the railway companies themselves, that an amalgamation was undesirable. For instance, the Midland Company for some time approached London by the North-Western Company; then at enormous expense secured a second approach through the Great Northern; and finally found an approach of its own absolutely necessary to carry on the immense amount of traffic produced by its district. Such arrangements as those made by the Midland Company were highly approved by him. The noble Duke at the head of the Board of Trade, and, therefore, in a most unfortunate position with respect to railway legislation, had spoken of this Bill as having for its object to bring certain lines into unison, so that trains should not start from London at the same time for the same places. But almost the only place of any importance at which more than one of these lines ended was Dover; and the South-Eastern ran through a totally different country from that traversed by the London, Chatham and Dover. Now, although it might happen that the amalgamation sought for would benefit the companies by reducing the number of trains they would send to Dover, yet the districts through which the two lines passed would certainly suffer if the existing competition were put an end to, and would be deprived of much of the accommodation they now enjoyed. In fact, it was evident that the chief object of those promoting the amalgamation was to get what was called "economy of working" by reducing much of the accommodation the public at present enjoyed; the Companies, in fact, desired to get more out of the public in exchange for less service. Describe it how you would, that was the real motive for promoting the Bill. It was true a considerable advantage would result from amalgamation to those who used the metropolitan lines south of the Thames in connection with the three great Southern and Eastern lines, because no doubt under an amalgamated management the various trains would be made to correspond from the different metropolitan termini; but this consideration should not be allowed to outweigh his fundamental objection to handing over a whole district to one concern. Hitherto, moreover, amalgamation schemes had generally been accompanied by a proposed reduction of fares as an earnest of good faith; this scheme, on the contrary, asked for an increase of fares, which he characterized as absolutely novel and objectionable. The promoters had also made a most extraordinary request; they had absolutely asked for power to make unlimited charges—a thing that had never been before heard of in connection with railway legislation. If the House sanctioned such a proposal, it would be opening the door to impositions on the public of the most dangerous character. He had expressed a hope that the Bill would be sent to a Select Committee; but at the same time he reserved to himself entire freedom to deal with the measure when it was again before their Lordships in whatever manner he might think the interests of the public required. There was no doubt the Bill had come from the Commons in a most objectionable shape; and the circumstances attending its passage not only through the Committee of the Lower House, but also through the House itself—he spoke of the discussions upon it—had caused him the greatest surprise. The noble Marquess who opposed the Bill had well remarked, however, that there were a great many very important points of detail that could not be efficiently considered before any Committee, because no one appeared before it thoroughly competent and empowered to conduct the opposition to the measure in all respects—there could be no organized representation of the public opinion or of the public interests. Objections, trifling in themselves but also sound in themselves, might be set up by individuals or small communities—any particular place—Sevenoaks or Canterbury—might feel that it would suffer severely if this amalgamation were carried out—but everyone knew how easy it was for the promoters to take them each objector in his turn, and defeat them separately. A larger consideration of the subject was wanted than could be got before a Committee; what was wanted was, in fact, an efficient Railway Board to deal with all schemes in a broad and comprehensive manner for the information of Parliament.

LORD TAUNTON said, he entirely joined with the noble Lord, the Chairman of Committees in his desire for the establishment of a Railway Board, able to deal comprehensively and impartially with all railway schemes requiring Parliamentary sanction. He felt that the thanks of the House were due to the noble Marquess for having called attention to the subject. It was clear that railway legislation was entering on a new phase, and it was of great importance that its true character and consequences should be carefully watched. Although it could not be doubted competition was in many cases an evil, as tending in cases of foolish opposition, to raise, rather than bring down fares, and thus put a drag on the trade of the country, yet monopoly was still more to be dreaded. He thought that the Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee, and he trusted the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees and the noble Duke at the head of the Board of Trade, whose services he highly prized, would carefully watch its progress, and would be prepared to state to the House, when the Bill came back, a matured opinion as the course they would recommend for adoption. He should reserve to himself the right of opposing the Bill on its third reading, if it should appear on its coming out of Committee that its defects remained uncorrected. He believed strongly in the general principle that it was much safer to intrust the discussion of private Bills to Select Committees, because, in his opinion, a Select Committee was a more impartial tribunal than the House. Still, in such a case as the present he believed it to be their Lordship's duty to give to the measure on its return from the Select Committee a careful and an attentive consideration.

Lord Redesdale

EARL GREY said, he trusted the noble Marquis, to whom they were all indebted for bringing this subject before the House, would not, after the discussion of that evening, object to the Bill being read a second time with a view to its being referred to the Select Committee. He should, like the noble Lord (Lord Taunton), claim to himself perfect freedom of action in regard to the Bill when it came back to the House; and if he found that its objectionable features had not been removed in the Committee he should be happy to support the noble Marquis if he renewed his opposition to the measure on the third reading. Among the most objectionable of the provisions contained in the Bill was that, perhaps, relating to the raising of the fares. He could not help thinking that if a railway company proposed to adopt a certain rate of fares, and upon that proposed rate obtained permission to establish a monopoly—for such, in reality, a railway was—it should not upon any condition be afterwards permitted to raise its fares. The fact was, that at the time Parliament granted powers to a company to construct a railway, a contract was virtually entered into by the railway company to convey passengers on certain terms, and those terms could not be afterwards disregarded without a breach of the virtual contract originally entered into between the company and the public. Still less should such a proposition be listened to when it emanated from the Companies south of the Thames, because it was notorious that the difficulties and embarrassments of those companies were the result of the grossest extravagance and mismanagement—or worse. He trusted, therefore, that Parliament would not in the slightest degree listen to any suggestion for permitting the Railway Companies to increase their fares. The Select Committee should also take care—in case the amalgamation was sanctioned at all—that the accommodation of the public was sufficiently provided for. The noble Lord the Chairman of Committees had very truly pointed out that, though a smaller number of trains might be sufficient for the Dover continental service, the districts through which those trains ran ought to be protected against the want of proper communication with which they were threatened. He further hoped that the amalgamation, if conceded at all, would be conceded for a limited time—that, at the end, say, of ten years at the outside, Parliament should have the opportunity of revising the whole arrangements. By some such alterations as those which he had suggested the Bill might, perhaps, be deprived of its present objectionable features. Now, he agreed in the remark that some more effectual means were required for fairly bringing the interests of the public under the consideration of the Committee. It might, perhaps, be advisable that some officer belonging to the Board of Trade, or some person especially selected to watch over the public interests, should be appointed to assist the members of the Committee with his advice; while he was also inclined to believe that in such a case as the present it might be advisable to have a stronger and a more numerous Committee than was usually appointed. He believed, too, that in order that the legislation of Parliament on railway matters should meet the real wants of the country, and provide for the service being performed with the efficiency and economy which were so necessary to the general, and more especially to the commercial, interests of the country, a special Department ought to be created, subject to the control of Parliament. He had frequently expressed an opinion that what they really required was a well-constituted Department, composed of men of ability and knowledge, who should sit during the whole year—or, at all events, during the time the Law Courts were sitting—so as not to crowd the whole of their business into a few months, and transact it under a pressure of time which, while it greatly added to the expense incurred, at the same time injured the efficiency of the work they had to perform; and it should be the duty of this Department to report on the matters which came under their consideration, and that their Reports should be submitted to Parliament for them to deal with. They ought, moreover, to be guided by some distinct and intelligible principle, instead of, as at present, not adhering to the same policy for two years in succession; because the want of uniformity which was now so apparent led to the imposition of an enormous charge upon the public, while it also contributed in no small degree to the present unsatisfactory state of affairs.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that as his object would be attained by the full examination which the Bill would have in the Select Committee, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn; then the original Motion was agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed; the Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection.

RELIEF OF THE POOR.

ADDRESS FOR A ROYAL COMMISSION.

THE MARQUESS TOWNSHEND rose to move That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to request that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the Operation and Administration of the Laws for the Relief of the Poor in England and Wales. The noble Marquess, who was imperfectly heard, was understood to say it appeared to him imperatively necessary that no further time should be allowed to elapse till an inquiry took place into the administration of the law relating to the relief of the poor, which he could not but consider as a scandal and disgrace to the country, and which had produced among the people a painful feeling of discontent. The subject would require a prolonged investigation, which could not be given to it by Members of the Legislature during the Session; but which could be devoted to it by them during the Recess, aided by gentlemen best fitted for such an inquiry. It was only necessary to call their Lordships' attention to the cases which had been brought forward in the public Press to show that unless something were done the gravest censure would justly be attributed to the administration of the laws relating to the relief of the poor. But in his censure of the system in general, and in some degree of those who had the administration of relief, he rejoiced that he was not obliged to point out any defect, or want of skill, or efficiency on the part of the noble Lord who now presided over the Department. It was the system itself which was condemned by the public at large. In speaking of the numerous scandals which had been made public it was impossible to say what was the number that still remained unknown. When it was considered that workhouses were literally prisons, though those confined had been guilty of no fault but poverty, the importance of classification among the inmates must be at once apparent. Yet in this respect how little had been done. Another point to which he must call attention was the system of unpaid nurses in workhouses, and who were in many cases totally unfit for their duties. Very little had been done to improve the condition of things in this respect. It was also most important that the system pursued with reference to the appointment of medical officers should be altered. There were cases which had appeared in the public papers, where it had been shown that the officers who had discharged their duty in the most able manner had been hunted out of their places because they had ventured to perform their duties in a proper and humane spirit. In connection with the internal economy of workhouses, it was impossible not also to allude to the state of the casual wards in the provinces. He admitted that considerable improvements had been effected in this respect, but much remained to be accomplished. It was well known that in some instances masters of workhouses had been appointed without due regard to qualification, and there were cases in which they had been appointed, notwithstanding a previous dismissal from office. Again, attention should be directed to the miserable pittance doled out to paupers advanced in years and not admitted into the houses—it was not enough to keep body and soul together. He entirely agreed with a very able article which had recently appeared in the leading journal on this subject, in which many evils of the present system were traced to the defective constitution of the Boards of Guardians. It would be presumption in him to endeavour to point out the proper remedies for the evils of the present system; but he hoped their Lordships would give full consideration to so important a subject, and that the imperfections of the advocate would not damage the cause he had undertaken. He would not attempt to point out the remedies that were required. That he would leave to noble Lords who were much more competent than himself; and he hoped their Lordships would therefore consent to an Address for a Royal Commission who might inquire into the subject during the Recess, and report to the House at the meeting of Parliament.

The Marquess Townshend

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to request that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the Operation and Administration of the Laws for the Relief of the Poor in England and Wales.—(The Marquess Townshend.)

THE EARL OF DEVON said, it was not from any want of respect for the noble Marquess, nor from any failure to appreciate the purity of his motives, that he felt bound to oppose the Motion; but he felt so on the broad ground that the noble Marquess had failed to make out any sufficient ground for the presentation of an Address to Her Majesty. The whole subject connected with the details of the administration of the Poor Law had, during the past few years, been investigated by Committees of both Houses of Parliament, and had undergone careful and thorough examination; and with regard to any individual case of grievance or oppression, he could only say that it had always been the object and the desire of the Poor Law Board, and that it was still, to cause the fullest inquiry to be made into it whenever it was brought under their notice. There was at all times the greatest desire to give the fullest information to their Lordships upon every point connected with the working of the Poor Laws, and any information in the possession of the Department would be freely placed at the disposal of the noble Marquess. The noble Marquess had spoken of twenty cases of death from starvation within a limited period; but if his noble Friend could point to one case of that character in which due and proper inquiry had not been made, no time should be lost in making it. While he differed from the noble Marquess as to the necessity for the appointment of a Commission, he did not differ upon certain important principles. One was that the law should be administered economically, in such a way as to relieve real destitution, and yet to prevent the money of the ratepayers from being paid to those who did not deserve it; and this was the principle which the Department would always endeavour to enforce.

He fully agreed with the noble Marquess as to the necessity for the employment of paid nurses in the hospitals and infirmaries. This was a point to which the Board had given anxious attention; the Bill before the House would give the Guardians increased power to appoint such officers, and it would be the constant endeavour of the Board to enforce the carrying out of the measure when it was passed. He entertained the same sense of the importance of classification as the noble Marquess did. The Board had used every exertion in this respect, and had lost no opportunity of improving and introducing it wherever they could; and he believed that if the noble Marquess would inspect the various metropolitan workhouses, he would find that it had already been carried out to a considerable extent. The inspectors had given great attention to the subject of vagrant wards in the metropolis; and but yesterday, in company with the Secretary of the Board, and on the invitation of the guardians of Marylebone, he visited the new vagrant wards which they had provided, which seemed to furnish all that could be desired in the way of ventilation, cleanliness, and separate accommodation, and which were but a sample of what was being done in various parts of the metropolis. Repeating his readiness to give his noble Friend the fullest information in reply to any question he might put, he concluded by urging that no necessity had been shown for the appointment of a Commission.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

ARMY CHAPLAINS BILL—(No. 116.)

(The Earl of Longford.)

COMMITTEE.

Adjourned Debate on Motion "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee."—(The Earl of Longford.)

Debate resumed.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that looking at what occurred on Thursday evening, and also at the Amendments to be moved in Committee of which Notice had been given by the right rev. Prelate who presided over the see of Gloucester and Bristol, the Government had considered the question with the view of seeing how far they were able to meet the wishes expressed on Thursday evening, and embodied in the Amendments. Questions were then raised as to two points—first, as to the term "Royal peculiars" and the arrangement by which it was proposed to exempt army chaplains, and the chapels in which they officiated, from the interference of the parochial incumbents; and, second, the question whether army chaplains should be subjected to the superintendence of the Bishop of the diocese in which the encampment was placed, or whether they should be subjected, as the Government proposed, to a Bishop or Archbishop appointed by the Government. With regard to the first point, objection had been taken to the creation of additional Royal peculiars, and considering that they had been for some time abolished, and that while they were in existence they had created a good deal of confusion, it was considered desirable not to revive them, and the Government, therefore, adopted the proposal of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol) to substitute the term "extra-parochial district." The effect of this substitution throughout the Bill would be to place army chaplains serving in these extra-parochial districts under the Bishop of the diocese in which they are situate; but the Government could not assent to this arrangement. The position of an army chaplain was very different from that of a curate of the Church of England. The army chaplain had to minister to the soldiers in his charge, and he had also to act in subordination to the commanding officer, who also was bound to submit to his superiors. The army chaplain was also liable to be removed frequently from place to place, and from the jurisdiction of one commanding officer to that of another; and this involved his removal from one diocese to another; and it would be inconvenient with regard to many points of administrative detail if the accident of his being placed in any particular district necessarily and ipso facto subjected him to the episcopal superintendence of the Bishop presiding over that diocese. It was to be remembered that army chaplains had never been subject to any episcopal superintendence, and it was perhaps most desirable that they should be brought under such control, due regard being had to the proper exercise of their spiritual functions; but at the same time it would be a novel expedient if persons so peculiarly and abnormally situated as army chaplains were to be subjected necessarily to the Bishop of the diocese in which their duties placed them. On the other hand, in cases where a number of army chaplains were congregated together in a camp it might be desirable that the Bishop of the diocese should not be necessarily deprived of the superintendence over them. He might exercise his jurisdiction with great benefit in such cases. But then some latitude should be allowed to the Crown, which ought to have a discretionary power to appoint, under exceptional circumstances, another Bishop to superintend these extra-parochial places. As, therefore, it was not expedient, necessarily, to put these places under the jurisdiction of the Bishops of the dioceses in which they were situate, and as on the other hand it might be desirable to do so in certain cases, the Government proposed so to modify the Bill as to enable Her Majesty in Council from time to time to appoint an Archbishop or a Bishop of the Established Church to exercise episcopal jurisdiction over these extra-parochial places. He had not had time to embody in formal Amendments these views, which he believed were approved by the right rev. Prelates, and therefore he proposed that they should let the Bill pass through Committee pro forma, after which it could be re-printed and re-committed on a subsequent day.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he had no objection to offer to the change of the phrase "Royal peculiar" into "extra-parochial place," if Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that the alteration would not be productive of inconvenience. He thought, however, it would be inexpedient to place these extra-parochial places generally under the control of the Bishops in whose dioceses they were respectively situated; and if this were done under peculiar circumstances, he thought the Crown ought to reserve to itself full power of revoking any Order in Council that might be made on the subject.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, the Amendments proposed by the Government removed the objection which he had raised last night. In some cases the Bishop of the diocese might not be—in consequence of extreme age, for example—a fit and proper person to exercise superintendence over these places; and, therefore, there could be no objection to the Crown giving the jurisdiction to another Bishop under such exceptional circumstances.

The Duke of Marlborough

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 146.)

FINE ARTS COPYRIGHT CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for consolidating and amending the Law of Copyright in Works of Fine Art—Was presented by The Lord WESTBURY; read 1st. (No. 145.)

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, to Monday next.
Eleven o'clock

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, June 12, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Court of Session (Scotland) [45]; Court of Justiciary (Scotland) [46]; Drainage Provisional Order Confirmation * [169].

Committee—Courts of Chancery and Exchequer (Ireland) Fee Funds * [146]; Land Writs Registration (Scotland) * (re-comm.) [111]—2^d. New Zealand Company * [156].

Report—Courts of Chancery and Exchequer (Ireland) Fee Funds * [146]; New Zealand Company * [156].

Considered as amended—Established Church (Ireland) [117]; Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement (Loans) Act Amendment * [133]; Duchy of Cornwall Amendment * [136].

Third Reading—Consecration of Churchyard Act (1867) Amendment * [152], and passed.

METROPOLITAN FOREIGN CATTLE MARKET BILL.—RESOLUTION.

Standing Orders Committee,—Resolution reported;

"That, in the case of the Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market Bill, the Standing Orders ought to be dispensed with:—That the Bill be permitted to proceed."

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he should move an Amendment that the Bill be considered on Monday next. He protested against the course which had been pursued with regard to the Bill. When the Parliamentary Notices for the Bill were given all mention of the main object of the measure was avoided, lest it should occasion alarm to the owners of property who would be affected ; and if this Report were now agreed to without question the promoters of Bills for the future would be able to say, " Don't put anything into the Notices that will excite alarm, but put in any Clauses which might have started objections when the Bill is before the Select Committee, and when the matter goes before the Standing Orders Committee they will allow the Standing Orders to be dispensed with."

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word " That " to the end of the Question, in order to add the words " the further consideration of the said Resolution be postponed till Monday next." — (Mr. Milner Gibson.)

Question proposed, " That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he must complain of the course pursued by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

IRELAND—AUDITOR OF GRAND JURY ACCOUNTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, By what authority the Executive appointed an auditor of Grand Jury Accounts, the salary being payable solely from County funds ?

THE EARL OF MAYO, in reply, said, by the Act 1st Vict., c. 54, s. 1, it was provided that accounts of County Treasurers were to be audited by such officers as the Lord Lieutenant by warrant should authorize. Under this Act the Lord Lieutenant appointed the Chief Remembrancer. Under the same Act the expenses of audit were provided for by a fee of 5s. in every £100. This fee was, by order of the Lord Lieutenant in 1842, reduced to 3s. The Act 6 & 7 Vict., c. 78, provided that the audit of these accounts should form part of the duties of the Chief Remembrancer. By the Act 13 & 14 Vict., jurisdiction in Equity of Exchequer was transferred to the Court of Chancery (s. 15). Mr. Acheson Lyle, then Chief Remembrancer, was made a Master in Chancery, and he and his successors were to perform the duties. Section 17 authorized the appointment of a successor to Mr. Lyle. Master Fitzgibbon now holds that appointment, and his office is maintained and his duties continued by the Act of last year (s. 50). These were the Acts under the authority of which the Executive of the day appointed Mr. Lyle, and continued the office to his successor, Master Fitzgibbon, who was now auditor of County Treasurers' Accounts.

POOR RELIEF ASSESSMENT RETURNS. QUESTION.

MR. CANDLISH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Poor Law Board, When he hopes to lay the Return of Poor Relief Assessments, ordered on the 18th of February, upon the Table of the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, in reply, that 1,500 notices had been sent out, and that only 1,012 persons had forwarded replies, so that up to the present time the Returns were incomplete.

IRELAND—MOUNTJOY CONVICT PRISON. QUESTION.

MR. PIM said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When he will be able to lay upon the Table of the House, the Correspondence between the Treasury, the Irish Government, and Dr. Robert McDonnell, late medical officer of the Mountjoy Convict Prison, relative to the change in the medical management of that prison, by which he was deprived of the office of medical superintendent?

THE EARL OF MAYO said, in reply, that the only reason why the Correspondence between the Treasury, the Irish Government, and Dr. McDonnell, relative to the change in the medical management of the prison, had not been laid upon the table, was that it was not finished. He would take the earliest opportunity of producing it ; but he was afraid it would not be complete for some days.

EX-GOVERNOR EYRE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BROWNLOW KNOX said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the Act of Indemnity passed by the Legislative Chamber of Jamaica, and confirmed by an Order in Council of the Home Government, is or is not a protection to ex-Governor Eyre for all acts done under martial law during the rebellion in the island of Jamaica ; and, if not, will Her Majesty's Government undertake to bring in a Bill to protect Governor Eyre from further prosecutions ?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, in answer to my hon. and gallant Friend I would remind him that the highest legal authorities have declined to give an opinion upon the extent of the Act of Indemnity passed by the Colonial Government on the subject to which he refers; and I think it would be an act of presumption on the part of Her Majesty's Government to pretend to give an opinion to the House upon that point. With regard to our bringing in a Bill to protect Governor Eyre from further prosecutions, I must say that we have no intention of doing so.

COLONEL BROWNLOW KNOX: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he is cognizant of the fact that Her Majesty's late Government did take the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject, and I have it in my pocket at this moment?

MR. DISRAELI: When I spoke of "the highest legal authorities" I did not refer merely to the Law Officers of Her Majesty's late Government.

INDIA — BANK OF BOMBAY — BENGAL AGENCY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether representations have reached him soliciting the removal of the Bengal Bank Agency established at the Presidency of Bombay with the sanction of the Viceroy upon the occasion of the failure of the Bombay Bank, in order that the new bank recently formed at Bombay may not be interfered with by a rival Government Establishment; and, if so, whether the Government is disposed to entertain favourably proposals made to that effect?

MR. DYCE NICOL said, he would beg to ask, Whether the Government have come to any resolution as to the precise terms on which their connection with the Bank is to be continued?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, there has been a communication recently made to the India Office with regard to the continuance of the Bengal Bank Agency at Bombay. That agency was established for a temporary purpose only—for the purpose, as it was understood, of collecting the debts due to the Bank of Bengal at Bombay—and some time ago I took occasion to express to the Government of India my opinion that, as the object for which the collector had been sent to Bombay had been some time since accomplished, I presumed that the agency should be withdrawn. In consequence of the representations which have been made I have written again to the Government of India, asking if there was any necessity for continuing the agency, and adding the request that if such was not the case, immediate steps might be taken for bringing the agency to an end, for it would be obviously incompatible to have two Government banks in the same Presidency. With regard to the Question of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Dyce Nicol), I would remind him that a Commission is now sitting in Bombay, upon the result of the labours of which will depend the future policy of the Government with regard to all the banks in India. With regard to the new bank at Bombay, Articles of Association have been framed under which it exists; but we are not altogether satisfied with those Articles, and a despatch has been sent to the Governor of Bombay requesting him to take measures for incorporating the bank under an Act of the Legislature, and to send home the terms of such incorporation.

Colonel Brownlow Knox

AUSTRALIA—POSTAL COMMUNICATION QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any replies have been received from the Australian Colonies to the Despatches stated by the Postmaster General to have been sent out in the month of October last, on the subject of postal communication with Australia under present arrangements; and, if he has any objection to lay the Paper on the Table?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTHE replied that answers had been received from several of the Australian Colonies on the subject, and there would be no objection to lay them on the table of the House.

IRELAND—GOVERNMENT AND THE PROPOSED ROMAN CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he will place upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Communication by which the Most Reverend Dr. Leahy and the Most Reverend Dr. Derry, acting on behalf of the Roman Catholic prelates in Ireland, broke off the negotiations carried on between them and the Government for the granting of a Charter to a Catholic University in Ireland; and if there be no Letter or Communication on the subject other than those already published, if he will point to any passage in any Letter from these prelates which was understood as intimating a wish to have the negotiations broken off; and whether the communication from Dr. Leahy and Dr. Derry, dated the 31st of March, 1868, was asked for by the Government, and lent by them as suggestions and the expression of opinions on matters then under consideration, or as a final and complete scheme from which they could not deviate?

THE EARL OF MAYO: Sir, no communications have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the right rev. prelates to whom the hon. Member refers, except those which are upon the table of the House. With regard to the remaining part of the Question, I have to state that last year the two right rev. prelates wrote to me, enclosing a copy of a letter which they had addressed to the Earl of Derby. In that letter they state that they were deputed by the Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland to enter into communication with Her Majesty's Government and to apply in their name for a charter and endowment to a Roman Catholic University. On the 14th of March, after I had made my statement in the House, I enclosed to the right rev. prelates the copy of a memorandum which stated the plan of the Government in more detail than I was able to do in my speech. On the 19th of March they addressed to me a letter which is now on the table of the House, stating seven or eight objections which they entertained to the scheme, and expressing their desire for a personal interview with myself or some other Member of the Government. That interview took place on the 24th of March, and after a prolonged conversation—lasting, I believe, an hour and a half—it was agreed that they should state their views at length in writing, and forward them to me. That was done on the 31st of March, in the letter which is also before the House. The Easter Recess intervening, an unavoidable delay took place; but after our return to town we took the matter into consideration, and I addressed to the right rev. prelates an answer, which has been laid upon the table. On the 16th of May I received a simple acknowledgment from Archbishop Leahy of the receipt of that communication; and so the correspondence terminated. The principles professed by the right rev. prelates having been expressed in two letters, and also at a lengthened personal interview, we were naturally led to the conclusion that those were their settled opinions, and that from them they could not depart. Now, those were opinions upon matters of principle of the highest moment. They were, at the same time, entirely at variance with the opinions entertained by Her Majesty's Government upon this most important subject; looking, therefore, at everything that has occurred, we consider the matter to be at an end, and it is not our intention to take any further step with regard to it.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, that the noble Lord omitted to answer the second part of the Question—namely—

“Whether the communication from Dr. Leahy and Dr. Derry, dated the 31st of March, 1868, was asked for by the Government, and lent by them as suggestions and the expression of opinions on matters then under consideration, or as a final and complete scheme from which they could not deviate?”

THE EARL OF MAYO: I thought I had already answered that Question. We considered that the opinion expressed in the letter and also at the interview was a final opinion.

SIR JOHN GRAY then gave Notice that upon some future occasion, on the Motion for a Committee of Supply, he would bring the whole of that Question under the consideration of the House.

INDIA—CHURCH SERVICES.

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether any information has reached him from the Government of India as to dissatisfaction having been manifested by some of Her Majesty's Protestant soldiers at being marched to Divine Service in churches where Ritualistic ceremonies had recently been introduced; and, if so, whether he has any objection to communicate the Papers to the House?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, some Correspondence had taken place on the subject of an occurrence of this kind, and he could not doubt from the hon. Member's description of it that it was the same case. It appeared there were two churches, one at Fort William and the other at Dumdum, where Divine Service was performed in a manner objected to by some of the officers, and, as was stated, also by some of the men of the 60th Rifles. The hon. Member asked if Ritualistic Service had recently been introduced there? It was not a place where any service of that kind had been introduced; the service was performed in the same way as in the time of Bishop Cotton and his successor. The chief objection taken was in reference to the celebration of the Communion, and two of the officers requested permission to attend the Presbyterian Service and take several of the men there, as preferring the Presbyterian Service to that of the Church of England. Some Correspondence took place between the chaplain and the officers, and the matter was referred to the Government of India. The remark made on it by the Commander-in-Chief (Sir William Mansfield) was that the Correspondence was very military on the side of the chaplain, and very theological on the side of the officers. An arrangement had been come to by the Government, and an Order issued that all officers and soldiers should have full liberty to attend at whatever place of worship agreed best with their private convictions. He thought the matter was now entirely at an end, and it was not desirable that the Correspondence should be produced.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE wished to ask his right hon. Friend, If he was aware that since the date of those despatches another chaplain had been appointed to the Fort William Chapel, and that none of the so-called Ritualistic practices existed there?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he was not aware of that fact.

FAMILIES OF MILITIAMEN.

QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Poor Law Board, Whether his attention has been called to the frequency of men belonging to the Militia leaving their wives and families unprovided for during the time of training, and thus becoming chargeable to their respective parishes; and if so, whether there is any means by which a portion of their pay could not be drawn for the maintenance of their wives and families?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, in reply, that unfortunately the bounty and allowances were often squandered by the men who received them; but it was difficult to see how they could be prevented from doing so if they chose. It could not be denied that there was room for improvement in the present arrangements for drawing the pay; but it was rather for the War Office than for the Poor Law Board to provide a remedy.

Sir Stafford Northcote

THE POST OFFICE SERVICE. QUESTION.

MR. MOFFATT said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Why the Annual Report of the Postmaster General for the year 1866, presented to the House on the 12th of August, 1867, has not yet been printed; why the Annual Report from the same Department for the year 1867 has not yet been presented; and, why the assurance given several weeks since by the Secretary to the Treasury, that those Reports should be speedily circulated, has not yet been fulfilled?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the Report for 1866 had been delayed in order that it might be presented along with that for 1867, the events of the year 1866 not being of a very important character. Both Reports would certainly be in the hands of Members within the present month. The reason for the delay that had taken place in the last few weeks was the great extra pressure of business and the increase of correspondence relative to the Electric Telegraphs Bill.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to inquire, If the Report would be laid on the Table before the Vote for the Post Office Service was taken?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the Report, would, he believed, be laid on the table before the Post Office and Steam Packet Estimates were taken.

ARMY—GUNNERY EXPERIMENTS. QUESTION.

MAJOR ANSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, as a section of Plymouth Breakwater Fort was going to be experimented upon at Shoeburyness on Tuesday, he would give hon. Members interested in shields and fortifications an opportunity of inspecting the section on Monday, in order to satisfy themselves what difference there was between that section and the original design?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was sorry his hon. and gallant Friend had not given Notice of the Question, since it would have enabled him to make inquiry. He sincerely wished the experiments to be carried on with due publicity and fairness, and would be glad to confer privately with his hon. and gallant Friend on the subject. As preparations would be going on on Monday, it might, he apprehended, be inconvenient if an unlimited number of visitors were admitted.

REGISTRATION LISTS.—QUESTION.

LORD HENLEY said, he would beg to call the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the fact that there are cases in which one part of a parish is in a borough, and the other part of the parish in a county, and to point out that confusion must arise if the overseers do not make out separate lists. He wished to know, Whether the right hon. Gentleman would cause the Clerks of the Peace to send instructions to the overseers to make out separate lists?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that provision was made in the Bill for separate lists of borough and county voters in those parishes which were partly within boroughs and partly within counties. It was, however, impossible for him to give instructions to clerks of the peace which he had at present no legal authority to issue.

EX-GOVERNOR EYRE AND HIS EXPENSES.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies a Question which he had privately asked him yesterday. It had reference to the Despatch spoken about a few days ago by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), who described it as dated February 1867, and containing an engagement, in fulfilment of which a communication had been made to Mr. Eyre, asking him to send in an account for the expenses which had been incurred. He wished to know, If such Despatch had been printed—having searched for it in vain—and whether there will be any objection to lay it upon the Table?

MR. ADDERLEY: If the hon. Gentleman will move for it I have no objection to give it.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CASE OF POLICE SERGEANT STONE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the causes of the dismissal of Police Sergeant Stone from the Metropolitan Police Force. In the year 1864 Sergeant Stone was stationed at Ealing. He had been a police officer for twenty years, and had been at Ealing eight years. Owing to ill health, resulting from a hurt received in the discharge of his duty, he was temporarily incapacitated from the discharge of his duty, and a man named Monsell was employed for the time as his substitute. Subsequently to this Stone received a summons at twelve o'clock one night to appear the next day before the Chief Commissioner of Police in London to answer two charges preferred against him by Monsell. One was that he had clapped his hands in the presence of the police magistrates in a case at Brentford; and the other was that he had written an anonymous letter. With respect to the first, the magistrates themselves, on being appealed to, declared their belief in his innocence; so that the only point requiring consideration was that of the anonymous letter. Captain Labalmondiere, before whom Stone appeared, told him that he had written an anonymous letter, and on that ground suspended him from his office of sergeant, and shortly afterwards dismissed him altogether from the force. He was dismissed without having any opportunity given him of seeing the letter, or of disproving the charge by comparing it with his own handwriting; and for two years he remained under the stigma of having written that letter, no inquiry or investigation meanwhile being made into his case in order fairly to decide the truth of the accusation for which he was suffering. During those two years numerous letters upon the subject were written by Stone to the Home Office, public meetings were held at Ealing, and petitions were presented on his behalf from the clergy, churchwardens, and overseers; and at last, in October, 1866, he was informed that if he would go before Sir Richard Mayne with an "expert" he might see the anonymous letter, and compare it with his own handwriting. Stone complied with the request, and was accompanied by Mr. Netherclift, who examined the anonymous letter, and also some letters written by the sergeant, and gave Stone a certificate that there was no possibility of the communications having been written by the same person. One would have thought that the first thing Sir Richard Mayne would have done would be to express his regret, and then to have either re-instated him or given him the pension to which he was entitled. Stone made continuous applications to the authorities, and after a further interval of seven months he received from Lord Belmore, then Under Secretary for the Home Department, a letter, stating that a pension could not legally be granted to him; but that, having regard to his good conduct and twenty years' service, Mr. Secretary Hardy had awarded him a gratuity of £106 3s. 4d. (being at the rate of one month's pay for each year's service), but that this was not to be considered as affecting any decision in his case. Sergeant Stone replied, accepting the gratuity, but saying it was not to be held as affecting the statutory declaration of his innocence of the charge on which he was dismissed. At the end of fifteen years a police sergeant was entitled to a pension of £34 per annum, and the sum to which Sergeant Stone claimed to be entitled was based upon the capitalization of that £34 per year, and amounted to £340. The pension was not merely the result of his services; but was also partly the accumulation of something like 4d. or 6d. a week which was paid by the sergeants of the force to a general fund; so that the case was a very hard one. Mr. Stone was now broken in health, and injured by the charge brought against him, although he had disproved it. All that he now asked was to have the same amount of pension, or the capitalization of it, as he would have been entitled to had he not been dismissed the service, and lain under the stigma of having written the anonymous letter. He (Mr. Labouchere) hoped that justice would be done to the man.

Mr. MONK seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the causes of the dismissal of Police Sergeant Stone from the Metropolitan Police Force,"—(Mr. Labouchere.)

—instead thereof.

Mr. Labouchere

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the case of Police Sergeant Stone arose in the year 1864. Sergeant Stone was called upon to resign by the Chief Commissioner of Police on the 9th of September in that year. The Commissioner of Police, he might mention, had the absolute power of dismissing constables, and there is no appeal from his decision. But the case from the beginning seemed to have excited some interest in the neighbourhood where Stone lived; and from the time when it first arose—when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) was Home Secretary—up to the present time, there had been continual threats that the matter would be brought before Parliament. It was hoped that this would have been prevented by the arrangement which had been made, because he believed the man was amply satisfied so far as the pecuniary part of the matter was concerned. Stone was undoubtedly charged with having written an anonymous letter very prejudicial to one of his comrades. Stone had been invalided, and in the year 1864 was not able to discharge his duties. Another sergeant was sent to the district in his place. An anonymous letter having been sent in, containing grave charges against Stone's successor, it was deemed important to ascertain whether it had been written by any member of the force. By a comparison of that document with the undoubted writing of Stone in the police books, and by the aid of an expert from the Post Office, the conclusion was arrived at that the anonymous letter was written by Stone. Afterwards another expert, without knowing what had occurred before in the matter, came to the same conclusion; and therefore the Commissioner was confirmed in his opinion after the second investigation consequent upon the petition of Stone. The hon. Member said that Stone had not seen the letter. [Mr. LABOUCHERE: I said he was shown the letter, but not allowed to have it in his hand.] Stone had certainly seen the letter, and might have read it if so disposed. The most careful attention had been given to the case by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) when Home Secretary, and that right hon. Gentleman did not think it called for his interference. As to the opinion of Mr. Netherclift with regard to the handwriting of the letter, experts, after all, were only guides to certain similarities in handwriting upon which other persons must judge; and it should be remembered that in one of the greatest cases ever tried—namely, that of Mrs. Ryves—Mr. Netherclift spoke to the authenticity of a mass of documents which were universally discredited, and in respect to which the jury came to the conclusion that he was entirely wrong, and the Judge agreed with them. Stone's case had also been pressed on his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), when his right hon. Friend was at the head of the Home Office; and his right hon. Friend, after very carefully investigating it with Lord Belmore, thought there was a certain amount of doubt about it, and that the anonymous letter might possibly have been an imitation of Stone's handwriting. Under those circumstances, and considering that he had been twenty years in the force before his dismissal, his right hon. Friend thought a gratuity or a small pension, if that were legal, might be given to him for his past services and good conduct; but the law would not allow of a pension being awarded him. A pension could not be given unless a man was sixty years of age, and had been invalided for certain reasons; or if he were below sixty there should be a certificate from the Commissioner of Police that he was incapacitated for certain causes, and that the Commissioner of Police could approve in all respects of his conduct. But the Commissioner of Police still retained the opinion he had at the first with reference to Stone's case. When he himself (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) succeeded to the Home Office his right hon. Friend had just made his decision, and he (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) had acted upon it, granting the man the sum of £106 3s. 4d., being at the rate of a month's pay for every year of his past service. Stone wrote expressing his gratitude and thanks for the gratuity granted him so "kindly, considerately, and justly," to use his own words, guarding himself at the same time by saying—"According to my understanding, my acceptance of the gratuity does not affect the statutory declaration which I made of my innocence. I tender my most humble and sincere thanks for the gratuity." He said, "The money will be a great boon to me;" but he added that as the gratuity was not enough to compensate him for the future, he hoped that if an opportunity offered of making a messenger of him that would be done. Stone was, however, too old for anything of that kind. In conclusion, in his (Mr. Gathorne Hardy's) opinion, ample justice had been done in the case. It was by no means so clear a case of hardship as the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere) thought. The man had received enough in the shape of gratuity; and he (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) believed that if others had let him alone he would have been satisfied.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere) deserved the thanks of his constituents for the trouble he had taken in that matter, which, though small in itself, had, it was satisfactory to find, received great care and attention from the Home Office. It would be still more gratifying if the right hon. Gentleman opposite could say that he contemplated giving Stone some slight additional gratuity or a small situation. Unless the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) intervened in the debate and told the House that there was a stronger case in favour of this man than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford thought, he would recommend his hon. Friend not to press his Motion to a division.

MR. WALPOLE said, he could confirm what had fallen from his right hon. hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Greater pains could not be taken than had been bestowed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir George Grey) in examining all the particulars bearing on that case. He (Mr. Walpole) had examined the whole of the Papers in the case, and his opinion was that under the circumstances ample justice had been done to Stone by the pecuniary acknowledgment which he had received. The only thing that had weighed with him was that Stone had never had an opportunity of seeing the anonymous letter and comparing it with his own handwriting. No more could legally have been given him, and it would, he thought, be very unadvisable to grant a Committee to inquire into a subject which had already been so fully investigated.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that he did not see that any advantage could accrue from further investigation of the subject. He remembered the circumstances of the case perfectly. The evidence was very strong as to Stone being the author of the letter, and he was glad to find that some doubt had been thrown on it. The course which had been taken by both the right hon. Gentlemen opposite in the case was not only just but generous towards Stone.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that after these expressions of opinion he would not press his Motion to a division.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he thought it was worthy of the consideration of the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it was just that a member of the police force who had conducted himself well for twenty years, and earned the esteem of all persons in the neighbourhood where he performed his duty, should be discharged or called upon to resign upon a charge being made against him, without that charge being fully and fairly investigated?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that there was a double inquiry before the subject came under the notice of the Home Office.

COLONEL FRENCH observed that there was power in the head of the Police to dismiss on his own opinion of a case.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LOCAL RATING.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. CORRANCE said, it is, perhaps, necessary that I should explain in a few words the reason I have in calling the attention of the House to this subject, and the causes from which, as I think, a necessity may seem to exist. It cannot, I think, but be observed by those who have followed up the business of this Session, that of all other questions, those connected with rates have been oftenest brought before the House. First we had the Committee on the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, which I hoped might have saved me the necessity of the present appeal by comprehending in the scope of its inquiry the whole bearing of these Acts. Then came the Motion of the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) on the Metropolitan Rates, in which he disclosed some most significant and valuable facts. The Mines Assessment Bill followed next, and a very little later the discussion upon the burdens of land, so ably introduced by the hon. Member for Wiltshire. In each instance local taxation lay at the root of the question advanced. At present both the Turnpike and Highway Bills, as well as that upon Education, have reference to this. Perhaps it may be thought that under such repeated inquiry, so often renewed, the matter must be fully winnowed out. It may seem strange to say that the contrary is the case, and the frequency of these occasions, as well as their great variety, establishes, I think, a necessity not otherwise so great. I must deprecate such partial treatment as this. If change is required of such a kind, this, I think, will be obvious to most — that, starting from a false point, if we attempt to legislate partially we shall but increase the difficulties which exist, and multiply those obstacles of which we now complain. Hence the necessity of inquiry, beginning from the root. Is this necessity justified by fact? With the scope of my present address I shall not go into detail upon this, for I think that even general considerations will suffice. The office of the Committee for which I move will be to investigate facts. Am I entitled to this? Now, if I show that at their very origin the scope and intention of these Rating Acts were imperfectly defined; if I am able to show that that intention has not been clearly laid down since; and that, confused by judgment and complicated by events, it has become a mass of incoherent legislation, incapable of just application or legal interpretation, perhaps it may be thought that there is good ground for this. If I can show that, starting from such a point, other taxes have been successively imposed upon such a base, either simply a matter of convenience, or accident, or custom alone, it may be thought that there is some ground for this. If I can show that by the incidence of such taxation a great injury is done to productive industry, and that it falls with severity upon needy and dependent classes, then, deeming such things of no small importance and not unnecessary to consider, I shall with some confidence appeal to this House. And now to the proof. Upon the terms and provisions of the Act of 43 Elizabeth, I need enter at no length. They are well-known to most. Nevertheless, in starting upon our present inquiry, there are some distinctive features which we may note. What was, or rather were, the leading principles upon which this Act was based? Contributions generally levied within a local area upon property and persons alike. What limitation to this?

Sir George Grey

That the property shall be visible, within the place, and that the ability of the person to pay shall be the subject of this tax. Now, to untechnical and unlearned minds no doubt this was simple enough, and of this, perhaps, we can have no more convincing proof than the fact that for 200 years it seems to have suffered no material change, and no important Amendment was either required or introduced. It was, no doubt, both in intention and scope a property tax, and this property of no exclusive class. It required the perverse ingenuity of legal minds to make the problem complex. Well, but what took place? The natural desire to escape taxation did not remain asleep. Subsequently much property became invisible, and, not being local, could not be taxed. The machinery was imperfect, and many kinds of property could not be reached. The customary carelessness of owners of property did the rest; and the easy inheritors of settled estates came into them, accustomed to the hereditary burdens and the parochial rate. Why, what proof of it is this, that previous to the Poor Law Bill of 1833, the whole property had become well-nigh submerged beneath the parish rate! They were in some instances £1 5s. in the pound as levied upon an assumed and fictitious base. One after another subjects of taxation fell out, while nothing was added, but new taxes upon the old base. With the increase of these taxes the desire to escape increased, and the ingenious supply of legal means has never failed to keep pace with the demand in such a case. Soon we have of these exemptions a goodly list. Mines, other than coal mines, woods, stock-in-trade, funded property, and securities, were invisible of course. Personal property, though visible, could not be reached. Ships and merchandize had no local place; and the area of taxation became thus comfortably circumscribed, and fell upon only persons or property which could not be overlooked. It was not until 1840 that stock-in-trade was exempted from the incidence of these taxes. The Act of Elizabeth being thus amicably perverted, what follows? Just as it would seem in the proportion to the diminished liability did the amount and number of their taxes increase, and every day new burdens were added, just as they would now be added in default of vigilance, in a manner most unjust. Let us just glance at the list—namely —

Poor Law Series.	Aggregated. Districts.	Miscellaneous Taxes.
Poor's Rate Workhouse Buildings Survey and Valuation Gaol Fees Highway Militia	County Rate Lunatic Asylum Shire Hall Hundred Police Borough Watch Rate	Sewers Drainage Church

—Of these, the two first are upon the Poor Law basis, none of them either for taxation or expenditure being more extensive than counties; nor are rent-charges, Easter offerings, or tolls, fees, or dues from navigable rivers, included. Now, one objection may be taken to this—namely, that the county rate rests on a separate base. Well, since the Act passed in the 55 Geo. III., c. 51, it has been assessed separately, and by successive Acts, namely 15 & 16 Vict., a consolidation of various statutes has taken place and that of Sir Edward Kerrison, in 1858 widens the area of this rate; but no less are the all more important features of the old poor rate preserved and the exceptions and exemptions are identical in each. Changes affecting the one, also affect the other; and the collection of the rate is made at the same time. Now, what has been the consequence of this? I shall let the answer come from some high authority upon this point, I quote from the Report of the Commissioners in 1843, Sir George Cornwall Lewis, Sir Edmund Head, and George Nichols—names which will inspire respect. They speak thus—“Scarcely anything can be more material than the declaration of the person and properties affected by a tax. Yet there is hardly an instance of any modern rate in which the purpose has been legally or unambiguously effected; not because there is any difficulty in effecting it, but because the draftsman dispensed with looking at the statute 43rd Elizabeth, and Parliament and the public had no ready means of checking the draftsman while the Bill was in progress. Then the highway rate is made a tax on property, without apparently following the person. In the militia rate the error is reversed, 43rd Geo., and the effect is to omit both the chief person and chief property, and to charge only persons liable to poor's rate in respect of stock-in-trade. The County Rate Act refers to occupiers of estate and property, and omit inhabitants as well as parsons and vicars, 55 Geo. III., c. 51, s. 12, while as regards the property to be rated the confusion is extraordinary, being described for parishes where poor's rates are made by terms inapplicable to the property liable to the poor's rate. The same confusion is extended by adoption to the county rate for shire halls and lunatic asylums. In fact, in the most important provision the confusion is universal. These instances, though a very small part of what the single subject of local taxation affords, and selected only from the most important head, will be more than sufficient to show how entirely fortuitous our legislation has been, and is upon a subject in itself the most intelligible and most capable of accurate definition."

But if such is the uncertainty in this respect, the use, or purposes is no less important. Now, these uses and purposes are nearly 200 in number, and often in the same rate most dissimilar. In the Report we find it thus stated, namely—

"The purposes thus imperfectly defined are the subject of re-iterated enactments, but are often all very rarely made sufficiently comprehensive to include all the occasions for expenditure to which the respective rate may be beneficially applied, and many matters of pressing importance are constantly found unprovided for. In such cases small regard has been shown to the fact whether the law did or did not authorize the application. But the use of a rate for such purposes, once so misapplied, easily becomes a fund out of which provision is made for more irregular and mischievous expenditure. There is no doubt that the intention has been to place all the series before-mentioned as poor and county rates upon one basis. If so, the terms used are entirely discordant with that intention."

I have given some instances of this. I may mention the following:—

"In the constable's rate and militia the property is not defined, and only by inference falls on the poor rate. In the county rate, the property to be made liable is described as the messuages, lands, and tenements, and hereditaments rateable to the relief of the poor, which wholly omits personal property, which when the Act passed was liable to poor rate. This disparity of terms extends to the whole series of rates imposed on aggregated districts."

So much, then, for the principle upon which this rating rests. Let us see what is the nature of its incidence, and to what ultimate effect. We have it as an admitted fact that it falls only upon a portion of property very limited in extent—about, let us say, one-fourth or one-fifth of the whole. Upon railroads and canals it is most unsatisfactorily, if not most unfairly, assessed, and the room for litigation is immense. Lord Campbell says—

"The rule laid down for the Parochial Assessment Act is easily applicable to the property which the Legislature then had in contemplation; but is wholly inapplicable to a railway extending many miles through many parishes, the traffic upon its various sections varying materially, and the expense of working these different sections bearing no certain proportion to the earnings upon them. If we settle all these and similar questions, we may be considered rather as legislators than as judges, rather making than expounding the law."

And again—

Mr. Corrance

"Without some alteration in or declaration of the law by the Legislature, we foresee that, although we should give judgment between these parties, much trouble, litigation, and expense must arise both to parishes and railways throughout England."

Sentences which experience has amply confirmed. Upon houses we are told by good authority it falls a house tax, and it is approved as such. Upon land, it falls, in respect of profit, both upon the landlord and the tenant class.

Stock in Trade.—In the first instance, let it be one main objection that such litigation should take place, exceeding, probably, in some instances, the capital value of the rate. The second we must not so lightly pass. A house tax may be a fair tax under appropriate condition; but what that condition should be is worth inquiring, at least. Now, in this instance it is paid upon the basis of the rent. What will be the effect? Competition will, therefore, rule this. Apply this rule, and it conducts to this—that the tax will vary just in proportion to the poverty of the class. Large houses do not easily let; small ones are hard to get, and you place this burden which must act as a drawback to their increase. Secondly, there is no limitation to the incidence of this tax. As an income tax the poorest classes would be exempt. Under this tax it falls upon them directly, and in the worst possible form and effect. It lessens the inducement to provide accommodation, and curtails the comforts of the house. It leads directly to contracted accommodation, and indirectly to all those evils of which over-crowding is the prolific parent, and vice and degraded habits the fruit. Have we not evidence enough upon this? What has lately passed during the debates upon artizan dwellings in another place? Let me afford one extract from this quotation—

"We are told that in one house there were fifty-nine human beings. That typhus speedily scented out its prey. That while one miserable man lay ill, his wife and six children had to partake his bed, and inhale his feverish breath. That the victim sank, while the miseries went to the workhouse or followed him to his grave."

Take another such instance as this—

"In sixty-two instances adult sons and daughters slept in the same room, and in three instances in the same bed. In 152 instances adult daughters slept in the same room, and in fifty-six in the same bed with parents, and so on, down the doleful and unseemly list."

Now, for such things there may be many reasons acting with unhappy concurrence upon the social state and which are productive of this. When we deal with such things we must take cognizance of the least. Is not a tax one of such. Few economists will deny this. I call then their attention to the fact. And if the conclusion at which they shall arrive shall point to results such as those I have indicated, they must, at least, materially qualify the opinion expressed as to the intrinsic excellence of this tax. Lastly, let us come to the land. Now, I want one admission on this point, lest our feelings and prejudices lead us astray. I will give ample evidence as to its truth. I want it to be an accepted principle by this House, that, primarily all taxation of industry falls upon the gross produce. It is so much deducted from it. Let us consult authority upon this point. Ricardo tells us—

“That labour, not land, is the real source of wealth, and that produce—all that is derived from the surface by the united application of labour, machinery, and capital—is divided between three classes, the proprietors, the owners of stock, and the labourer.”

Taxation falls thus upon the whole, and not upon a reserved part. Under any artificial regulation you can set up, there will be so much deducted from the heap, so much less divisible remainder, so much less to reward labour or replace capital. Now of this what will be the result? That first capital and then labour will desert. Let me give an example of this—Supposing that there existed within the same parish three distinct branches of industry—say, manufactures of a different class—yielding a similar percentage of return, and that upon one of these you placed some burden of an especial class, what would be the result? Profits would be less, capital would fail to be attracted, and the employment of labour would decrease. The thing is so obvious as to admit of no doubt. Supposing land in the farmer's own hands to be one of these, and the one taxed. Well, he would sell his land, if he could, and invest at the larger profit of the industry untaxed. Men would buy it to whom profit was no object no doubt. Is this what you want? You have been dealing with this class of landlords, and to get at their accumulations you have forgotten common principles, and the economic effects have been overlooked. You are taxing the industry nevertheless. The proprietors have a smaller surplus to improve their estates, the farm buildings will be worse kept up, and the inducement to invest in such heavily taxed property will be reduced. What says Mr. Mechi upon this—

“It is an alarming fact that much of our revenue is derived from the capital we lend to foreign countries, and this, too, while our agriculture to become fairly profitable would require a sum of no less than £300,000,000 invested in the improvement of land. In 1851 there were 285,986 farm holdings in Great Britain. Of these no less than 170,814, or more than half, were under fifty acres. The average of the whole number was only 102 acres, while 91,698 farmers, or one-third of the entire number, employed no labourers. Of these holdings he estimated the capital at £4 per acre, or a total of £200,000,000, and the acreable produce £3 12s. The conclusion is that there must be an immense tract of country unprofitably farmed and inefficiently capitalised.”

In corroboration of such an opinion, and in further illustration of its cause, a great commercial authority, Mr. Lamport, says—

“Capital is mobile, and follows as simple a law as water finding its level. The safest and most profitable business always requires and will command the largest share. It is only businesses which do not pay—that are starved and cry out.”

Once more, the authority of the hon. Member for Westminster—

“The mere fact that profits have to bear their share of a heavy general taxation, tends in the same manner as peculiar taxes, to drive capital abroad. This is thought to have been the principal cause of the decline of Holland. Under these circumstances it is inevitable that a part of the burden will be thrown by capitalists upon the labourer or the landlord. One or the other of them is always a loser by the diminishing rate of accumulation. If population continues to increase as before the labourer suffers; if not, cultivation is checked in its advance.”

Surely such evidence should suffice. If taxation is an evil, its unjust or irregular incidence must tend to aggravate this, and as is here shown, may be followed by deplorable and unforeseen results. Surely of these it is at least time that investigation should take place. On this ground, then, let us ask that it shall speedily take place. It has been proposed to substitute an income tax as the just alternative in this case; but it seems to me that to this, simple as it may appear, some objections have been overlooked. It would fall on incomes hitherto absolutely exempt, such as professional incomes and salaries. Funded property also, borrowed at any former time, or other such securities upon which no such charges should be imposed by legislation of an ex post facto class. In these instances it might be sufficient for the future that no stock newly created should be able to claim exemption of such a class, as resting upon a principle neither sound nor just. Against the conversion of the claim upon stock-in-trade or personal property into income tax, no such reason can exist. Now, I think that it will be at once admitted that these are questions of the gravest class, and that in inquiry no further time should be lost. Let the House just consider this, that, during the last twenty years, in Imperial taxation an almost entire revision of burdens has taken place, and this to a most useful and beneficial effect. In local taxation things are not only as they were, but get worse and worse as occasions for the imposition of fresh rates occur upon a false and unequal base. And yet, just consider the amount and importance of taxation of this class, exceeding in amount the entire revenues of many European Powers, not of the first class, for all purposes of general and local taxation, and nearly or quite half of the amount of our own Imperial taxation, if we except the payment of the interest of the Debt. So far, then, I trust that I have made out to the satisfaction of the House a case for inquiry, at least. Of that inquiry, what ought to be the practical effect? Without a word or two upon this my observations would be incomplete. In the first place it seems to me much to be desired that a complete revision of this species of taxation should take place in the following respects, namely, that its proper incidence, both upon property and persons, should be once more declared, with due respect to the application and use of the tax. That as far as possible classification of such taxes should be made and levied upon a uniform base. That the applicability of the mode now in use for assessing annual value be determined in cases of difficulty and doubt. And, lastly, that all exemptions should either cease, or be levied in some form applicable to each case. I am not willing any longer to detain the House. I shall not deem it necessary to go into all the ultimate and evil consequences following the existence of such things as those I have pointed out. One thing is clear, I hope, to the House, that until such an inquiry has taken place, no further charges or changes can take place. In the one case injustice, in the other confusion, will be the result. In the reforms we contemplate, or the exemptions we seek, we must proceed from a sure base. Last year the Government introduced a Bill, which, although it did not directly deal with this, still was of a nature to lead to some further inquiry upon these points.

Mr. Corrance

I allude to the Valuation Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That Bill had my support. It was the first question in which I took part in the House. Of one thing I felt convinced—that by the establishment of such a Board as that proposed the question would not long be allowed to sleep. When I spoke upon this in my concluding words I said—

“One hope I might entertain. It would be this—that this could not be the measure of the Reform which would be introduced by her Majesty's Government upon the question of the rates: that her Majesty's Government having thus bestowed their care upon the question of assessment, as I thought, to excellent effect, would further deem it their duty and worthy of consideration to the incidents and accidents of the rate. Let there be equalization also in such respects.”

These words I now beg to repeat.

MR. GREENE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words: “a Select Committee be appointed to consider the present incidence and principle of Local Rating, and report thereon,”—(Mr. Corrance),

—instead thereof.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH admitted the importance of the subject referred to by the hon. Member, but reminded him that it had already occupied the attention of the House during the present Session, and had given rise to an interesting debate. As to the Motion for a Committee, the hon. Member had himself given the best answer to it when he stated the various points which their inquiry should embrace. At this period of the Session such an inquiry would be impossible. In another month or six weeks the Session must close, and it would be impossible to consider one of the points alluded to by the hon. Member during this limited time. The speech of the hon. Member might be divided under two heads—first, how property should be rated; secondly, what kind of property should be subject to rates. Now, a Committee last Session instituted an inquiry of considerable importance into the valuation of property; but the Bill introduced on the subject was not proceeded with, and the question, therefore, was not determined by the House. There had been another question also as to how rates should be collected, whether from the owner or occupier, and a Committee on the subject had been moved for by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton). Then Bills had been introduced on two or three occasions on the subject of the rating of mines by the hon. Member for Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham), and the hon. Gentleman who had introduced this subject did not appear sanguine that that matter could be successfully dealt with by the House. As to the rating of railways, that was a question which might fully occupy a Committee for more than one whole Session. He had mentioned these things to show the variety of questions which must be considered before the House could come to a conclusion. A debate had been held in the early part of the Session as to the great increase of rates paid by occupiers of land, and the burdens upon house property in the metropolis. That was a great and important question, upon which it would be quite impossible to initiate any satisfactory inquiry during the present Session; but he thought there was a necessity for some alleviation. The county rate, for instance, had considerably increased, a Committee on the question of county finance was at present sitting, and he believed it would be proved before that Committee that the greater part of the increase in the county rates had arisen in consequence of the maintenance of the police, which was contributed to by the Consolidated Fund. Then there was a great demand for increased expenditure in the treatment of the poor, especially of the sick poor. Now, it was a question whether further aid might not be granted by the State in matters of that kind. At present aid was granted towards the payment of salaries; but it might be well to consider whether more of those charges might not be borne by the State. As to the rating of personal property, it might be said that when the Act of Elizabeth was passed there was little or no personal property compared with that which existed at the present time. But there was a difficulty and almost an impossibility in bringing such property under rates. That had been proved by the legislation which had been effected for the exemption of stock-in-trade. He trusted that the hon. Member would not see fit to press the Motion, which he had introduced in a speech of considerable ability. The matter was one of very great importance, and well worthy the attention of the House, but it could not be dealt with at this period of the Session. But if a Committee were to be appointed at an early period of the new Parliament it was quite possible that some satisfactory conclusion might be arrived at.

MR. HUBBARD said, he thought that sufficient grounds had been shown for further inquiry whenever there might be an opportunity. The best tax we had was the house tax, though the hon. Member for East Suffolk (Mr. Corrance) had taken exception to it, and had cited extreme instances in favour of his view. There was no better test of the ability of the tax payer than the house which he occupied. After a careful consideration of the subject, he had arrived at the conclusion that upon an average of classes the expenditure of an occupier in respect of house rent was in the ratio of one-tenth of his whole means of expenditure, and that, whether in the case of the man who paid 2s. a week rent or £2,000 a year, the test was equally good. But at present the house was taxed three times; it was taxed for the house tax, it was taxed again for the income tax, and, thirdly, for the fire insurance duty, and that duty was equal to 4d. in the pound on the rent. These were points which should be taken into consideration by the Committee. It had been asked why stock-in-trade should be exempt, as it was now so important an item even when compared with real property. But the true principle to proceed upon was this — we should never attempt to carry our taxation beyond the means we had of ascertaining property and reaching it. In the case of stock-in-trade, they could never ascertain what it was. Real property was local, they could find it, assess it, and tax it; but personal property was not local, it might be anywhere in the world, and, therefore, it was clearly beyond the power of the local authorities to reach it for purposes of taxation, although it was reached by self assessment through the income tax. The contrast between the two kinds of property indicated that there were many matters the provision for which by local taxation might be fairly assisted out of the general taxation of the country. It should be remembered, too, that some local matters were of general interest. He hoped the hon. Member would be able to renew his Motion in the early part of next Session.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he rose to protest against the eulogy pronounced by the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) on the house tax, which amounted to 9d. in the pound on private houses, and 6d. in the pound on houses in which goods were displayed in the ground floor windows. It was a tax good with the artizan and with those in the receipt of incomes up to £1,000 a year: above that amount the ratio diminished; and persons receiving less than 20s. per week paid one-fifth, and some even one-fourth, of their earnings for rent. The house tax was merely the old window tax under another name, and houses that would formerly have escaped the old duty, having only seven windows, were now brought into charge at the rate of 9d. in the pound. If the houses with their gardens were rated at £20 per annum. The house tax was, in his opinion, by no means so fair or equitable as some hon. Members supposed, and he thought that there was no tax that more required revision. It was levied on the amount of rent at which a house either did or was presumed to let; but many noblemen's seats and large mansions in the country escaped from their proper amount of taxation in consequence of their being so large and so costly to inhabit that they could not possibly be presumed to let at any equivalent rent, and consequently they were rated at a nominal amount. From a Return issued, it appeared that in the county of Northumberland there was only one house assessed at so large a sum as £1,000 a year, and paying 9d. in the pound. This house must necessarily be Alnwick Castle, the seat of the Duke of Northumberland, which is rated at only £1,000 a year, about equal to a house in Belgrave or Grosvenor Squares, or to three houses in many of the squares in London.

SIR MASSIEU LOPES said that while

ment of capital by both employer and employee, and if such investment would be a diminution in the amount of capital employed, the increase, more or less, would be taken place in some of the districts, and the extent of the increase would be as great as was generally supposed. The cause of that nominal increase in the Union Assessment Act was the uniform valuation which was the result of that Act had been attended to in the assessments, there would be no increase in the value of the property in the kingdom which had not been raised to the highest standard that could be attained. Indeed, the Act ought to have designated an Act for the imposition of the income tax on the basis of that which had been its effect. It would not presume to say that it was not its object. It had been alleged that the value of real property were very much depreciated with regard to the income tax. The fact was, that the tax was levied on the gross and not on the net income, no allowance being made for repairs, depreciation, agency, or bad debts; and that the tax was paid on a sum much greater than the owners ever received. It would give an illustration of this. If a man owned a house worth £100 a year the building was so dilapidated that it could not be let for more than £50 if they were rebuilt, and this would be done for less than £500, so that for five or six years he would receive nothing.

as the cultivation of the soil, and no business in which the return for capital was so small as that of the agriculturist. An hon. Member (Mr. M'Laren) stated on a former occasion that the commutation of the land tax had been a great advantage to the owners of real property, the valuation upon which the commutation was made being now very inadequate, and he went back to history to show that that tax was levied at 4s. in the pound. Was that tax, however, originally levied on real property alone? Why, on referring to the Act of 1692, which was passed for a year in order to prosecute vigorously a war with France, he found that the tax was imposed on personal as well as real property, but there was afterwards a remission in favour of the former, and by an Act of William IV. a certain quota was assigned to every borough and parish. Was it just that the amount formerly levied on personal property should now be thrown on real property? He thought that in 1846 a golden opportunity was lost, for both Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell, while affirming that the adoption of Free Trade was a question of policy, stated that in the event of its adoption the question of relief to the agricultural interest was a question of justice. Now, the policy had been adopted, but the justice had not yet been conceded. Owners and occupiers of real property did not come to the House with an appeal ad misericordiam; they did not sue in forma pauperis; but they urged that they had a grievance, and they asked for a full and impartial inquiry. If, in such an inquiry, they failed to establish their case, they would be content to bear with patience and resignation burdens which they now regarded as anomalous, arbitrary, impolitic and unjust.

Mr. LIDDELL said, that, as no practical result would follow the appointment of a Select Committee during the present Session, he hoped that his hon. Friend would withdraw his Motion. At the same time he attached great value to the discussions that had arisen on this subject during the present Session, because the country must now be convinced that the question was not one which affected the rural districts alone. The great force of the argument in favour of a revision of local taxation arose from the fact that the pressure was felt not so much in the country as in the towns, and not even in the favoured districts of the towns. It was not in Belgravia, but in Bethnal Green, that the pressure of local taxation was chiefly felt. He hoped that during the Recess they would obtain extraneous aid to their efforts to secure a careful and impartial examination of the whole question of the incidence of local taxation. No inconsiderable addition to these burdens had been caused by the action of Parliament, and it would therefore be the duty of the House carefully to pass in review all the cases of exempted property, so as to see that one class of the community was not favoured at the expense of another. The whole matter was now divested of its class appearance, and it was seen that the interests of the poorer ratepayers were more concerned than even those of the owners and occupiers of land. He trusted that Parliament would at the earliest opportunity during the coming Session turn its attention to the incidence of local taxation.

Mr. JASPER MORE said, that great interest was taken in this matter in agricultural districts, but it was too late to appoint a Committee this Session. A Committee of the House of Lords, in 1850, inquired into the matter, and collected a great deal of most valuable evidence. Their Report, however, was now out of print, and he hoped that the Government would allow it to be re-printed. It would very much facilitate an intelligent discussion of the subject out-of-doors.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that he would endeavour to comply with the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. CORRANCE said, that he should not withdraw his Motion, but would leave it in the hands of the House.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

ACCIDENTS IN MINES.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. BRUCE said, he rose to call attention to the Report of the Select Committee on Mines (1867), and to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they propose to give effect to the recommendations of such Committee? Considering the circumstances of the present Session, he did not blame the Government for not bringing in a Bill to embody those recommendations; but he was anxious to recall attention to them, because he felt that on their adoption materially depended the safety of an important part of the population. A great many serious accidents occurred in mines; but the attention of the public was attracted almost solely to those which were mines had recently been considered by a Committee of that House, who had conducted a very laborious inquiry, extending over the greater part of two years. The Committee was originally presided over by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton); but, as he had been prevented from attending, he was succeeded in the Chair by the hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate), whose zeal and energy in conducting the inquiry could not be surpassed, and merited the warmest acknowledgments of the House. The present moment was favourable to the consideration of the subject, for both masters and men had shown a desire for useful legislation. The Committee began by recommending that an alteration should be made in the last Act of Parliament, which allowed children of ten years of age to be employed. They proposed that no child under twelve years of age should be allowed to be employed, and with this recommendation he entirely concurred. Not a month passed without death from accident occurring among children of tender age, who were exposed to risks and unable to take care of themselves. There was another reason in withdrawing these children from the mines, because at this age they ought to be enjoying the benefits of education. It was impossible to apply the principle of the Factory Acts to children so employed, and it would be better that no children under twelve should be employed in mines, without imposing any further condition as to education in the thirteenth year. An-done, when left to the colliers in a very reckless manner. Mr. Neate, of Her Majesty's Inspector of Mines, the coalowners of his district, and the men whose special business it was to see that the workmen did their duty in the matter; and after an examination of the cause had diminished by 40 per cent. in the North of England that the workmen were intrusted to men told off for the purpose. The recommendation of the Committee was that in no case should the workmen be taken off their duty, but that it should be taken by the colliery owners and their agents. Another cause of the accidents had been attributed to the imperfect Government system of inspection. A difference of opinion existed as to the subject. The majority of the inspectors were of opinion that their number should be increased for the purpose originally contemplated in their appointment—it never was intended that, on the part of the Government, every colliery throughout the country should be inspected by an Inspector. In some collieries the roads were sixty or seventy miles long, and it was utterly impracticable to inspect them except by the most gigantic expenditure. The inspectors themselves were so completely occupied with ground working as to prevent any possibility of such accidents happening. Mr. Neate presented a petition from the Monmouth and South Wales Coalfield in which they proposed that sponsible for every accident that occurred. After all, the safety of every colliery must depend not only on the wise liberality of the employers, the skill and knowledge of the agents and viewers, but also on the unceasing watchfulness and vigilance of the men themselves and of those who were set over them. He concurred in the recommendation of the Committee, and thought there should be a limited increase in the number of inspectors. The inspector should have a general acquaintance with the character of every colliery throughout his district, and where, either from information given him or from his general knowledge of a particular colliery, he suspected the existence of any mismanagement, he ought to make a proper inquiry. Though the number of inspectors had been doubled since they were first appointed he did not think it was yet sufficient. There were, he believed, very serious objections to the employment for that responsible duty of men in the position of sub-inspectors. It would be very difficult to get a sufficient number of persons who would be able to perform such a duty. In the next place the smallness of the payment which it would be possible to give them would expose them to the temptation of bribes, and in a short time there would be a want of confidence in the Reports of the sub-inspectors. The next subject to which the Committee called attention was the employment of stipendiary magistrates in the colliery districts. The safety of collieries was provided for by certain general rules which under Act of Parliament must be adopted in every colliery, and also by special rules applicable to the circumstances of each particular colliery, and which were approved by the Secretary of State. The enforcement of those rules of course depended on the local magistracy; and it so happened that throughout the colliery districts the Bench was not so strong as it usually was in other parts of the country. It was of the highest importance that these delicate duties should be discharged by magistrates whose authority was respected and whose impartiality was above suspicion. One of the inspectors stated that in Monmouthshire he always failed in his prosecutions, while in another county his appeals to the stipendiary justice always succeeded. That subject was certainly a very difficult one. At present when stipendiary magistrates were appointed it was upon the application of the district. His own suggestion would be that where a statement was made to the Home Office that a district required the services of a stipendiary magistrate an inquiry should be instituted analogous to that preliminary to the adoption of the Public Health Act in towns; and if, after consideration of the Report of their Inspector, the Government thought the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate was necessary for that district it should appoint one, define the limits of his district, and also decide what should be his salary. He believed the appointment of these stipendiary magistrates would give satisfaction throughout the colliery districts. Another of the Committee's recommendations was that the Acts relating to collieries should not only be amended but consolidated; it being a great impediment to justice when Acts were partially repealed and different portions of the same subject were dealt with in separate Acts of Parliament. Over and above the recommendations of the Committee, it had been suggested that a Commission should be appointed to inquire into other matters, which might not be supposed to come fairly within the scope of a Committee of that House, the Members of which were not sufficiently versed in the details of mining to give an authoritative opinion upon them. No doubt there were some important questions connected with the safety of collieries and also with the economical working of coal seams still to be solved. There existed the most different systems for that purpose, with the most startling difference in the results. He was informed that there existed in England and Wales differences to this extent—that under one system all but 17 per cent of coal could be extracted, while in other and very wide districts, under a different system, the quantity of coal lost to the public was 30 or 40 per cent. Of course, the House could not insist on the adoption of a particular mode of working coal; but he was informed that the mode which was most economical was also that by which the most perfect ventilation of the mine could be secured, and the safety of the colliers was a matter on which Parliament had the right to legislate. Another question connected with ventilation, and likewise with the economical working of a coal mine, was well known in the North of England as the double-shift system, which existed universally in the North. Under it in every colliery the men worked eight hours instead of twelve, and were succeeded by another shift, which also worked eight hours; and as a consequence of that their labours could be carried on in a much smaller area than where the single-shift system prevailed. Ventilation was the great safeguard against accidents by explosion; and a great economy of human life could be effected by the introduction of the double-shift system. It was, however, greatly opposed by the colliers themselves where it had not taken root. He would suggest the appointment of a skilled Commission to inquire into this subject, and to report upon its results in security, economy, and safety. The recommendations of the Committee were marked by moderation, and he had only, in conclusion, to express a hope that the whole subject would receive the attention of the Government during the approaching Recess.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he had so recently addressed the House on the subject that he need do little more than briefly to repeat what he had then stated. The subject was one which had not been lost sight of by the Government; and his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Home Department had had several interviews, at which he himself had not time to be present, with persons who took an active interest in it. He had, however, carefully considered the Report to which his right hon. Friend opposite had drawn his attention, and he must add that no one was better qualified to deal with the question than the right hon. Gentleman, or possessed a more thorough acquaintance with it. He felt—having, as he said, carefully considered the Report—that it was impossible to introduce any measure on the subject during the present Session; but he could assure the House that it had been and was occupying the attention of the Ministry. Whether it might or might not be desirable to make some inquiry also into the case of the ventilation of tin and copper mines, he did not exactly know; but he did not think there was such a lack of information on the point as to render such an inquiry necessary. If, however, there were any particular matters with respect to which sufficient information had not already been procured, the country would not, he felt satisfied, grudge any expense which might be incurred in obtaining it, even to the fullest extent. The question of the stipendiary magistrates was a somewhat difficult one to deal with, because hitherto no justice had been appointed without a requisition from persons interested in the subject. What he understood his right hon. Friend to recommend was a sort of local inquiry, by means of which it was supposed that both the feelings and wants of any particular district might be ascertained, and the services of magistrates secured who were acquainted with its business and would be likely to be disinterested in deciding the questions which might be brought before them. He must add that he thought the multiplication of sub-inspectors to any considerable extent would tend to take away the responsibility for the proper working of our collieries from those to whom that responsibility was attached. He was not at all sure, however, that it might not be found expedient to increase the number of inspectors, so that a fuller knowledge of the mode in which different mines were worked might be obtained, although that knowledge was already pretty extensive. Probably all the information necessary might be obtained from the inspectors, and there would be no occasion for the appointment of a Commission for the purpose.

MR. KINNAIRD thanked the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Tydvil (Mr. Bruce) for having brought the subject before the House. He thought it would be very unfortunate if Parliament should separate without some expression of opinion on it. He hoped that the Home Secretary would make public any additional information which might be lying in his office, so that it might be diffused throughout the country for the information and satisfaction of the public mind during the Recess.

MR. NEATE said, that whatever opinion the working miners might entertain as to the value of the labours of the Committee which sat on the subject, every one who had presented himself before it must feel that their cases had been listened to with the greatest care and attention. He must add that he was not altogether satisfied with the speech which had just been made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department as to the need of legislation. At the same time, there was no doubt that the circumstances of the present Session were somewhat extraordinary, and as the Government had waited so long before introducing any measure on the subject, he thought they would do well to avail themselves of the recommendations of the Commission which had been appointed to inquire into the supply of coal so that provision might, if possible, be made for the more effectual and economical working of our coal fields. He thought, however, that they might at once increase the number of inspectors, and he did not see how a measure of that kind would remove any responsibility from the coal-owners. To show the value of inspection, he might observe that he was told by a great authority — Mr. Dickinson — a few days ago, that he had gone into a mine, and that his attention was attracted by what he believed to be a great accumulation of gas in part of it. He satisfied himself that such was the case by applying his lamp to it; and he had some difficulty in impressing upon the manager the danger of such accumulations and the necessity of attending to the matter. That furnished, he thought, a good illustration of the good which inspectors might do by entering mines. He could not reconcile the limited view which the Government inspectors took of their duty with the 22 & 24 Vict., which empowered them to visit mines at all times of the day and night; and the point was one with which, in his opinion, the Government might deal at once. Another point to which he would invite their attention was the expediency of subjecting the managers of mines to the necessity of obtaining certificates, as was the case, for instance, with the captains of ships; and neglect of duty should be punished by the suspension of the certificate. Since 1832, Parliament had done great things in improving conditions of labour, especially in the case of young persons, and he thought it was well worthy of consideration whether there might not be a Board formed to have, under the control of the Home Department, charge of all the different organizations for regulating the conditions of labour. To such a Board the inspectors might make all their Reports, and the head of the Board might communicate these Reports, in a condensed form to the Home Office.

Mr. Bruce

MR. GREENE said, he was glad of the discussion of this evening, because it would show the public that there was not in the House of Commons such apathy on this subject as might have been supposed in consequence of what occurred when the dangers of coal mines was brought under the notice of the House on a recent occasion. He thought the question was one which ought to occupy the attention of the House from time to time. From an observation made by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) on a former occasion, it would appear that the hon. and learned Gentleman thought that he had been guilty of some presumption in calling attention to accidents in coal mines. [Mr. AYRTON said the hon. Gentleman was mistaken.] If he were to read the hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks, he thought the House would agree with him that they had that interpretation. As the hon. and learned Gentleman so frequently occupied the attention of the House, he did not see why even so humble a Member as himself might not be permitted to bring forward a question of such importance. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Bruce) had mentioned to the House that the largest portion of the accidents in coal mines occurred from the falling in of the roof. He (Mr. Greene) believed that the arrangements for the prevention of such accidents were not at all what they ought to be. Then, as to the inspectors, twelve were not enough for the work to be done. He hoped that, if not in this Session, there would be legislation on the whole subject before the end of next year.

MR. BAGNALL said, he hoped that if there was to be an addition to the staff for inspection, it would be in the appointment of additional inspectors, and not in that of sub-inspectors.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he regretted that circumstances had interfered to prevent legislation on the subject; but after the statement of the Secretary of State for the Home Department he was persuaded that some attempt to alter the law for the better would be made next Session. He believed a Commission would hardly be able to develop any facts of importance in addition to those which had been already elicited by three Committees of this House and by the Committee of the House of Lords, which had ably inquired into the question. He believed that all the substantial facts relating to the subject were already fully known; but at the same time these accidents were of so dreadful a character that if it appeared to be the opinion of the working colliers that a Royal Commission might be able to make valuable suggestions which had not been made hitherto for the greater security of their lives, he should be glad to support the appointment of such a Commission. With regard to the Commission on the future coal supply he hoped it would make its Report before next Session; but the inquiry was extensive, and he could not say when it would conclude. There was, however, no connection between that question and the subject now under discussion; and he saw no reason for the postponement of legislation with respect to accidents in mines pending the inquiry of the Commission. He believed there would be no difficulty in the way of passing a really good measure upon the subject. A very valuable suggestion had been made by a well-known colliery inspector and viewer (Mr. Buddle), that mines should be separated into districts, each district having separate means of ventilation. If that suggestion were carried out he believed we should not again have such enormous sacrifices of life by colliery accidents as we had had recently at the Oaks and Ferndale collieries. The plan was somewhat similar to that adopted with regard to buildings for the manufacture of gunpowder, which were so arranged that the explosion of one building could not cause the explosion of another. Another valuable suggestion, made by Mr. Nixon, an extensive coalowner in his district, was for the general introduction of the double shift system, which would also tend to lessen the sacrifice of life when any colliery accident should happen. With regard to the inspection of mines, he thought the general feeling of the country would be against the introduction of a lower class of inspectors, and that anything which tended to lower the standard of the inspectors and the confidence placed in them would tend to diminish the advantages of the system of inspection. With reference to the mode of dealing with cases of offences arising in coal mines, he would observe that in many mineral counties there were already stipendiary magistrates, and he would suggest the expediency of requiring that offences under the Mines Act should be tried before a stipendiary magistrate instead of the ordinary bench of justices. As it was, the coalowner was placed in an awkward position. He was compelled to carry out the strictest discipline; and if any of the rules were transgressed his only remedy was to summon the offender before the bench of magistrates, and then he was often unable to obtain a conviction. Magistrates at petty sessions did not sufficiently appreciate the seriousness of breaches of regulation in coal mines. It should be remembered that some things, such as smoking or the possession of lucifer matches, which were no offence at all above ground, were most serious offences underground, and might lead to the most fatal results. Punishment for such offences would be much more certain if a stipendiary magistrate heard the case. With regard to the officers who had charge of the mines he could not agree with the hon.

Mr. Hussey Vivian

and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate) who had conducted the inquiry before the Committee in the most able manner. He did not think any good result would follow from a system of certificates. He should prefer to see them not men deeply versed in mathematics or history, but sound practical men upon whose practical knowledge the safety of the men employed might be allowed to rest with security. He thought that the coalowners themselves must be the best judges of the men to put in charge of the mines. He again expressed an earnest hope that the subject would be legislated upon in the course of next Session.

Mr. LEATHAM: I rise, Sir, merely to say a word to strengthen the hands of the Government (in the absence of further legislation) in the appointment of a larger number of inspectors. I am quite aware that it is very important not to shift the responsibility from the owners of mines to the inspectors; but I am of opinion that if the inspectors are to be of substantial use their number must be largely increased. I believe there are now twelve inspectors of mines. If I may venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary the amount of their increase, I should say that they ought to be at once doubled. I have my own opinion respecting some of the causes of accidents in coal mines. I happen to live where there are coal measures, within eight miles of the Oaks colliery, where there was recently a most fearful accident, to which allusion has frequently been made in this House and elsewhere. I have nothing to do, directly or indirectly, with coal mines, and I have no scientific knowledge of the working of them; but I am of opinion that where a fiery seam of coal exists, as is the case in some parts of Yorkshire, that the present system of ventilation is on a wrong principle; that the use of large fires at the bottom of one of the shafts of the mine, to produce a draft and ventilate the mine, is a most dangerous method, because, if any of the return-air of the pit happens to pass over that furnace, the dangers of explosion are great. I do not pretend to suggest a more efficient mode of ventilation; but it has often struck me that pumping fresh air down into the pit so as to drive the return-air up another shaft would effect this purpose. Again, the size of the pit has often much to do with the chances of explosion. I am aware that the law now requires two shafts in every pit ; but some of the pits are extended to such a size that four or five shafts are really required for the safety of the pit. I merely throw these out as suggestions, to those who are more capable of looking into the subject, and in the absence of further legislation on this interesting subject, I beg again, respectfully, to ask the Government not to delay in the appointment of a considerable number of fresh inspectors of mines.

REGISTRATION OF PUBLICATIONS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. AYRTON said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the state of the Law regarding registration and security in respect of certain publications. He regretted to be obliged to bring this matter again before the House, as he had hoped, from the tone of the discussion last year, that it would not have been necessary to revive the consideration of it in the present Session, but that some measure would have been brought in to give effect to the general feeling of the House on the subject. Some years ago, when he asked the House to repeal this remnant of laws which were most oppressive to a particular class of publications in this country, the Bill which he introduced was passed, and sent up to the other House, where it was rejected ; and upon a second occasion his Bill passed the Commons, and was again rejected by the Lords. The laws upon this subject were such as could never have been placed upon the statute book, except in the most evil times—that was to say, in the reign of George III.—when the old Tory party was engaged in desperate struggles to repress the expression of public opinion, and to maintain its hold of political power. Measures of relief had been from time to time granted by the Legislature ; but, although many of the severer penalties had been removed, the process had been always accompanied by some stringent regulation on the subject of registration or security. No one could publish a periodical of less dimensions than 714 square inches, and with intervals of less than twenty-six days between each successive publication ; and at a less price than 6d., without giving security that they would not publish seditious and blasphemous libels. There could be no doubt that this was aimed at a class of periodicals likely to inform the mind of the people ; and the extravagance of the law was shown by the fact that it was not merely directed against newspapers, but against essays upon the moral, political, or religious condition of the country, or upon the phases of public affairs. It would be seen at once that a law of this kind was totally ineffective, because a man might print any amount of sedition or blasphemy, provided he only wrote enough of it to fill a book of larger dimensions than 714 square inches, and sold at a higher price than 6d. Great penalties were formerly imposed for an infraction of this law, and for the second offence the penalty was banishment. That extreme punishment was modified a few years ago ; but at the same time the securities were increased in London from £300 to £400, and in the country from £200 to £300. Moreover, the publisher was compelled to find two persons to be answerable in the sum of £400 to answer in any action at law. Now, there was no reason whatever, as far as he could see, why publishers of periodicals any more than any other traders, should be subject to that restriction in the conduct of their business ; they were engaged in a useful and a necessary work, and how could it be maintained that a man who published libel or sedition in a few pages ought to be liable to penalties which a man who published libel or sedition on a larger scale escaped ? When the tax on newspapers was repealed, there was a general impression that the declaration which publishers were previously required to make at the Stamp Office would fall into abeyance. And for a long time it did so. But some injudicious persons thought it right to set the Stamp Office in motion ; and, accordingly, instead of having a free and unloaded Press in this country, it once again began to be tampered with. Last year his right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Milner Gibson) brought the subject under the notice of the House ; the Attorney General did not then contend that it was desirable to maintain the declaration, and nobody rose to suggest that the existing law should be continued ; accordingly, he had expected that the right hon. Gentleman would have introduced a short Bill early this Session to put an end to the state of things complained of ; but, instead of that, the Stamp Office had been seized with another fit of injudicious activity, and had instituted proceedings against two or three journals. These proceedings were taken ostensibly in the name of the Attorney General, and it was highly desirable that if persisted in they should be carried on upon his responsibility. But, according to the present system, matters were either allowed to sleep altogether, or were only stirred to action when some individual object was to be attained by giving private information, and inciting the department to commence a prosecution. He submitted the Attorney General should not permit persons to make use of his name, as the prosecutor under the Act referred, to in cases where their object was simply to gratify personal malignity; the Attorney General was also bound to see that the law was uniformly administered; that all or none were prosecuted. He found that proprietors of newspapers of the most innocent character were proceeded against; among them he noticed the National Reformer and the Parochial Critic. The latter was a paper which ministered to the wants of persons having what might be described as a parochial mind, by contributing to their knowledge of the public business of their locality. He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman would prevent this abuse of power, and see that the spirit of the law was carried out. He would submit to the hon. and learned Gentleman that the time had come for effecting some amendment in the existing law on this subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the hon. Member had assumed in that case a state of things of which he (the Attorney General) could not admit the existence. The hon. Member had assumed that the law was put in force against newspaper publishers capriciously and for the gratification of private malice. But so far as he (the Attorney General) was aware that was a totally incorrect statement. He had been informed that it was only when due notice had been given, and the parties had refused to obey the law that proceedings were taken. A circular was issued after the Act of 1855 was passed, pointing out what it was necessary to do for the purpose of having newspapers registered, and as it was found that several newspapers were published which were not registered the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown was taken as to whether it was incumbent upon the Board of Inland Revenue to enforce registration. An affirmative reply was obtained. Some alteration was at that time made in the law with respect to the particular kind of papers which were to come within the category of newspapers, but nothing was done in the shape of any alteration of the penalties which it was thought proper to inflict. The Board of Revenue had on all occasions, as far as possible, been guided by the Law Officers in ascertaining what particular publications were or were not newspapers. In cases where the law was infringed by the proprietors of newspapers refusing to give the requisite securities proceedings were taken; but these were in no case influenced by personal motives, or by any considerations as to the particular political party which the newspaper represented. He did not propose to suggest any alteration of the law as it at present stood. Particular instructions specifying which newspapers were to be prosecuted were never issued, but the Board of Revenue proceeded generally against newspapers whose proprietors refused to give the proper securities. Proceedings were never taken against anyone until it was made clear that a violation of the statute was taking place, and in no case were these proceedings of a malicious character. As to whether the law should be altered or repealed, that was another matter, but so long as it existed it was the duty of the Board of Revenue to enforce it. He could not comply with the request of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets and propose any alteration of the law.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he was inclined to agree with the observations of the Attorney General as to the manner in which the Board of Inland Revenue had exercised its functions. He believed the real mischief arose from the law itself more than from the mode in which it had been administered. It was only that day that he had been asked to present a petition from one of the victims of this law (Mr. George Hill), who believed, and had no doubt been advised that his paper was not a newspaper within the meaning of the Act, and who was compelled either to contest the point at considerable expense or to give up his paper, as he either would not or could not enter into the requisite securities. He was willing to acknowledge that the Board of Inland Revenue had exhibited every desire to give to the cases which came under its notice a fair and attentive consideration, but he believed also that there had been an evident desire on the part of the Board to be relieved from what was a disagreeable duty. If it was necessary to require securities for the prevention of sedition, blasphemy, and libel, it was absurd to vest the power in the Board of Inland Revenue, which was exclusively intended for the collection of taxes. Such a power, if exercised at all, as it was of a moral nature, ought to be vested in the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, or some such authority. It was, moreover, impossible for the Board of Inland Revenue to enforce the provisions of the Act impartially. The Board knew nothing of newspapers, and could only act upon private information, which was invariably afforded from personal or party motives. Although, therefore, no vindictiveness was displayed by the Department, still the prosecutions often originated in some petty jealousy, or a desire to injure, it might be, a proprietor, who had started a rival paper. He wished to call the attention of the Attorney General to the fact that there appeared to be a constant desire to class under the name of newspapers certain publications which had not hitherto been regarded in that light. He remembered that during the existence of the stamp duty it was attempted to make Charles Dickens's Household Words and Household Narrative liable to the stamp and to securities. The Government was defeated; but it was generally understood that by the law Household Words and the Household Narrative were liable. The necessity for again trying the question, however, was done away with by the passing of a small Act by which the meaning of the word "newspapers" was so altered as beyond doubt to exempt from liability all such publications. He charged the Government of this country, speaking generally and not referring to any particular Government, with retaining on the statute book a law which could not be enforced, which they had not the good grace to repeal, and which they, nevertheless, did not entirely allow to remain in abeyance. They did not enforce it, because the law did not relate exclusively to newspapers, inasmuch as it referred to all pamphlets or papers dealing with the affairs of Church and State, which were sold for less than 6d., and were of a less size than 714 square inches. The provisions of the Act, too, were enforced in the case of newspapers which were not liable, while others that were liable were exempted. The Saturday Review was a case in point, for, though these securities were compelled, it was not published for less than 6d., and was not of a less size than 714 square inches. He was also advised that there was a large number of newspapers upon which these provisions were illegally imposed, while it was equally notorious that others which ought to be liable escaped without these securities being exacted. In his opinion it was incumbent upon the Government of the day to bring in some measure which would put an end to this unsatisfactory state of things. For his own part he believed it was desirable there should be a registration of periodical publications, which he did not think the Press at large would object to; but he thought the obnoxious system of giving security should be done away with, as it was an insult to any person to require him to give security that he would not be guilty of an indictable offence. If the Government could not introduce such a measure as he had indicated this Session, he hoped that in the course of the next Session they would bring in a Bill to repeal the Acts in question, which were not in accordance with the policy which Parliament had recently adopted on this subject, which was to liberate the Press from all those fiscal fetters by which it was formerly restrained.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. J. STUART MILL said, he was glad the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to impress upon the Government the propriety of putting an end to all the difficulties to which reference had been made, by repealing the Acts in question, which inflicted a punishment upon the whole body of the Press because some of its members might possibly be guilty of a violation of the law. What would be said if every physician were bound to give security that he would not poison his patients? Surely it was sufficient to punish him if he did poison them. His purpose in rising was to express a hope that if the Government could not bring in a measure of the kind proposed this Session, they would at least suspend all prosecutions under these Acts, which were generally condemned by public opinion, which it had been found impossible to enforce impartially, and which, therefore, operated most unjustly upon those who were prosecuted under them; often by individuals without the concurrence of the Attorney General and of the Board of Inland Revenue.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, the real principle upon which these Acts of Parliament were passed was for the general protection of the State against attacks which might be made by persons who were not in a position to pay the penalties imposed upon those guilty of violating the law. It was found that when persons started publications attacking the State or private individuals there was considerable difficulty in tracing the owners of those publications, and in recovering the penalties when the owners were discovered and prosecuted. Under these circumstances he desired to maintain the law as far as it was useful and proper, by compelling the owners of publications to register themselves, and to give security for the payment of penalties which might be inflicted upon them in the event of their violating the law. He thought that the preventive element was a valuable ingredient in any code. There might, of course, be some ground for altering the law as it now stood, but he did not think these Acts should be altogether abolished, by which all safeguards against libels injurious to the State or ruinous to the private character of individuals would be done away with. The principle was, that where a violation of the law was committed there should be a solvent party to proceed against. But if any different law, or administration of the law, could be introduced which might protect private character from slander and libel, at the same time that it protected the Press, by all means let that be carried into effect. It did not, however, follow that because the present law could not be fully enforced it was a bad law. It was said that the law was a limited law, and that if the paper was of a certain size, or was sold at 6d., it was not within the range of the law. But the fact of its extent and price gave it a certain amount of respectability, and was a kind of guarantee that if an action should be brought there would be the means of recovery against the proprietor. His desire was to keep up the respectability as well as the liberty of the Press—to have a good, sound, strong Press, against which, if the law were violated, they could proceed; so that, while protecting the Press, they should protect themselves.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he was rather amused at his hon. and learned Friend's notions of respectability. It used to be said that a man was respectable when he kept a horse and gig; but he (Mr. Craufurd) thought it was quite impossible to define the respectability of the Press by a mere reference to price. If a man published a newspaper in which there was blasphemy, was it to be said that the conductors of that newspaper were respectable because they sold the blasphemy for 6d. instead of 3d.? He did not see why the publication of newspapers should be put upon a different footing from any licenced trade. Why was the man who published a newspaper not only to be registered and to give his address, in order that he might be found out, but to give securities that he would not commit an indictable offence? The whole thing was perfectly absurd and ridiculous. The imprint, which gave the name and address of the publisher, was a sufficient protection, and it was unjust to demand any further security. The fact was that the restrictions upon the liberty of the Press arose entirely from political causes, and dated from the time when everything likely to enlighten the people was tabooed. They were told that the fact of the law not being enforced was no proof that it was a bad one; but if the law was good it ought to be fairly and impartially administered against all persons, and he asked how many pamphlets, written by noble Lords and others, were registered? In point of fact, it was left to informers to put the law in motion, and then, especially in political cases, or in cases in which the matter complained of affected the Law Officers of the Crown, the whole force of the law was brought down to crush the unfortunate newspaper proprietors. The interest of the public would be sufficiently protected by a simple system of registration which would enable individuals to punish libellers, instead of which the law was surrounded by such intricate legal meshes that nobody could understand it. If it was good it ought to be administered. Let everybody be dealt with in a fair and straightforward manner, and let them no longer leave in the hands of the Law Officers the arbitrary and unconstitutional power which they now possessed.

Mr. M. Chambers

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and negatived.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

COURT OF SESSION (SCOTLAND) BILL
(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Attorney General.)

[BILL 45]. SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in moving that this Bill be now read a second time, said, that when he asked leave to introduce it in February, he had stated that it was not his intention to proceed with the measure until it had received the consideration of the different legal bodies in Scotland who were interested in it. The measure had accordingly received the careful consideration of these legal bodies. In the first place, the Bill was submitted to a committee of the Faculty of Advocates, consisting of twenty Members—men who were engaged in practice—and the Committee were unanimously of opinion that the Bill contained many valuable provisions for amending the procedure, and the judicial arrangements now existing, of the Court, and they added that, although further and early legislation might be thought necessary and expedient, they hoped a strong effort would be made to carry the measure. A committee of the Writers to the Signet expressed their satisfaction at finding that the main provisions of the Bill were to abolish unnecessary forms involving expenses and delay, and to render procedure more simple, economical, and expeditious than at present. To these objects they gave their ready approval, although they could not assent to all the provisions of the measure. The solicitors practising before the Supreme Court had expressed an opinion that a measure embracing so many details could not be expected to be acceptable in all its provisions, or to meet all the evils of the system with which it dealt; but they regarded it as a step in the right direction, and many of its provisions would be beneficial. Having regard to the necessity of obtaining a measure dealing with the present state of things, the Council were of opinion that the Bill should be proceeded with, although many of its provisions might not be exactly all that they could wish. It was of course, in such a measure, impossible to expect unanimity in all matters of detail, but such were the views of those much interested in the matters with which the measure was meant to deal. Another body of legal gentlemen in Scotland had given the measure a good deal of consideration—the solicitors who conducted business before the Sheriffs' Courts, and the whole body of country practitioners, who did not practise before the Supreme Court, but felt an interest in the judicial system; and the view taken by the Council of country practitioners was that they were unwilling that this Bill should pass, and the reason they assigned was that its provisions, so far as they went, were so good that they entertained an apprehension that, if it passed, there would be no further investigation or reform in the Courts of Justice in Scotland. He was not inclined to adopt that view; for he agreed with the opinion of the practitioners before the Supreme Court, that it was of great importance that they should have some improvement in the general system, and that such improvement ought to be introduced as soon as possible. But this Bill should not stand in the way of the fullest investigation into the jurisdiction and constitution of all the Courts—not only of the Court of Session, but of all the Courts throughout Scotland. It was, therefore, the intention of the Government to issue a Commission somewhat similar to the Judicature Commission issued last year in this country, and at present sitting and applying itself to the constitution of the English Courts; and he was assured that very valuable results were likely to attend the labours of that Commission. As representing to some extent the legal body of Scotland, along with his right hon. Friend opposite, who was at the head of the Bar, he felt that it was for the interest of the Bar, and for the interest of all connected with the Courts, that, if there existed a desire on the part of any considerable body of their countrymen for investigation into the constitution of all the Courts, and into the judicial arrangements of the country, it was only reasonable, and for the interest of the Bar and the Courts, to have such an investigation as might bring about a better system of the administration of justice. He wished it to be distinctly understood that while he considered, along with the practitioners interested in the business of the Supreme Court, that it was desirable the Bill should pass into law—he did not mean to say as originally introduced; for it would be his duty to give effect, as far as he possibly could, to the conflicting opinions expressed, so as to bring the whole system into harmonious action—it was not his wish to stifle the fullest investigation into the constitution of the Courts. It was the wish of all who wished well to the country that the judicial system should command its confidence and respect; and therefore it was that he proposed such an investigation should take place. He sincerely hoped that he might be able to modify this Bill, which had given him a great deal of trouble, in such a manner that it would meet with the unanimous assent and approbation of the profession, and pass the House this Session. There would then be this advantage, that the Commissioners would be able to observe its effect, and would see whether the changes which it made were improvements or not. If they found that it was a step in the right direction, they could continue it; and if it were not successful, they could try some other plan. He therefore proposed that the Bill be read a second time, pass through Committee pro forma, and then the suggestions of the various legal bodies having been received, should be re-committed, and such alterations should be made in it as were deemed advisable after consideration of these suggestions.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he would not go into the details of the Bill, but while supporting the second reading, he felt no hesitation in saying that the Bill did not go far enough. He had long been of opinion that the forms of their judicial procedure in Scotland had been framed at a time when the operations of commerce were much slower than they were at present, and that those forms were not adapted for the scale of commercial relations which now existed. He could have wished, therefore, that his hon. and learned Friend had dealt with the matter with a bolder hand. He recollected that not very long ago the Common Law Courts at Westminster Hall were almost deserted in consequence of the dilatory forms of procedure. The result was that the legal profession inquired into the matter, and a Bill was brought in which passed — namely, the Common Law Procedure Bill — which abolished a great many old obstructions and useless legal forms, and in a couple of years afterwards Westminster Hall was as full of business as ever. Now, that was an example which he thought ought to be followed in Scotland, and which legal reformers there need not be ashamed to follow. He was, therefore, prepared to support the proposition of the Government. He thought that the Bill would be an improvement, and, at all events, a step in the right direction; and there was no reason whatever why it should not go further, and put an end to a great deal of unnecessary delay. He was very glad to find that his right hon. Friend was going to recommend the issuing of a Committee of Inquiry. There was nothing on the part of those who were connected with the judicial system of Scotland which need make them fear the results of that inquiry. On the contrary, such investigation was very desirable, with a view to put an end to some of the ignorant, and he might say absurd, misrepresentation that had been put forward from time to time in the public prints on the subject of the business of the Court of Session. If that inquiry were made, as he had no doubt it would be, by competent persons, it would, he believed, produce the greatest possible benefit, and put a stop to many abuses which had been caused by the exaggerated misrepresentations to which he referred.

The Lord Advocate

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(The Lord Advocate.)

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he would not oppose the second reading, because the Bill contained many valuable provisions; but he thought the House would have been very glad to have had a little more satisfactory assurance from the Lord Advocate as to the extent of the inquiry to be made by the proposed Commission which was to follow the Bill. The learned Lord had stated that it was to inquire into the jurisdiction and constitution of the Courts, and he mentioned some minor details with respect to the number of the Judges and of the Courts; but he did not think that the country would be satisfied unless there was also a full inquiry into the procedure of those Courts, and the best means of preventing their present dilatory mode of conducting business. The state of the law required great amendment both with regard to the internal administration of the Court of Session and in its relation to the subordinate Courts. He hoped that the inquiry which they had been promised would have special relation to the procedure in the Courts, and expressly in jury trials; for on all these points there was great room for improvement. The people of Scotland had an example before their eyes in the cheap and rapid justice of the Sheriffs' Courts, and they could not fail to contrast it with the cumbrous forms that were followed when their suits went before the Court of Session. He thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given too high a colour to the reception which his Bill had met with from the profession; he thought he had seen some opinions expressed of a contrary character. The country practitioners, and even some persons who practised in Edinburgh, objected to the details, and indeed to some of the fundamental principles of the measure. He put it to his right hon. and learned Friend whether, looking at the state of the Session and the scanty opportunity that would be afforded for discussing the details, the best course would not be to refer the question to a Select Committee, with a view of separating those parts which were strongly objected to from those parts to which no objection was entertained? He did not think that any reform of the Court of Session, as it now stood, would give satisfaction to the country which did not proceed more upon the principle of the Bill introduced four years ago by the right hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Moncreiff). He was not so sanguine as the learned Lord in anticipating that small measures of this kind would stave off more comprehensive legislation; and there was an inconvenience in requiring people to become acquainted with new modes of procedure which were likely to be superseded by more radical changes. He had no wish to stand in the way of some moderate reform; but he thought that something far more searching and comprehensive was necessary to give satisfaction to the people of Scotland.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he had no objection to allow the Bill to be advanced this stage, on the understanding that, in assenting to the Preamble, they were only assenting to what every Scotchman would concur in—that some alteration for the better ought to be made in the Court of Session. He was inclined to think that the Commission should precede legislation. He hoped that, when the Commission was issued, some care would be taken that it did not consist too exclusively of Edinburgh lawyers—because, whether rightly or wrongly, throughout Scotland there was great distrust of Edinburgh lawyers. Of course, the legal profession must be represented on the Commission; yet country lawyers, and gentlemen who were in the interests of the clients, should also be represented.

MR. M'LAREN said, he hoped the Lord Advocate would not take the advice given to send the Bill to a Select Committee. Of all things that could be done, that would be the worst, for it would prevent the possibility of any legislation taking place this year; and the Bill contained so many good provisions, that it would be a great pity to lose the benefit of them even for one year. Reference had been made to the opinions of the legal bodies on the question; and, in fact, it seemed to be assumed that Courts were made solely for the benefit of legal practitioners, but he maintained that the public were those who had the main interest. Among all the parties who had given their approval to this measure, the Lord Advocate had omitted one which was of more importance than any other—namely, the Chamber of Commerce of Edinburgh. That body contained about 500 members; it included every person of importance connected with commerce or trade in the county or city of Edinburgh and the burghs surrounding it; and the Chamber had sent a petition to the House of Commons in favour of the Bill, expressing general approval of its provisions, and praying that it might pass with the least possible delay. He thought this was the highest possible testimony in favour of the Bill; for at least four-fifths, and probably a larger proportion, of all the cases that came before the Court were cases connected with mercantile affairs. The mercantile community, therefore, had a deep interest in promoting the cheap, rapid, and just administration of justice by means of improved legislation, such as the present Bill. As regarded the Royal Commission, he rejoiced at the prospect of its appointment; but he agreed with what had been said by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Carnegie), that it should not consist wholly of Edinburgh lawyers; for he knew that there was a certain measure of distrust—though, perhaps, not so great as had been indicated—but still there was a certain measure of mistrust or prejudice which would operate against any Royal Commission composed exclusively of that class. There were some other questions which had not been referred to; one was the number of Judges. In 1852 a Committee of the House of Commons upon Public Salaries reported that the number of Judges was too large, and ought to be reduced by two. He thought that was a very important point. The salaries of persons connected with most public offices had been considerably increased; but the salaries of the puisne Judges in Scotland remained as they were—at £3,000 a-year. He would suggest that the number of the Judges be reduced by two, and that the salaries saved should be added to the salaries of the remaining nine Judges, so that each would get £3,666. The salaries of the two presiding Judges he thought were large enough. Then there were in all parts of Scotland a number of local Judges called sheriff-substitutes, whose functions resembled very much those of the County Court Judges in England, only they were, in addition, charged with the administration of criminal justice in petty cases. But the judgments of these gentlemen, who heard the case and examined the witnesses, and knew the character of the persons on the spot, might be reversed by the principal sheriff resident in Edinburgh, who had never seen the witnesses, and knew nothing about the case except what he learned by reading the evidence laid before him. On appeal to the Higher Courts it was often held, as might be expected, that the judgment of the principal sheriff was wrong, and that of the local sheriff right. Many parties in Scotland thought these non-resident sheriffs ought to be abolished altogether, and that the position of the local sheriffs should be somewhat improved, and put on a more permanent and respectable footing than at present. He admitted there was a difference of opinion on this subject, and that there were some advantages in the system of non-resident sheriffs; but, in his mind, the disadvantages greatly outweighed the advantages. Another great anomaly was that although these local sheriffs were all paid by the Crown by annual Votes, the Crown did not appoint them. The Edinburgh non-resident sheriff appointed his sheriff-substitute at one place with a salary of £1,000, at another with a salary of £800, and at another with £600 a-year. All these sheriff-substitutes, he thought, should be appointed directly by the Secretary of State, at a salary to be fixed by Act of Parliament. Though he would have liked a larger measure, he thought it would be mistaken policy to let this Bill drop, in order that they might wait for a more comprehensive measure, such as that introduced four or five years ago by the Lord Advocate then in Office. It would be better to seize the opportunity of passing this Bill, which contained a great deal of good. When the Royal Commission had reported, he hoped that an additional good measure would be passed, based on its Report.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, there were very many anomalies and clauses in the existing law, and it was essentially important to get some of them removed as soon as possible. If they waited till they got a complete and in every way satisfactory Bill, they might wait a very long time; and he was therefore in favour of taking the present Bill as a step in the right direction. He hoped the Lord Advocate would carry out his suggestion of a Royal Commission, and he trusted this inquiry would not be confined to one part, but would include the whole system, particularly as to the double sheriffships—a system that principally existed for the purpose of finding employment for the Edinburgh lawyers. He trusted the Commission would be issued immediately.

Mr. McLaren

MR. CRAUFURD said, he would earnestly ask the Lord Advocate not to pass a Bill which they had no opportunity of discussing or examining. He contended that if there was to be a Royal Commission, it should be issued before, and not after legislation. He hoped the Bill would be delayed until after the fullest and most searching inquiry. The opinion of those who know the business of the Court thoroughly, and whose interests would be most affected, should be taken upon the subject. They should strive to get a Bill not to satisfy the Edinburgh lawyers, but to be beneficial to the country. He should like to hear the Lord Advocate defend that most monstrous institution, the system of double sheriffs.

MR. CHILDERS wished to impress upon the learned Lord Advocate the importance of appointing upon the Commission he proposed some gentlemen who would look into the matter from an economical point of view. By this he meant gentlemen who were not connected with that House, and who were not only interested in legal procedure in Scotland, but were conversant with the finances of this country, and would consider the question accordingly. Some years ago the extravagance connected with the Irish Courts was brought under the notice of the Government; a Committee was appointed by the Treasury, and it recommended considerable economical reforms; nothing, however, was done, and the Irish Courts constituted one of the greatest scandals that could be imagined, their cost exceeding the fees by £30,000, while the English Courts paid their way. Last year Acts were passed stereotyping some of the worst abuses of the Courts, and for the time even increasing their cost. He hoped that in this case the principle of economy would be recognized in the Commission.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had already explained that the Commission was to inquire into all questions connected with the constitution and jurisdiction of the Courts and the number of the Judges; and his purpose was that the investigation should be as full and searching as it was possible for it to be. He would recommend that it should not consist entirely of either Edinburgh or Scotch lawyers, but that it should embrace English lawyers, although the English Commission included no Scotch lawyer, notwithstanding which it was likely to recommend some assimilation of the English to the Scotch system. He was most anxious that the Bill should proceed, because it proposed amendments of the system in a direction in regard to which there was no difference of opinion, while it also proposed experiments which it would be advantageous to have tried to a certain extent before the Commission concluded its labours. He would remark that the hon. Member for the Ayr burghs (Mr. Craufurd) was an ardent reformer when he took the initiative, but was rather an obstructive when others did so. It did not rest with him to name the members of the Commission, but he was quite of opinion that it should embrace some one connected with the Treasury.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

LAND WRITS REGISTRATION (SCOTLAND) (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 56.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Walpole.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short Title of Act).

MR. WALDEGRAVE - LESLIE inquired what was the intention of the Government with regard to the recommendation, respecting the Lord Clerk Register, of the Select Committee which sat two years ago, on the subject of this Bill? The Committee stated in their Report that large powers were vested in the Lord Clerk Register, and that a considerable amount of labour had actually been performed by the present occupant of the post. All of it had been, and promised to be, of indisputable public advantage. It was inexpedient, they said, that powers so extensive should be vested in an unpaid officer. They, therefore, suggested the propriety of providing an adequate salary for the responsible head of this important office. The post of Lord Clerk Register, which had for many years been held as a sinecure, was deprived by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 81, of a salary of £1,200 a year. By the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53, a salary of not less than £2,500 a year was assigned to the Chief Registrar of the Land Registry of England. The Lord Clerk Register was one of the officers of State of Scotland, and the head of an office of which the revenue largely exceeded the expenditure. The Committee were unanimous in their Report—and he should like the House to remember that by the Bill now under their consideration, very large and increased duties would devolve upon the whole staff of the Register House in Edinburgh. He trusted that the Government would do their duty, and give a proper salary to the very efficient Lord Clerk Register, and also increased pay to the clerks and officers in the Department. He would remind the House that the present Lord Clerk Register, Sir William Craig, had resigned his post of Referee to the House of Commons, of the value of £1,000 a year, in order to attend to his duties at the Register House.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that in the course of the discussion on Supply a few nights ago the Secretary to the Treasury, in reply to a Question, intimated that the Government had it under their consideration to give effect to the recommendation of the Select Committee on that subject, and he could now add nothing to that statement.

MR. CRUM-EWING complained of the way in which gentlemen who did nothing were paid high salaries at the expense of the public.

MR. M'LAREN said, it had been assumed that the duties of the Lord Clerk Register had been increased, but he had seen no evidence that that was the fact, and he did not believe it. No new duties had been imposed by any Act of Parliament on that officer, whose work, such as it was, was done by a deputy, even for whom there was not enough to do. His own opinion on that matter was shared by nine-tenths of the people of Edinburgh; and he hoped that the Government, after they had concluded their consideration of the subject, would see that the right course to take was to provide no salary whatever for that office.

MR. CRAUFURD said, the hon. Member who had just spoken reminded him of the adage that none were so blind as those who would not see. Having sat on the

Select Committee himself, he could state that the evidence adduced was so irresistible that the general body of the Committee, feeling astounded at the work performed by the present Lord Clerk Register, who took the office under the impression that it would be merely honorary, spontaneously came to the conclusion that they ought to recommend that he should receive a salary. Whatever step might be proper in regard to sinecurists, there was no reason why a gentleman who really performed useful public labour should not be remunerated.

MR. MONCREIFF said, that, as he was Lord Advocate when the salary was taken away from the Lord Clerk Register, he thought it right to say a few words on this subject. The office was one of great responsibility and important duties. It was an entire mistake on the part of his hon. Colleague to suppose that there were no duties to be performed, or that the Register of Land Writs was not within the department of the Lord Clerk Register. So little was this the case, that the ancient statute which was the basis of the system of registration named the Lord Clerk Register as the high officer of State under whom the system was to be administered. Although the actual recording of the Writs was intrusted to the Keeper of the Sasines, the whole searching Department was under the direct superintendence of the Lord Clerk Register, who had besides a general control over the system. The office ought never to have been a sinecure. Unfortunately, when the late Earl of Dalhousie was appointed Governor General of India, he retained the office, while he surrendered the salary; and although he (Mr. Moncreiff) was very averse, on that nobleman's death, to deprive the office of its salary, having in view the improvements which it is the object of this Bill to carry out, it was impossible at that time to insist on its not being abolished. But his right hon. Friend, the present holder of the office, has discharged its duties for the last ten years with such labour, fidelity, and ability that the Committee which was appointed two years ago unanimously recommended that the salary should be restored. He entirely concurred in that opinion. Some allusion had been made by his hon. Colleague to the opinion of the people of Edinburgh. He was quite satisfied that the Government could do no more popular act, as far as its citizens were concerned, than to give effect to the recommendation of the Committee. Some observations had been made in regard to the Keeper of the Sasines. There was no foundation whatever for the assertion that this gentleman had no duties to discharge. His duties were important and essential, and they were most thoroughly discharged, and he was, as was well known, a most able and valuable public servant.

Mr. Craufurd

COLONEL SYKES said, the real question was whether there should be an increase in the expenditure of the country or not. If one person was sufficient to discharge the duties of the office, why should two be paid for their performance?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he could bear testimony to the efficiency with which Sir W. Gibson Craig had performed the duties of the office. There might be a question whether the office was overmanned; but there could be no question that there were important duties to be performed, and he thought there could be no doubt as to the propriety of paying persons who discharged important duties for performing them efficiently.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 23 (Compensation Clause).

MR. M'LAREN said, that the compensation payable to the suppressed keepers of the local Registers of Sasines under this Bill represented a capital sum of about £200,000. Some of the officers who would be compensated under the Bill as it stood had taken their office on a commission in which a clause was inserted, stating that they took the appointment subject to its being abolished, or a change made in it, and providing that no claim for compensation, in either event, should be competent. He moved, as an Amendment, the insertion of the words, "Having regard to the terms of his commission," in order to limit the claims for compensation.

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped that the Committee would agree to the Amendment of his hon. Friend. Since 1858 a clause to the effect stated by his hon. Friend had been inserted in the commission of persons taking the appointments for which it was now proposed to compensate them. The clause was not in all cases framed in precisely the same words. In some cases, the condition was based on the event of the office being abolished; in others, on that of alterations being made in it. What would less well-paid civil servants in other parts of the country say if it should be attempted to enforce in their case conditions of this kind, suppo-

ing they were now given up in the case of the influential officers proposed to be compensated under this Bill?

SIR JOHN OGILVY said, he thought it would be more judicious to leave the clause as it stood, as these gentlemen had held their offices for ten years, and had discharged their duties most efficiently.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was of opinion that considering the terms upon which these officers were appointed, it was impossible to resist the proposition of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren).

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would not object to the introduction of the words proposed by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, if it was understood that it should be left to the Treasury to deal with all the claims for compensation, as all the appointments were not made in the same terms, and also to have regard to the recommendation in the Report of the Select Committee as to those appointed since 1858.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that it was now ten years since these officers were appointed, with the expectation that their offices would be speedily abolished; but since their appointment their whole time had been devoted to the discharge of their duties, and it seemed hard to turn them adrift without compensation.

MR. CLAY thought that a bargain was a bargain, and ought to be adhered to.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday next.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND) BILL.
(Mr. Gladstone, Sir George Grey, Mr. Lawson.)

[BILL 117.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. VANCE said, that the Bill was one paving the way for the confiscation of the property both of the English and Irish branches of the Established Church. It was a violation of the rights of property, of the Act of Union, and of the Oath of the Sovereign. Upon the present occasion he did not intend to oppose the Bill itself, but wished to draw attention to a clause which had been hastily and inadvertently introduced the other evening. The clause professed to deal in a tender manner with private rights, but seemed to treat corporate rights in a rough way. The misfortune of the intended measure of the right hon. Gentleman was that it was a Bill of confiscation, without having any object of public utility. It proposed to confiscate three-fifths of the property of the Irish Church, without providing any equivalent fund for the support of that Church. It was a great defect in many of our Acts of Parliament that they showed too great a respect for private rights, and too great a disregard for corporate rights. One of the greatest anomalies in the Irish Church was caused by certain clauses which had crept into an Act of Parliament. There would have been but little complaint of the want of provision for religious purposes in certain parishes in Ireland had it not been for the enactments which had crept into the Church Temporalities Act. The misfortune was that whilst that Act enacted that, where there was no church in any parish or where service had not been performed in a parish for a certain length of time, the revenues of such parish should be forfeited to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; but it contained a saving clause, which enacted that where a benefice in such parish was in the gift of a private individual there was to be no sequestration, and thus such parish frequently remained without any religious supervision while its revenues were received by an absentee clergyman. The right hon. Gentleman carried that tenderness for private rights through the whole of the measure he shadowed forth—while confiscating, according to his own admission, three-fifths of the property of the Irish Church, without offering any counterbalancing public advantage. The clause in the Bill to which he wished on the present occasion to draw special attention was one which appeared to have crept into it through haste and inadvertence. It provided that—

“Every person who shall be appointed to any office in the College of Maynooth after the passing of this Act shall hold the said office subject to the pleasure of Parliament, and likewise every Presbyterian minister hereafter to be appointed to receive any share of the Regium Donum.”

The first part of that clause was an absolute injustice, while the last part of it was an absolute absurdity. The Bill proposed to enact that the presentation to all benefices in the Irish Church which should become vacant should be immediately suspended, and it was understood that the presentation to the offices in the College of Maynooth were to be suspended also. So far from that being done by this clause, however, it permitted all vacancies which might occur in that institution to be filled up, merely directing that the whole grant should be subject to the pleasure of Parliament. But what was the effect of that provision? Had not the grant to Maynooth always been subject to the pleasure of Parliament, which had at any time power to abolish it either in part or altogether. The part of the clause which referred to the Regium Donum was very vague. The Regium Donum was commonly understood to be a provision for the Presbyterian and Nonconformist clergy in Ireland; but, in fact, technically, it might be a Royal grant for any other purposes. There was no public recognition by any Act of Parliament of the Regium Donum. It was mere surplusage to say that that grant was to be at the disposal of Parliament, when it was voted in the Estimates year by year, and might at any time be abolished, either wholly or in part. The clause if agreed to would be utterly inoperative, and therefore he begged to move that that part of it which referred to the Regium Donum should be omitted.

Amendment proposed,

In New Clause (Maynooth and Regium Donum), to leave out the words "and the right of any person to a share in the Regium Donum which shall accrue after the passing of this Act."—(Mr. Vance.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought the hon. Member had been rather severe upon this clause, and it was a great pity that he had not been present when it was agreed to in Committee. All he could say was that he was in no way responsible for the clause, which had been introduced in order to meet the views of those who sympathized with the hon. Member with respect to this measure, and which was not necessary either to carry out the objects of the authors of the Bill, or to meet the views of the Government as expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. The hon. Member said that the first part of the clause—that which related to Maynooth—was unjust, and that the second part of it—that which related to the Regium Donum—was absurd. He appeared, however, to be more scandalized by the absurdity than by the injustice, for he proposed to omit the absurd part of the clause and to retain the unjust part of it. The course that the House should take upon the subject was quite plain.

Mr. Vance

These private rights were recognized in the 4th Resolution. In his opinion there could be no doubt that with respect to this clause they had gone beyond all usage; and if the matter were viewed in a strict and fastidious sense, possibly beyond propriety, in taking notice in a statute of right which depended entirely on the pleasure of Parliament. But if the grant to Maynooth were to be referred to in the statute, it was only just that the Regium Donum should be placed upon the same footing, and that the legislation with regard to both grants should be equal, which would be the case if the clause were passed. The fact was that the provision with respect to the Regium Donum grew out of the 4th Resolution which had been adopted by the House. That Resolution distinctly recognized the existence of a personal interest on the part of those who received the Regium Donum. It was not a legal interest, but it was an interest of a kind with which the House had always shown its readiness to deal generously; and if they were to make any distinction between the College of Maynooth and the Regium Donum they would be committing a manifest practical injustice. The hon. Gentleman appeared to forget that the Bill contained provisions for the discharge of the duties of the minister during the continuance of the Act, and that the only object was to prevent the creation of freeholds until Parliament could deal with the whole subject of the Irish Church.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would reiterate his objection to the Bill; and he presumed his arguments had some weight because the Roman Catholic Members were so desirous to refute them. He had voted with the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun) on the ground that it was unjust to pass an Act designed to injure the Anglican clergy, while the professors of Maynooth were allowed to be free from its operations. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) apparently thought such a course just, and had voted the other way; but now, by sanctioning the clause, he had endeavoured to cover an injustice by an absurdity. The position of those who derive benefit from the Regium Donum was totally different from the professors at Maynooth, because the latter were appointed under an Act of Parliament. It was perfectly true that the Regium Donum in the aggregate was sanctioned under the Appropriation Act, but the appointments were not specified in any Act of Parliament. On the other hand there was a clause in the Maynooth Act specifying the appointments. The position of persons receiving a share of the Regium Donum was therefore totally different from that of persons appointed under the Maynooth Act of 1845.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time upon Tuesday next.

REVENUE OFFICERS' DISABILITIES
REMOVAL BILL—[BILL 76.]

(Mr. Monk, Sir Harry Verney, Mr. Otway.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. MONK said, that he was glad to afford the Chancellor of the Exchequer an opportunity of which he knew that his right hon. Friend was anxious to avail himself, to explain to the House the circumstances under which Her Majesty's Government had deemed it consistent with their duty not to be present in their places at the hour at which the Speaker usually takes the Chair on Wednesday last, when he had the honour to move the second reading of this important Bill. He was sure that hon. Members who were present on that occasion would bear him out in the remark that he was extremely reluctant to snatch what was deemed by some to be a supposed advantage, but which he desired most distinctly and deliberately to state was not an unforeseen success, through the absence of all Her Majesty's Ministers. It was true that the right hon. Gentleman came down to the House half-an-hour after the usual hour of meeting, but when he (Mr. Monk) rose to address the House there was only one hon. Member present on the five Ministerial Benches above the Gangway. It would have been absurd for him to address mere empty Benches. He believed he was acting discreetly in moving the second reading and in reserving his arguments in favour of the measure for a reply. The reasons which had induced him, as an humble and independent Member, to introduce another Franchise Bill to the House at a time when two most important Government measures for the Reform of the representation of the people in Scotland and Ireland were occupying the greater part of the time and attention of Parliament, were briefly these. It would be in the recollection of the House that when the English Reform Bill was in Committee last year, the hon. Baronet the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney), proposed a clause by which the right of voting at Parliamentary elections would be conferred upon officers employed in the Revenue Departments, who were otherwise entitled to the franchise. That clause was negatived almost without discussion by the advice and recommendation of the present Prime Minister, and of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, partly on the ground that by conferring the franchise on Revenue officers new influences would be introduced into public life, which might not be of a beneficial character, and partly because my right hon. Friend thought that, although there was a fair prima facie case in their favour, preliminary inquiry was desirable; but chiefly because the House was anxious that no delay should take place in sending the Bill to the House of Lords, and that it should become law as speedily as possible. My hon. Friend allowed his clause to be negatived without a division, and for a time the hopes of the Revenue officers were doomed to disappointment. The object of this Bill was to relieve the public servants employed in the management and collection of Her Majesty's Revenues from certain disabilities imposed by an Act of the Legislature in the last century. In 1782, shortly after the formation of the Rockingham Ministry, a Bill was introduced into the House of Commons for the purpose of better securing the freedom of election of Members to serve in Parliament by disabling them from voting at such elections. That Bill was warmly contested in all its stages, but it was passed by considerable majorities, though in no one division were more than 110 Members present. At that time it was computed that the Revenue officers formed nearly 20 per cent of the whole number of electors throughout the country. On the third reading of the Bill the Marquess of Rockingham stated that in no less than seventy boroughs the elections depended chiefly upon the votes of the Revenue officers, so that in point of fact they could influence 140 votes in the then House of Commons. At present, they would, if these disabilities were removed, form a very insignificant proportion of the whole number of electors. Shortly after the union of Great Britain and Ireland the Act of 43 Geo. III., c. 25, was passed, creating similar disabilities for the sister country, and by the 7 & 8

Geo. IV., c. 53, s. 9, the provisions of the former Acts were amended and still further extended by increasing the penalty to be inflicted upon a Revenue officer for voting whilst in Her Majesty's service and for two months subsequently, from £100 to £500. Those were the enactments which the Bill sought to repeal. It was simply and solely a Franchise Bill, and was confined to the relief of the officers in the Revenue Departments from a fine of £500 and the further penalty of being for ever disabled and incapable of holding or executing any office of trust under Her Majesty, her heirs, and successors, to which they are liable for voting at elections. The Bill had been for some weeks in the hands of Members and of the public. There had been no undue haste, no surprise. The petitions which had been presented were unanimously in favour of the Bill. It was worthy of note that those Acts affected one branch only of the Civil Service. The Treasury, Home Office, Foreign Office, War Office, and Admiralty were wholly unaffected by them. The employés in those Departments could exercise the franchise freely without let or hindrance, and with respect to the officers in the Customs, Post Office, and Inland Revenue, whatever might have been the apprehensions of Parliament in 1782 as to the special influence of the Crown in directing their votes, it was preposterous to suppose that any such apprehensions could reasonably be entertained in 1868; indeed, if there were any grounds for apprehending any undue influence from that, or from any other quarter, an excellent opportunity would have been found for making trial of the ballot in taking the votes of the civil servants of the Crown. The chief argument used in favour of the Disabilities Bill in 1782 was that the Revenue officers themselves desired to be relieved from the franchise. One of the Members for Kent (Mr. Honynwood) said that the Bill gave universal satisfaction in the ports in that county, as the officers were liable to be dismissed from their employment if they dared to have an opinion of their own in matters of election. That argument no longer held good. The Revenue officers, as might be seen by their petitions, considered their continued disfranchisement as a stigma and as a disgrace, and as indicating a belief that they were under the control of the Government of the day, and unfit to be entrusted with the franchise. The Revenue officers themselves were a highly educated class, possessing political capacity equal to, if not above, their fellows. They were eminently fit to be entrusted with the franchise, and fully capable of exercising it with intelligence and independence. They had been selected by competitive examinations to fill offices of trust in the public service. Those offices they filled with credit to themselves and with advantage and satisfaction to the country. He would ask the House whether it was not a glaring anomaly that these men should be deprived of their electoral rights upon entering Her Majesty's service, and that they should be restored to them only on being dismissed on account of incompetency or some grave and serious offence? In the face, too, of the wide enfranchisement by the Act of last year, their position would be more galling and intolerable than it had hitherto been. He would appeal to the House whether this was not a necessary corollary of the Reform Act of last year; he would appeal to the Scotch and Irish Members whether this was not a necessary adjunct to the Reform Bills for Scotland and Ireland? Nothing but the good of the State could justify the continuance of those restrictions, and he did not believe that they were necessary for the good government of the country or for the well-being of the public service. At that hour of the night it would be impossible for him to do more than to allude to the Report of the Commissioners of Customs and Inland Revenue just delivered to Members. Some of the arguments were inapplicable to the Bill, others might easily be refuted. But he must call the attention of the House to the remarkable absence of any Report from the Post Office. [“Move, move!”] In deference to the wishes of the House, he would at once move that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.

Mr. Monk

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”—(Mr. Monk.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought it was utterly impossible at that hour of the night to discuss a measure of so serious a character. He wished to explain and apologize to the House for his absence when the Bill stood for a second reading the other day. It came on at an earlier hour than was usual for the first Order of the Day, and he was not prepared for its coming on so soon. He was on his way to the House, but was unexpectedly detained, and reached very soon after twelve o'clock, but found the second reading had been agreed to without any discussion. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had on that occasion an ample opportunity for detailing the reasons for reading the Bill a second time—indeed, the Bill might have occupied the whole day; and if he had gone on with his speech he would have had the advantage of the presence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, who came into the House a few minutes after he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) did. A few minutes ago he had received a message from that right hon. Gentleman to the effect that he understood from the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway), whose name was on the back of the Bill, that it would not be proceeded with to-night, and the right hon. Gentleman had left the House on that understanding. On the same understanding he had told a number of his Friends who intended to support him in opposing the Bill that they were at liberty to leave. He therefore hoped the hon. Gentleman would have no hesitation in acceding to the adjournment of the debate.

MR. OTWAY explained that he had a short conversation with the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, who informed him that, being very much tired, he could not wait for a long discussion, upon which he said he would ask the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) not to proceed with the Bill; but the right hon. Gentleman left the House before he had the opportunity of learning the result of that communication, which was that his hon. Friend intended to persevere in his Motion. He thought it would be impossible now to persist in going into Committee when the Government declined to discuss the principle of the Bill.

MR. CLAY said, he thought his hon. Friend could not, in Parliamentary courtesy, resist the adjournment of the debate, but he hoped a Morning Sitting would be appointed for the Bill, which excited considerable interest among the large class whom it concerned.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

The House divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 52: Majority 16.

VOL. CXCII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD EDWIN HILL-TREVOR moved, "That this House do now adjourn."

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Lord Edwin Hill-Trevor:)—after some discussion, put, and negatived.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Powell.)

After further discussion, the House divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 42: Majority 9.

Main Question put, and negatived.

MR. MONK said, that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought, after what had happened, he (Mr. Monk) had a claim upon the Government, he should be happy to allow the debate to be now adjourned, and he would put the Motion down for Monday.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the question very worthy of discussion, and he should be glad to hear it fully discussed. He had no objection to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

House adjourned at Two o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, June 15, 1868.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, The Marquess of Bath added.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Metropolitan Regulations* (149); Metropolitan Roads* (150); Industrial Schools Act (1866) Amendment* (151).

Second Reading—County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) (108); Unclaimed Prize Money (India)* (121).

Committee—Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy Act Amendment* (103-148).

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—OBSERVATIONS.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

EARL STANHOPE rose to call the Attention of the House to the Report of the Public Schools Commission in 1864, with the View to some further Measures beyond the Bill now pending in Parliament; and to move for Copies of any Petitions or Memorials on the subject of Public Schools which have been received by Her Majesty's Government since the 1st of July, 1866. He had no intention of discussing the Bill now pending in the other House—had he desired to do so he should certainly have waited until it came before their Lordships; but all he had to say about the Bill was that he heartily wished it success, for it was substantially the measure which was framed two years ago by a Select Committee of their Lordships' House, to which the Bill introduced on behalf of the Government by his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) was referred. As the Bill was received from the Government, it was intended to legislate for a great number of cases; but the Committee adopted a more general and he thought a much sounder principle—that of leaving each case to be decided as it arose by a Commission which commanded confidence. It was on that principle the Bill which had been introduced into the Commons this year was framed, and he trusted it would come to their Lordships without any material alteration. But, important though the Bill was, it gave no power to the Commission it appointed to deal with the question of the course of studies at public schools. Yet the subject occupied much of the time of the Commission of 1864, and no one would deny that it was one of paramount importance. He did not complain that no power over the course of studies was given to the Commission, for the subject was one which properly belonged to the governing body of a school, and he disclaimed all idea of constraint or compulsion. The question he desired to submit to their Lordships was whether, without any constraint or compulsion, some measures of a practical character might not be introduced which might facilitate the improvements we desired to see effected in the course of studies, and which might enable the governors of public schools to do what he believed many of them were desirous of doing. It did seem most essential, as was well urged by the Commissioners' Report of 1864, that the studies of the public schools should continue to have a classical basis, and that they should still proceed from the languages of Greece and of Rome. A striking testimony to the value of that classical foundation, even where the teaching was of a far less elevated order, was supplied incidentally in that other Report of the Commissioners on Endowed Schools, so ably presided over by his noble Friend opposite (Lord Taunton). In one passage the Commissioners said of such schools—and the words though few are most weighty—"Where Latin is best taught French and mathematics are best taught also. Where Latin is not taught, other subjects are rarely well taught." While concurring in the desire that Greek and Latin studies should be made the foundation of the curriculum of these schools, he would say it did not follow that they should be, as they were fifty years ago the only studies. It was gratifying to find how many other branches of study recommended by the Commission of 1864 were being taught. Until 1836 mathematics were not taught at Eton; it was only provided that the writing master might be permitted to add them to his other teaching. It would appear incredible in the next age that the countrymen of Sir Isaac Newton could be content to leave mathematics at this great public school to be a mere makeweight and appendage to the duties of the writing master. Since then, both at Eton and other public schools, mathematics had become part of the school course. Modern languages had also been introduced at Eton. It was not the least of the many services which the Prince Consort had rendered to the cause of intellectual progress in this country that he had founded prizes at Eton for the study of modern languages. Notwithstanding these prizes, the study of French had been pursued at Eton under, he might say, great discouragement from the school authorities. But at present it was otherwise. Since the subject was last discussed by their Lordships, French had been made a necessary part of the school course. If disparaging terms were to be used of Eton, they could apply only to the past, and not to the present or future; for the system had undergone a most salutary change, and it was probable—nay, more, he would say certain—that Eton would henceforth take the lead in all improvements of study. Modern history and geography had been introduced, and natural science had made more progress at Eton and other public schools than he could have ventured to anticipate. When he last addressed their Lordships on this subject he expressed doubts whether natural science could be introduced into the course of studies; but now he found with great pleasure that this object was actually accomplished. According to a Return kindly supplied to him by the Provost of Eton—

Earl Stanhope

“ French is taught compulsorily throughout the school to the top of Division 4. The first three divisions comprise together just 100 boys. Some branch of physical science is taught compulsorily throughout the fifth form to the top of Division 4. The branches now being taught are physical geography, mechanics, hydrostatics, optics, astronomy. These divisions (4 to 11) comprise about 280 boys.”

In fact, so many new branches of study had been introduced that it had become absolutely necessary to consider what portions of the present curriculum could be laid aside while retaining the classical foundation—for the conclusion was irresistible, that, with due regard to the health and physical training of the boys, it was impossible to increase materially the time devoted to study. Much might be done by increased application and by improved methods of teaching; but substantially the question was what branches of study were to be given up for the branches which were to be adopted. He could not but think it was desirable with that view to deal with the practice of Greek composition in prose and in verse, which he believed could be wholly set aside. Latin composition might be, not set aside, but restrained within smaller bounds, and especially should it be confined to those who showed an aptitude for it. But he maintained there was no good argument for continuing the practice of composition in Greek verse. To illustrate that point he would take the case of the noble Earl the late Prime Minister (the Earl of Derby), who, it was universally allowed, had gained great credit by his spirited and successful translation of the Iliad into English verse, and who, he might remark in passing, would greatly gratify gentlemen of all political parties if he would employ his present leisure in translating the Odyssey also. Now, supposing that the noble Earl, instead of giving an English version of the Iliad, had been so misled by his school recollections as to have undertaken the translation of Paradise Lost into Greek iambs, he would doubtless have been subjected to very disparaging remarks—and, indeed, he observed that the very idea caused his noble Friend to smile. A very painful impression was in like manner produced on his mind by the description of the ludicrous efforts of a school-boy who, being required to celebrate the inauguration of a neighbouring railway in some prize verses, endeavoured to convey the notion of a railway in pure and classical Greek; and it certainly was a strong condemnation of the system that, whereas other branches of study, if pursued in after-life, brought praise and honour to those who cultivated them, the pursuit of Greek and Latin composition would be productive of ridicule. Then when so many other branches of study demanded our attention, what argument could be adduced in favour of continuing this system of Greek and Latin composition at our public schools? The sole argument which he had heard was that it tended to promote good scholarship. But was that the fact? He would venture to bring forward evidence to the contrary, and he felt sure it would be listened to with respect by their Lordships. There was a very important letter, dated the 8th of November, 1862, from Dr. Whewell, the late Master of Trinity College. It would be found in the second volume of the Commission of 1862. In that letter Dr. Whewell said—

“ The very great amount of time and care which is bestowed on this accomplishment [of writing Latin verses] is disproportioned to the value of it as a condition and element of an exact knowledge of the Latin language. Still more are the writing of Greek prose and Greek verse not necessary to the scholar; and it cannot be doubted that a most exact knowledge of Greek may exist in persons who could not fluently translate Addison into Greek prose or Pope into Greek verse. . . . The great amount of time and attention bestowed on these accomplishments in this University has, I think, an unfavourable effect upon the knowledge of classical literature which our scholars acquire. The result of its occupying so much of their time is that they bestow comparatively little of their time and thoughts upon the reading of Greek and Latin authors with a view to their matter. They are much better acquainted with the Greek and Latin written by themselves and their companions than with any Greek or Latin written by ancient authors.”—[p. 43.]

He trusted their Lordships would mark well these words. If even Greek and Latin scholarship were to be taken as the sole and entire aim of public schools, see what so high an authority pronounced to be the effect upon that scholarship of the system of Greek and Latin composition. Dr. Whewell declared that it was actually unfavourable. The result of that system was in general to make the scholars mere copyists of copies—to turn them from the study of such writers as Virgil to the study of such writers as Vincent Bourne. If he wished to describe our present system of compulsory compositions in Greek and Latin by two words only, he would take the two words in which that great critic Boileau described some bad poets of his time—he bade us to beware of their “sterile abundance.” Nothing certainly could be more abundant than the crop of Greek and Latin verses at our Universities and public schools; nothing could be more sterile than the supposed advantages they brought. Why was the existing system maintained? He thought he could clearly show that some of our greatest public schools were themselves disinclined to encourage or extend it. Here, for instance, were some extracts from a circular letter, dated April 10, 1867, and addressed by the very able Head Master of Harrow, Dr. Butler, “to masters and tutors engaged in preparing boys for Harrow.” He said—

“It may be convenient for you to receive early information of an important change which we propose to introduce into our school instruction. Boys in the fourth form will be henceforward exempted from Latin verses altogether. In the shells the great majority will be exempted; instruction in verses being reserved for such young boys in this part of the school as shall appear to their tutors to have a decided talent for them.”

Dr. Butler then proceeded to show that by some other classes Latin versification might be still pursued; and he said in his final paragraph—

“You will not, I trust, infer from this circular that I am an opponent of Latin verses. On the contrary, I have a strong sense of their value as a means of imparting and developing a taste for refined scholarship. But experience has convinced me that with a very large proportion of our boys they are thrown away, and I cannot resist the conclusion that the intellectual interests of this large number demand some modification in our long-established system.”

The reason why the present system was continued was that the public schools were looking to the Universities, while the Universities were looking to the public schools. Each expected the other to make the first step. Anyone conversant with our public schools, if interrogated as to the reason why the system of Greek composition, which had become the laughing-stock of the best scholars of France and Germany, was still continued in this country, would reply that the public schools were bound to train boys for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, where prizes were awarded for Greek composition—as the Porson Prize at Cambridge and the Gaisford Prize at Oxford—and where Fellowships and other posts of dignity and profit were to some extent dependent upon such acquirements; and therefore that if such instruction were not given the boys would not learn what they expected, and would be sent elsewhere. If, on the other hand, any one at the Universities were asked why any encouragement was still afforded to Greek verses, the answer might be—“Why, what can we do? Is not this the very accomplishment to which the young men who come to us from public schools have been most carefully trained? Would it be fair to exclude them from the chance of obtaining academical distinction from that branch of classical study to which they have previously given so much of their time and care? There was much force and weight in those arguments urged on both sides; and though both the public schools and the Universities might desire a change of system neither of those bodies could effect it singly. There was, however, a practical suggestion which much reflection had led him to think would meet the difficulty; and he desired to submit it to their Lordships’ attention. The Public Schools Commission, as he had reminded their Lordships, had nothing whatever to do with the course of study; and what he desired to submit to the House and to the Government was, that when the Public Schools Bill had been in operation for some time—say after an interval of a year or more—there should be nominated another Commission, consisting solely of persons connected with the governing or teaching bodies of the public schools, and with the governing or teaching bodies of the Universities. He would have no one on the Commission who was not connected with either the schools or the Colleges, because he thought there ought to be nothing like pressure in the case. If a Commission of able men wholly connected with the public schools and the Colleges were so appointed, and if, assisted by an able secretary, they met from time to time, he thought it highly probable that great improvements would be made in the course of study. He did not mean to suggest that the Report of the Commission should be binding on the governing bodies; but they would have an opportunity of considering it, and he had no doubt that good results would follow. If it was true—and he thought it could not be denied—that those public bodies were desirous of finding time for the more important branches of study, without trenching unduly on the hours of exercise and recreation which it was important to preserve — if it was true that those public bodies were desirous of improvements, and yet could not effect them singly, he asserted that there was no other means by which improvements in the course of study could be brought about than by giving those bodies an opportunity of discussing details with the view of retrenching superfluities in other branches in order to obtain time for those more important subjects to which he had adverted. He owned there was one reflection which occurred to him with great force on reading passages in the Report recently presented in reference to Endowed Schools. He thought it very striking to observe how very much—and he said it to their honour—the middle class of this country at the endowed schools were striving to obtain intellectual superiority, and to push forward for an intellectual lead. Now, he would desire that the sons of the gentry of this country should maintain, as heretofore, the leading position in public affairs—that they should be, as they had hitherto been, the leaders in the intellectual and political movements of this country. If they were to do so—and he did not doubt that such was their desire—it must be by honourable competition in those useful courses of study in which the youth of the middle class were striving to excel them. In the endowed schools they found young men studying the principles that regulate the wealth of nations in the admirable work of Adam Smith; discerning the early revolutions of this planet, and the substances that go to compose it in the recent discoveries of Murchison and Lyell; or with Airey and Adams and other eminent astronomers exploring the still sublimer rules which are obeyed in the starry sphere, and which enable us, mere atoms, to calculate with minute precision the slightest movements of the heavenly bodies. When the young men studying these objects at the middle-class seminaries came to compete with those from the public schools, that competition should find the latter engaged in the same course with perhaps still superior advantages of study. Let not that competition find our grandsons as it would have found our grandfathers—toiling merely in the composition of wearisome Greek iambics, or explaining in full detail the five varieties of the Asclepiadean metres! Let it be remembered, also, that those studies of imitative verse and prose were naturally stationary, while science was progressive.

Earl Stanhope

Their Lordships would remember the noble words used by Lord Bacon—Multi pertransibunt et augebitur scientia. Some short time ago he took occasion to explain to his noble Friend the President of the Council the object he had in view. He was very far from expecting his noble Friend on the part of the Government to give him any definite reply at present. He was well aware how numerous and pressing were the subjects which now occupied the attention of the Government; but he hoped he might hear from his noble Friend the assurance that this matter would not hereafter be neglected. He thought, moreover, that he was justified in bringing the question under the consideration of their Lordships, because there could be no place better fitted for its discussion than an assembly in which there were so many Prelates who, so greatly to their honour and credit, had at the outset of their careers been teachers of youth in our public schools and Colleges. The education in those institutions was of immense importance; for there was nothing which conduced, in the long run, more effectually to the object their Lordships all had in view—to maintain unimpaired the greatness of the English nation and of the English name.

Moved, “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of any Petitions or Memorials on the Subject of Public Schools which have been received by Her Majesty’s Government since the 1st of July, 1866.”—(The Earl Stanhope.)

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, that as one who took a great interest in our public schools, he could not help expressing his thanks to his noble Friend for having again brought this question before their Lordships. The noble Earl (Earl Stanhope) had alluded to the Report of the Commission over which he (the Earl of Clarendon) had had the honour to preside. That Report was the result of a very laborious and impartial inquiry, in the course of which evidence was taken of a very remarkable character; but he regretted to say that hitherto the labours of the Commission had been almost barren of results. A Bill was brought in and referred to a Select Committee. He admitted that the measure was much improved by the Committee. Machinery was introduced by which great and important reforms might have been effected; but, to the regret and surprise of those interested in the public schools, valuable clauses were struck out by their Lordships after the Bill came from the Select Committee. It was now two years since that Bill had passed their Lordships' House; and although during the last two Sessions the House of Commons had been almost exclusively engaged in the discussion of questions of Reform, he thought that if the Government had been earnest on the subject, and had attached to the Bill of last year the importance it deserved, there would have been no insurmountable difficulty in passing it. This Session the Bill had been introduced in the House of Commons and had been referred to a Select Committee; but whether, after coming down from the Committee, it would undergo another discussion and reach their Lordships in time for consideration, or whether it would be one of those measures abandoned at the close of the Session, he was of course unable to say. Sure he was, however, that no further delay ought to occur in legislation which was universally admitted to be necessary, and in which the middle classes of this country took a great interest, notwithstanding the strange apathy with which it appeared to be viewed by the country, and particularly by the parents of children who would be affected by the public school system of education. To show how deeply interested parents were in improving that system, he would quote a single passage from the Report of the Public Schools Commission—

“If a youth, after four or five years spent in school, quits it at nineteen, unable to construe an easy bit of Latin or Greek without the help of a dictionary, or to write Latin grammatically, almost ignorant of geography and of the history of his own country, unacquainted with any modern language but his own, and hardly competent to write English correctly, to do a simple sum, or stumble through an easy proposition of Euclid, a total stranger to the laws which govern the physical world and to its structure, with an eye and hand unpractised in drawing, and without knowing a note of music, with an uncultivated mind and no taste for reading or observation, his intellectual education must certainly be accounted a failure, though there may be no fault to find with his principles, character, or manners. We by no means intend to represent this as a type of the ordinary product of English public school education; but, speaking both from the evidence we have received and from the opportunities of observation open to all, we must say that it is a type much more common than it ought to be, making ample allowance for the difficulties before referred to, and that the proportion of failures is therefore unduly large.”

He thought he could appeal to many of their Lordships whether there was any exaggeration in this description of the results of our public school education. He would not weary them with any further quotations from the Report or the evidence; but he had quoted enough to show that an education confined to Latin and Greek was unnatural; that, though these were everywhere professed to be taught, they were not taught thoroughly; and that, in any case, it was a miserable mis-spending of the best years of a boy's life. They were all agreed that the study of Latin and Greek should be the basis of a liberal education. He was convinced that if these were taught upon a better system, there would be abundance of time for them and for studies which were more directly fitted for boys for the practical age in which they lived; and, without overtaxing the brain or encroaching upon the recreation of boys, they might be much better qualified than they now were for the battle of life. He would not follow his noble Friend into the details of Latin and Greek composition and verse-making, because he could not quite agree with his noble Friend that there was any practical utility in such a discussion. Nor could he concur with his noble Friend in thinking that such a Commission as he desired to appoint would be useful at the present moment. Hereafter it might be of use; but just now the whole subject of education had been overloaded by inquiry, and the time had arrived when investigation might safely be suspended, and when legislative action should properly follow. What was really wanted was the passing of this Bill, re-constituting the governing bodies; and by and by the time might arrive when a further number of professional men might be appointed, as his noble Friend suggested. At the present moment he thought there was some risk that the chances of a sounder system of education would be rather retarded than promoted, if men of such eminence and authority as his noble Friend desired to appoint were to commit themselves very strongly in favour of the existing system. A Report by them would have such weight upon the new governing bodies and the executive Commission as rather to hamper than advance the reform of the existing system. It was also quite true that some of the schools had not been inactive or unmindful of public opinion, so far as it had been elicited by the inquiries of the Commission. His noble Friend had alluded to some of these. At Rugby natural science and modern languages were now part of the regular course. At Harrow that cruel infliction of verse-making upon boys, who had about as much aptitude for making verses as they had for flying in the air, was now greatly abated. Modern languages had also been introduced: and he was glad to hear that great changes were in contemplation—he feared, rather than in active operation—at Eton. [Earl STANHOPE: French is now compulsory.] He was glad to hear the fact quoted by his noble Friend, as a triumph of the new system, that 100 boys were now studying French compulsorily at Eton. [Earl STANHOPE: 180.] Such a fact showed that public opinion had operated upon the public schools, and that they could act independently of other bodies. The great point, in his opinion, was to see the governing bodies re-constituted, and the new system brought into action, not in opposition to the Head Masters, but in concert with them, and profiting by their knowledge. When such a system had been brought into operation, the time might arrive for appointing such a Commission as his noble Friend suggested; and he believed that the very men who would now be put upon it would be better fitted a year hence to undertake the task. A great change of opinion was in progress, and the volume of essays upon public education, which no doubt most of their Lordships had seen, would greatly assist in promoting that change. What was wanted was to infuse such new life into our public schools as would be able to deal vigorously with existing prejudices. This could only be done by legislation, and if his noble Friend's speech had the effect of contributing to the passing of the Bill now before the other House this year, he would have done better service than by promoting further inquiry.

The Earl of Clarendon

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH was glad that his noble Friend had alluded to the Bill which was the practical result of the inquiry of the Public Schools Commission, over which his noble Friend had himself so ably presided. They must remember that the Bill to carry out the recommendation of the Commission had been introduced into Parliament in three successive Sessions. In 1865 the noble Earl who has just sat down (the Earl of Clarendon) presented the Report of the Commission and a Bill which was the complement of that Report followed upon it. That Bill was referred to a Select Committee and underwent a laborious investigation during the greater part of the Session; indeed, so much time was consumed in investigation that the Bill could not be further proceeded with. In 1866 the late Government, acting consistently with what they had done in the preceding Session, re-introduced the Bill into this House, and it was passed and sent down to the Commons; but, owing to the change of Government, the further progress of the Bill was stopped. The noble Earl (the Earl of Clarendon), however, was hardly fair to the Government of which his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) was the head, when he said that if they had used a little more exertion they might have secured the passing of the Bill; for in 1867 his noble Friend introduced the Bill on the 7th of February, immediately after the meeting of Parliament; the third reading passed on the 8th of March; and it was sent down to the other House of Parliament. Anybody who remembered the proceedings of the other House last Session must be fully conscious how the time of the other House was overtaken with the discussion on the Reform Bill, and could not be surprised that a measure of this importance, occupying the whole time of Parliament, precluded the fair consideration of any other measure. Therefore, considering the magnitude of the question, he was bound to say the Government of his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) used every exertion to pass their measure; and one of the first acts of the present Government this Session was to re-introduce the Bill in the House of Commons, where it was now under consideration. Their Lordships would, of course, listen with the greatest respect to everything which fell from his noble Friend (Earl Stanhope) on the subject of education in public schools; but, at the same time, considering Parliament was already engaged in legislating on the subject, he thought it would have been better if his noble Friend had postponed his observations until the Bill had come from the Commons, where it was being considered, and perhaps considerably changed, by a Select Committee. The Commissioners had strongly and wisely urged the modernizing of the studies in public schools; and the mere introduction of a Bill to carry out the Report of the Commissioners in three successive Sessions had already exercised a beneficial influence on the governing bodies. At both Eton and Harrow the course of instruction had been modified; and the result so far induced him to recommend their Lordships not to press the heads of schools too far, but to deal with them very tenderly. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Clarendon) had admitted that his original Bill had been improved by the Select Committee to which it was referred; it was, therefore, reasonable to hope the present measure would introduce into the government of public schools those salutary changes so ably advocated by the noble Earl. He was sure his noble Friend would not press him, under the circumstances, to give a reply on behalf of the Government to his statement; and, respecting his request for Papers, he assured him that no memorials whatever on the subject had been received by the Government.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he thought that his noble Friend (Earl Stanhope) was wrong on one point, when he said that the Bill now before the Legislature gave the Commissioners no power to deal with the studies of the schools; for one of the clauses expressly gave the Commissioners power to make regulations with respect to the introduction of new classes of studies.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY rose to Order. The noble Lord was not in Order in discussing the details of a Bill which was now in the other House of Parliament.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he asked leave of the House to point out, as the noble Earl had already referred to the Bill, that the governing bodies and the Commissioners had power to make regulations concerning studies; and, that being so, he contended a measure such as that proposed by the noble Earl was not needed. As regarded the Bill, he desired to express his regret that it had been hitherto dropped, and his hope that it would pass this Session and become law. He believed that it was the necessary and the adequate sequel to the Commission, which could not be said to be a failure till this Bill had been considered on its merits and rejected by Parliament. He thought the chief difference between his noble Friend and the late Commission was as to the time necessary for the different studies. His noble Friend argued that there was not time for the new studies, unless at the expense of the old ones. Now in the Report he would find a carefully prepared scheme with respect to Eton, in which the new studies were introduced, without any unnecessary curtailment of the time given to the old ones. He regretted that the noble Earl had shown himself as inveterate an opponent as ever of Greek and Latin composition. He eminent tho was who ha public school in the habit of each other. It was adm much time Latin compo thought with lotted to ther—but not th disregarded. if, as his no Lost should bics, but a hexameters indeed, if th undertake to he hoped his The noble E. the idea of th railway being Well, he wo beautiful mo seen was a engine, in her of Rochester Latin verse i plished in the guage of Gre Greek and treated just modern lang lamentable to born with a a had been co learning year only with at declined, with that natural sired that all be placed so there should boys as had a should be abl whose inclin physics, or coive full en He thought for inaugural sent system Until they av that was alr portion of or besides the c pect that th would cease clusive atten schools must attention to those subjects which were in the greatest favour in the Universities.

The Duke of Marlborough

EARL STANHOPE wished to say in reference to the observations of his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Clarendon), that he had not in any case contemplated the immediate appointment of a Commission. He had been careful to explain that he did not wish for its appointment for a year or more after the first Commission to be appointed under the Public School Bill had been at work for some time. His object had been in a great measure attained by the opinions which he had elicited. After the discussion that had been held, and on learning from the noble Duke that no petitions or memorials had been received by Her Majesty's Government since the 1st of July, 1866, he should withdraw his Motion.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

COUNTY COURTS ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION BILL. (The Earl Granville)

(NO. 108.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, explained that the object of the measure was to transfer to County Courts, nominated and appointed by Her Majesty in Council, the power and jurisdiction given to two Justices and a County Court Judge by certain sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862. The operation of the Bill would be to enable small suitors in Admiralty cases to make their claims before County Courts. To enable the Judge to perform his functions satisfactorily, he was to be aided by assessors, who were to be approved by the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty. An appeal lay from the County Court to the High Court of Admiralty.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(Earl Granville.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that in the course of last Session a Bill was introduced by the Government into the other House of Parliament for the purpose of giving County Courts jurisdiction in Admiralty cases; but the measure was obliged to be placed in abeyance in consequence of the exciting subjects which arose at that time, and which fully occupied the attention of Parliament. After the close of the Session, a Commission was appointed for the purpose of considering this among other important subjects connected with the law, and he should have been more satisfied had the present Bill not been introduced until after the Report of that Commission had been made. As, however, there was evidently a strong feeling throughout the country in favour of some Admiralty jurisdiction being conferred upon the County Courts, and as the House of Commons had passed the present measure, he should not wish to oppose the second reading of the Bill. While assenting to the second reading of the Bill, however, he should reserve to himself the right of proposing several Amendments upon it in Committee.

LORD CHELMSFORD also thought that it would have been desirable to have deferred legislation upon this subject until after the Report of the Commission had been presented. He thought it unfair to impose this additional labour upon the County Court Judges, whom he might describe as judicial beasts of burden, upon whom, whenever any new work of judicial business was devised, and it was not known to whom to allot it, the burden was thrown. He objected to the Admiralty jurisdiction in Liverpool being conferred upon the Court of Passage, and to the large fees likely to arise out of the litigation being given to the corporation of that town.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he proposed to introduce an Amendment in Committee relative to the Liverpool Court of Passage.

Motion agreed to : Bill read 2^a accordingly.

SALE OF POISONS AND PHARMACY

ACT. (The Earl Granville.)

(NO. 103.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

EARL GRANVILLE explained that the object of the Bill was to provide for the safety of the public by compelling all persons keeping shop for the sale of poisons, and all chemists and druggists to undergo an examination before the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain as to their practical knowledge; and no person was to be permitted to keep a shop for the sale of poisonous drugs, or to call himself a "chemist and druggist" unless duly certified.

LORD VAUX OF HARROWDEN expressed his general concurrence in the Bill, and his wish that its provisions might be extended to Ireland.

EARL GRANVILLE said, as far as he was concerned, he should only be too happy to extend the operation of the Bill to Ireland on the suggestion of so high an authority.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, he would not question the discretion of his noble Friend in extending the Bill to Ireland, but he should have thought that would not facilitate its progress in the other House. [The noble Duke proceeded to quote the Report of the Medical Officer of the Privy Council for 1866 to show the danger to life from the indiscriminate sale of poisons in village shops, and referred to the fatal case at Bradford, in which arsenic was sold by mistake for plaster of Paris, and used in the making of lozenges.] The Pharmaceutical Society was a voluntary one, and if there had been any other of the same character, it would have been fair to consider its claims to be put upon an equal footing; but as this Society occupied the ground alone, having come forward in the public interests to promote examinations, it was desirable that it should have the advantage which the Bill would confer of conducting throughout the country such examinations of chemists as were necessary for the protection of the public. But it was necessary, as these examinations were to be made compulsory upon all per-ample evidence that opium tions were most extensively parts of England. It was used by men and women to infants, and great destruction the result. The reports were most distressing, and fore, have been glad to see the Schedule. He did not think there was any special reason for it; but, in the absence of other ground, there was good ground for the House thought fit to do so. On his qualifications, he approved of one calculated to be general.

LORD REDESDALE said, in Notice of a clause, which many and others were anxious to see, and if any objection were made to it in Committee, he would bring it in. The Report. The Pharmaceutical Society had not proposed it because it would give a little trouble to add to the bottle as a "poison bottle," but it became known that poisons were sold only in a particular bottle, which would be known as a "poison bottle," and when it was not only to sell poisons in one bottle, but to sell things not poisons in bottles," there would be fear that there was at present of poisoning by mistake, as unfortunately were. Fatal mistakes were made in the dark, and might be avoided by having a b

VOLUNTEER REVIEW AT WINDSOR.

QUESTION.

LORD TRURO asked, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to grant a general holiday to those employed in the Offices of the Public Departments on the occasion of the Queen's Review of the Volunteers at Windsor on the 20th of June? The Government were as much interested in the success of this Review as anybody, and large employers of labour would be a good deal influenced by the decision of the Government in granting a holiday to their employes.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that the object of the noble Lord was a very desirable one, and he was glad to say that the Government, having taken the matter into consideration, had already given their subordinates who were Volunteers leave to join their respective regiments. Besides this, a Treasury Minute had been sent to the Public Departments directing that a holiday should be granted to the clerks and others who were Volunteers.

METROPOLITAN REGULATIONS BILL [H. L.]

(No. 149)—A Bill to provide Regulations for the Government of the Metropolis in certain Matters: Also,

METROPOLITAN ROADS BILL [H. L.] (No. 150)

—A Bill to improve the Roads of the Metropolis: And also,

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS ACT (1866) AMENDMENT BILL [H. L.] (No. 151)—A Bill to amend the Industrial Schools Act, 1866:

Were severally presented by The Marquess Townshend; read 1^a.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, June 15, 1868.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [June 4] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Local Government Supplemental (No. 6).*

First Reading—Local Government Supplemental (No. 6)* [175].

Second Reading—Government of India Act Amendment [91]; Governor General of India [92]; Registration [167]; Inclosure (No. 2)* [162]; Courts of Law Fees, &c. (Scotland)* [158]; Curragh of Kildare [134].

Referred to Select Committee—Curragh of Kildare [134].

Committee—Representation of the People (Ireland) [71]—R.P.; Petroleum Act Amendment (re-comm.) [141]; County General Assessment (Scotland)* [84]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 4)* [159]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 5)* [160]; Alkali Act (1863) Perpetuation* [153]; Court of Session (Scotland)* [45]; Court of Justiciary (Scotland)* [46]; Drainage Provisional Order Confirmation* [169]; Judgments Extension (re-comm.)* [163].

Report—Petroleum Act Amendment (re-comm.) [141-171]; County General Assessment (Scotland)* [84-172]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 4)* [159]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 5)* [160]; Alkali Act (1863) Perpetuation* [153]; Court of Session (Scotland)* [173]; Court of Justiciary (Scotland)* [174]; Drainage Provisional Order Confirmation* [169]; Judgments Extension (re-comm.)* [163].

Third Reading—Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement (Loans) Act Amendment* [133]; New Zealand Company* [156]; Duchy of Cornwall Amendment* [136]; Voters in Disfranchised Boroughs* [128], and passed.

COLLIERY PROSECUTION.

QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of a man named Hopley, who having been summoned before the Magistrates at the instance of Mr. Wynne, the Inspector of Mines for the Staffordshire district, for having refused to bring up a gang of Colliers from the Madeley Court Colliery when required to do so, had dismissed the summons; and whether the reasons had been given which induced the Magistrates to dismiss the summons?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that he was informed by the clerk to the magistrates in question that there was not sufficient evidence adduced before the Bench to justify a conviction. The circumstances appear to have been that the men down the mine disobeyed orders by not sending up the weight which should have been used to counterbalance the other shaft, and Hopley, therefore, would not send down the "doubles" to bring them up. The men below then procured "doubles" from another place, but Hopley gave them notice that he would not land them until they sent up the weight.

IMMORAL PUBLICATIONS AND PLAYS.

QUESTION.

MR. HUBBARD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home

Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the lamentable amount of juvenile criminality, largely attributable to the spread of cheap publications and theatrical representations of an exciting and immoral character, which corrupt the children of the lower classes, and stimulate them into courses of dishonesty and vice; and, whether the Government will propose any remedy for these growing and most serious evils?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that the hon. Member had been good enough to place in his hands samples of the publications of which he complained. The police authorities had also placed similar periodicals in his possession. The publications, although very bad in their character, were not of such a nature as to make them liable to prosecution. They were merely sensational, and did not come within the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act, or they would be seized and destroyed. With respect to the theatrical representations referred to, he was informed that there was a great deal of exaggeration. With regard to those places that were known as "penny gaffs,"—the police had told him that those which they had visited the performances were not in themselves immoral, and therefore the authorities could not interfere. As to the publications, he begged to assure the hon. Member that if anything whatever could be done to counteract their tendency he should be happy to do so.

EGYPT—LAW COURTS.—QUESTION

MR. LAYARD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any proposal from the Egyptian Government on the subject of a modification of the Capitulations, and the introduction of improved Law Courts in Egypt, to which all foreigners shall be amenable; whether such proposal, if made, has been entertained; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, Copies of a Despatch on this subject addressed to Her Majesty's Consul General in Egypt in the month of October of last year; of a Note on the same subject communicated by the Egyptian Government to the European Powers; and of any other Correspondence relating to the Capitulations and Consular jurisdiction in Egypt? He wished also to know whether the Papers could be produced at an early period, the matter being of such importance that he thought it called for the House?

Mr. Hubbard

LORD STANLEY said, in reply to the hon. Member's proposal similar to that referred to by the hon. Member had been received, and it had been engaging the consideration of the Government, consulting the Law Officers of the State. The question was also under the attention of the other Great Powers of Europe. He need not say that it was one of very great difficulty, and that it would take some time to decide. He should be happy to send a copy of the despatch which he had sent to the British Consul General in Egypt in October last containing the Majesty's Government upon the subject. He apprehended that there was some difficulty in laying the Note upon the Egyptian Government also upon the Table, but he thought it better to wait the production of the rest of the documents, until it was completed.

SCIENTIFIC INSTRUCTION IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.—QUESTIONS

MR. SAMUELSON said, he would beg to ask the Vice-President of the Council on Education, Whether he had received any information of the continued delay in the production of the information received from foreign countries abroad on Scientific Instruction in foreign countries?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, the delay complained of was due to the immense mass of matter to be translated. As soon as the translations were prepared, they were forwarded to the Foreign Office, in which Department the responsibility of printing the papers rested.

MR. SAMUELSON said, he would beg to know if any delay had occurred in the Foreign Office?

LORD STANLEY did not know, but he would make inquiry as to the matter. He believed the fact to be that a large number of these Papers were already printed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would beg to ask, If the Reports of the Secretaries of Legation could be laid on the Table at once, leaving the documents to follow as soon as they were received.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, there could be no objection to this. He believed that 260 pages had already been printed.

SMALLPOX HOSPITAL.—QUESTION.

SIR J. CLARKE JERVOISE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Privy Council on Education, Whether he has observed in the Annual Report of the Smallpox Hospital just issued the increase in vaccinated cases from 66·7 per cent in the epidemic of 1851-2 to 84·1 per cent in 1867, and how this is accounted for; and, when the Report of the Medical Officer of the Privy Council, which Members were informed they might calculate on having in their hands immediately after the Easter Recess, will be delivered?

Lord ROBERT MONTAGU said, in reply, that the Privy Council Report had been delayed in consequence of the great number of chromo-lithographs which it was to contain, and in consequence of the work of lithography occupying much more time than he had anticipated. With regard to the Smallpox Hospital he had to say that he had seen the Report alluded to; but in consequence of the great number of cases he feared that the operation of vaccination must have been performed very imperfectly.

THE BRINDISI ROUTE.—QUESTION.

Mr. GOLDSMID said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, in consequence of the opening of the Fell Railway over Mont Cenis, Her Majesty's Government intend to adopt the Brindisi route for the Indian Mails; and, whether they have made any application to the French Government to put an end to the twelve hours' detention in Paris of Letters posted for Italy by the Evening Mails?

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH said, in reply, that he thought it was premature at present to form an opinion as to the necessity of changing the route for the Indian Mails. The subject was fully considered by a Select Committee which sat in 1866, and, anticipating the opening of the Fell Railway, a very elaborate Report was presented to the Post Office by Captain Tyler. On the settlement of the contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company last November, it was stipulated that the Brindisi route should be adopted in preference to Marseilles if circumstances rendered the change expedient. With regard to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, he was informed that although the detention operated inconveniently for letters from London, this was not the case with respect to provincial letters, and that the present arrangement was most convenient for the French service and for all parties interested.

nient for the French service and for all parties interested.

FOREIGN OFFICE AGENCIES.QUESTION.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Correspondence has taken place between the Foreign Office and the Treasury on the subject of the amount of compensation to be granted to Foreign Office Agents in the event of their agencies being abolished; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay such Correspondence upon the Table of the House?

Lord STANLEY said, he would lay on the table the Correspondence between the Foreign Office and the Treasury on the amount of compensation to be awarded to Foreign Office Agents in the event of their offices being abolished.

IRELAND — POST OFFICE.—QUESTION.

General DUNNE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of a Commission or a Commissioner directed by his Grace the Postmaster General to inquire into the subject of a deduction of 25 per cent from the salaries of officers employed in the Irish Post Office, and to state any reason why that deduction was made in 1854, after a Minute of the then Postmaster General had stated that the salaries of the officials in London and Dublin should be the same?

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he understood that no reduction of 25 per cent ever was made from the salaries of the clerks in the Irish Post Office, nor was any Report of a Commission or Commissioner made to the Postmaster General on that subject. The supposed Minute of the Postmaster General did not exist. The question was probably founded upon the fact that there was a Treasury Commission which sat upon the salaries of the London Post Office officials, and which recommended that in the event of a re-arrangement of the salaries of the Edinburgh and Dublin officials, similar alterations should be made, due regard being had to the relative cheapness of living in Dublin and Edinburgh as compared with living in London.

the competition entered into by the architects, be a correct statement?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, it was true that Mr. Barry had written a letter to the Treasury, which had been published that morning in the newspapers, protesting against the appointment of Mr. Street as architect of the New Law Courts. This letter would be laid on the table, with other Correspondence on the same subject. With regard to an exhibition of the designs of the New Law Courts in the Library of the House, he might remark that the designs had already been on view for six months in Lincoln's Inn, and that no object would be gained by another exhibition in the Library.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE: Was Mr. Barry's protest received before or after Mr. Street's appointment?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: After his appointment.

SPAIN—CASE OF THE "TORNADO." QUESTION.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to the discussion in the House of Commons on the 23rd of July last, If any authoritative decision has been given by the Spanish Tribunals in the case of the Tornado; whether the claims of the crew for compensation for harsh and unjustifiable treatment are still under consideration; and, if he is prepared to lay upon the Table of the House any Telegraphs ordered by the 21st April will be presented. Is the cause of the delay in the Return, and the annual Return of the Railway Companies?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said that it would be impossible to get the Return relating to Electricity until the second circular, the requirements of which had not been received from the Great Eastern, and North-Western, London and North-Western, London and North-Western, Midland, Manchester and Lincolnshire, Great Northern, Great Western, Caledonian, and other companies. It was evident that the particulars from these large companies the Return would be as to be entirely useless. An answer must be given to the hon. Member's Question in presenting the compiled Return of the Railway Department. The failure of the companies to send particulars earlier. These particulars are compiled daily as they arrive at the Office of Trade; so that as soon as the particulars were received the Return was ready for presentation, and it would take a few days for computing the totals, and it would be generally also in type at the same time, ready for printing. Last year five reminders were sent to the companies, and the whole of the Returns were

THE ABYSSINIAN DES

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the Despatches have not yet been received. Some portions of the Despatches have been received; but not the Despatch which ought to be placed before the House before the Vote of Thanks is moved, and which refers particularly to the recommendations of Sir Robert Napier as to the services of the individuals engaged. The moment the remaining Despatches are received they will be placed on the table, and the House will see that it is absolutely necessary to have them. When they are received, I will give Notice of a day for moving the Vote of Thanks.

MR. LAYARD said, the delay was a little remarkable. Was the right hon. Gentleman aware that there were some persons now in town who had been present at the taking of Magdala?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: As I have seen the officers who have returned from Abyssinia, I will venture to answer the Question. Sir Robert Napier informed me, in a Despatch which has been laid on the Table of the House, that it was his intention to send an officer—Colonel Milward—with a Despatch containing details of the engagement which resulted in the capture of Magdala. On Saturday evening last Colonel Milward arrived, having been detained in consequence of the vessel in which he sailed getting aground. The Despatch gives full details of the action before Magdala; but the closing paragraph states that Sir Robert Napier proposed to send by the following mail a further Despatch, which would give the re-embarkation of the troops, and at the same time full particulars of the services of those whom he wished to recommend to notice. In a private letter to me Sir Robert Napier said he hoped to send this by Colonel Fraser. Very late on Saturday Colonel Fraser arrived, and left some letters at my house. The Despatch in question was not among those letters; but I have hopes that it may be among some other Papers that were sent to the Horse Guards.

REVENUE OFFICERS' DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK said, he would beg to ask, Whether the First Lord of the Treasury would appoint a Morning Sitting for the discussion of this Bill?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it is always most agreeable to me to accommodate Gentlemen on both sides of the House who are intrusted with the conduct of any public question of importance. At the same time I have a primary duty to fulfil—to carry through the necessary Business of the House with all possible despatch consistent with mature legislation. It is therefore very difficult to give those facilities which I should otherwise be happy to afford. I do not understand that the hon. Gentleman has any grievance to complain of. He experienced, I am informed, unexpected facilities in passing his Bill through a second reading, and that, of course, cannot be a cause of complaint on his part, but one rather of rejoicing. Inasmuch, however, as there was no discussion upon a Bill which it is admitted is one of grave importance, he could hardly doubt that on the Motion for going into Committee a discussion would ensue. I believe that there was an opportunity of going into Committee on Friday an hour after midnight, when it is our custom not to enter upon discussions of a grave character. I am, therefore, justified in saying that the hon. Member has no cause of complaint so far as the course of Public Business is concerned. The measure is, however, one which is of interest to Gentlemen on both sides. I should be sorry to be churlish in the matter, and on Friday there is an opportunity of placing this as the first Order of the Day after the Notices of Motion. I trust that this facility will meet the wishes of the hon. Gentleman.

ARMY—VOLUNTEER REVIEW AT WINDSOR.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, that Her Majesty had graciously signified her intention of reviewing the Volunteer Force in Windsor Great Park on Saturday. As it was desirable that there should be as large an attendance as possible, he wished to know, Whether it is intended to give the gentlemen engaged in the Government Offices who are Volunteers a holiday on Saturday, in order that they may have an opportunity of going to Windsor? If the Government set the example by giving the holiday, it would be followed, he trusted, by employers in the metropolis.

MR. DISRAELI: Notice, Sir, has already been given to all those engaged in Public Offices who are Volunteers, that their public services will not be required on Saturday next, in order that they may have an opportunity of attending the review. That Notice has been generally communicated to all engaged in the Public Service, and if there have been any omissions I will take care they are supplied. I trust that the good example thus set by the Government may be followed by others.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILLS.
QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is his intention to go on with those Bills that night?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that, although he was anxious to proceed with those Bills, there were others of greater importance on the Paper—the Irish Reform Bill for example—which stood before them on the Paper, and the Registration Bill, which stood next. If he found that the Committee on the Irish Reform Bill was concluded at such an hour as would leave the Registration Bill sufficient time to pass a second reading, he would proceed with the India Bills, but not otherwise.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to know, Whether the Electric Telegraphs Bill would be taken on Thursday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he wished, in consequence of an Answer just given to a Question by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in case the Committee on the Irish Reform Bill should not be finished that night, which was highly probable, he did not think it would be right to place it first on the Orders for Thursday?

MR. DISRAELI: I think there are reasons why the arrangement which has been made should be adhered to at present; but I will certainly take care that the Committee on the Irish Reform Bill shall not be neglected.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. MORRISON said, he would beg to ask, When the Government intended to bring on again the Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill; and also, if they were to have Morning Sitings?

MR. DISRAELI: In answer, Sir, to the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Morrison), I would just make one remark on the proposition which I am about to make, because it greatly affects the conduct of Public Business. The Motion is, that on Tuesday, the 7th of July, and on every succeeding Tuesday during the Session, Orders of the Day shall have precedence of Notices of Motion, and that the Orders of the Day of the Government shall have precedence over other Orders of the Day. That is an indulgence which, if the House felt any considerable indisposition to grant us, I should be sorry strongly to press for, because I attach much value to the privileges of private Members. At the same time, it is an indulgence which was extended to the Government some years ago almost perpetually in the month of July. It interferes, no doubt, to a certain degree with the privileges of hon. Members; but, on the whole, I think the Government may be permitted to have this great assistance in winding up the Public Business. The hon. Gentleman asks me whether I am going on with the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill, and whether I will have Morning Sitings? Now, I adhere to the statement I originally made on the subject of Public Business—namely, that my first object was to carry the three supplementary Reform measures. Now, the Scotch Reform Bill and the Boundary Bill, though they have not yet left the House, may be regarded as virtually settled. But we have still a third measure of Reform before us which may require from us a great deal of consideration; and when I see that measure in the same position as the Scotch Reform Bill and the Boundary Bill, I shall then be able to take a general view of the Business before the House, and to state the course of Public Business which I think will be satisfactory to hon. Gentlemen generally. Therefore, I would rather postpone saying anything about the Corrupt Practices Bill, or about having recourse to Morning Sitings at this moment. If the Motion with which I shall presently conclude is acceded to, the Government may be able, without unnecessarily using what, no doubt, is a most efficient instrument for carrying on the Public Business towards the end of a Session—namely, Morning Sitings—to attain the results which we all desire. I would remark that Morning Sitings, under the system which, with the favour of the House, I instituted last year, are certainly a most powerful instrument under certain circumstances. They are admirably efficient when dealing with an important Bill in Committee. Then you may make very great progress; and if it be necessary we can have recourse to them for the Corrupt Practices Bill. But they are really productive of very slight results, when devoted to the second reading of a Bill; because there is something so captivating in the discussion of a general principle that time is whiled away in a most extraordinary manner; and such a sacrifice of the comfort, the convenience, and the time of the House has generally a very injurious effect upon the efficiency of the Evening Sitting, if the Morning Sitting has been occupied in debating a second reading. Therefore, though the weapon in our armoury is one of great value and powerful temper, still I think we should not unnecessarily and with levity resort to it. At present, if the House consents to the Motion which I am now making, there is a fair prospect that we shall not need to task the energies of the House in an extraordinary manner with respect to Morning Sitzings. But, at the same time, I should not refrain, if I thought there was not a fair chance of our disposing of the Corrupt Practices Bill without them, from proposing Morning Sitzings.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. GLADSTONE: No doubt, Sir, the Motion just made by the right hon. Gentleman is one that is agreeable to the usage of the House at a certain period of the year; and that time is generally fixed by a reference to the amount of Business before the House in the hands of the Government, by the general views of the House as to the termination of the Session, and by the amount of Business also before us in the hands of private Members. As far as I am aware, I know of no reason connected with any of these topics to prevent us from acceding to this Motion; and if it should happen that there is any Bill in the hands of a private Member that it is desirable to send forward, which would be impeded by this arrangement, I have no doubt the Government will be glad to take it into their consideration. But I wish, in giving a cheerful assent to this Motion, to say one word. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will adhere with some rigour—and, perhaps, with greater rigour of construction than he seems disposed to adopt—to the rule that we should make it our main object to progress with the Bills relating to Parliamentary Reform. It is obvious that when we enter into Committee on the Irish Reform Bill, which I trust will not take a long time—although it would be sanguine, perhaps, to expect to finish it to-night—our proceedings in regard to it ought, at any rate, to be continuous, and we ought not to have other Business in the hands of the Government interpolated, unless it is Business of great urgency. The Government are quite right in asking for a full discussion of the subject of Electric Telegraphs; but I am at a loss to know why it should be necessary to take that subject on Thursday, in preference to going on with the Irish Reform Bill. I also hope that when the details of the Irish Reform Bill have been disposed of the right hon. Gentleman will not only keep in mind the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill, but, if possible, place it next in order, for undoubtedly it stands in close relation to the other measures of Parliamentary Reform, and our legislation on Reform will not be complete until the House has had an opportunity of fully considering and disposing of that question. I trust, therefore, that the Corrupt Practices Bill will be allowed to tread on the heels of the Irish Reform Bill either immediately or with the intervention of no other measures except those of urgent and pressing importance.

MR. OTWAY said, he wished to know, Whether any Morning Sitzings would be devoted by the Government to discussions on the Army Estimates?

MR. DISRAELI: I will take the inquiry of the hon. Gentleman as a suggestion, and I will consider it.

MR. MORRISON said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have misunderstood the Question which he had addressed to him a few moments before. He by no means wished to convey the idea that the Government were not anxious to proceed with the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill. On the contrary, he was quite convinced of the sincerity of their intentions in the matter, and he knew that there was a large number of Members on the Liberal side of the House who were equally desirous that they should go on with it.

SIR HENRY WINSTON-BARRON said, he would suggest that the Irish Reform Bill should be passed through Committee before any new Business was entered upon.

Resolved, That upon Tuesday the 7th day of July next, and every succeeding Tuesday during the present Session, Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices be quite ready to proceed with the Irish Reform Bill in Committee after the Public Schools Bill had been disposed of.

Resolved, That this House do meet Tomorrow at Two of the clock, subject to the Resolutions of the 27th day of May 1867.
—(Mr. Disraeli)

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM—
REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
(IRELAND) BILL.

(The Earl of Mayo, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland).

[BILL 71.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. REARDEN rose, pursuant to Notice, to move the following Amendment:—

"That no Bill can be satisfactory to the people of Ireland which does not provide for a rental franchise of £8 or upwards in counties, instead of a rating franchise of £12 or upwards, and a rental franchise of £3 or upwards and a lodger franchise of £3 or upwards in boroughs, instead of a rating franchise of £4 or upwards; that votes at Elections be taken by ballot; and that no borough be disfranchised, but that the boundaries of boroughs having less than 8,000 inhabitants be extended so as to include within the limits of such boroughs all premises, for the purpose of conferring the franchise on the inhabitants thereof." much as those boroughs proposed to disfranchise were and appeared to have been franchise on some cap support of which no valid be advanced. He felt as that nobody could be actuated by a desire to a matter than his noble Secretary for Ireland; but acknowledge that it was a trary mode of proceeding to a third Member to Dublin principle, and to divide those cases in which an ad to their representation. It was intended to disfranchise only one of the seats—the Dublin—was to be given to as things at present stood were represented in nearly of two to one. What he was, that the town of Port which only possessed 100 disfranchised, and that th tained should be conferred Dalkey, Monkstown, and E contained a population of 28,000. If that suggesti matters might be much as the Bill were proceeded w it was clear, from the nur ments of which Notice had the discussions on it mus aside so that hon. Members might be the earlier released from their labours. He saw no hope of their getting through the Bill in anything like a reasonable period if they were to proceed with the proposals of the Government, as to re-distribution of seats. Ireland would not suffer by leaving the remainder of the scheme to be dealt with by the better or worse men who were to follow in the new Parliament.

MR. PIM said, that in England 37 per cent of the Members would, under the new Bill, be returned by counties; whilst in Ireland the county Members were in the proportion of 62 per cent. It was, therefore, a very extraordinary thing to propose an increase of the number of Irish county Members. There was no doubt that the small boroughs in Ireland were not independent; but no party on either side of the House seemed to take into consideration the arrangements by which they might be made independent. The same arguments brought against five of the boroughs which it was proposed to disfranchise could be brought against all boroughs with less than 10,000 inhabitants. There were many boroughs in Scotland and Wales with under 2,000 population. His own opinion was that these boroughs in Ireland could not be rendered independent by any other plan than that of grouping, which had been found so successful in Scotland and Wales. Though he should prefer to see Portarlington grouped instead of being disfranchised, yet he was willing to admit that that borough afforded by far the least strong case for the retention of representation, while Kingstown afforded by far the strongest case for enfranchisement; and he should be well content if the whole principle of re-distribution were given up, with the exception of the transference of the representative from Portarlington to Kingstown. The question of the Irish Church was at present one of absorbing interest in Ireland, and there were also other questions engaging the attention of the lower classes in that country, and preventing them from taking an interest in the subject of Parliamentary Reform, their feeling rather being not to be connected with that House at all. He therefore thought that it would be advisable that the whole matter of re-distribution should be put off until those questions were settled and the mind of the Irish people was in a fit state to express their feelings with regard to Parliamentary Reform. Under these circumstances he should be glad if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) were acceded to.

MR. BAGWELL said, that when the Bill was introduced he objected to the disfranchisement of a number of boroughs in Ireland. The proposal to disfranchise boroughs while the county representation was increased could not be borne out by reference to the principle adopted in the case of England or of Scotland. He thought that such an arrangement would be fatal to the establishment of a fair system of representation. In the counties the landed interest and the landlords had a preponderating influence, and he did not wish to see that influence increased; but in towns the population consisted of people of varied interests and varied opinions. He still entertained the same objection to the Bill as he expressed on the night of its introduction. The suggestion made by the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) was one which was well worthy the attention of the Government. It would meet with very considerable support in Ireland, and, if adopted, would facilitate the progress of Business in that House. It was not to be regarded as in any sense a party question; and he hoped both sides of the House would concur in adopting the suggestion which had been made. He believed that the Bill would double the constituencies in boroughs; and therefore the number of voters would be so large as to form a good argument against disfranchisement.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he hoped the House would not forget the strong claims which Ulster possessed to increased representation. The present proposal of the Government by no means commended itself as likely to be a permanent measure. He would take the statistics of the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim) himself, and he found that the number of Members, if allotted to the four provinces in proportion to population, and also to the annual value of property in each, would be as follows. According to the population in 1861, Leinster, with a population of 1,457,635, would have 26 Members; Munster, with a population of 1,513,558 would have 27 Members; Ulster, with a population of 1,914,236, 34 Members; and Connaught, with a population of 913,135, would have 16 Members. According to the annual value Leinster (£4,386,986) should have 35 Members; Munster (£3,263,804), 27 Members; Ulster (£3,830,040), 30 Members; Connaught representatives to that House, and it was in order to provide representatives for those places that the disfranchisement of small boroughs in England was urged. But that was not the case in Ireland. It appeared that the only town in Ireland over 10,000 inhabitants which did not send a representative to that House was Kingston and Rathmines, in the county of Dublin. He protested against borough seats being transferred to counties for it had always been held that variety of representation should be studied. The Irish county Members were, almost without exception, the proprietors of landed estates in the counties they represented or in adjoining ones. Members of the trading, professional, and mercantile classes were only returned by the boroughs. He did not believe the proposal to transfer five seats from boroughs to counties would meet with approval, and he was not surprised to find hon. Members desirous to get rid of the difficulty by asking the Government to withdraw their scheme. He objected to any middle course being taken, and he protested against his own borough being made the scapegoat. Portarlington was not smaller than some English boroughs which, until the recent decision of the the House, had returned Members, nor was it much smaller than Dungannon.

Mr. SYNAN said, that although the discussion was premature and not altogether in Order still he did not regret that upon a fallacious principle of the Government was a constitutional principle, inasmuch as it proposed to merge the boroughs in the county representation scheme of his hon. and gallant Member for Longford was a fallacious principle, inasmuch as it placed the English and Irish boroughs on the same basis as to population. A population of 5,000 in an English borough presented a decaying villa in Ireland. An Irish borough with 10,000 inhabitants, according to the estimate, was equivalent to an English borough with 10,000. He recommended the effective scheme of the Government to be struck out of the Bill, and he recommended his hon. Friend not to persevere with it but to withdraw it.

Mr. H. BAILLIE said, that the re-distribution scheme seemed to be damned by Gentlemen on both sides, they disliked the transfer of seats to counties, and by his own side, because it gave additional seats to the South and not to the North. He thought Ireland should be treated in the same way as England—boroughs with more than 5,000 inhabitants being given seats, and the seats being given to large towns and partly to Kingston, which certainly understand the object of the discussion, unless it was to throw cold water on the whole plan for the reform of the Irish representation. For hon. Members to pick out and discuss particular portions of the question was certainly to prejudice it. He did not see why this Bill should be divided, and a half left to be passed by another Parliament. He was anxious to go into Committee, and he should then be able to meet the statements and arguments of the hon. Members for Dublin (Mr. Pim) and Londonderry (Sir Frederick Heygate), and show that the claims of Ulster were not paramount. The English Reform Bill had occupied almost the whole of last Session; and he had no reason to suppose that the Government or the House would be reluctant to give sufficient time for the fair and full consideration of the Irish Reform Bill.

MR. DISRAELI: I do not understand what ground there is on the part of the hon. Member for Longford (Colonel Greville-Nugent) for blaming the Government in regard to the course they have taken. They have moved that the House go into Committee on the Irish Reform Bill, whereupon a discussion not originated by the Government, but in which the Irish Members on both sides have taken a great interest, has arisen. It would not have been becoming in us to stifle that discussion, because it has enabled us to learn the general opinion of the House on the matters which have been raised. All that has been said shall receive respectful and careful consideration; but I do not understand that anything has occurred to prevent the House from going into Committee on the Irish Reform Bill. I hope that the Committee will now go on with the business before us.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 postponed.

Clause 3 (Occupation Franchise for Voters in Cities, Towns, and Boroughs).

MR. LAWSON said, he rose to move an Amendment. The existing franchise in boroughs in Ireland was a rating of £8. When the Chief Secretary for Ireland moved for leave to bring in the present Bill he stated that he proposed to lower the borough franchise from £8 to £4; but instead of lowering it to £4, the noble Earl had made it necessary that a voter should be rated at something "more than £4." [The Earl of Mayo: I said "about £4."] The clause now made the franchise above £4, for which there was no sufficient reason. The valuation in Ireland was conducted by persons appointed by the Government, and the valuation usually proceeded by steps of from 10s. to £1. The effect of the clause would be that in order to entitle a man to the franchise he must be rated at, say, £4 10s. It was desirable that the Government valuers should not consider whether the effect of their rating would be to give the franchise or not. His Amendment would render it necessary to alter the law of rating, and he had put upon the Paper a Notice in conformity with his present Amendment. The effect of the clause, as it was now worded, would be to disfranchise all who were rated at £4, of whom there are considerable numbers. Such an amount would be quite high enough, because it would usually indicate a house of between £5 and £6 rental. He begged to move on page 2, clause 3, line 4, to leave out the words "more than," which would place the borough franchise on an intelligible and rational basis.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 4, to leave out the words "more than."—(Mr. Lawson.)

THE EARL OF MAYO said, the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, taken in conjunction with a Notice he had given of an Amendment in Clause 26, would practically alter the law of rating in Ireland as it had existed ever since the Poor Law was established in that country. That law of rating was that in the case of all tenements rated above £4 the poor rates were paid, one half by the landlord and the other half by the tenant; whereas in the case of all tenements at or below £4, the whole of the rates were paid by the immediate lessor, and no demand was ever made on the occupiers for poor rates. That principle had worked very satisfactorily, and it practically exempted from the payment of poor rates the greater number of persons who were unable to pay them. That system got rid of the difficulty in the way of the collection of rates which existed in many instances both in England and Scotland, and he believed the day was not far distant when some such system—he was then speaking only in regard to the collection of rates—would be adopted for the entire United Kingdom. The great closeness between the rates struck and the rates paid in Ireland was, perhaps, one of the most remarkable features presented by the administration of the Poor Law. Since the introduction of the Poor Law into Ireland the total amount of rates made was £20,300,000, of which £19,500,000 sterling had been actually collected; so that the total amount of poor rate declared irrecoverable out of that very large sum in a period of more than thirty years, including the time of the famine, was under £1,000,000. The Committee ought, therefore, to pause before it interfered with a system which had worked so admirably. The increase which the right hon. Gentleman's proposal would cause to the constituency, although not very large, would include the very poorest class, and as a rule precisely those whom the law had declared to be unable to pay their rates. The increase to the borough constituency which would be made by giving household suffrage to every man in Ireland who paid rates would, in round numbers, be about 9,700 or 10,000; and the adoption of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment would add to that number some 2,000 persons scattered all over Ireland, the greater portion of them living in the city of Dublin. The great objection to the Amendment was that it did not affect only the persons who were rated at £4 in boroughs. Taken in connection with the Amendment proposed in the 26th clause, it would interfere with the system of rating over the whole of Ireland, and would render the occupiers of 39,000 tenements who were now exempted from poor rates, liable to pay those rates. No cause had been shown why they should create so great a disturbance in the Irish Poor Law and inflict so great a hardship on thousands of poor people. Nobody had asked for such a change. On the contrary, all whom he had spoken to were perfectly satisfied with the working of the present law, and not a single petition had been presented to the House since then. He therefore hoped that the Committee would reject the Amendment.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he thought the proposal ought to be limited to boroughs, and believed his right hon. Friend the Member for Portarlington (Mr. Lawson) was quite willing that it should be so limited. Thus altered, the noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland had given no sufficient reason for opposing it. It was true that was not a very large question, but that fact told both ways; and in speaking of the great disturbance the Amendment would cause system, the noble Earl must consider its effects, especially if it were applied to boroughs. He could not but agree with the noble Earl had said in regard to the manner in which the rates were collected in Ireland; but he could not agree that that inconsiderable depreciation in the present line at which the occupiers were personally liable, but which would be a considerable addition to the rates, if the Amendment were adopted, would seriously impair the value of poor rates. Again, the noble Earl himself proposed a much greater increase than his right hon. Friend had proposed now did from the present system in regard to five large cities. Dublin was one; for in the city the limit of liability was to be raised from £8 to over £4. The entire value of the borough constituencies would be diminished, and that Bill was a very moderate one, and he should welcome the Amendment, however small, that would be a step towards the Amendment of his right hon. Friend, which he hoped the Committee would support.

MR. VANCE said, that on the reading of the Bill, the late Secretary for Ireland entirely approved the principle of the proposed borough system for Ireland. Occupiers at a certain rate would not wish to have the condition of paying rates, and he thought the Amendment before the Committee should be regarded in Ireland among the public ties concerned as a breach of faith.

MR. MURPHY said, the consequence of retaining these exemptions in the 26th clause would be to do great injustice to the five large towns in Ireland. It would enfranchise the occupiers of 30,000 houses in Cork alone, and practically give them a qualification at £4 10s., which was equivalent to a £7 rental.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he wished to ask the right hon. Member for Portarlington (Mr. Lawson) whether he was prepared to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Fortescue) with respect to the Amendment to the case of boroughs.

MR. LAWSON was understood to answer in the affirmative.

GENERAL DUNNE said, if the Amendment were adopted, it would cause much confusion, as well as open the door to fraud and corruption, inasmuch as the very poor class of householders would be obliged to pay the rates for themselves.

The Earl of Mayo

Mr. O'BEIRNE said, that the operation to which the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland now so much objected, he had himself proposed to carry out with regard to no less than two-thirds of the whole of the voting population of boroughs.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) said, that all the Government were proposing to do was to assimilate the law of rating all over Ireland, so that a principle which had been found by experience to act well might prevail in counties and boroughs alike. The proposal that came from the other side was to compel occupiers of houses in boroughs to pay rates and to leave those in counties exempt.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, this clause did not follow a single principle which had been laid down with respect to the English Bill. A most inconvenient "hard and fast line" would be imposed by it. The proposition of the Government was to give every man a vote who was rated over £4, and the Amendment was to give every man a vote who was rated at £4. In Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Belfast, and Waterford, those who occupied tenements valued under £8 paid no rates and the Government proposed to give every man in those towns a vote who was rated at more than £4. In other words, in giving a man a right to vote they put upon him the hard condition that he should submit himself to a rate to which he was not now liable. This would apply to eight-tenths of those admitted to the franchise. Why not accept the convenient figure of £4? By this clause, the noble Lord was inflicting a great hardship on eight-tenths of those admitted to the franchise.

Question put, "That the words 'more than' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 188; Noes 177: Majority 11.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Lodger Franchise for Voters in Cities, Towns, and Boroughs).

Mr. REARDEN moved, in line 30, to leave out the word "ten" in order to insert the word "three."

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 and 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 (Successive Occupations in Counties).

Mr. REARDEN moved, in line 30, after the word "year," to leave out to the end of the Clause.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 postponed.

Clause 10 (Disfranchisement of certain Boroughs).

Mr. DISRAELI said, he proposed that this and the two following clauses should be postponed, in order that the Government might have the opportunity of considering the suggestion which had been made to-night. He proposed, however, to go on with Clause 13, and to accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Portarlington (Mr. Lawson) so as to do away with the Boundary Commissioners.

Mr. BAGWELL said, he did not understand why Clause 13 should not be postponed also.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he would explain that when they came to the clause.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 11 and 12 postponed.

Clause 13 (Appointment of Boundary Commissioners).

Mr. BAGWELL inquired what the Government proposed with regard to this clause?

THE EARL OF MAYO said, that with the permission of the Committee, he would explain the course the Government meant to take with respect to the question of boundaries. He was sure the Committee felt it would be a matter of great convenience if any inquiry into the question of boundaries could be dispensed with. There was really, as he would show, no necessity for any extensive alteration of the Parliamentary limits of boroughs. He found that in fourteen out of the thirty-three boroughs in Ireland the Parliamentary boundaries were the same as the municipal boundaries. These boroughs were Armagh, Carlow, Clonmel, Tralee, Wexford, Bandon, Dungannon, Ennis, Enniskillen, Kinsale, Mallow, New Ross, Portarlington, and Youghal. In these fourteen cases they would be disposed to leave the boundaries as they were, being the same for municipal and Parliamentary purposes. In a considerable number of them the population had increased since 1841, so that there was really no case whatever for altering any of their boundaries. In fourteen of the remaining boroughs the Parliamentary boundaries were larger than the municipal—namely, Carrickfergus, Cork, Drogheda, Galway, Kilkenny, Limerick, Waterford, Dungarvan, Lisburn, Newry, Sligo, Cashel, Coleraine, and Downpatrick. In these fourteen boroughs, with the exception of Carrickfergus and Lisburn, the population had decreased; in no instance had they extended beyond the present municipal boundary; therefore, they did not require to be enlarged, and no one suggests their reduction. That leaves only five boroughs to be dealt with—that is, Dublin, Belfast, Londonderry, Dundalk, and Athlone. In Dublin there were some small portions of the city north of the North Circular Road and south of the South Circular Road which were contained within the municipal boundary, but were beyond the Parliamentary borough. These parts of the city should be included in the Parliamentary boundary. As regarded Belfast and Londonderry, the Parliamentary boundaries should be extended, as in both these places the towns, from considerable additional buildings and a largely increased population, had gone beyond the present Parliamentary limits. The Government proposed that in these cases also the Parliamentary boundaries should be extended, so as to correspond with the municipal. In Dundalk and Athlone a small extension will take place by assimilating the municipal and Parliamentary boundary. The Government were prepared to omit the 13th clause, and to adopt the first portion of the clause of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Portarlington (Mr. Lawson) had given Notice, which provided that where the boundary of any municipal borough did not coincide with the Parliamentary borough, all that part of such municipal borough extending beyond the limits of the Parliamentary borough, but within the municipal limits, should hereafter form part of the Parliamentary borough. The second part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's clause would provide that in the case of any borough not municipal, but under Town Councils or Commissioners, the boundaries as settled for the purpose of local government should be the Parliamentary boundaries also. This would bring in such towns as Carrickfergus, Lisburn, Coleraine, Galway, Newry, Down-

The Earl of Mayo

patrick, and Cashel, and as it would have the effect of curtailing the limits of these boroughs he should not think the Committee ought to agree to it. He believed that in the case of the borough of Cashel it would have the effect of reducing the number of voters to the extent of one half. He thought that if the Committee adopted the first part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's clause, and agreed to the suggestion of the Government, they would get rid of all necessity for a Boundary Commission in the case of the Irish boroughs.

MR. LAWSON said, he would withdraw the latter portion of the clause of which he had given Notice. He had not intended that it should apply to the boundaries of existing Parliamentary boroughs, but introduced it to meet the case of Kingston if it should get a Member.

GENERAL DUNNE: What does the right hon. Member for Portarlington (Mr. Lawson) really want?

THE EARL OF MAYO said that the general principle on which the Government proposed to act in cases where the municipal now exceeded the Parliamentary boundaries was to extend the latter so as to make them coterminous with the former.

Clause 13 negatived.

New clause inserted—

(Boundaries of Parliamentary Boroughs).

"Where at the time of the passing of this Act the boundary of any municipal borough does not coincide with the Parliamentary borough, all that part of such borough situate beyond the limits of the Parliamentary borough but within the municipal limits, shall form part of the borough for all purposes connected with the Election of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for said borough."

Clause 14 agreed to.

Clause 15 postponed.

Clause 16 agreed to.

Clause 17 postponed.

Clause 18 (Payment of Expenses of conveying Voters in Boroughs to the Poll illegal).

MR. GREGORY, in the absence of Mr. G. MORRIS, moved an Amendment, having for its object to except from the operation of the clause the towns of Carrickfergus, Drogheda, and Galway, and the cities of Cork, Kilkenny, Limerick, and Waterford.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 4, after the word "borough," insert the words "except the several boroughs of Carrickfergus, Drogheda, and Galway, and the cities of Cork, Kilkenny, Limerick, and Waterford."

of the county of the town of Carrickfergus, county of the city of Cork, county of the town of Drogheda, county of the town of Galway, county of the city of Kilkenny, county of the city of Limerick, county of the city of Waterford."—(Mr. George Morris.)

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, that when the English Reform Bill was under discussion he voted for an Amendment having a similar object with regard to certain places in England to that of the Amendment now proposed by the hon. Member in favour of certain Irish boroughs; but the agents on both sides were now of opinion that it would have been better to provide additional polling places.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he hoped that the noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland would not assent to the Amendment. He thought the exception made last year in the English Bill was of doubtful policy; but the Amendment now proposed did not rest even on the same ground. The boroughs included in it were not, he presumed, of the extent of Manchester or Liverpool.

MR. G. MORRIS, who had entered the House after his Amendment had been proposed, said, that some parts of the Parliamentary borough of Galway were seven or eight miles from the town. If voters living at that distance were not conveyed to the poll by car they would in winter have to start from home before daylight in order to vote at an election. If expenses of conveyance were allowed at all, they ought to be allowed in boroughs comprising a large rural district. He hoped the Government would agree to his Amendment.

MR. MURPHY said, that although the Parliamentary boundary of the city of Cork extended for seven English miles, no polling places were allowed beyond the limits of the municipal boundary. He would suggest that in Cork and similar places the candidates should be allowed to convey to the poll voters who lived beyond the municipal boundary. The only other way of meeting the difficulty would be to create additional polling places; but his own opinion was that adopting such a course would lead to inconvenience.

MR. SYNAN said, that these county towns were really districts of counties, and it would be impossible to provide polling places for the sparse population scattered over them. The candidates for such districts should be allowed to provide cars for voters, as the candidates for counties were allowed to do.

SIR HENRY WINSTON-BARRON said, that as the representative of one of the boroughs affected by the Amendment, he was quite sure that candidates for these places would rather not have the privilege of increasing the expenses of their election in this way. He could speak feelingly, for he knew the extravagance and imposition which attended this form of expenditure. He hoped the Committee would reject the Amendment. Those voters who wished to come in and vote were perfectly able to do so.

COLONEL TOTTENHAM said, he wished for a clear explanation of how the Amendment would operate. Would candidates be debarred from paying the travelling expenses of voters who happened to be away in the country?

MR. PIM said, that with regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Waterford (Sir Henry Winston-Barron), though his (Mr. Pim's) election had cost a great deal of money, he had found the carmen of Dublin less inclined to imposition than many in a higher social position. Still he doubted not that the voters in outlying districts always contrived somehow to attend every fair and market in the borough, and he did not see why they should not be left to find their way to the poll. Scarcely any of them were without a horse.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, that many of the electors in these boroughs were poor men, who could not afford to pay the expense of a cart, especially as carters demanded higher terms at election time. Unless the candidates were allowed to pay these expenses a number of voters would practically not be allowed to exercise the franchise. The exception made in favour of certain English boroughs ought to be extended to analogous cases in Ireland.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, he thought Dungarvan should be included in the Amendment, as it comprised a large rural district.

MR. G. MORRIS said, he had no objection to strike out Waterford and insert Dungarvan, since the hon. Member for the former town (Sir Henry Winston-Barron) seemed to have a painful recollection of the impositions which had been practised upon him.

COLONEL FRENCH said, it was ridiculous to suppose that Galway voters were unable to walk five miles. They frequently walked such a distance to markets and fairs; and such an exertion, for an election happening perhaps once in three or four years, was surely not unreasonable.

VISCOUNT GALWAY had learnt, since he recently addressed the Committee, that the five polling places in Galway were all in the city, whereas in the English boroughs they were so distributed that no voter had to walk more than two miles or two and a half. It was manifestly unjust to expect voters to walk five miles.

SIR HENRY WINSTON-BARRON said, that he objected to the clause altogether, as subjecting candidates to imposition, and not merely to its application to Waterford.

MR. GREGORY said, the discussion ought not to turn on the virtues or vices of carmen. He thought the fault of the Amendment was that it went on a general principle, regardless of the particular circumstances of each borough. Drogheda, for instance, had an area of only 5,000 statute acres. He thought the Amendment was defective, inasmuch as it proposed to except small as well as large boroughs. In places of great size, like Limerick, which comprehended 33,000 acres, he thought that exception might fairly be allowed.

MR. WHITWORTH said, that the Amendment if carried would only be a temptation to bribery and corruption.

MR. G. MORRIS said, he was willing to omit Waterford as well as Drogheda from the Amendment.

MR. VANCE said, he did not know why Dublin should not be one of the excepted places, especially as Dublin was itself a county. The better course would be to strike out the clause altogether and allow these expenses to be paid where they were not paid corruptly.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he thought that this clause was a very peddling way of dealing with bribery and corruption. That question could not be satisfactorily dealt with in a clause such as this, nor could a clause be framed to carry out even the limited object at present in view if justice were to be done to the peculiarities of different boroughs.

MR. M'LAREN said, it appeared from a Parliamentary Return that out of ten boroughs in England exceeding thirty square miles in extent, only two were exempted. He objected altogether to the exemption of Drogheda which had an area of but nine square miles.

Colonel French

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, he was of opinion that their principle should be to diminish the expenses of candidates, and then they would not get a corrupt House of Commons. The proper remedy for the evil complained of was the increase of polling places. That was the only way to grapple with the question of candidates' expenses. He would divide the borough into districts and establish polling places in each. He would have additional polling places even where there were only three or four voters. Why should electors have to go five or six miles to record their votes?

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, that at present it was no easy thing in Ireland to establish a number of new polling places, though it might be easy to pass an Act to effect that object. A good deal of formality had to be gone through before they could be erected; and the inhabitants of the neighbourhood in which the polling places were usually situated would always oppose with the utmost violence the granting of any new polling places by the Quarter Sessions, because their sale of whisky would thereby be effected. But it was a mistake to suppose that the expenses of the candidates would be diminished by an increase in the number of polling places. Booths must be erected, each candidate must have an agent and a polling clerk at every polling place, and in fact the remedy would be worse than the evil.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, he thought that if the House was in earnest on this subject of Parliamentary Reform in Ireland there ought to be no hesitation in dealing with the question now before the Committee. If they decided upon granting the suffrage to the Irish people, they ought to give all possible facilities for the exercise of the voting power. Those facilities ought not, however, to be provided at the expense of the candidates, but of the public; and even if carriages were necessary for the conveyance of voters to the poll, these also ought to be provided at the public cost. Additional polling places were provided in the English Reform Bill, and if, being necessary in Ireland, they were not provided by the Legislature, what would the Irish Reform Bill be worth after all? There were numbers of places in England much larger than those in Ireland for which exemptions were now sought, and, in his opinion, exceptions ought only to be made in extreme cases.

MR. MURPHY said, he was of opinion that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. G. Morris) were adopted it should be limited to those cases in which there were voters outside the municipal limits of the boroughs. No payment should be made for car hire within those limits.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he could not consent to withdraw the clause which was framed on the English Act. The best course that the Committee could adopt was to follow the precedent of the English Act as a general rule, but he admitted that there were cases in which such a rule would be equivalent to depriving residents outside the municipal boundaries of their votes. Under these circumstances he proposed to omit the boroughs of Drogheda, Kilkenny, and Waterford from the clause, leaving Limerick, Galway, and Cork under its operation. He did not think the plan suggested by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy) would work satisfactorily. It would only lead to difficulties if one portion of the voters of a borough were subject to a different law from those who lived in another portion of it.

MR. BRADY said, though car hire was of some importance, Reform in Ireland was more important. They could not introduce corruption into a borough more readily than by sanctioning the payment of car hire. In his opinion the constituency ought to pay the expenses of conveying voters to the poll.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that no sensible man could entertain a doubt with regard to Drogheda. In the English Bill of last year an exception was made in favour of four places, which were called boroughs, but were to all intents and purposes more like counties than boroughs. If an exception was made with regard to Irish boroughs they ought to be in the same category as the places to which he had alluded, otherwise the rule that had been laid down by Parliament would be broken through. Cork was the only borough which came within that rule.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, that he proposed to limit the exception to three towns—Cork, Limerick, and Galway. They were the largest in extent of any in Ireland. Cork had an area of 70,000 acres, Limerick 33,000, and Galway 34,000. The case in their favour had been very much pressed, and he thought it would be better to conclude the matter by making an exception in their regard.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that if twenty-four square miles was considered a sufficient area to justify an exception being made in favour of one of these boroughs, it would be impossible for Parliament to resist any applications for a similar exception that might be made by English towns.

MR. G. MORRIS said, that in the borough which he represented there were voters living at a distance of five Irish miles, which was equivalent to something like seven English miles, from the only polling place in the borough; and to have to walk that distance to and from the poll was no slight matter. He should divide the Committee with regard to Galway.

MR. HIBBERT said, that until he was persuaded that an Irishman could not walk so far as an Englishman he must oppose the Amendment. The largest of the boroughs contained only 47,965 acres, while the smallest of the boroughs excepted in England contained 51,246.

MR. CANDLISH said, that in his opinion no case had been made out except on behalf of Cork, for Galway comprised thirty-five and Limerick forty-one square miles, so that if the polling place were central voters could be only about three miles from it.

MR. SYNAN said, that the polling place was at one extremity of the borough, and this made all the difference.

Amendment amended, by leaving out the words "county of the town of Drogheda."

Another Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out from the words "county of the town of Galway to Waterford, inclusive."

Question put, "That the words 'county of the town of Galway' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 134; Noes 86: Majority 48.

MR. VANCE said, that nearly all the counties of cities and towns in Ireland had been exempted from the operation of the clause except Dublin. It was true Dublin was not of a large area; but the Parliamentary boundary extended several miles beyond the municipal boundary, and there were many more voters, who would have to go six or seven miles to the poll. He should move, therefore, that Dublin be added to the list of exemptions, and he was sure the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim) would support him.

MR. PIM said, he would do no such thing. It was true that Dublin deserved to be exempted as much as Cork or Limerick, but as he was opposed to the exemption of those places he could not agree to include Dublin.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Amendment, which there was nothing in the circumstances of Dublin to justify.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON moved to include in the Amendment his borough, Londonderry which was peculiarly situated. Its area was not very large, but the town was divided by a river, over which there was a bridge, and as on this bridge a toll was levied, persons wishing to record their votes on the occasion of an election would be subjected to a fine. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite might laugh; but seeing to what extent the franchise had been lowered, 1*d.* was a great object to some who would in future exercise it. He thought the candidate standing for Londonderry should be allowed not only to engage carriages to convey voters to the poll, but also to pay the toll of the bridge.

MR. PEEL DAWSON said, he thought the noble Lord had made out a strong case, and as he (Mr. P. Dawson) was well acquainted with the locality he would give him his support.

MR. O'REILLY said, if there was to be any payment at all it should be the payment of 1*d.* to each voter to enable him to cross the bridge. It would be for the noble Lord, or some other candidate—and he hoped it would be another candidate—to pay the voters their toll.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT suggested, as a way of getting over the difficulty, that there should be a rider, making the bridge free on polling days, as Chelsea Bridge was thrown open on Sundays.

Amendment withdrawn.

Amendment, as amended, by striking out Drogheda, Kilkenny, and Waterford agreed to.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he thought it would be necessary to insert words restricting the payment for conveyance to the case of voters brought from places within the Parliamentary borough, or else it might include voters brought from the Continent. He would move to add words to that effect on the Report.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Vance

Clause 20 (Notice of Claim in Towns, and Boroughs).

MR. LAWSON moved to omit the "for any city, town, or borough," insert the words "or on behalf of the word "claimant." Claimant be abroad and it was only fair that on their behalf should assert their be put on the register.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he the proposed alteration would be advantageous, and that it would be better to assimilate the law in boroughs that in force with regard to them. There was no reason why there should be a distinction between them. It was desirable to get rid of fictitious notices signed without the knowledge of the person on whose behalf they were ostensibly signed. The public were put to great expense in respect to fictitious claims, there was no power to give costs against those who resorted to the practice.

GENERAL DUNNE said, that if notices were permitted to sign a notice, it should be provided that he should be required to prove that he had received authority as agent. Otherwise a political agent of his own accord send in claims for a county on the plea that he was "on behalf" of the persons concerned.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, such an Amendment as that had been steadily opposed in England, its practical effect would be that a political agent would sign any number of claims without the parties hearing of the matter, and when once he had his names on the register he would register as his voters, and they would never hear from him.

MR. LAWSON said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. MURPHY said, that there was a penalty against a clerk of the Union for omitting the name of a qualified elector from a list of electors. He begged the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the subject in order that some remedy might be provided.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, the clause could be called to account by the Local Government Commissioners.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 21 to 24, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 25 postponed.

Clause 26 (Where value of Premises do not exceed Four Pounds, in Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Belfast or Waterford, immediate Lessor to be rated).

MR. MONSELL said, that as proposed by the clause, the rate in certain boroughs was to be made on the immediate lessor, where the value of the property was not more than £4, and it would be a very hard case if the lessee, through the act of the immediate lessor, should be deprived of his right to vote.

THE EARL OF MAYO suggested that the clause should stand for the present, and he would bring up a new clause.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY: It is better to postpone it.

THE EARL OF MAYO: In regard to the ensuing election, it would be necessary to pass a temporary clause relating to the position of the voters this year, while this clause will refer to them in future. There is no necessity for postponing this clause.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Question that the clause stand part of the Bill.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY proposed to add a proviso, to the effect that the occupants of land or tenements in a borough rated at the net annual value of less than £8, and more than £4, should be entitled to be put on the register and vote at the election of Members of Parliament, notwithstanding the immediate lessor should not have been rated.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question has been put that the clause stand part of the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 27 to 31, inclusive, agreed to.

On Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress,"

COLONEL FRENCH asked when the new clauses would be brought up and the consideration of the Bill resumed. He gave Notice that as soon as the postponed clauses were disposed of he should ask the House to adopt in the Irish counties a franchise of £8 instead of £12.

MR. DISRAELI: I think it is due to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and also to the importance of the question generally, that no time should be lost in coming to a conclusion upon this question of the Irish representation, and therefore I will remove the Order which I had arranged for Thursday, and will put this Bill first for that day.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday next.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 91.]

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir James Fergusson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

MR. AYRTON said, that when the question of the Government of India was under discussion some ten years ago it was evident that it was the intention of Parliament that it should be at liberty to reconsider the mode in which the Council at home should be appointed, and the time at which their offices were to expire. He could not understand, therefore, why it was now proposed to grant the members of that Council pensions at once. The term of office which was suggested in their case by the Bill was in his opinion too long. The great object which it was desirable to attain he apprehended to be the introduction into the Council of men who had recently returned home from India, and who would be able to give the Secretary of State the benefit of the latest knowledge obtained in that country. That object could not, however, be secured if the members of the Council were to receive their appointments for a great number of years. He ventured to think that seven years would be ample time, and as the Council consisted of fifteen members, he would have two of them retire every year, so that a new element might thus constantly be introduced into that body, and that freshness communicated to it which it was of great importance, in his opinion, that it should possess. This plan would open a door for the employment soon after their return home of those who had served their country in India. He wished also to point out that the Under Secretary of State for India was not by law entitled to take any part in the proceedings of the Council, even in the absence of his chief from London. That he regarded as a most anomalous and unsatisfactory state of things, and he should submit that as the Secretary of State was empowered to appoint eight out of the fifteen members, the eighth should be, ex officio, the Under Secretary, who should take his place in his absence, just in the same way as the Under Secretary for the Home Department transacted its business in the absence of its head.

Mr. J. STUART MILL said, he agreed with his hon. Friend in thinking that seven years was a sufficiently long period for the tenure of office in the case of members of the Council; but he would suggest that there should be a power of re-appointment, because, while it was desirable to bring in those whose information was fresh, it would often be a great disadvantage to the Council to lose the services of some particular Member. Instead of two members being obliged to retire every year, one of the two might be eligible for re-appointment.

Mr. CHILDERS said, that when introducing the Bill his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India stated it to be his intention, in the event of its passing, to propose that the accounts of Indian expenditure should be dealt with in the same way as the Imperial accounts, in the respect that they should be submitted to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts appointed every year by the House. Before that was done, however, it was, in his opinion, desirable that that Committee should have an opportunity of considering the whole of the arrangements which the Government meant to make for the audit of Indian accounts. It was intended that the auditor of those accounts should stand in an independent relation to the Secretary of State for India, and that the audit should be one of a real and effectual character; but his impression was that the auditor at the India Office held some other appointment, that so far he could not fairly be called an independent officer, and that the audit was reduced to something like a mere shadow. What he should under those circumstances suggest was, that before any further action was taken in the matter the whole question of the audit of Indian accounts should be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts, so that it might be dealt with thoroughly previous to the third reading of the Bill. Proposals had been made to the effect that there should be an independent auditing of those accounts, as in the case of the Imperial accounts.

COLONEL SYKES said, he thought that the term of twelve years was too long for the tenure of office by members of the India Council. Under the East India Company directors went out every four years and could not be re-elected for a year. The civil servants in India, some of whom returned to England every year, were thoroughly acquainted with the change which the progress of the minds of the men taken into intervals. At Calcutta, Madras of Native graduates in the way as at Oxford necessarily from all situations of emolument. The employment of the Covenanted Civil Service is thrown open to the Committee upon the duration of members of the exceed five years Governor General Presidencies are tenable in the desirable, as suggested for Westminster certain individuals capacity for Office retain their place longer period than be given in the of State for India in exceptional cases.

Mr. Ayrton

SIR STAFFORD SMITH said, that the main purpose was to provide for the of a succession in India. There was that might be went into Committee several propositions and be prepared whole, he thought the most convenient members, each there would provide one new appointment allowing for vacancies appointments in gained a great India Council, complete views of India in a year there appointed. He adopted the suggestion for Pontefract (the mode of action to the Committee after considering such recommendations desirable. Thought might be unsatisfactory holding another situation, the audit was, nevertheless, efficiently conducted.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA BILL.

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir James Fergusson.)

[BILL 92.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Stafford Northcote).

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped that when the Bill got into Committee the Secretary for India would offer some explanation respecting the power proposed to be given to the Governor General to make laws for Natives of India wherever they might be, whether in India or in any other part of her Majesty's dominions. Hitherto this power had been limited in its application to Natives in India, and he wished to know why it was now to be extended. The provision in the Bill giving to the Lieutenant Governors of different Provinces very summary powers to make laws appeared to be a rather retrograde proceeding. The Bill provided for a difficulty—which now existed—in case of a difference between the Governor General and the majority of his Council; but it contained no provision to remedy an important defect in the present constitution of the Governor General's Council. Some further provision was requisite by which the Governor General should be empowered to conduct the ordinary business of government, by dividing his great administration into several Departments and placing one member of the Council at the head of each. The provision for introducing Natives into the permanent Civil Service required great consideration, for it was of no use subjecting candidates at home to stringent examinations if there was to be a back door in India by which the Governor General could usher Natives into the Civil Service. He thought it would be very much better to guarantee to the Natives that to which they were clearly entitled—namely, the uncovenanted branches of the Civil Service. He was afraid that at present it was too much the practice for those in power to appoint their own dependents to this part of the service; and the result was that the Natives had little confidence in the manner in which public business was conducted.

VOL. CXCII. [THIRD SERIES.]

COLONEL SYKES said, he thought it objectionable that the Governor General should have power to introduce Natives of India into the higher branches of the service without proper provision being made to test their capabilities and qualifications. With regard to the Uncovenanted Service, he took a similar view to that of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton). Of the civil servants in that branch, 75 per cent were European adventurers, ignorant of the languages of India, and usually the protégés of men in Office.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought that, in the absence of any Papers bearing on the question of the admission of Natives into the Civil Service, such an explanation ought to be given as the importance of the change deserved, particularly with reference to the extent to which it was to be carried.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE admitted the propriety of the suggestion that Papers bearing on the question ought to be produced. He had laid before the House Papers relating to the administration of Bengal, which ranged to a considerable extent over the more important questions raised by the Bill; but there were Papers relating to the appointment of Natives which it was desirable the House should be in possession of before passing the Bill. He would take care that they should be laid on the table, and in the meantime it would, perhaps, not be convenient that he should discuss the general subject.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [June 4] reported.

MR. CHILDERS said, that on Thursday week, when the Votes now reported were taken, he took occasion to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what period the Government proposed to take Supplies. The right hon. Gentleman was not in a position to answer him then; but on Monday night he stated that he proposed to take them for twelve months. It was not his (Mr. Childers') intention to make any objection to Supplies being taken for that period; but he wished to point out that the arguments adduced by the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion would, if accepted as valid, establish a precedent which might be dangerous on future occasions.

He desired also to note briefly some of the expressions which fell from the right hon. Gentleman whilst he was making his statement, and which he could hardly have intended to bear their literal signification. He said he did not know why the Government should not receive the same frank and honourable treatment which had been received by former Ministries under similar circumstances; but he was sure his right hon. Friend did not mean to impute that there was anything but frank and honourable treatment in the putting of the Question as to the time for which Supplies were to be taken. As soon as the Government had definitely made up their minds as to the period for which the present Parliament would last, he asked, stating that it was not a party, but strictly a constitutional Question, what course they would pursue, having regard to former precedents; and he did not mean to insinuate that his right hon. Friend either had departed or would for a moment depart from that uniformly straightforward course which in this and all other matters he pursued. In reply to the Question the right hon. Gentleman gave reasons why the Government would not follow the course which had been pursued on former occasions, but would ask for Supplies for the whole period of twelve months. He (Mr. Childers) had cited the precedent of 1841, and quoted the speeches of Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell, in which they said they followed the precedent of 1830; and his right hon. Friend said the precedent he had quoted was not applicable, and if it were it would not point to the conclusion that the Supplies should be taken for nine months, for in 1841 Supplies were granted four months before the time when a dissolution was possible, to last two months after the time when Parliament would meet again. That, however, was not strictly correct, because the Supplies were voted on the 7th of June, and the dissolution did not occur till the end of the month, so that the Supplies were really voted only for three months after the dissolution. As the House met in that year on the 19th or 20th of August, he admitted that there was a difference of some ten or fifteen days between that time and the time which would have elapsed had only nine months' Supply been granted on the present occasion; but

His right hon. Friend 1841 a Vote of Want been passed, so that that day could not carry through measures which they de the public welfare; but on occasion there had been tion, and although they been defeated on one if they had, with the as House, proceeded with Business. Now, that description of what had present Session. The man at the head of the describing the circumstances the dissolution was abe tinctly said that he had that his advice and that was that Her Majesty al present Parliament and the country as to the c nisters and the questi Church, and he added would be taken except i the Reform Acts. There Friend was not correct i was simply a dissolution question in regard to w ment had been defeated. ever, to point out that w tion had been announce been the reasons for suc variable and constitution been acted upon, and the ment had not been aske Supplies than were neces the public services until th met. His right hon. Fri on this subject the othe alluded to the precedent wished to call his right h ticular attention to that he (Mr. Childers) had q there was no Resolution liament either of want approval of a policy which could not support. The caused by the King's dea vernment and the Opposit anxious to lay down th principle that that dissolu notified to Parliament th that Supply should only b period of the existence of ment In June 1830 of July he remarked that the taking of Votes for a limited time was a pledge that Parliament would be assembled at an early date. The simple question which arose in the present instance was whether, if Supplies were now voted for nine months, there would be time in December next, when the Parliament was to be called together, to take the remaining Votes. Now, if Parliament met on the 8th of December he confessed it would be impossible between that day and Christmas to go through the necessary forms for taking additional Votes for the financial year. Four or five days would be occupied in swearing the new Members; it was a tedious process to set up the Committee of Supply in a new Parliament, and it would be necessary to pass a new Appropriation Act. He therefore admitted that the reasons of convenience given by his right hon. Friend were conclusive, and that if Supplies for nine months only were granted it would be impracticable to obtain a fresh Vote in December for the remaining quarter of the year; and accordingly although he was of opinion that Government were wrong when they urged that the cause of the dissolution had anything to do with the taking of Supply, he should not offer further objection to the Votes being taken for the whole twelve months.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER assured the hon. Gentleman that he had not intended to make any remarks to which exception could be justly taken. He believed that the words he had used on a former occasion would not bear the interpretation which the hon. Gentleman had put upon them. He had merely said, "Why should the frank and honourable course pursued in 1841 be departed from now?" In that year the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons stated openly the intention of the Government to call a new Parliament, and the Leader of the Opposition accepted that statement and relied upon it most implicitly. He certainly was of opinion that a like course should be taken now, and that the statement of the Government ought to be accepted without question. He was still unable to agree with his hon. Friend that the precedent of 1841 was applicable to the present case, because the House then determined that the ordinary Business should not be carried on until the autumnal Session, and therefore there was an opportunity towards the close of the year of proceeding with the regular Business, and fully discussing the Estimates. But this year the Government were not in a position to appeal at once to the new constituencies, and, therefore, the two cases were by no means parallel. As to the precedent of 1830, the dissolution was then caused by the decease of the Sovereign, and entirely new arrangements had consequently to be made for the transaction of the Business of Parliament.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the House would observe that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) were perfectly at one with regard to their practical conclusion, and it might, therefore, be deemed unnecessary that he should prolong the conversation; but the principle involved was of great importance, and it was even possible that the proceedings of the present Session might be hereafter referred to as a precedent. Therefore it was expedient that not only should a certain line be taken, but the reasons for that line should be recorded. He agreed with his hon. Friend that it was on the whole convenient that Supply should be voted for the entire financial year; but he felt bound to demur to the reasons which had been urged by the right hon. Gentleman in favour of the adoption of such a course. The right hon. Gentleman had asserted that the dissolution in 1841 ought to be regarded rather as an interruption of the Government with a view to the resumption of Business in the autumn. But this was not by any means the case, as, in point of fact, the ordinary Business was not resumed during the autumnal Session. Nothing was done in the way of what might be termed ordinary business except the passing of a Bill about the Bishop of Jerusalem. Then, the importance of the precedent of 1830 did not seem to be duly appreciated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That precedent showed, in reality, that the principle of voting Supplies for a limited period was the deference paid to the authority of the new Parliament by the expiring Parliament. He was not at all prepared to admit the distinction drawn by the right hon. Gentleman, for he did not think the Constitution recognized anything but this—that when an adverse vote was given on any vital point the Government had the power of dissolving, or might elect to resign. He would not go into the question of what were the particular reasons that justified the alternative of a dissolution.

tion. That was not the matter to be discussed at the present moment; but when the Government recognized it all arrangements should be made for dissolution. There were not two sets of circumstances applicable to such a situation. In 1841, the right hon. Gentleman says that the conduct of Sir Robert Peel was frank and honourable in accepting the declaration of the Government; but that was accompanied by a guarantee in the voting of the Supplies only for a short term. It involved no confidence, no reliance, and was entitled to no other praise than that of propriety or prudence, because the promise given by the Government was accompanied by a practical measure which absolutely insured the fulfilment of the promise.

Vote 8. £511,324 (Public Education in Great Britain).

MR. POWELL moved that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £1,500. He found that the expense put down for the preparation of the examination papers amounted to £3,000; while there was another item for inspection and examination which amounted to £5,450, and another of £2,800 for travelling expenses. He thought these items were excessive, and he wished to have some explanation concerning them, and for that purpose he moved the reduction of the Vote.

MR. E. POTTER said, he wished to call attention to the mode adopted of remunerating those persons who examined art collections for the South Kensington Museum. He had been invited to examine a certain collection which the Heads of the Department thought of purchasing; and after sending in his Report he received a cheque for £5 5s., which he need hardly say he returned. He thought such a plan as that was rather dangerous, and liable to great abuse; for cheques for such professional services were showered abroad right and left.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the Examiners of King's College and other Colleges, and the Examiners in the Science and Art Department at South Kensington, were not paid out of this Vote. They received no salaries, but only fees in proportion to the number of students they examined. The Vote last year was exceeded, and this year the number of schools examined and of pupils presented for examination had very much increased. This year 300 science schools were examined in different subjects of science, having 851 of under instructed presented themselves examinations, of science, were examinations worked papers by whom prepared and were looked over by eminent men in the subjects. The Professor Anatole Bradley, Rev. Professor Hux Ramsay, Mr. Thomson, Dr. Woolley. In art were the President Mr. MacLise, Mr. Westmacott A.R.A., Mr. Marshall, F.C.S. were very large issued. The these papers were. He was sorry he said by the hon. B. Potter). In a word that felt that he had been on some collecting inquiries, if the him Notice of know the result

First twenty-

Vote 25 (£ penses): Resol

MR. ALDERM to draw attention for "robes, &c thought that ought to pay. He believed, he were sent to some were not appreciated. At a monstrous to each county, in one sum for ornaments were intended, or not. As the on the average moved the reduced sum of £4,500

Amendment "£19,377," (Mr. Lusk)—i

Mr. Gladstone

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, it was quite true that the average of the item for robes, collars, and badges had been about £2,000 for some years past; but at intervals of a few years a larger amount was required in order to replenish the stock of decorations. Of the item of £6,070, a sum of £1,500 was to replace the decorations which had been distributed to Knights of the Bath. He admitted that the largest portion of the item objected to by the hon. Member was not very regularly placed in the Votes for this year. It ought rather to have appeared in those of last year; but the account for this service last year had not been rendered in sufficient time to put them in the Votes of the Session of 1867, or even in the Vote for Civil Contingencies presented in March last. A sum of £3,000 was for investing the Sultan, the Emperor of Russia, the Emperor of Austria, and Prince Arthur, with the Order of the Garter. He might observe, too, that some few years ago Her Majesty had been pleased to dispense with the statutes which required the heirs of deceased knights to return the decorations of the Orders, as it was thought desirable that these decorations should be left as heirlooms in the families of the knights.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the portion of the item which was for expenses properly chargeable last year ought to have been included in the Vote for Civil Contingencies.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he had already explained why it had not been so included.

Question, "That '£19,377' stand part of the Resolution," put, and agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

Subsequent Resolutions agreed to.

REGISTRATION BILL—[BILL 187.]

(Mr. Secretary G. Hardy, Sir James Fergusson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. BAINES said, he wished to call attention to the fact that neither in this Bill nor in the Reform Act of last year was there any provision for the serving of notices of objection on lodgers, who consequently would not know until they went into Court whether they were objected to or not. Now, this new class of voters, to whom the franchise had been conceded after much consideration and controversy, would number many thousands in the metropolis, and would be very numerous in the principal towns, and they would be grievously disappointed if they found themselves practically debarred from their anticipated privileges. The service of notices of objection answered two good purposes—it apprised the claimant that his claim was disputed, so as to enable him to attend the Court, and establish his right, and it relieved from the necessity of attending those whose claims were not objected to. Now, as many of the lodgers would be working men, it could not be expected that they should attend the Court day after day in order to see whether they were objected to or not. He was sure the Home Secretary and the Solicitor General would be anxious to have this defect supplied, and he had called attention to it in order that it might be considered by the Select Committee to which the Bill was to be referred.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he wished to call attention to another point. He was advised by a barrister well fitted to give an opinion that in thickly-populated counties, such as Middlesex, where many persons had qualifications in one district and their place of business in another, in which latter they would vote, a poll could not be got there as the Bill stood in one day. Under Clause 6, the numbers in each polling district would begin with 1, so that throughout the county there would be many of a particular number; but those who voted in a polling-place other than the district where their qualification was situated would have no number at all. Supposing a quarter of the constituency were in that position, and assuming the constituency of Middlesex to number 20,000, there would be 5,000 without numbers; and how would it be possible for the poll clerks, without a numerical list to guide them, to find the name of any such person who presented himself? He trusted this point would be considered by the Committee. Moreover, under Clause 15, claims might be made until the 25th of August; but the Act of last year altered the day for making objections from the 25th of August to the 20th, consequently there would be no opportunity of objecting to persons who might send in claims between the 20th and the 25th.

MR. PUGH said, he hoped the House would not proceed with unnecessary precipitation in this matter. If ever there was a time for exercising due deliberation and caution it was now, when the country would have to manipulate three most important Acts conferring great privileges on the people. Therefore he objected to decapitating the revising tribunal. He objected to cutting off the head of the Common Pleas. He had every confidence in the legal ability of the Revising Barristers; but he was certain they would be glad to be supplemented by the learning of that high Court. And it would be satisfactory to the country to know that amid the changes and chances of electioneering life there was an august tribunal, unruffled by the popular breeze, to which the more difficult questions of their franchises could be referred—

“ Apparet Divum numen, sedesque beatæ, Quas neque concutiant venti, neque nubila nimbis Aspergunt.”

There was a practical matter to which he wished to refer. He feared the time was coming when the Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices Bill must be withdrawn. If all the Election Petitions, with which they would certainly be inundated, were to be tried as usual by this House, would not the Public Business be seriously interfered with? He agreed with an ancient critic that a hastened maturity generally results in failure—celerius occidere festinatam maturitatem. He believed the Government wished to do what is right; but they were mistaken in thinking that there was any desire in the House, or out of it, that the new Parliament should meet before February. For his own part, he would say, “Stay a little, that we may make an end the sooner.”

MR. J. STUART MILL said, he thought the point relating to lodgers a very serious one. Unless the lodger franchise was to be merely nominal, the law ought to require that notices should be served upon them when their right to vote was objected to; for otherwise, though the greater portion of them would be poor men, they would have to attend the Court from the very beginning of the revision to the end, in order to know whether they were objected to or not. Knowing this, very few of them would register at all. The obstacles in the way of the lodger were much greater than in the way of any other class, for instead of being put on the register by the overseers he had to make his claim, and to repeat it every year. It ought not, then, to be liable to unknown objections at an unknown time.

MR. LOCKE said, that the Act of last year required the lodger to appear before the Revising Barrister, and substantiate his claim by proving the value of his holding and the other conditions which he had to satisfy. The service of a notice of objection would thus make no difference for under any circumstances he was bound to attend the Court, whereas the ordinary voter was placed upon the register by the overseer and had no need to attend what he objected to.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that on the lodger franchise being considered last year it was thought impossible that the overseers should make out a list of lodgers, and that it was necessary that lodgers should make their own claim. The fear that lodgers who had made a claim would waste much time in waiting on the Revising Barrister for fear their claim should be disputed had no foundation; a certain day would be appointed for lodgers to prove their claim, and objections would be heard on that day and on no other. He did not think the objection raised by the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere) were to any extent surmountable, and he had no doubt the Select Committee would soon find a way to meet them.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he thought the Bill demanded most serious consideration. It was agreed on both sides of the House that an early dissolution was desirable; but the question arose, what was necessary and what unnecessary delay. To decide on this question, he appealed to a great principle, which he proposed to lay before the House. The next Parliament would be the most important ever elected by the English people; and he said without fear of contradiction that Parliament had resolved on making the greatest change in the Constitution ever resolved on since Parliament had existed. The change might be described as a statutory revolution, because it transferred political power from a mixture of classes to at least a body in which one class predominated. He would not take as certain the opinion of the wisest man in the country, as to what the next Parliament would be; no one could speculate with accuracy upon it; they were, indeed, taking a leap in the dark. The next Parliament might be a success; it was just as likely to be a failure, and result in the total subversion of the state of things which had raised England to its present eminence. Under these circumstances, it was of the utmost importance this new Parliament should be elected according to the law; and that could not be done without carrying out in the most stringent manner all those safeguards with which the wisdom of Parliament had surrounded the admission of electors to the franchise. So far from passing a law to hasten the process of making up the register, he would, on the contrary, have extended the time; the change was so momentous that, instead of having the electoral roll compiled with increased haste, he would have the work done with greater deliberation, and have no pains spared to secure a more genuine constituency than any that had ever before existed. How did the case stand, as regarded the Court of Appeal? To hasten the formation of the new electoral rolls, several additional Revising Barristers were to be appointed; the chance of diversity of opinion would, therefore, be proportionately increased. Under such circumstances the need of appeal would become more urgent; but, strange to say, the Government proposed to do away with it altogether; and the new House would find itself in the extraordinary position of having among its Members some who would not be entitled to their seats, if the appeals from Revising Barristers had been duly heard. He had yet another point to offer for the consideration of the House. Immediately a difficulty arose in the new Parliament, the Government of the day would be able to point to the extraordinary circumstances he had detailed as a valid reason for saying the country had no confidence in the Parliament as a true representation of its opinion; another dissolution might therefore be reasonably expected in the course of a year, simply because Parliament had been elected in a hurry and a scramble. He did not, however, intend to oppose the second reading of the Bill, weighty as were the reasons for condemning it; he merely wished to point out what a grave responsibility rested upon the Select Committee to which it would be referred, and to urge that Committee to consider the question without respect to party, and with a full appreciation of the tremendous results their acts might bring about.

Mr. Labouchere

MR. MELLY said, he thought that no greater tax should be imposed upon the artisan who claimed to vote under the lodger franchise than was now imposed upon the householder. It would be extremely hard that a man in receipt of good wages should lose his day's earnings, and, in some cases, his earnings for two or even more days, because he received no notice, whereas a shopkeeper, who could easily and without loss leave his shop for an hour or two in the course of the day, was entitled to the notice.

MR. LEEMAN said, that as an old clerk of the peace—perhaps the only one in the House—he wished to congratulate the Government on their having brought forward this Bill, which he believed would effectually accomplish the object that both parties had in view. He could scarcely believe that the hon. Baronet the Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) had read the Bill, or he would have seen that there was no interference with the preliminary stages of registration, and that it was not till the Revising Barrister came into play that there was any change in the periods allowed for the purposes of registration. The changes that had been made were such as he thought would effectually enable the clerks of the peace to have the register ready by the time required in order to have the elections in November. With regard to the lodger any defects in regard to his case might easily be remedied in Committee. They were all agreed that as the lodger was not rated he would not be put on the register without sending in his claim; but having done that, he would be put upon the register, and there ought to be no necessity for his appearing unless his claim were objected to, in which case there was no reason why he should not receive notice. There was no difficulty in the Bill that might not be remedied in Committee.

MR. KENDALL admitted that the authority of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) as an old clerk of the peace was very high; but the hon. Member had himself convinced him on a former occasion that an election at the time proposed was impossible.

MR. LEEMAN explained that he was then referring to a proposition that came from his own side of the House, to have the elections in the middle of October.

MR. KENDALL was sorry if he had misunderstood the hon. Gentleman. He confessed that he could not understand why Her Majesty's Government had shortened the time at all. There were many hon. Members who, like himself, had supported the Government in carrying the Reform Bill through the House, who were anxious that the full advantages of the measure should be extended to those who were to be enfranchised under its provisions. Now upon this question he would cite the authority of the clerks of the peace in the most important counties of England, nineteen of whom had met last week to consider the subject. These gentlemen were of opinion that it would be extremely dangerous to shorten the time usually allowed for the purposes of registration, the decision they had arrived at being as follows:—

“Resolved, that in the opinion of this meeting it is not practicable to accelerate the preliminary stages of the registration prior to the day (the 1st of September) prescribed for the delivery of the lists by the overseers to the clerks of the peace, except at the cost of depriving of the franchise a certain class of persons on whom the right to vote has been newly conferred. 2. That this year, if extra exertions were used to obtain the delivery of the lists punctually by the 1st of September, it might be arranged for the Courts of the Revising Barristers to commence not later than the 21st of September, as an interval of at least twenty-one days is requisite for collating the lists, extracting the claims and objections for the guidance of the Revising Barrister, and the appointment and advertising of the Courts; and that such Courts should terminate by the 17th of October. That by extra exertion and expense the printing of the registers for delivery to the sheriff might be effected by the 30th of November; but that, having regard to the length of registers in the more populous counties, the printing and binding could not be executed at an earlier date; and that the meeting believed it to be extremely doubtful whether the printing could in some counties be completed by the day suggested, if the names were to be numbered consecutively throughout as at present.”

It certainly appeared, therefore, in the opinion of these high authorities, that the shortening of the time of registration would have the effect of depriving a large number—he believed about a third—of those entitled to the franchise under this measure of their privilege as electors. He apologized for having troubled the House; but he never rose except for a practical purpose, and always endeavoured to apply his remarks to the particular point under discussion.

Mr. HIBBERT said, he would remind the hon. Member for East Cornwall (Mr. Kendall) that no alteration had been made in the time allowed for the preliminary stages of registration, and that it was to those stages that the objections of the clerks of the peace chiefly applied. The work of the Revising Barrister, could be accelerated by the appointment of additional barristers. He wished, he referred to a point noticed by the hon. Member for Middlesex, and to suggest that while the voters should be taken to their respective parishes the clerk of the peace had better be left in the hands of the clerk of the peace. This might be done by beginning at 1001; and the numbers with regard to the districts might be marked off by asterisks. He could see why the hon. and learned Member for Middlesex (Sir George Bowyer) should say that justice would not be done to the electors in case of an election coming on before it had been time to decide the appeal against the decisions of the Revising Barrister. He did not believe that any decision would be made between the electors and the electors under the present practice, and it was now the practice, in case an election came on before an appeal was decided, to permit the elector to cast his vote. Some improvements were required in the arrangements as to the booths. The Act of last year left much to be desired in that respect as it was settled by the Act of 1832.

Mr. Kendall

Mr. P. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, he had voted in two places without a ballot, and therefore there could be no practical difficulty with regard to the number of the number. As to the lodges, he was obliged to “dance attendance” in the registration booth, all he wanted was that he had himself proved himself a voter himself on the register could not any other person claiming the franchise. He had done it himself. If so, it must be a most unfortunate incident that he could not get a neighbour to support his claim in the Revising Barrister’s Court. The thanks of the House were due to the Government for bringing in the Bill for their statement that they would hold a General Election as soon as possible. What object could there be in postponing the dissolution till January? There was a great discontent out-of-doors at the prospect of delay in the assembling of Parliament. Trade was partially paralysed, and therefore the sooner the present state of suspense was put an end to the better.

Mr. DENMAN said, he hoped that there would be power given to the Courts to examine witnesses. The Bill was a very good Bill; but it contained some things requiring alteration. If one or two Revising Barristers, one or two county clerks, and one or two parliamentary agents examined some difficulties which pointed out as likely to arise might easily be got rid of.

MR. DODSON said, it would be important to have the House meet, if possible, at even an earlier date than was proposed. He thought it not desirable to shorten the time for making claims, nor the time for the Revising Barristers revising those claims. The object should be to gain time after the Revising Barristers had given their decision. At present, the clerks of the peace were allowed two months to make up the registers; under the Bill only from the 7th to the end of October. This time might be considerably shortened. The registers might be made up and completed in a week or ten days after the last day of the revision. All that was wanted was an increase in the staff of clerks in the office of the county clerks. All knew the rapidity with which the debates were taken down in that House late at night, copied, and printed, so as to be ready for transmission by the early trains. At all events the time might be shortened considerably. And this was the point to which the attention of the Select Committee should be directed. A list of persons entitled to the franchise, according to the information which reached the overseers, was published, according to law, on the 31st of July. This he would not interfere with. But in counties claims on the part of ratepayers omitted from the list were to be sent in by the 20th of August; in boroughs by the 25th of August. He could not see why the two things should not be assimilated by making the date in both the 20th of August. The overseers were allowed now to the 1st of September to copy out and fix the lists of objections on the church doors. He did not see why four or five days would not be enough for that work, and thus there would be a saving of a week; the Revising Barristers would be able to commence their duties on the 7th instead of the 14th of September, and, allowing them three weeks, their task would be completed by the 28th of September, and the registers might be published by the 5th of October. Allowing a week for the copies to be made, everything might be completed by the 12th of October, when the writs might be issued, and, allowing an interval of twenty-eight days, as proposed by the Government, the new Parliament might be brought together by the 9th or 10th of November.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said that generally the objections which had been taken to the Bill were such as would naturally come under discussion in the Select Committee. With respect to those which had been made by his hon. Friend who had spoken last, he would only say that there was not one of them which had not been most carefully considered by the Government. As for the saving of time which might be effected in the printing, while aware that in towns where there were great appliances much might be done, he must say there were parts of the country where it would be extremely difficult to expedite matters. With respect to the points raised by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) he would venture to say that the hon. Gentleman had not read the clause with his usual attention, otherwise he would have found that if 300 could vote in a compartment under the statute of William, 500 could vote under the proposed Bill. He did not mean to go into all the objections which had been urged, because they were much more fit for discussion in the Select Committee; but in reply to what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for East Cornwall (Mr. Kendall) he would say that the Government having conceived it their duty had brought in a Bill to shorten the time within which Parliament might be assembled; and having done so on a principle which they thought right for themselves and the country they were quite prepared to submit the Bill to the consideration of the Select Committee. He should leave the question of examining witnesses entirely to the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on June 23, Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY, Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Sir ROBERT COLLIER, Mr. GRAVES, Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Mr. BOUVERIE, Sir RAINALD KNIGHTLEY, Mr. LEE MAN, Captain SURTEES, Mr. AYRTON, Sir GEORGE BOWYER, Mr. GARTH, Mr. HIBBERT, and Sir CHARLES RUSSELL:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

PETROLEUM ACT AMENDMENT (re-committed) BILL.

(Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy.)

[BILL 141.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. M'LAGAN said, he should oppose the Motion on the grounds that the Report of the chemists to whom the Bill had been referred was directly opposed to that of the Committee of last year, and that certain Amendments had been lately put on the Paper which altered the character of the Bill, and made the igniting point lower than under the present Act. He moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. M'LAGAN.)

—instead thereof.

Mr. HORSFALL said, he hoped the Under Secretary would not consent either to withdraw the Bill or to refer it to a Select Committee. He was quite satisfied that the point of 100 which had been agreed on would be a sufficient protection to the public.

Mr. GORST said, he must ask for a longer time for the consideration. The Bill might either be postponed or referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. AYRTON suggested that the Bill should be put through Committee that night, then re-printed, and that a week should be allowed for the re-consideration of the Report.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he hoped the Bill would not be referred to a Select Committee.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, it was admitted on all hands that some legislation on the subject was necessary. The substances proposed to be dealt with by the Bill were of a very dangerous character; and these oils were used in lamps sold at a very cheap rate, and used to a great extent by poor people. Great precautions were therefore necessary. The Bill was originally framed in accordance with the recommendations of the Select Committee of last Session; but it being urged by various deputations that the test proposed was too rigorous, the question was referred to chemists representing both sides, and to the chemist generally consulted by the War Office. The recommendations of these gentlemen had been adopted in their integrity, and he believed the measure as now settled would ensure perfect surety. The modifications which had been made would effect the same end as the more rigorous test originally proposed, while the would not have and he had the Association for not be injurious should decide a Select Committee to withdraw it, hope of its passed hoped they were Committee.

Question, "I be left out standing, put, and agreed."

Main Question now leave the C

Bill considered; as amended upon Monday [Bill 171.]

CURRAGH OF 1
(Mr. Sclater-Bo
Attorney
SEC

Order for Sec
Motion made
"That the Bill
time."—(The E

Mr. COGAN read a second time without explanation.
THE EARL OF that the right be unreasonable. and notices had Irish papers. better provision Curragh, and to ascertain the required.

Motion made,
"That the Debit (Lord Otto Fitz

Motion, by leave

Bill read a second time to a Select Committee. Six to be nominated. Five by the Court.

Select Committee
Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL
MONTGOMERY, LORD
FITZGERALD, and the Committee of persons, papers, & quorum.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT SUPPLEMENTAL (NO. 6)
BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders under "The Local Government Act, 1858," relating to the districts of Harrogate, Layton with Warbrick, Bury, Lower Brixham, Hexham, Tipton, Gainsborough, Worthing, Aberystwith, Cockermouth, Burnham, Wednesbury, Burton upon Trent, Hornsey, and Keswick; and for other purposes relative to certain districts under the said Act, ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES FERGUSON and Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 175.]

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, June 16, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement (Loans) Act Amendment* (152); Voters in Disfranchised Boroughs* (153); New Zealand Company* (154).

Second Reading—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) (142).

Committee—Poor Relief (132-155).

Report—Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy Act Amendment (148).

NEW PEER.

William O'Neill, Clerk, having been created Baron O'Neill of Shanes Castle in the County of Antrim—Was (in the usual Manner) introduced.

POOR RELIEF BILL—(No. 132.)

(The Earl of Devon.)

COMMITTEE.

House again in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 9 (Poor Law Inspectors to make Report as to idiotic and harmless Lunatics in Workhouses).

LORD PORTMAN said, he objected to this and the five following clauses, which provide that Poor Law Inspectors shall report to the Clerks of the Peace the number of idiotic, imbecile, and harmless insane paupers in union workhouses on each 29th of September; that on receiving the Reports the Justices at the next Quarter Sessions may appoint a Committee to consider the expediency of providing an asylum for the county alone, or, in conjunction with some adjoining county or counties; that the Justices at Quarter Sessions may provide such asylums; that Guardians, on receiving notice of their completion, may send idiotic and imbecile paupers to such asylums, and that the Poor Law Board, or a Poor Law Inspector may, after due inquiry, require the removal of a pauper to such an asylum. He thought that clauses of this description, which must greatly increase local taxation, ought to have originated in the other House of Parliament. He objected also that it was very undesirable to increase the discretionary power of Courts of Quarter Sessions. If it is necessary to establish such asylums, the law should be imperative; but, in his opinion, the number of idiots would not require many asylums, and that it would be better to establish as many as may be required in a few convenient localities, and to manage them under the control, and at the expense of the Government, out of the Consolidated Fund. He also thought it was a subject that should be considered apart from the Poor Laws, and from the attention it might require, should be proposed to Parliament in a separate Bill. For these reasons he should divide the House against the clause in this Bill.

Moved, "To leave out Clause 9."—(The Lord Portman.)

THE EARL OF DEVON said, he could not concur with his noble Friend in thinking that the subject with which these clauses dealt was not one which should have been included in the Bill. The clauses as they stood were not in the Bill as it was originally submitted to the Select Committee. He had himself proposed clauses in the Committee which were permissive; and he did so in full confidence that their Lordships would not shrink from making the provision required for the large numbers of the unfortunate classes in question, especially when it was remembered that there were many young persons whose condition might be improved by judicious treatment. The Select Committee took a different view of the clauses, and, on the suggestion of the noble Earl below the Gangway (the Earl of Carnarvon, they introduced the clauses now in the Bill. He opposed the introduction of the clauses because he then believed, and he still believed, that the substitution of a degree of compulsion for permission would to a certain extent defeat the object in view; and he had more confidence in the object being attained if the matter were left to the Guardians. There-

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he thought the striking out of the clauses would produce consequences more serious than the noble Lord intended. No doubt, the intention of the noble Lord was to secure a peculiar protection and care for the congenital idiots; but the rejection of the clauses would affect lunatics of other descriptions, and would go far to prevent the depletion of the county asylums, where there were now a great many patients who ought to be removed in order to make way for more recent cases. Where cases remained without treatment more than twelve months their affliction would most probably become chronic, and their recovery was almost an impossibility. Indeed, trustworthy authorities on this subject stated that 80 per cent of recent cases could be easily cured; but that not more than 10 per cent at the utmost of those patients were curable who had been left without medical care more than a year. These chronic lunatics required a certain treatment and diet, which they could not get in our workhouses. He thought that the clauses were carried into effect, with some slight modifications, very beneficial results would ensue.

EARL GREY said, some change in the present system was desirable; but he thought their Lordships hardly competent to deal with the subject, as it was one affecting the taxation of the country.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, there could be no doubt that great efforts had been made of late to improve the state of our workhouses and the condition of their inmates. His own knowledge enabled him to confirm the statement of his noble Friend (the Earl of Stradbroke) that sane persons were much more happy among their own class than they would be shut up in what they would regard as a kind of prison.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the proposition of the noble Earl who brought forward the Bill (the Earl of Devon) was that the rates for these asylums should be paid on the authority of the Guardians. The proposition of his noble Friend near Lord Portman) was that the expenses of these asylums should be under the control of the magistracy. His noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had just pointed out how desirable it was that lunatics and idiots should be under the same management.

But if they waited for this purpose they could arrange their differences as to the disposal of local rates, they would not be able to move in the matter at all till they had established Financial Boards. He agreed in the desirability of idiots being removed from the workhouses and from under the control of the Guardians. However, as so much difference of opinion appeared to prevail with respect to the clauses under discussion; and as those clauses could hardly be sent down to the other House in time to admit of their being properly considered there, he thought the best course would be to allow them to be struck out of the Bill.

THE EARL OF DEVON thought that the difficulty which his noble Friend (the Marquess of Bath) had pointed out as to the management of the funds lay at the root of the whole question. In the one case it was contemplated that the funds should be expended by the elected representatives of the ratepayers; in the other, it was proposed that they should be administered by the Justices of the county. Now, independent of any argument on the subject, there could be no doubt that the first plan was the more popular. There was one other point to which he wished to revert. It had been argued as if he (the Earl of Devon) was desirous of keeping idiots and the chronically insane in the workhouse; but the reverse was the fact, for the proposition which he brought forward had for its special object to facilitate the removal of these classes from the workhouse, by enabling several Boards of Guardians to unite for the purpose of forming a special establishment for their reception.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, there were cases of hopeless idiotcy, where but little actual benefit could be looked for from removal. But there were many others in which by removing idiots from the ridicule and annoyance to which they were too often exposed, and bringing them under proper tuition and treatment, they could be rendered capable of the enjoyment of life.

EARL FORTESCUE said, nothing could be more undesirable or unpopular, than any attempt to increase the burdens of the ratepayers at the mere discretion of the county magistracy. But any man must be blind who did not see that before long the representatives of the ratepayers must be admitted to a share in the control of the expenditure of the county rates. But if they were now to have unions for the purpose of dealing with those chronic cases of idiotcy that were now in workhouses—and no one was more sensible than he was of the desirableness of removing them—then they would create an anomalous and embarrassing system in dealing with two analogous classes, lunatics and idiots, and all because they could not rely upon the speedy establishment of Financial Boards. Their parochial system was now practically at an end. Parishes were superseded except for the purposes of voting church rates, and no one supposed that would last long. The Union was now the unit of administration, and it was very undesirable that there should be no intermediate stage between the Union and the Central Board in London—a Board that had not been able to inspire the public with confidence.

LORD LYTTTELTON hoped that no discretionary power would be given either to Justices or Boards of Guardians. In a great many large workhouses there was abundant space for keeping idiots and incurable cases; but all curable cases, all young persons affected in this manner, and all recent cases, especially, ought to be dealt with separately.

EARL GRANVILLE, differing from some previous speakers, believed that this was just the sort of question upon which the House was competent to pronounce an opinion with advantage. He therefore hoped their Lordships would not hesitate to adopt whatever clauses they thought best adapted to secure the end in view.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, the usual course in dealing with such a clause as the present in this House was that after the third reading the clause was struck out, but was afterwards printed separately and sent down to the Commons along with the Bill. If the clause was then accepted by the Commons it came up to their Lordships as a new clause inserted by the Commons, and was passed accordingly.

LORD PORTMAN thought the subject was such as could be more satisfactorily dealt with by an altogether separate measure.

On Question, That the said Clause stand Part of the Bill, their Lordships divided:—Contents 26; Not-contents 61: Majority 35.

CONTENTS.

Salisbury, M. [Teller.]	Fortescue, E.
Westmeath, M.	Granville, E.
	Kimberley, E.
Airlie, E.	Morley, E.
Amberst, E.	Nelson, E.
Carnarvon, E. [Teller.]	Romney, E.
Ellenborough, E.	Shaftesbury, E.

Earl Fortescue

Everaley, V.
Lifford, V.

Bangor, Bp.
Carlisle, Bp.
Gloucester, Bp.
Oxford, Bp.

Cairns, L. (Z for.)

Cleveland, D.
Devonshire, D.
Manchester, D.
Marlborough, D.
Richmond, D.
Somerset, D.

Bath, M.
Exeter, M.

Bandon, E.
Bradford, E.
Cadogan, E.
Camperdown, E.
Chichester, E.
Devon, E.
Lucan, E.
Malmesbury, E.
Morton, E.
Powis, E.
Selkirk, E.
Stanhope, E.
Stradbroke, E.
Strange, E. (Z
Tankerville,

De Vesci, V.
Hardinge, V.
Hawarden, V.
Powerscourt, V.
Sidmouth, V.
Strathallan, V.
Sydney, V.

Abinger, L.

Further port thereof next; and I
(No. 155)

SALMON F
(
(No.

THE DUTY
that the Bill
said, that it inquired into that a Com regulate the to make by Scotch sal with by act 1862, 1863
was introduced the main object of which was to confirm and make binding the by-laws which had been framed by the Commissioners. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee of their Lordships, by whom it was considered, and was afterwards passed by the House as amended; but in the Commons it was withdrawn on account of the lateness of the Session. The present Bill was substantially the same as that of 1866. There were, however, some recommendations of the Committee which being likely to give occasion to controversy had not been embodied in the present Bill. If their Lordships were pleased to read the Bill the second time these questions could be very properly considered in Committee.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Duke of Richmond.)

THE EARL OF AIRLIE approved the general principle of the Bill; but believed he was not singular in fearing that some most desirable clauses had been omitted from it.

LORD ABINGER said, he believed that the main object of the Bill was the confirmation of the by-laws of the Commissioners. By the Act of 1862 every river in Scotland had been formed into a separate district; but it had been found in practice that the provisions of the Act could not be carried out. He trusted that the question of the Solway would receive attention, and that the present anomalous system by which the fixed engines in the English and Scotch sides of the river were differently dealt with would be abolished. This could only be accomplished by providing that no method of fishing should be legal in Scotland which would be illegal were it situated in England. He perfectly acknowledged the necessity of legislation on the question of the Solway Firth; but he doubted whether it was prudent to attempt to deal with it at this period of the Session.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

SALE OF POISONS AND PHARMACY ACT AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 148.)
(The Earl Granville.)

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

LORD REDESDALE moved to insert a new clause to follow Clause 17:—

"From and after the 31st day of December, 1868, it shall not be lawful to sell any Poison in a Bottle unless such Bottle shall be of an angular Form, corrugated and opaque, to be thenceforth known and described as a Poison Bottle; and it shall not be lawful to sell any preparation not Poisonous in any such Bottle; and any Person offending against either of the aforesaid Provisions shall be liable to the Penalties hereinbefore enacted for selling Poison not distinctly labelled."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR doubted whether the noble Lord could have been fully aware of the consequences of proposing this clause—which, moreover, in its language was not reconcilable with some of the other clauses. The Bill, it should be remembered, referred to compounding as well as to selling, and did the noble Lord intend to render a chymist liable to the penalties of the Bill if he compounded a prescription which contained something poisonous but did not supply it in a bottle of the shape suggested in this clause?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY also expressed a hope that his noble Friend would not persist in his Amendment, which treated the subject with a minuteness and detail which ought only to proceed from an executive body such as the Board of Trade.

After a few words from Lord NORTH-BROOK,

LORD REDESDALE said, that he must press the clause upon their Lordships, as he thought something ought to be done to protect the public with regard to the sale of poisons.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR suggested that the object of the noble Lord might be answered by the Pharmaceutical Society determining what the shape of the poison bottle should be, that shape being approved by the Privy Council, and advertised in the London Gazette.

EARL GRANVILLE wished to know what were the views of Her Majesty's Government upon the question?

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: What, upon the shape of the bottle?

LORD REDESDALE said, that he would not divide the House now, but would move the clause on the third reading of the Bill.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, half past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 16, 1868.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Municipal Elections (Scotland).*

Second Reading—Ecclesiastical Titles [87], debate adjourned.

Committee—Public Schools (re-comm.) [135]—r.f.; Inclosure (No. 2)* [162].

Report—Inclosure (No. 2)* [162].

Considered as amended—Alkali Act (1863) Perpetuation * [153]; Judgments Extension * [163].

Third Reading—Established Church (Ireland) [117]; Drainage Provisional Order Confirmation * [169], and passed.

SCOTLAND—POOR LAW.—QUESTION.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he would beg to ask the Lord Advocate, When the Return of Poor Rate (Scotland), for which an Address was moved on the 9th day of March, may be expected to be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it would be laid on the table very shortly.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS BILL.
QUESTION.

MR. LEEMAN said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Boundary Bill or the Telegraphs Bill will take precedence in the Orders of the Day for Thursday?

MR. SCLATER-BOOOTH said, in reply, that the Electric Telegraphs Bill would be taken as the second Order of the Day on Thursday.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. Walpole, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy.)

[BILL 135.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. NEATE moved that the Bill be referred back to the Select Committee, in order that clauses may be inserted in it giving power to the new governing bodies and the Commissioners to be appointed by the Bill to deal with the constitution and revenues of Eton and Winchester Colleges. He said he would be unwilling to do anything to impede the progress of a Bill which might be of some useful service. He was convinced that no benefit could be derived from the Bill, and that no good could be done by legislation in relation to public schools in the present bad state as regards the formation of the Bill. He doubted whether it would be necessary for any gentleman to have done as much as he had done for a school they might just as well have done just as he had, and reform it? It might produce gentle little to do with gentlemen were cause the boys which they saw but what was going on at Harrow, and only specimens of the objection to the Bill was that it was the sons of the gentlemen who asked whether the Bill was for a mother and those in an humble position, was not as might be set before the upper classes? He thought the schools were in a state of destruction; but he thought who were eager for effective change in the schools could be made to see that the Bill had not the rule which the Bill had long as the University and Greek—and a little else—as what was the result of the schools the obligation would be on them in their future referred to Eton they were two it was the intention to frame a Bill with governing bodies Commissioners, and themselves without governing bodies of the two Colleges, say, however, to be but very important Bill. He made it was wholly inadvisable to do whatever to the under it to deal in any way with either the revenues or constitution of Eton or Winchester Colleges. Eton School existed only as an off-shoot and dependency of Eton College, which might at any time suppress, suspend, or reduce the School to the condition of a proprietary establishment. The legislation that was proposed three years ago aimed at subjecting Eton College to certain legal obligations to provide for the School, but the Bill before the House was wholly silent in that particular. There was nothing whatever in it to vary the original legal obligations of Eton College to provide merely in a very limited way for a certain number of scholars, and make a payment of a few pounds to a master who might be charged with their education. If Eton College was to say "We have nothing to do with this new-fangled scheme; we are content as a College to enjoy what we now have, our £20,000 a year, which will soon become £30,000, and even £40,000, and we do not care about the school. If the Eton masters can take advantage of the goodwill that belongs to the place and establish a great school we are very willing they should do so, and if they wish to buy the buildings we have erected we do not object to sell them,"—he did not say that such a thing was likely, or that it would be allowed by the Legislature, but the state of affairs that now existed ought not to be allowed to continue. It was intended by the original Bill in the House of Lords to give to the new governing body and the Commissioners appointed to control them the power of dealing with the revenues and constitution of Eton and Winchester Colleges, because a clause of the Bill contained words to this effect, they—

"Shall have the same real and personal property rights, powers, and privileges, and be subject to the same obligations, as the existing governing body of those schools."

He saw nothing in the present Bill which at all corresponded with such a provision, and he challenged anyone to show him anything in the measure which would enable the new governing body or the Commissioners to touch the revenues or constitution of the Colleges. He did not go so far as some in his reverence for ancient corporations; but he would not treat the present governing bodies with so little ceremony as that which had been shown them by the framers of the Bill, and they might justly complain that they had been taken by surprise by the proposal to transfer their powers to new bodies. He doubted, however, whether the terms of the measure would have sufficient legal force to transfer to the newly-created bodies the whole management of the revenues of these foundations. He thought that before proceeding to legislate the House ought to be in possession of fuller information as to those revenues. The evidence given on this head before the Royal Commissioners was offered in a very hesitating spirit; but even according to that evidence the income of Eton College was about £20,000, with a probable increase of £10,000, and that of Winchester about £17,000. Knowing the reticence with which public bodies were likely to state their income, he believed the probable future income of Eton might be taken at not less than £50,000. He once suggested £32,000 as the prospective income of Winchester College, and an old friend of his there jocularly expressed a hope that he would not live to see that amount reached, for that his life would be a burden to him; but even this gentleman did not go beyond arguing that a considerable time would elapse before his estimate was realized. He had had some experience of the way in which Returns were made, and hon. Members must be aware that the income assigned to livings in the Clergy List was considerably below the actual value. Assuming that the probable future income of the two foundations was £80,000 a year, it had to be considered how they should be dealt with. Now, this Bill had apparently been framed with the special object of excepting Eton and Winchester from the recommendations of the Commissioners. Dealing with the present income of £20,000 at Eton, they proposed to lessen the number and emoluments of the Fellows. The income of the Provost was stated at over £1,800, and of the Fellows at £814; but the latter sum did not include the occupation of a house, and certain perquisites in the shape of coals and candles, which practically raised it to £1,200. The Fellows enjoyed this income without any duty being attached to it, and they might also enjoy livings of the value £700 or £800 per annum, being specially exempted from the condition of residence. The patronage of Eton comprised eight livings worth between £100 and £200; nine between £200 and £300; nine between £300 and £400; four between £400 and £500; two between £500 and £600; one between £600 and £700; one between £700 and £800; one between £800 and £900; and one between £1,000 and £1,200. Any one of these was a very pretty addition to an income of £1,200. These livings might be given to the school chaplains, but they were not, and the Bill proposed to leave the Fellows in uncontrolled exercise of this patronage. There appeared to him two ways in which the surplus revenues might be dealt with. One, which he submitted to the House on a former occasion, was to apply them to the creation of a middle-class school, for which class the endowments were in the first instance chiefly, if not exclusively, designed. The other, which had since suggested itself to him, was to make this £40,000 a year the nucleus of a University in the North of England, founded upon principles similar to those of Oxford and Cambridge, with the difference that its curriculum should be so arranged as to encourage the industries of the district in the midst of which it should be placed. He would not enter into such a scheme now; but he insisted on the right of Parliament to deal with these surplus incomes. He might, indeed, be met with an assertion of the prescriptive rights of corporate property; but he regarded this argument as threadbare, it being repudiated by all who had given attention to the subject. The House was deeply concerned to repudiate the notion that corporations possessed property in the same sense as individuals. They could only hold property so long as they were corporations, and it was absurd to maintain that the State was bound to continue them as corporations after they had ceased to perform the duties which called them into existence. He was far from asking the House to divert any portion of the revenues of Eton College from the purposes of education. All that Eton College gave to Eton School was £400 a year; while the College derived much more than that from the School in the increased value of the College lands. So far from diverting from the School any of the benefits it derived from the College, he would rather make the College subsidiary to the interests and benefit of the School, so that the College should foster the growth of the School more than it did. It was in evidence that the Provost of Eton received £2,000 a year, and the Fellows £1,200 a year each; yet a few years ago they had allowed the School to degenerate, and the number of the King's scholars to be diminished from seventy to forty. Their conduct had, indeed, been such as to deserve language stronger than it was usual to apply to those who had gone to their account. Let it be hoped that their present successors would enter upon their career in a spirit of sincere and reflective repentance. It was well that those successors should know that the House knew as well as themselves for how many generations of men the Provost and Fellows of Eton had been so indifferent to the pleasures of a good conscience that, in the words of one of their favourite poets, they "seemed to enjoy the anger of the gods." One especial abuse had been the diminution in the allowance to the choristers, who, to eke out a living, had been obliged to run in the most indecorous manner from the services at Eton to take part in those of Windsor Chapel. At the present moment, however, whether he looked at the Eton masters or the boys, it was with kind, respectful, and hopeful feelings. He trusted that, as to Eton at least, the House would make the revenues of the College far more subservient, subsidiary, and useful to the government of the School. With regard to the constitution of the College, the Provost was, he thought, of no use whatever. It was said that he was the means of obtaining for the boys an intercourse with the outer world, and that he gave dinners which formed an introduction to society. He did not think that these services were sufficient to justify the continuance of this useless honorary office. The dignity and duty of the Provost ought to be given to the Head master, so that instead of receiving £370 from the College as at present he should receive the £2,000 a year now given to the Provost. The Provost and Head master ought in that case to have a Vice Provost to assist in the management. It was necessary to deal in some way both with the revenue and constitution of Eton and Winchester.

Mr. Neate

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be referred back to the Select Committee, in order that Clauses may be inserted in it giving power to the new governing bodies and the Commissioners to be appointed by the Bill to deal with the constitution and revenues of Eton and Winchester Colleges,"—(Mr. Neate,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. MOWBRAY said, he would not follow the hon. and learned Member for the city of Oxford in his very discursive speech; but would ask the House to consider the position in which, at the present period of the Session, that question stood. The animus of the hon. Gentleman's proposition was disclosed at the commencement of his remarks, in which he said there was no necessity for legislation, and that the question might wait. Now, it was more than four years since the Royal Commissioners presented their Report to Her Majesty. That Report was in the hands of Members of Parliament before Easter, 1864; a measure was introduced on the subject in 1865; the question was referred to a Select Committee of the House of Lords; the Bill that was then framed came down to the House of Commons too late in the Session to be passed; again, in 1866 and 1867, Bills were introduced; and now the existing Government had brought in a measure sanctioned by their predecessors, and on which a Select Committee of that House had bestowed much valuable time and the greatest pains in order to render it as perfect as possible. The hon. and learned Member for the city of Oxford was himself a very active Member of that Select Committee, before which he had an opportunity of urging all the arguments which he had just addressed to the House. The speech which the hon. Gentleman had made that day ought to have been delivered in 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868 against the second reading of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman wanted to refer the measure back to the Committee that they might provide for the cases of Eton and Winchester Colleges; but by the interpretation clause of the Bill the word "school" included, in the cases of Eton and Winchester, the Colleges at those places. If the hon. Gentleman had Amendments to propose, let him propose them in Committee of the Whole House. But what was the hon. Gentleman's object? Why, that those bodies might come before the Committee and be heard by counsel after the 16th of June. If that were done, the Bill was not likely to pass this Session. He believed it was the opinion of the House that legislation on that subject was now required, and he hoped the dilatory plea of the hon. Gentleman would not be listened to. The schools were anxious for the completion of that legislation, and the action of Eton and Winchester themselves, as well as of the others, would be paralyzed by a prolongation of the present state of suspense. For these reasons he trusted that the House would now go into Committee on the Bill and discuss its provisions.

MR. NEWDEGATE, as one of the trustees for Rugby, did not see why Harrow and Rugby should be summarily dealt with, while Eton and Winchester should have legislation in regard to them virtually postponed, or, at all events, be legislated for on a different footing. Harrow and Rugby had one peculiarity—namely, that their governing bodies consisted of laymen of the Church of England; but he did not see why, on that account, they should be treated, as was proposed by the Bill, in a more summary manner than institutions whose governing bodies were clerical. There was no pretence for saying that the governing body of Rugby had thwarted the success and prosperity of the School, for their only difficulty was to find accommodation for the number of pupils who were anxious to enter. He attributed the success of the School in great part to the Head master, but the governing body had not impeded—on the contrary, he trusted they had aided—the efforts of the Head master. The Bill proposed that before the 1st of January, 1869, the governing bodies of Rugby and Harrow should be compelled, in Japanese fashion, to effect their own extinction. In Japan, as the House was aware, executions were conducted in this way. The culprit was expected to acknowledge the justice of his sentence, and then to rip up his own belly while the executioner stood by to cut off his head. That was exactly the treatment to which the governing bodies of Rugby and Harrow would be subject by that Bill. He was far from saying that those bodies might not be improved; but he wanted to know the mischief they had done, or the neglect of which they had been guilty. That anomaly appeared to have been introduced by the Select Committee, and not to have been contained in the original Bill, and he had placed on the Paper an Amendment providing that before the governing body of Harrow or Rugby should be compelled to immolate themselves or undergo execution by Special Commission, they should at least have eighteen months to consider what they ought to propose. That, he thought, was only reasonable, as the last six months of the present year would be a period of crisis arising out of the General Election, which would be very unfavourable to calm deliberation. Throughout the whole Bill the powers which the original Bill proposed to confer on existing governing bodies, or on their successors, were limited to their successors. Therefore, the whole purport of the Bill was that those two governing bodies, consisting of lay members of the Church of England, who had not interfered injudiciously with the Head master, or neglected their duties, were to be got out of the way before any reform of the statutes was to be proposed. Nothing could be more extravagant than the powers which it was proposed by the Bill to invest in the new governing bodies, and more particularly in the special Commissioners, who would be enabled under its provisions to deal with the whole of the property of the schools in the most summary manner, with the single check that any scheme for changing the application of their funds should be submitted to Parliament for forty days. As to the principle which had been laid down by the hon. Member for Oxford, that no corporate body had a title to any property and that all such property belonged to the State, he could only say that it had its origin in the Convention of the first French Revolution; that so strongly had the force of the analogy been felt that the principle was afterwards transferred to the case of private property, and that there had been a perpetual struggle during the whole of the present century to get out of the difficulties which resulted from its application. But, be that as it might, he should like to know why it was that Eton and Winchester were to be dealt with by the Bill in a manner different from Harrow and Rugby with respect to their properties? He objected to any such difference between them being made; and he was also opposed to the Bill because it contained an element of secrecy, inasmuch as the new governing bodies would be empowered to make proposals to the Commissioners for an alteration of the statutes of a school without publishing their intentions to those whose interests were immediately involved. It was, moreover, he maintained, contrary to the Common Law of England to have all the property of those foundations dealt with by means of Orders in Council, as was proposed, and he, therefore, should support the hon. Member for Oxford in his endeavour to prevent the Bill from being proceeded with.

MR. GOSCHEN remarked, that the hon. Gentleman who spoke last was perfectly correct in saying that, by the Bill as it was referred to a Select Committee, the existing governing bodies were to be intrusted with the reforms which were to be made in the schools. It appeared, however, to the Committee a somewhat illogical proceeding to begin by conferring such powers on bodies which were about to expire, and which might make regulations which would not be in the spirit of the new governing bodies by whom they would be succeeded, and which would, consequently, only tend to the creation of much confusion. That being so, the Committee had deemed it advisable to change the order of the reforms to be made, and to recommend that the existing governing bodies should reform themselves before proceeding to reform the schools intrusted to their care, the time being shortened by the Committee from the 1st of January, 1870, to the 1st of January, 1869, in order that no additional delay might be incurred. He was not sure whether the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Newdegate) was aware that this change was made by his hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate), whom he was now supporting in referring the Bill to a Select Committee. [MR. NEWDEGATE said, he objected to the principle of the Bill.] The hon. Member objected to the principle of the Bill. The hon. Member asked why were Rugby and Harrow selected to be dealt with in a different way from the other public schools? It was the first time that he (Mr. Goschen) learned that such was the case, and he had sat on the Committee a long time, and it would be quite as new to the other Members of the Committee. The governing bodies of all the schools were to be called on to reform themselves; but as some governing bodies might not stand so much in need of reform as others, it was provided that "the new governing body" should be held to mean both a governing body, the constitution of which might have been altered under the Act, or a body established under it, or the new governing body, which might, however, be identical with the existing body.

Mr. Newdegate

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that in the Select Committee the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) brought forward an excellent clause, carrying out the principle of religious toleration. It was a species of "Conscience Clause;" but it was rejected by a strict party vote. He trusted that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets would propose the clause again in the Committee of the Whole House.

MR. POWELL said, that though the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets did not succeed in carrying what had been called a "Conscience Clause," he did induce the Select Committee to introduce another clause enabling the governing bodies to give facilities for the education of boys whose parents or guardians wished to withdraw them from the religious instruction given in the school.

MR. AYRTON said, that he should support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate), to refer the Bill back again to the Select Committee; for, though the Bill was much improved in details, its main defects remained much as they were before. It seemed a measure designed to carry out the most pernicious principle of selecting a few schools in order to apply to them very large endowments; not because they were necessary for the education of those who resorted to the schools, but merely because they tended to keep up the expensive character of the schools, and to maintain a kind of fashionable system of education for the fashionable classes. The discussion got up in the other House last night showed that the crude ideas of 300 years ago were not applicable to the exigencies of the present time. It was proposed to consecrate to this scheme of education endowments amounting to £70,000 a year, and with the addition of the value of the annual rental of property rent free worth £80,000 a year. The prospective increase in the value of the property might be estimated as likely to raise the amount of the endowments to £100,000 a year. With these great endowments they were now going to do for the education of the poor and the great body of the people of the country absolutely nothing. One might have hoped that the House of Commons would have conducted itself as individuals did at the near approach of dissolution, and would have abandoned evil ways. He thought that it would be much better to give up such a Bill as the present, and to leave the reform of these schools, together with other reforms, to the new Parliament. There was nothing to distinguish the schools comprised in the Bill from many schools left out of it, such as Uppingham and Tunbridge Schools, except that the latter were not so fashionable as Rugby, Harrow, and Eton Schools, and the idea was to apply these great endowments for the benefit of the wealthy classes and those connected with them. It appeared in evidence that parents were beguiled by vanity and weakness to spend £200 a year, in order to get their children educated at Eton, though they might have obtained for them a better education in a self-sustaining school for £50 or £60 a year. It was an established fact that no real benefit was to be derived from these enormous endowments. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford broached the extraordinary doctrine that the children of founders had a vested right to the endowments. No such right of property could exist, and the power of the founders to put a limitation on the enjoyment of their property was restricted to lives in being and twenty-one years after.

MR. LOWE said, he could not remember whether this Bill had ever been discussed in the House before. If it had been it had left very little impression on anybody's mind, for he had asked the question of several who seemed to be in the same condition as himself regarding it. He only regretted it had not been discussed, for he thought they might be better employed in settling principles than arranging details. It seemed to him that the Bill proceeded on a false analogy and was founded on an unsound principle. The analogy was that of the governing bodies in the Universities and Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge. This unhappy analogy was applied to public schools. But the same public body which existed in the one case did not exist in the other. The body was to be created for the schools. What, then, were they going to do? They were going to create a governing body for those schools that never existed before. They were going to intrust to this new and untried body the powers of a constituent assembly—to make a new governing body; and so jealous were they of them as to their powers that they were to be extinguished at the end of this year. They made them on purpose to destroy them; they lighted the candle for the purpose of snuffing it out. They gave them certain functions to be performed, but under the Commission which had power to undo them. Would it not be better if this was to be done to give it to the Commission at once? It seemed to him there never was a Bill framed on so strange a basis as this. The analogy of the Universities and Colleges, it was found, did not apply; so successive Committees had cut it down to the shape in which they now found it; but the result was most unsatisfactory. There was a greater fault in the Bill, and he hoped he might be allowed to state the objection he felt to its principle, lest it should afterwards be referred to. His objection to the principle was this—when dealing and legislating for anything they ought to look at its substance, and not at the form. Now, the form of these public schools was undoubtedly an endowment. That was the nucleus. But the substance of the public schools was not the endowment, but the great private adventure school which had grown out of the endowment, the good-will being given to the man who held the office of Head master. There were two kinds of property involved in the Bill—one was the endowment, the other the good-will which had grown out of it, and which was the property of the Head master for the time being, which was the substance. Thus, with regard to Eton—the Eton they were all so much concerned about—which was educating the young gentlemen of the higher classes of the country was the College or the Oppidan Eton. It was almost ridiculous to ask the question, it was so perfectly manifest that the real strength of Eton consisted in the private adventure school kept by the Head master, and the good-will of which belonged to him. That was the main thing, and the College or endowment might fairly be left to be dealt with like any other endowment. On what principle should they deal with private adventure schools? There was but one course for their improvement, and that lay with the parents of the children who went there. It was to the parents of the pupils, and not to any governing body they might appoint, that they must look for modernizing and making the schools better adapted to the present day. What, then, was their duty in this matter? It was to leave the greatest possible scope to those who managed the school—to the Head master, in fact, to manage it as he pleased, and all they should do was to give parents the best means of knowing the manner in which their children were educated, leaving them to find out whether it was satisfactory or not. He should say form a governing body if they pleased—that was, a body to appoint a master and remove him in case of misconduct or for the interest of the school; but when they had appointed him give him full power and control over it. Let him be the dictator not merely as to discipline, but education and direction. Trust him fully. He would go further. He would say provide some machinery by which the school should be examined by some perfectly independent authority every year; let the result go to the family, be tabulated, and laid on the table of the House, so that they might know exactly the instruction that was given. That was his notion. They had to deal with these schools secundum subjectam naturam, not as an endowment, but as what they really were, private adventure schools in the hands of the Head master. This Bill had been misconceived. Instead of giving the Head master full power, giving the adventure principle fair play, it gave the regulation of the school, and the objects of study, almost everything except the appointment of Under master to a body they were going to appoint for the purpose who had no interest in its prosperity. The endowed element was only a trifle if they gave it to such a body, and withdrew it from the Head master, placing it in the hands of a body not now in existence, but which they were going to create for the express purpose of marring the free trade adventure principle in schools. That was his objection to this Bill, and, as it never seemed to have occurred to any of the Commission or Committee, or any other Gentleman, and therefore he was bound to suppose, being his own, must be wrong, he had felt bound to state it to the House. It was a mere chimera to educate by endowment; they must rely on the free trade principle. So far from an endowment being an assistance to education, it often put the schoolmaster asleep. By keeping him from relying on his own exertions, an endowment was often the means of doing positive mischief. He therefore protested against the notion that they could carry on the education of this country energetically or successfully by means of endowment. All they could do was to take advantage of existing endowments, to cluster round them a system of demand and supply pure and unrestrained.

Mr. Lowe

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), seemed to have forgotten that this subject had been made matter of consideration by a Royal Commission some years ago, which sat for two years or more, and very fully considered the whole of these questions—among others, the relation in which the Head master should stand to the school; and if the right hon. Gentleman would take the trouble to examine the Report of the Commission he would see ample reason for not giving the whole matter into the hands of the Head master, and throwing on him a weight he would be unable to bear. With regard to the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman had not stated correctly the history of the clause with regard to the governing bodies. It was not the case that these schools had not governing bodies now. They had; and if the right hon. Gentleman would look into the Report he would find a very good account of the actual state and powers of the governing bodies that existed. The right hon. Gentleman referred to Eton, but it was well known the College was, in fact, the cream of the School, and it was owing to the very great energy with which the College worked that Eton held so high a position. It was very unfair to speak of that School as if it were not doing that which had placed it so high among our public schools. The case for the whole inquiry and Bill rested on this—that Parliament was not satisfied that those schools did as much as with their means and endowments they ought to do. The intention originally had been to lay down in the Bill what the functions of the new governing bodies should be, upon whom would devolve those duties which could not be discharged by the Head master without interfering with his special province. It was obvious that there was an immense amount of work to be done with respect to those schools which could not be thrown on the Head master if he was to be charged with the teaching of the school. But when the matter came to be argued in the House of Lords it was thought better, instead of attempting to deal with those matters of detail by an Act of Parliament, to do so by the appointment of a Commission, with statutory powers to make such alterations as might be deemed necessary. Then arose the question whether or not that statutory Commission should reform the schools at their own instance; but it was stated that the existing bodies ought to have that power given to them; that their hands were now tied, and they were prevented from introducing improvements; and that therefore the fair thing would be to give them the chance of doing that which they believed to be the best, and if they failed to act in a satisfactory manner that then the statutory Commission should take the matter up. That was the shape into which the Bill was put, and as Parliament had for two or three years kept the Bill in that form, he was anxious, without saying that form was the best, that they should go into Committee, and try whether they could work upon it. He believed the general feeling of persons acquainted with the subject was that they should try to improve without altogether revolutionizing our higher class schools; for they held that those schools had a mission of their own, though they were not doing all that they were capable of. He believed, if they honestly set to work and endeavoured to work out the details of the Bill they would make the schools much more efficient and satisfactory. Their policy ought to be to improve and not to revolutionize. He hoped the House would consider that this matter had been very carefully sifted in the other House of Parliament and also before the Select Committee upstairs, and that it was ripe for discussion in a practical sense. He trusted therefore they might be allowed to make use of the remainder of the present Sitting for the purpose of dealing with the Bill in Committee.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, though agreeing with much that had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) and the right hon. Gentleman beside him (Mr. Lowe), still thought that the House ought to go into Committee on the Bill. At present the education of a boy cost a large sum. He did not exaggerate when he said that a father who sent his boy to one of those public schools without getting any assistance from an endowment, and afterwards sent him to a University, could not do so for less than £2,000. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets had said that there was no sufficient reason why those seven schools, or the nine schools that were originally contemplated, should be made the subjects of a special Act of Parliament. But they must take facts as they found them; and he supposed the reason why they were called upon to legislate specially with regard to those schools was because there had been a Report on their condition which showed a state of things that required alteration, notwithstanding the opinion of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford that no reform was needed. It was true that if the House was prepared to deal with the general subject of endowments, as he hoped would be done in the new Parliament, there was not any reason upon the merits of the question for excluding the schools with which the Bill proposed to deal. Nevertheless, as the question with regard to those schools had been debated for three or four years, he was of opinion that the House ought to consider it, because while there was a doubt whether there would be any legislation or not, or what the nature of that legislation might be, the managers of the schools who wished to initiate reforms would find their hands tied. And besides he was afraid—such was the feeling of Members of that House who had personal associations with those schools—that any general scheme of dealing with endowed schools would have a better chance if the question of those public schools was excluded from it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) seemed to think that the general use of endowments was a question that they need not pay much attention to, and he talked of endowments as trifles; but he (Mr. Forster) could by no means look upon endowments of £70,000 for the purposes of education in such a light. On the contrary, the management of sums like that was a very grave matter; and it behoved them to see that those endowments were applied to the best possible use. For his own part, he thought the endowments were of little use compared with what they might be in promoting the cause of education generally throughout the country. The Bill was so framed that he was sanguine in hoping that the endowments would be much better used if it became law. He believed that the Commission would see that reforms actually took place. Winchester and Eton, with endowments amounting to £32,000, would, no doubt, under an improved system, still remain the two principal high class schools for boys whose parents wished to bring them up for professions and for the Universities; but they might be made of greater use to those persons who, at great personal sacrifice, desired to educate their sons in that way, and who, if grants were made for elementary education and for lower middle class education, were also entitled to public assistance in carrying out an object from which the country derived benefit afterwards. He looked to an advantage in another way from the reform of the public schools; for he expected the endowments to be so arranged that clever boys of a low sphere of life might be able to obtain a high class education by rising from the National Schools, with the assistance of exhibitions, to the secondary and primary schools. It would be the fault of the Commission which was to be appointed by the Bill if those two results were not attained fully from the Bill.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. ACLAND said, he could not go the length of speaking of endowments as useless, though it was perfectly true that some of our best public schools did not depend on them. Harrow, for all practical purposes, was an unendowed school, though Eton had very large endowments. But what he wished to know was whether they had power in Committee to provide that the best use should be made of the endowments of Eton and Winchester; for the hon. and learned Member for Oxford seemed to think that in Committee their hands would be tied with respect to the revenues of those schools.

MR. WALPOLE said, the hon. Member (Mr. Acland) had put a very important question, and the whole discussion which had arisen upon the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Neate) really turned upon the answer to be given to that question. Having consulted legal authorities, he believed that the Bill as now drawn gave the fullest powers to the governing bodies of the schools and Colleges, whether old or new, in conjunction with the Commissioners, or to the Commissioners alone, of so arranging the funds and property of the schools and Colleges that they might be turned to the best possible use. Such was his belief, and otherwise there would, he admitted, be great force in the argument of his hon. Friend. If the terms of the Bill left any doubt on this head, it might be remedied in Committee, and he hoped that on this understanding the House would proceed to consider the clauses.

MR. KINNAIRD remarked that the governing body of Eton were very anxious that the Bill should pass, and that it would be very injurious to these bodies to subject them to any further delay.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH contended that the parents of the boys should have some voice in the management of those institutions, and that their supervision would be more effective than that of any Commissioners. He feared that the old and new governing bodies and the Commissioners would come into conflict, and he doubted whether the Bill would operate beneficially on Eton, where reforms were already being introduced by the Provost and Head master.

MR. MARSH agreed with his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) and the hon. and learned Member behind him (Mr. Ayrton) with regard to endowments. He thought, indeed, that no man should have the power of tying up his property for more than thirty years. As to public school education, he could not concur in the depreciatory view which had been taken of it by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, for he himself had enjoyed such an education, and there was not a day passed in which he did not feel the advantages he had derived from it. A great man once said that the chase was the image of war, and a public school might perhaps be described as an image of the battle of life. It was not merely literary knowledge which was acquired there, and he could point to many men in eminent positions whose success might be largely attributed to their public school education. He was sure that in Committee all would be desirous to make these institutions as useful as possible.

Mr. NEATE said, that in consideration of the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) that the Bill would be dealt with as he described, he should not press his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short Title of Act).

Mr. ACLAND objected to the Bill being entitled the Public Schools Act 1868, on the ground that other schools not included within its operations were equally entitled to the appellation of public schools. He moved that the clause be postponed for the purpose of an arrangement being made to get some other expression to indicate the title of the Bill.

Mr. WALPOLE said, he could see no reason for postponing the clause, since any alteration which the hon. Gentleman might offer could be now considered. The title of the Bill, however, did not imply that these were the only public schools; it simply indicated what public schools were dealt with in 1868.

Mr. ACLAND said, that gentlemen connected with other public schools objected to the assumption that those affected by this Bill were the only public institutions of that character. The title might be altered to the "Colleges and Schools Act, 1868."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. ACLAND then moved that the word "public" be omitted.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Definition of "existing" and "School").

Mr. LOWE objected to the use of the word "existing."

Mr. WALPOLE said, the object of the word was to maintain the distinction between the old and new governing bodies, which ran all through the Bill. For the purposes of this Act, the existing governing bodies of Eton and Winchester were not the governing bodies which existed now.

Mr. J. STUART MILL said, he understood that the Fellows of Eton College had very little to do with the school, except to usurp to themselves the greater portion of the endowments. He thought that the Head master rather than the Provost should be the head of the governing body.

Mr. WALPOLE said, at Eton the governing body was the Provost and Fellows, but they were not the governing body of the School. The person who had the real governing authority was the Provost, who, no doubt, acted in conjunction with the Head master. It was in the Provost that the property of the College was vested.

Mr. NEATE said, he had an Amendment to the latter part of the clause, which went to the whole principle of the Bill. In order to ensure that full power should be given to deal with the revenues of the Colleges, he proposed to insert the words—

"Including in the case of Eton College the Provost and Fellows, and in the case of Winchester College the Warden and Fellows."

Mr. WALPOLE said, there was no doubt that the Bill as it stood dealt with the revenues of the Colleges of Eton and Winchester. It might be proper to add these words to a later clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 (Definition of existing "Governing Body").

Mr. AYRTON said, that as this clause raised the question how far the Bill should extend, it was the proper time to ask why two of the schools included in the Royal Commission were omitted from this Bill—

whether from their extreme virtues or their extreme vices? St. Paul's School had flourished for a very long time in the City of London. It was founded by Dean Colet, who declared by his statutes that a boy who was shown to be inapt to learn was to be removed from the school. The management of the school was intrusted to the Mercers' Company, a body of trustees who, after a time, perverted that splendid charity entirely to their own purposes, and declined to admit any boy freely. The nomination of the scholars had become a simple affair of patronage in the hands of the members of the Court of the Company, and it was not required that a boy should be qualified to be educated in the School. There was no greater mystery in the world than the Mercers' Company—a body which had repeatedly set Royal Commissions of Inquiry at defiance, and refused to give any information as to its proceedings and the purposes of its existence. He was not aware that this association did any good to anybody whatever; all that was known of them was that they met periodically in the City of London, and ended their proceedings with inordinate festivities. The company had an estate yielding them £9,500 a year, situated in the borough which he represented, and yet when a poor school in the district from which they derived that large revenue was greatly in want of assistance, none could be obtained for it from that wealthy Company. On applying at their Hall in the matter, he received this answer—"We never tell anybody who are the governing body of the Mercers' Company." The general impression was that the whole thing was in the hands of certain families, who kept it entirely to themselves. The result was that a splendid endowment of £9,500 for educational purposes assisted in the education of only 153 boys. It was said that the Company, finding their administration of the school in danger of being reformed, asserted that all the property belonged to them, and then set up a Chancery suit in order to raise that very interesting question. The omission of St. Paul's School from the Bill was a great defect in the measure, as there were many abuses in that institution; and therefore he should move that the words "St. Paul's School" and "the governing body of the Mercers' Company" be added at the end of the clause.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had an Amendment to move prior to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets—namely, in line 9 to leave out "and Chapter," and insert "of Westminster, the Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge." The Royal Commissioners, in their Report, had recommended extensive alterations in the buildings of the school; but these were entirely set aside. He was very anxious not in any way to delay the passing of that Bill, but an imperative sense of duty compelled him to interpose at that stage; for that was a question of vital importance to Westminster School. It was proposed by the Bill as it stood to constitute, under the title of the governing body, a body which never had been the governing body of Westminster School, and one which was singularly unsuited, from their conflicting interest, to discharge such duties—namely, the Dean and Chapter. But not only would the Bill create such a governing body, but it would summarily abolish a governing body which had existed for many years, and, as he maintained, with good results to the school. The Dean of Westminster, the Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, appointed the Head and Under masters, summarily dismissed them if they thought it necessary, and they had practically the regulation of the education, annually examining the scholars. The Dean and Chapter of Westminster never had been, and he hoped never would be, the governing body of Westminster School, and with that object he should move the omission of the words "and Chapter," and the insertion of the words after "Westminster" of "Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and Master of Trinity College, Cambridge."

Mr. Ayrton

MR. LOWE said, he had an Amendment on the Paper which should have preceded the Amendments of both the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) and the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther). The question he wished to raise was whether those governing bodies should be created at all, seeing that the sole duty which they would have to discharge would be to appoint other governing bodies; for they would be intrusted with no legislative functions, and would only have, if created, an existence altogether of six months and a fortnight. Believing that it would be ridiculous to create such bodies merely to do a thing for which they had no peculiar aptitude and some inaptitude, he should move to leave out the words from "Existing Governing Bodies," in line 5, to "Trustees" in line 13, inclusive.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the beginning of the Clause to the word "Trustees," in line 13.—(Mr. Lowe.)

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he hoped that he would not be prevented by the right hon. Gentleman's Motion from putting his Amendment.

MR. LOWE said, the effect of what he proposed to do would be to carry the hon. Member's Amendment.

MR. GOLDNEY objected to the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), on the ground that it struck at the root of the Bill, which he thought it was not desirable should be shelved altogether.

MR. NEATE said, he was of opinion that there was no real necessity for the proposed change, and that it would only be paying a compliment, to which they were entitled, to those so-called governing bodies to give them the right of making suggestions as to those by whom they should be succeeded.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the right hon. Member for Calne proposed to improve on that Japanese system to which he had alluded in the early part of the day, and to become at once a Nero. He, for one, objected to have the governing bodies disposed of in so summary a manner.

MR. LOWE said, that the hon. Member was under a misapprehension in supposing that the tendency of his Amendment would be to withdraw all control over the Head master. All that he proposed to strike out was the proposition to give to the existing governing bodies the only function the Bill assigned to them—that of appointing their successors.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that the new governing bodies would have important functions to discharge, some relating to education and others to revenues and emoluments; and as the existing governing bodies were trustees, it became a question how far it was right to take out of their hands the nomination of the new governing bodies.

MR. ACLAND thought that, as a matter of common sense, full power should be given to the Commission to act in the matter.

MR. W. E. FORSTER denied that the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) would strike at the root of the Bill. The Commissioners, under the Bill as now framed, would have full discretion left them.

MR. KARSLAKE said, he thought the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne would practically destroy the Bill. It would be better to accept the Bill as they found it.

MR. WALPOLE appealed to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) not to press his Amendment. He thought in all reforms they should attend to this rule, to go as far as they could in perfect harmony with those to whom they had to look for carrying their reforms into effect. He would therefore consult the existing governors of schools as to who should be the proper governing body. Why should they not pay them the compliment of allowing them to consider the matter?

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would prefer the present system to that which would result from the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman.

Question put, "That the words 'Existing Governing Body of a School shall for the purposes of this Act mean' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 152; Noes 69: Majority 83.

MR. LABOUCHERE rose to move to insert in line 5, after the word "Fellows," the word "Head master," with the view of giving him a locus standi among those who were to decide who the governing body were to be. Eton, though the most fashionable, was one of the worst schools in the world. ["No, no!"] He had been there three years himself, and had learnt absolutely nothing. He had to learn seventy lines of Homer every day, but he forgot them the next day; and they did him no sort of good whatever. The present Head master had not been brought up at Eton. [Dissent.] Well, at all events, he had been brought there as Head master from another school, and was in favour of introducing such improvements as were in accordance with the spirit of the 19th century. He thought it right the Head master should have a locus standi on the Committee, so that, if out-voted, he might be able to present a Report of his own.

MR. LIDDELL thought it was only common justice to point out that the Provost and Fellows of his own School, against whom some harsh expressions had been used by an hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stuart Mill), had by their choice of the present Head master given the best possible proof of their earnest desire to improve, extend, and, as it was called, liberalize the education of that great School. With regard to the Amendment, he thought there was no necessity for placing the Head master on the governing body.

MR. J. STUART MILL hoped the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill would take into serious consideration the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere). The object which they all had in view was to improve the schools. The Provost and Head master had the most to do in the management of the schools, and as the good government of those institutions was what should be steadily aimed at, that object could not be better promoted than by including the Provost and Head master in the governing body.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE remarked that the discussion was turning upon the composition of the governing body. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere) would be worthy of the consideration of the Special Commission; but it would be extremely difficult to deal with it at present. It was obvious that the relations of the Head master with the governing body would be materially altered by placing him upon it, and he was inclined to doubt whether his power of doing his proper work would be thereby increased. He hoped the Committee would adopt the proposal of the Select Committee, and allow existing governing bodies, of which the Head master had never been a member, to prepare a scheme of future government and submit it to the Commissioners.

MR. GOLDNEY said, the Fellows were acquainted with the working of the School. As to the merits of that School, a gentleman who had recently taken high honours at Cambridge informed him yesterday that he attributed his success to his progress at Eton, where he had acquired the best education that could be found in the country.

MR. FAWCETT thought the Head master was one of the most appropriate names that could be placed upon the list of the governing body, and that the most advantageous results would follow such an appointment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the question before the House was simply, whether between August and the 1st of January the Head master should be associated with the Fellows and Provost in making suggestions as to the constitution of governing body. That was not of very great consequence. The of importance was what were the of the Head master to be in future this Bill was passed. That, however, be afterwards determined.

MR. ACLAND advised the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere) to withdraw the Amendment, and request the Commissioners giving an opportunity to the Head master of expressing his views.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that in regard to the tone of the discussion which had taken place, he should withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. LOWTHER moved an Amendment, providing that the governing body of Westminster School should consist of the Dean of Westminster, the Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and the Dean of Trinity College, Cambridge, in lieu of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster.

MR. MARSH remarked that in the time the boys had nothing to do with the Chapter, but with the Dean alone used to ask them to dinner.

MR. HURST pointed out that the pecuniary interests of the Dean and Chapter were hostile to the school, since every farthing spent on it came out of the revenues.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he had no objection to include the Dean of Christchurch, Oxford, and the Dean of Trinity College, Cambridge, in the governing body of Westminster School, but the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. J. Lubbock) would consent to retain the Dean and Chapter in the governing body.

MR. J. LOWTHER accepted the Amendment, and the Amendment thus was agreed to.

MR. ARYTON moved the Amendment to which he had formerly referred, providing that the governing body of St. Paul's School—namely, the governing body of the Mercers' Company—should be included in the Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN said, his hon. Friend a little while ago pointed out his inability to find who the governing body of the Mercers' Company were, yet he proposed to put them in the Bill. He was so anxious not to impede the progress of the Bill that he would not detain the Committee by defending the Mercers' Company, and would only remind them that the circumstances of St. Paul's School entirely different from those of other public schools. In the other schools the boarders were the chief element; but in St. Paul's they did not exist at all, for the boys were all day scholars. Whether the Mercers' Company had private rights or not it would not be wise to put St. Paul's in the present Bill, although it might be advisable to deal with it in a future Bill, together with Christ's Hospital and one or two others similarly situated. St. Paul's was maintained not only out of those funds of which the Mercers' Company were trustees, but they also contributed out of their own private property. St. Paul's School was taken out of the Bill in the Lords, and his hon. and learned Friend was beaten in an attempt in the Select Committee to include this School. It was therefore not advisable to include the school now.

Mr. Liddell

MR. KARSLAKE said, that a petition had been presented to the House by the Mercers' Company, in which they stated that at that moment an information was pending in Equity as to whether they had a right to claim the surplus revenues of the School. It was clear that while the matter was thus sub judice nothing could be done as to the insertion of the School in this Bill. He spoke with some knowledge of the School and of the Head master when he said that St. Paul's School not only furnished a good middle-class education, but that the boys obtained a high state of proficiency in Latin and Greek—far in excess of their numbers.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Power of Governing Bodies to alter their Constitutions).

MR. WALPOLE: This clause is an important one. It was with reference to it that the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate) made his remarks at the commencement of the debate. Wishing to have time for consideration with regard to it, I now move, Sir, that you report Progress. We propose to proceed with this Bill at a Morning Sitting on this day week.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I believe we can fix it for this day week; but, formally, we may now fix it for Thursday.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

NOVA SCOTIA—BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN CONFEDERATION.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, about a month ago—on the 15th of May last—I presented a petition to the House from the representatives of the colony of Nova Scotia, and I now rise for the purpose of calling attention to that petition, and to statements made in it, and of proposing what appears to me to be a judicious course in regard to it. The Resolution which I have given Notice of consists of two parts—first, the statement of a fact which is easily proved; and, secondly, a statement of the mode in which the Government would do wisely to meet the difficult questions which have arisen. I am sorry to see that the right hon. Gentleman who has charge in this House of colonial affairs is not here; but in the course of my argument he may come upon that Bench. The petition which I presented to the House makes what to all Englishmen must or ought to be considered a very serious complaint. It complains that the Parliament of this country, by an Act passed in the last Session, overthrew the constitution of the colony of Nova Scotia, and destroyed a description—nay, in fact, a reality—of independence which had existed in that colony for nearly 100 years; that it handed over the Government and the destiny of the colony mainly to another colony—namely, that of Canada; and, taking from the people of Nova Scotia the management of their own affairs, the appointment of their own officials, the collection and expenditure of their own revenues, transferred the whole of these to a Parliament created by the Bill, which was to sit at Ottawa, distant not less than 800 miles from Nova Scotia. Now the petition declares—and I think it is capable of proof—that the House of Commons and the Parliament of the United Kingdom did all they could, not only without the consent of the colonists of Nova Scotia, but directly in the face of their pronounced disapproval; and I think it would be easy to show that what has been done was in reality done as a great surprise to the people of Nova Scotia, and that it was in some degree—though I am afraid to use a word that may seem harsh—a fraud upon the Imperial Parliament. At least, if it were not a fraud—and perhaps I had better withdraw that word—the Act was passed upon representations which were extravagantly coloured, if they were not absolutely untrue. The Bill that passed last year did not include the colonies of Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland; and for a very good reason, but for only one reason—namely, that the people of those two colonies did not take part in the discussion on this matter, and refused to be united to the other British North American Provinces. A clause was inserted in the Bill which would enable them at any future time to enter on its consideration—a clause which was perfectly wise, and would have been still better if it had included Nova Scotia. It is quite clear that, for the very same reasons, if they have a real existence, Nova Scotia ought to have been excluded; and I shall ask the attention of the House while I show them that Nova Scotia had as much right to be excluded as the other two colonies, and as much right to complain of being included as they would have had if they had been included in the Bill. The petition which I presented to the House describes itself as a petition from the representatives of the people of Nova Scotia, and was signed as I shall state. Out of nineteen Members who were elected last September to represent the Province of Nova Scotia in the Parliament at Ottawa, seventeen Members had given their assent to the petition, and had declared themselves opposed to the Confederation. But of the thirty-eight Members elected last September to the Nova Scotian Parliament or House of Assembly, not fewer than thirty-six have signed the petition. I think that if 640 or 650 out of the Members of this House signed a declaration on some great public question, it would be difficult to say, especially if it were a question of subverting our Constitution, and handing us over to somebody else, that that was not a very fair, satisfactory, and complete expression of the will of the people of the United Kingdom in regard to that matter. The case appears to me to have been on the part of Parliament simply one of great error—an error of haste and precipitation; but to the colony, if their opinions are as I believe them to be, it is one of very serious wrong. I know exactly beforehand what the right hon. Gentleman will say upon this matter. He will say, "We have had the assent of the colony, and it is impossible for anybody to argue now that after what was done by the Legislature of Nova Scotia that the Province was wrongfully included in the Act of Union. I am glad to have the matter on the footing; because by the House of Commons Nova Scotia was excluded. I ought to be required of Nova Scotia to it, then I shall prevail on the House of Commons to include Nova Scotia from the Act. I say that not only but the Government perfectly well. In the debate on the other House introduced, the comprehensive Earl of Carnarvon State for the purpose of referred to the difficulty. Referring to Nova Scotia, he said against the Bill of Lords. He said petitions, and rather against though they were able, yet the of some single admitted that recently from put by the chairman attended the matter referred to what was resolution, general of Confederation Assembly of Nova Scotia it was in very force no one could do anything to do this particular referred also to when the Parliament dissolved—that the moment before of Confederation Government and back beyond the Colonial Parliament potent to do what did must be admitted did not agree as an example of the or three years catastrophe too was admitted in country to be as a constitutional movement. We know the Assembly was those transactions took place, and that, in point of fact, it only "committed suicide to save itself from slaughter," since if it had not done that, the very first act of the Imperial Parliament would have been to make some substantial change in the government of Jamaica. This is the sentence in which the Earl of Carnarvon expresses his feelings on the matter—

Mr. Bright

"The plea for delay is in reality a plea for indefinite postponement, and to this I do not believe that Parliament will lend its ear. This measure has been purchased at the cost of great personal and local interests, and if we now remit it—I care not on what pretence—to the further consideration of the Province, we deliberately invite opposition, and we may be sure that many years will pass over before another such proposal for Confederation is submitted to Parliament."—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 572.]

It is quite clear from that expression that he knew perfectly well what was going on in the colony; how entirely dissatisfied the people were with the proceedings of this Parliament; and he feared that if there were any delay—for the Bill would not pass if Nova Scotia was not included—and the question was remitted to the decision of the people of Nova Scotia, the idea of the Federation of all the colonies would not be carried out for many years to come. I think that supports the proposition I am submitting to the House. If the House determines—whether the people of Nova Scotia wish it or not—that that Province should be included in the Confederation, then I have no more to say on the matter. I should argue it no longer, and should leave Parliament and the Government to take the consequences of a policy which in my opinion would be so foolish and so monstrous. What is the course which the House of Assembly and the people of the colony took on this matter? I ask hon. Gentlemen who may fancy there is really nothing in the question to consider it carefully, because in all probability this will not be the last occasion of its being brought before us. In 1861 there had been very naturally a good deal of talk in the British North American Provinces as to the propriety of a Confederation of the colonies, and in that year the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia passed a Resolution of a general character, which referred to a general or partial Confederation or union of the maritime Provinces, and which appointed delegates to consider the question, and to correspond with others who might be concerned in it. In 1862 certain delegates were appointed to meet the Executive Council of Canada, and another deputation from New Brunswick at Quebec. The whole matter was discussed and the determination come to by the conference was that the consideration of the question was premature, and that, until the intercolonial railway was made, and until the colonies were brought into that kind of amalgamation which would arise from the general establishment of free trade among them, nothing could be done, and therefore no further steps were taken by that conference. The next year a General Election occurred, but it is not asserted by anyone that the question of Confederation was referred to the decision of the constituencies. Two important questions were referred to them—one was that of retrenchment, some thinking that the Government had been very expensive; the other was a proposed limitation of the franchise. The result of the election was a change of Government—a result that sometimes follows a General Election in this country—and a Minister of great authority being deposed, a Minister who has since had great authority—namely, Dr. Tupper—ascended the Nova Scotian ministerial throne. In 1864, soon after Dr. Tupper came to the Premiership, the new Parliament met, and went into the question of Confederation, appointing delegates to consider the propriety of a union between Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island; but I believe that on no occasion has Nova Scotia shown any disposition to unite in any Confederation from which New Brunswick and Prince Edward's Island were excluded. In the same year there was what is called a "dead-lock" in the administration of affairs in Canada. The House will bear in mind that for many years past it is not Nova Scotia that has troubled the English Parliament and Government, but any difficulty in connection with the British North American provinces has arisen from embarrassments in Canada. The dead-lock in Canada was such that men looked across the table at each other in the House of Assembly, and asked how things were to go on. It was ultimately agreed that there should be a coalition; that men who had fought violently in Parliament for years before should form a coalition Government, and that its policy should be to combine all the Provinces in a Federal union; or, if that was impracticable, to apply Federal principles to Canada alone, by forming a central Parliament, in which representation should be based upon population, which would give dominance to Upper Canada, and so in all probability get rid of a dead-lock. This was the means by which they proposed to extricate themselves from the embarrassment in which they were placed, and to set their governmental carriage running on its four wheels again. The delegates who had been appointed to consider the desirableness of a union of the maritime Provinces—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island—met, in August 1864, at Charlottetown, the capital of Prince Edward's Island, and they discussed the question for some time; but whilst so doing they were interrupted by the advent of a powerful delegation from Canada, the Canadian politicians being afraid that the maritime Provinces would get up a more limited Federation of their own. The result was, that these gentlemen having no increased authority from the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia, whatever they had from New Brunswick or Prince Edward's Island, some delay took place, and the delegates met again in Quebec, in October 1864, the result of their deliberations being the formation of what was known as the Quebec scheme, and which really formed the basis of the Bill which the Parliament passed here last year. The delegates from Nova Scotia and from the other Provinces did not agree to the Confederation. There is no proof that Nova Scotia has ever in any way countenanced a Confederation in which all the maritime Provinces should not be included. Bear in mind that up to this moment the policy of complete Confederation was entirely Canadian. It was not Nova Scotian—it was not even Imperial. Judging from the despatches of the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell), the Colonial Office looked at it with great shyness, and probably did not think it was in a position to give immediate and distinct sanction to it. When this scheme became known in Nova Scotia, there arose a spontaneous excitement on the part of the whole people; meetings were held almost everywhere; petitions in great numbers numerously signed were presented to the House, objecting to the scheme; and objecting—as they have done all along—that anything should be done which was not referred to the constituencies at the elections. The Nova Scotian House met in February 1865, and in his opening speech the Governor referred to the Quebec scheme, promising to bring the question before the House; but he did not do so because it was felt that this was so entirely in vain to ask the Assembly for the contrived and done what the House did, however this scheme, but Confederation of which the Nova Scotia had been greatly attracted, it appears to have been a scheme to subvert the Canadian position of 1864, Confederation of and to show how was to do nothing, ally rejected the tions, which seem to have the semblance to the circumstances then with Canada. It was a remarkable man that they should have a general Confederation included with the 1865 there were more than 15,000 signatures to the House of Assembly complaining of a deal with the Confederation until it had been the people to be at a General Election, petitions against only one solitary names I have no notion—in favour now we come to the House met in February, single word in the question of been referred to the people of Nova Scotia if it was for its had been assented to have had some of the Governor's speech. considered as a minds of the people been so far drawn the matter was supposed to have happened two months ago—ordinary thing—Nova Scotia, Dr. Tupper's motion that a scheme be proceeded with was pointed to arrange for a demonstration was given for a demonstration in fact, the whole

Mr. Bright

on with an indecent haste, such as I should think there is no example of in a Legislative Assembly that was about, contrary to the will of its constituents, to subvert and overthrow its own power. The Session before there was no majority for doing anything; but in the Session of 1866 there was a majority for this proceeding. How it was obtained I know not; but there are modes of dealing with Oppositions, as we have had any number of times in this House, by which a minority sometimes becomes a majority. Dr. Tupper is a man of whom I will say nothing that is disrespectful. He is a man, I should say, of rather a subtle intellect, and he has what is an admirable thing in a Prime Minister—a persuasive tongue; and, what is more, he appears to me to have an ambition which is not willing to be confined within the comparatively narrow limits of the Province of Nova Scotia; and, somehow or other, Dr. Tupper managed to convert the minority of the year before into the majority of the year 1866, and succeeded in having this Resolution passed and these delegates appointed. Then these delegates came to England, where they were joined by those of Canada and New Brunswick, Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland taking no part in the matter, and sending no delegates; so that, happily or unhappily as the case may turn out—for I am not arguing for or against Confederation as a principle—their legislation did not subvert their Constitution, and they are free as they were before. But there came to England whilst this question was under discussion a counter delegation sent by the people—not the Assembly—of Nova Scotia. The delegates from the people brought a petition signed, not in favour of Confederation, by 31,000 male inhabitants of Nova Scotia, protesting against the Imperial Parliament giving its assistance to the subversion of the Constitution of Nova Scotia and to uniting that colony to Canada, and till the people should have had an opportunity of declaring their opinion upon that proposal at the General Elections in the Colony. In the month of March last year I protested against the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies proceeding with the Bill, telling him that in three months, according to the ordinary custom of the colony, there would be a General Election, and this question would then be referred to the whole of the constituencies affected by it. But the right hon. Gentleman was very sharp on me, and thought I was stepping in and interfering with a great transaction of his. I pointed out that in reference to English corporations this House does not put men within the circuit of a municipality until you have ascertained what is the opinion of those who are to be included within it; but here is a whole colony of 400,000 persons—a colony that I venture to say is, for its numbers, the noblest colony probably that England has; a colony that has given us less trouble; a colony having a people of most remarkable qualities; and yet they are handed over to this new Confederation not only without their consent, but absolutely in the teeth of their protestations against it. To show the House that I am not now taking up the question merely for the purpose of stimulating any difficulty that may have arisen, or of making this question embarrassing to the Government, I will state some few of the things I said when I spoke on the subject last year. I said that I had never before known any measure affecting any considerable part of the population hurried through Parliament with the unseemly haste which we witnessed last year; and I referred to the fact that two colonies were left out, and I said I presumed they were left out because it was quite clear that they did not want to come in. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) interrupted me, and said: "I am glad I can inform the hon. Gentleman that they are—one of them at least—on the point of coming in." I have not heard of their coming in, but they were left out because they did not wish to come in, and that is all I propose with regard to the colony of Nova Scotia. Further, I described what had been done with that petition of 31,000 signatures; and I asked the House not to bind Nova Scotia until the opinion of the constituency of that colony had been ascertained, which would have been within a few months of the time at which I was speaking. I said further—

"If, at a time like this, when you are proposing a union which we all hope is to last for ever, you create a little sore it will in all probability become a great sore in a short time, and it may be that the intentions of Parliament will be almost entirely frustrated by the haste with which this measure is being pushed forward."—[3 Hansard, clxxxv.1182]

The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the case as one of great exigency, and I pointed out that if we had the feeling of the people of Nova Scotia with us we might go forward in the hope that the transaction would be advantageous to the colony and honourable to the mother-country. The petition to which I have referred was disregarded; the opinions of 31,000 persons were considered not nearly so important as the representations of Dr. Tupper and his friends; my warning with regard to the little sore was considered of no use and not in the slightest degree judicious; and the Bill, being pushed forward, was passed. Now there came on in September, later than usual, a General Election for the Province of Nova Scotia, and it was no longer possible to keep the subject from discussion and decision by the constituencies. The result was, that of the thirty-eight Members returned to the local Nova Scotian Parliament meeting at Halifax, only two were returned in favour of Confederation, and of the nineteen sent to represent the Province in the Parliament meeting at Ottawa, only two were returned in favour of Confederation, and one of these has, I believe, given his assent to the petition I have presented to the House. Thus it will be seen that of fifty-seven Members, only three are in favour of the Bill which was passed with so much haste and so much unstatesmanlike obstinacy last year. The House is landed in this difficulty, that you have been professing to confer a great benefit on your colony—you did it without their consent, and that colony turns upon you, and asks you to take back the gift. The House should bear in mind, when this election took place there were not wanting those means by which Government and officials interfere with the freedom of elections. It was said more than once by persons in authority, that if the people of Nova Scotia voted against the Confederation it would be displeasing to the Queen. The Colonial Office also exercised its authority. The Governor of the colony at the time exercised all the influence he could bring to bear on the matter and the case. The military gentlemen who lived outside barracks, and who never before voted at elections, came forward and voted, and brought all the force of their opinion, example, and suffrage in support of what they supposed was the intention of the Government at home and of the colony. And the Canadian officials, they were also to exercise whatever influence they possessed. Well, all this was done, and we know how it is done here, and we can guess how it is done in Nova Scotia. But, notwithstanding all this battery and machining against the popular cause, it failed, and failed completely, as I have shown. The House

Mr. Bright

elected last September met in February of this year, and immediately turned their attention to the question of the destruction of their Constitution and their forced union with Canada; and they sent delegates to England to ask for the restoration of the Constitution as it existed previously to the passing of the British North American Confederation Act, and they instructed their delegates they were not to accept any alteration or amendment of that Act. I do not say this for the purpose of saying I agree with or approve of it, or that I think it absolutely necessary for them to stand by those words. I state it for the sake of showing what at the present moment is the unanimous judgment of the whole local Legislature of Nova Scotia. In the eighteen counties of the colony great public meetings were held, and one was held in Halifax, the capital city, and under the eye of the Government. They say the Act of Union has no claim upon the loyalty of the people of Nova Scotia, and that any obedience to it is a matter of coercion, and not given by a free people. There are 48,000 electors in Nova Scotia, and I think only 13,000 voted for the Confederation candidates, with all the influence that could be brought to bear upon them. But in some counties there was no control; in others, the majorities were so great and the minorities so small that the poll was over at a very early hour of the day, and a great number of the electors did not vote. I state this in order to show that the number of electors who voted on the occasion ought not to be regarded in a consideration of this question. I must refer once more to the speech of the Earl of Carnarvon. I say it expresses a fear of public opinion in Nova Scotia, and a consciousness that he was taking a course, in moving the second reading of the Bill, which had not the sanction of the people of the colony. If that be so I put it to the House whether it is not a question of more than ordinary seriousness, and whether the proposition I make for an inquiry—that a Commission should be sent out—is not a rational and statesmanlike proposition? If the House or the Government be disposed to disregard the question, then I assure them it is understood to be a serious question in Canada; and that, although Dr. Tupper is anxious the Confederation should work well, and that all the colonies should adopt it, the present aspect of affairs in Nova Scotia is perilous. In Canada, I am told, the Canadian oath has been altered, because it will not be taken by the people of Nova Scotia. They were required to take an oath that they would defend their dominions. The people of Nova Scotia were not prepared to take the oath, and it was therefore altered. More than that, I believe the Nova Scotia Militia will not be called out for drill this year, because it is felt that the people of Nova Scotia are unwilling to do anything that will put them into action with, or independence upon, or in submission to the Government of Canada. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) will tell the House—I wish I could say what he will doubtless say—that the whole thing will blow over. Well, some things do blow over; some do not: and if they do, it is only with a very rough blast. It is not a very statesmanlike conclusion, after last year committing a great error or wrong, to sit down and refuse to inquire into it, or remedy it, and say it is a momentary passion, and will blow over, and that the opposition will soon be at an end. You have bound them together, and you say there is no remedy in this Parliament which did them the injustice. You tell them, if a wrong has been done, they must go to Canada and get it remedied. If they go to the Parliament of Ottawa they would tell them by a majority of 6 to 1 they could nothing for them. They would say, “You are part of the Confederation, and if any wrong has been done you must go to the Parliament in London.” I beg to tell the House that if that is the principle on which we are to act—to allow them to go to Canada for a remedy, and if we undertake to interfere in no way in the matter, and withdraw the troops from Nova Scotia, and leave Nova Scotia and Canada to settle the matter, it will be settled very easily, or perhaps I should say without much difficulty. Canada cannot coerce Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia would know that she cannot be coerced; and therefore either she would secede and revert to her ancient Constitution, which she has by no means forgotten, or Canada would immediately appoint a Commission to inquire into the whole matter, and to offer to Nova Scotia such amendments of the Act, and such changes or concessions in the mode of Confederation, as Nova Scotia might—I do not say it is likely she would—but such as she might ultimately be willing to accept. There is another point which the House should bear in mind—that Nova Scotia is next to New Brunswick, and although New Brunswick has, by her General Election, confirmed the proposition of Confederation, yet there is a growing feeling in New Brunswick, since the Canadian Parliament met, that the Confederation is not a good thing for them. Every day, I believe, a stronger sympathy with Nova Scotia is being created. The other day, in the city of St. John, the principal mercantile city of New Brunswick, a candidate strong against Confederation was returned, and so strong was the party supporting him that no candidate in favour of Confederation could be brought forward to oppose him. I venture to say, if the Government refuse any inquiry into this matter, they will only add to the folly of their haste of last year the greater folly of a more perilous obstinacy this year. It is not a safe course that the Government is going to pursue, if I have rightly heard what is in their mind. It is said that the right hon. Gentleman and the Duke of Buckingham, his Chief at the Colonial Office, propose that by-and-by a new Governor General shall be sent to Canada; that the matter shall then be inquired into; that he shall try to ascertain the grounds of discord, stopping a day or so at Halifax; and that, when he arrives at Ottawa, he shall propose something to reconcile Nova Scotia to the Government of Canada. I believe that any such inquiry will be utterly futile. The Governor General going out there will not be the most impartial man to consider the question; and when he gets to Ottawa, and is there surrounded by his Ministers in the Canadian Parliament, who will all be on the other side, it is quite clear he will be in a position of the greatest difficulty. And I think a man must be sanguine beyond what is wise to suppose that any good could arise from a proceeding like that. I think that we have committed a certain wrong. We have done it through error, or in haste; and it is very unstatesmanlike to shut the door of Parliament against the prayer of the petitioners, which may be said to represent nearly, if not quite, half the population of Nova Scotia. I think the sending out of a Commission, or Commissioners, would be more considerate to the colony. Such Commission might take into view all the circumstances of the case; and it would be more soothing to the 300,000 or 400,000 inhabitants who are dissatisfied with the course taken last year. Our colonial experience has not been very satisfactory to us in some things. We fancy that people 3,000 or 4,000 miles off are as tractable or as easily governed as people in a neighbouring colony. It is quite a mistake. They have ideas which Englishmen have not. The tie which binds them to this House, though strong, is very much less strong than the ties which bind our English counties to the sovereignty of this House. It is only about 100 years ago that the wise men in this House proposed in a single Session to pass three coercive Acts against the North American colonies. I have no doubt that there were many men in those days who stood up to object to those Acts, and were deemed fools or something worse for their pains. And yet their folly turned out the greatest wisdom, and the almost unanimous wisdom of Parliament turned out to be the greatest folly; and this is now pointed at by every historian as one of the most remarkable transactions of unwisdom that ever occurred in the English Parliament. It is not now a question of mere stamps, or of 3*d.* or 6*d.* a pound on tea. It is a question of the absolute subversion and abolition of an ancient, honoured, and valued Constitution. I consider it quite likely that the people of Nova Scotia, who have been free, happy, independent, and prosperous for so long a time, may have just as strong a love for the Constitution of their comparatively small population, as any of us may have for the Constitution under which we live. The noble Lord who moved the second reading of the Bill in the other House said we were now laying the foundation of a great State. Last year we all hoped so. I hoped so myself although I confess I had not much faith in it. But to build up a great State by making a victim of this colony, and to make a victim of this colony in order to meet certain difficulties in Canada or in the Colonial Office, does not appear to me to be wise; and to endeavour to build up a great State from those discordant materials, partly from fear, and partly from jealousy of the United States, is a far more objectionable feature in the matter. I know very well there is an idea that this union with Canada is one mode of preventing the North American colonies from annexation to the United States. The motive is hardly wise, and in the mode of accomplishing it there is no wisdom whatever; for you are attempting now to build a great State on a foundation which shakes under you the very moment you are beginning to build; and when you passed your Bill of Federation last year for the foundation of a great State, you were putting together materials which were not in accord, and out of which the moment they were brought together would arise something like we have now seen. We know what the official view of things is. It, we generally find, is to do nothing; and it goes on doing nothing until the case gets so bad that nothing can be done. And that is precisely what the Colonial Office to-night will ask the House of Commons to do in this matter. It would not do anything last year but contradict me when I said the Nova Scotians were against that Bill, and the right hon. Gentleman was positive and rather insolent, and thought I was meddling where I did not understand it. And now, when I ask him to inquire, he will tell the House that inquiry would only make the difficulties greater, and would bear the appearance of a concession which the House does not intend to make. Now, I hope the House and the Colonial Office will beware of saying anything like that. You do not know yet that you will not have to make concession. And therefore I say to the right hon. Gentleman and to his Colleagues not to agree to any statement like that, because next year we may look upon a state of things far less palatable than those of to-day. What is the difficulty of inquiry? There have been Commissions of Inquiry before of an important character, and there may be one now. The result would be this—that all the Canadian people would say—"Well, the English Parliament have behaved to us, after all, in a certain degree of moderation and reasonableness. What they did was through misapprehension, and when we represented it to them they were ready to inquire. They have sent out a Commission, and we will go fairly into the question with them, and we will see if the difficult question can be adjusted." Now, there are several things which could be done. There could be a Confederation of all the Provinces, as at present proposed, but with certain modifications, and this might possibly meet the views of the Nova Scotians; there might be a Confederation of the maritime Provinces only, which would be probable most likely to meet the views of the Nova Scotians; or you might take the alternative scheme proposed by the Canadian Executive Government—apply the Federal principle to the two Canadas with a central Parliament. So that, after all, there are two ways out of this difficulty, and the proper way would be discovered by a Commission sent to Nova Scotia to inquire into it. But whatever you do, I say to have no inquiry, but to stand on the Bill passed last Session—to shut the door of the House in the face of that new colony—would be one of those acts, not of statesmanship, but of madness, which statesmen and Ministers ought on all occasions to avoid. If you shut the door of hope, what will be the effect upon the minds of this population who are so agitated? They will feel that they are made the victims of Canadian ambition and of Imperial policy in which they do not in the least sympathize. I am afraid, Sir, to treat this question in one part of it, because it will lead me to say, though it will be false in detail, what will be likely to increase the difficulty I point out. If you propose a union at all hazards, the danger to my mind is apparent. From the moment that resolution reaches Nova Scotia there will be created a deeper hostility to Canada. I do not know why it is that the smaller Provinces have no love of Canada. They do not believe in her political system. They have no faith in the wisdom and morality of her statesmen. They go there with nineteen Members to a House of 180 Members, and they think they will be lost when they get there, and that their own complete government will be gone. They are not placed under the Imperial Parliament, but under what is only a Colonial Government, in which they have no faith and for which they have no love. I say therefore if you turn them from this House, not only without remedy, but without inquiry, you will create a deeper hostility to Canada. You will create also a growing estrangement from England, and what is perhaps dreaded by some more than anything else, you will create and increase the sympathy with the neighbouring New England States of North America. When men are irritated, as the Nova Scotians are now irritated, and when nothing is done to soothe the irritation—when you will not inquire—when you will not remedy—when you will not listen—it takes a very little thing indeed where a colony is 3,000 or 4,000 miles away from the mother country, to turn its eyes in the direction of the government of a great country—of its own race and with institutions as free—and probably willing, when the colonies are willing, to receive them within its ample borders. This is what I am afraid may happen. Your scheme must break down if the Nova Scotians resolve they will not have it. It is impossible for you to coerce them. I do not think there is the temper in the English House of Commons, nor amongst Englishmen in the United Kingdom, that would allow the Government by force to coerce the population of Nova Scotia into the subversion of her very government, and into annexation with Canada. But if you are not prepared to coerce, then I say the proper course for the Government to take—and I never gave any Government an opinion with more conscientious belief in its reasonableness and its propriety—the course which the Government should take is to select one or two men of high position and character in this country, who would go and give two or three months to this question this autumn, to examine into the whole matter in Nova Scotia. They would also see something of the state of public opinion in Canada; because they would necessarily see the Governors and the authorities there, and possibly—probably—I will not say certainly—they may propose some plan which would relieve the colonies from this difficulty, and would show the House of Commons and the Government here a path out of a difficulty which I think every day we tread in it becomes more difficult, and which may land us in disasters which are fearful to contemplate. The other day the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government met the deputation upon Ireland. It was not upon this question—it was upon a question which has been much discussed in the House during the present Session—and he made an observation to them which would have been very wise under certain circumstances, but, as it was not true, it was not very wise under the circumstances in which it was spoken. He made this observation. He said—“We have secured this for the people of this country, that the Constitution shall not be subverted without an appeal to them.” But you have subverted the Constitution of Nova Scotia without any appeal to the people of Nova Scotia. You did it from what I think an exaggerated statement of persons connected with the then Government of Nova Scotia, and the House did on the representation of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who certainly was very much more sanguine than he had any right to be. You have done to the people of Nova Scotia what I maintain is one of the greatest wrongs that despotism in any form can do to any people. You have power to maintain it so long as Nova Scotia has no assistance from outside its own borders. But there is no statesman in England who will venture to bring about the shedding of one drop of blood upon that Continent. No man in this House more entirely hopes that such a thing is absolutely impossible than I do. Yet these questions may be driven to a point where difficulties will arise which the English Parliament will be utterly unable to settle. And whilst we have been endeavouring to bring about important arrangements for the Federation of our fellow-subjects in the British North American Colonies, we may possibly have been taking the step that will thrust them into the United States. Only the other day I met an Englishman who has lived in the United States, and who is familiar with everything there, and he asked me whether I thought the Government intended to refuse my claim. I said, "I think they do. They generally refuse everything, and I understand they are going to refuse this." "Well," he said, "I am very glad to hear that;" which rather struck me with surprise, and, indeed, with pain; and I said, "Why are you glad?" He said, "I believe nothing can prevent the absorption of these colonies within the Republic of the United States;" and he added "There is no step the Government could take so certain to hasten it as to object to your Motion and refuse the Commission of Inquiry which you propose." Now, Sir, I cannot say what he says, because I am not glad of it—I regret it, and regret it sincerely, because I think nothing could be more unfortunate for these colonies and this country than that we should do anything to hasten the accession of these colonies to the United States. Our duty is, so far as we can in legislating for them and in governing for them, to do it all freely, honourably, and generously to them, with their consent in every step; and to the last moment that these colonies shall be dependent on the British Crown, that every person within them shall feel that that Crown has not been a Crown of tyranny, but the Crown of just government to them. Now, Sir, I have submitted this case. I do not know that it is necessary to say anything more about it. I submit it as I see it, and as it commends itself to my view. It is a case not for opposition nor for obstinacy. It is a case which calls for statesmanship and for justice. Last year the House legislated in error and in the dark. To-night I hope, after the simple narrative I have given of these transactions, it can never be said that the House can act otherwise than in the broad light of day with respect to this question. I advised the right as he knows, not Bill. If he had difficulty would right hon. Gentleman placed too much was not trustworthiness I have no part serve. We ought that what is just should be done Scotia, and the made into the complaint is made. Gentleman refuses culties should capability must rest gentleman and with me. The hon. moving his Resolution.

Mr. Bright

Mr. Bright

Mr. BAXTER tion, expressed acceded to by believed that if signed and so presented by his disregarded by consequences much and disastrous to his hon. Friend House should affirm any measure of the delegates could understand Majesty's Government hesitation in doing. He believed that carefully looked been circulated we must admit that Scotia had made. But his hon. Friend to repeal the Union any opinion on at all that he asked regard to the union prevailed in Nova Scotia an inquiry into the faction, with a view could scarcely or would refuse so whatever view the Confederation of had, perhaps, seen Scotia; but he totally different point any communication either direct or taken the trouble this matter. He from a friend long a gentleman in having no connection with the party politics of the colony, a letter which fully confirmed the statements made by the delegates sent over by Nova Scotia. In that letter it was stated that the whole population of the Province was opposed to the union; that the Imperial Government had been entirely deceived as to the feeling of the Nova Scotians themselves; and that the people would resist the change. It should not be said that, in consequence of our legislation, we had driven a loyal and influential State to take a step of that sort. The letter went on to say that Nova Scotia had already experienced the disastrous effects of the union in the increase of the duties imposed upon most commodities. The Nova Scotians ridiculed, too, the idea of our giving an Imperial guarantee in connection with the construction of an inter-colonial railway, on the ground that they were perfectly able and willing to raise the money themselves. The colony was one which had been loyal and true, and the people complained that the Act had been passed without seeking their opinion upon it. The people of the colony deserved the utmost consideration at the hands of the Imperial Parliament, and he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Birmingham, that if the House took the strong step of refusing any inquiry into the case, the people of Nova Scotia might come to the conclusion that the present generation of Englishmen had forgotten the lesson of the American War of Independence. He had much pleasure in seconding the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House is informed, by a Petition presented on the 15th day of May last, signed by 36 out of 38 Members of the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia, and by 16 out of 19 Members elected by that Colony to the House of Commons at Ottawa, that great dissatisfaction prevails in Nova Scotia with the Act passed in the last Session of Parliament, intituled 'An Act for the Union of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick:' And that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to appoint a Commission or Commissioners to proceed to Nova Scotia for the purpose of examining into the causes of the alleged discontent, with a view to their consideration and removal."—(Mr. Bright.)

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the Motion of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) could not be regarded as raising in any way a party question, because both sides of the House were equally interested in this great Confederation of the North American Provinces obtaining a successful start, and were equally interested in the Act of last Session, which was passed almost unanimously. But, although the question raised was not a party question, it was one of the gravest importance, and one that ought not to be judged by outside appearances, but by the gravest and most thorough consideration of the intrinsic merits of the case. The question raised by the Motion before the House was whether the Province of Nova Scotia was so wrongly, and in the dark, drawn into this union by the Imperial Act of last Session that it became this House to ask the Queen to issue a Royal Commission of Inquiry on the spot, undertaking on the part of this country a most questionable interference with the local affairs of North America. The proposition was startling and obviously dangerous, and nothing but the strongest reasons should induce the House to assent to it. Great dissatisfaction undoubtedly had been recently shown in the Province of Nova Scotia with the union of the North American Provinces. That dissatisfaction cannot be disputed, and he had no doubt that the House would deeply regret with him that it should exist. He could only say that Her Majesty's Government regretted the existence of that dissatisfaction as strongly as any one. But this proposition for a Commission from this country to inquire into it was, notwithstanding, so unpromising a remedy that it became the House to consider the allegations on which it was based, and the nature of the recommendation which they were asked to agree to. He would endeavour, in the first place, briefly to show that those allegations were wholly erroneous, and without foundation; secondly, that if even the allegations which had been made were true, the recommendation of the hon. Member was about the most insane thing the House could agree to; and thirdly, that the alarm and discontent in Nova Scotia could be much better met, and were rapidly being met, by a totally different process. The allegations were that Nova Scotia had been entrapped into this union by surprise, and that this House was induced to sanction the Act by a fraud practised upon it. The truth of these allegations he entirely denied. Parliament, in passing the Act of Union, simply put Ministerially into the form of an Imperial statute, Resolutions which had been passed by the Provinces themselves. The subject of union had been agitated for no less than fourteen years in the Provinces, and in no instance had this country done more than accept the propositions made by the Provinces to it, and offered to do its part in carrying out their wishes. When propositions were first made the Duke of Newcastle was Colonial Secretary, and he received them very cautiously, saying—"If you really want this union, make it clear to us, and we will entertain your proposition." When a similar proposition was made to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cardwell) he received it with similar caution, saying—"Confer with your colonial Legislatures and let us know the conclusion at which they arrive upon the subject." In both instances the Colonial Secretaries of State, so far from initiating propositions of union received those made to them most cautiously. He did not mean to say that the Government might not have been perfectly justified if they had treated the subject less scrupulously. Far be it from him to say this country was not concerned and deeply interested in this Confederation. The British taxpayer who maintained 12,000 British troops for the defence of North America was certainly interested in consolidating the strength and developing the resources of his fellow-subjects. It was unnecessary to raise the question whether this country could not have instituted this Confederation even without the consent of the Provinces. But this country always felt that it was better that we should not initiate, still less urge, such a union, but that we should rather wait upon the inclination of the Provinces. His object was to show the House, by mere statement of facts, that this proposition came from the Provinces themselves, and that history, without any argument, would dissipate to the winds the allegation either that Nova Scotia was taken by surprise, or that this House had been in any way imposed upon. Lord Durham, in 1838, reported that deputies from Halifax urged the necessity of a general union of the Provinces as the most likely measure to preserve their connection with the British Crown. The proposal for union was first made by the Leaders of the two opposite parties in Nova Scotia in 1854, Mr. Howe being one of them; and a proposal to that effect was made to this country by the then Colonial Government. In 1857 the proposition was renewed at the instance of the other party, and delegates were sent to this country upon the subject. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) had mystified himself by the distinctions drawn by those who had placed in his hands the case for Nova Scotia between the various propositions made at different times for different kinds of union—Legislative union, Federal union, and union by actual representation in that House.

of some kind of Provinces had been in Nova Scotia for four years of common companies in that Province. The Resolution of the House of Commons in its favour had been passed in 1868 and should be a surprise. The of supporting the man, went really. The hon. Gentleman's federation was that election, a that was a point of fact of the subject party cry was a feeling against Had such a feeling undoubtedly won the cry, and would have the hustings. were then agreed therefore nobody that election. again brought it was passed by proving it. Then when the delegates from Canada came in could say in reply that Canada asked to be invited to send delegates and therefore it the other Provinces by her taking part. When the Conference at Quebec, in 1864 which were the Imperial Act which Before these Resolutions the Legislature election had taken which returned a union. But in the spring they charged as strongly in favour had at first been of opinion appeared to the hon. Gentleman's opinion, however of mature consideration the Legislature of the change may result in reflection. It was in favour of the unanimously agreed to the interested Provinces last Session was

Mr. Adderley

Parliament. He would not waste the time of the House further in endeavouring to show that the Nova Scotians were not taken by surprise by the Act of last Session; but the hon. Gentleman, departing from that ground which, he thought, he must have found a somewhat weak one on which to take his stand, appealed from the Legislatures of the Provinces to the people. It was true he admitted that the Legislatures were in favour of the union; but then he contended that the Nova Scotian Legislature did not faithfully represent the inhabitants at large. Now, what he had already said about the election of 1863 fully disposed, in his opinion, of the hon. Gentleman's argument on that point; for all parties at that election were so unanimous on the long-mooted question of Confederation that it was not even raised on the hustings; and the Assembly then returned passed immediate Resolutions in its favour. But he would deal with the hon. Gentleman's proposition of an appeal from representatives to the people on such a question on grounds of abstract principle. The hon. Gentleman had quoted the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government as having laid down the principle that an existing Legislature was not to deal with a great constitutional change without an appeal to the people. But had not the hon. Gentleman himself, he would ask, repudiated that principle in the debate on the Irish Church this very Session? [Mr. BRIGHT dissented.] He was glad the hon. Member thought the Irish Church could not be abolished by this Parliament. He would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, who he was certain had repudiated that principle in reference to the Irish Church; for he had quoted a speech of Mr. Pitt on the Union with Ireland, in which that statesman said that a principle so democratic as that representatives could not deal with constitutional changes without special reference to their constituents struck at the root of representative government. The Irish Union was a precedent against the hon. Member for Birmingham. The Scotch Union was another precedent against him. Commissioners in that case were appointed on both sides to draw up terms which were enacted without an appeal to the people. Again, in the case of the Canadian Union in 1842 an appeal to the people was proposed and rejected; but, perhaps, the best precedent was that which was furnished by Mr. Howe himself, who in 1863 passed a Nova Scotian Reform Bill, reducing the constituencies of Nova Scotia by one-third, without ever deeming it necessary that an appeal to the people should be made. On the contrary, the change occurred immediately after his election, and he repudiated the notion of appealing to the people even on the subject of their extensive disfranchisement. And he must remind the hon. Member for Birmingham that in making the appeal which he now so strongly advocates he was asking for an appeal from a larger to a smaller constituency—to a constituency which since 1863 had been diminished by one-third. And when the hon. Gentleman talked of the old Constitution of Nova Scotia, and said that if care were not taken the people of that Province would violently resume that Constitution, he would beg him to remember that the old Constitution of Nova Scotia was simply, after all, the gift of the Crown. The Lieutenant Governor was sent out from this country with a commission which authorized him to summon an Assembly. There was no charter for Nova Scotia and no foundation for a Constitution enjoying the advantages of that great Confederation in which they had now their share, which had a Government as free as our own, and a Parliament as powerful as the House of Commons to manage its own affairs. But then the hon. Gentleman laid stress upon the fact that in the recent elections in Nova Scotia since the union it had been triumphantly condemned. Now, he disputed the statement that the union was condemned in those elections, and he had taken the best means to inform himself as to what had been the real expression of feeling at those elections. Looking through a file of the Halifax Morning Chronicle, which was the organ of Mr. Howe, he found that the cry at the elections was not against the union generally, but that it had almost wholly reference to two things—the possible injury that might accrue to the interests of Nova Scotia from Confederation with the larger State of Canada, but still more was it directed against what was called the Tupper-Archibald party and their past misdeeds. It was certainly quite true that there was great alarm in Nova Scotia; but history furnished no instance in which a smaller State did not entertain some fear and jealousy in confederating with a larger State. No man, for example, possessing a genius inferior to that of Washington could, he believed, have overcome the mutual jealousies he had to contend with before he effected the first Confederation of the United States, and it was not surprising that similar jealousy should prevail in the smaller States of our North American Confederation. The hon. Gentleman would, however, find that the existence of a feeling at the recent elections in Nova Scotia against the union with Canada was by no means so conclusively established as he seemed to suppose; but that, upon the contrary, the people of that Province had for the most part made up their minds to give it a fair trial, the chief objects of abuse at the election being the Fishery Licence Act and that compulsory education tax for which Dr. Tupper enjoyed the credit and the blame. Mr. Howe, he saw by the Halifax Morning Chronicle, was in favour of giving a fair trial to the new Constitution, though he described the result of his electioneering as having been against it. Mr. Annand, who declared for its repeal, was ousted from his seat; and Mr. Stewart Campbell, the leader of the opposition to the union in the Assembly, stated that he would accept the Act now that it was passed, and help to carry it out in the interests of the colony. These quotations from Mr. Howe's paper tended very much in his opinion to upset the general view which the hon. Gentleman had taken of the elections. He might also observe that out of 48,000 electors only 23,000 had given their votes for what the hon. Gentleman would call the popular or anti-union party, so that though the elections went against the Government, not half the electors so voted. He thought he had now shown that the allegations which had been made by the hon. Gentleman were not well-founded, and he should in the next place proceed to contend that even if they were, his proposal for an Imperial Commission of Inquiry was about the worst which the House could adopt. We had no business to inquire into the local arrangements of the North American Provinces. By doing so we should be going back for some thirty years in colonial policy. In 1839, when Lord Durham was sent out, the object was to redeem the North American colonies from evils which our interference had caused, and to allow them to manage their own affairs. We had recognized self-government of the most ample kind in North America. If the hon. Member would place himself in the position of a member of the Confederation Parliament he would feel himself insulted by the proposal of a Commission to be sent out from this country to inquire into the policy of a representative Legislature of which he was a freely elected Member. Besides, let the House consider what the effect of such a course would be upon this country. If we were to send out a Commission of Inquiry arrangements of take upon ourselves their future good assuming the burden and perpetuating reasoning the cold then let the hon. House consider upon the influence new Government out a Commission of Inquiry and possibility. Just at this critical Government is in affairs amidst the partners, and the other aggravated conspirators operating by projects and a of these colonies who deprecate annexation is there—at such a moment a gentleman says it proceeding to set would paralyze the union, and end and complaint. in the midst of the new State government the ward with a pre no effect more at every trial from. And that the statesmanlike the effect upon the Confederation federation was a public works. Nova Scotia was merged in the federation, in common interest had been the hon. Gentleman's vision which would root of public credit to a state of unpardonable suspicion to all future, for the interests of ourselves, and for the and for the power and its financial being a statesman thought it was hang up the record Confederation upon mission of Inquiry. But, though that very last thing I would tell the House of modes of meeting

Mr. Adderley

vailed in Nova Scotia, which he believed was already rapidly subsiding. If, instead of sending out a Commission, they were to follow out the line which was indicated in a late despatch of the Secretary of State that this country would not place itself in the position of judge and dictator, but would use all friendly moral influences to assist the Provinces to settle mutual claims amongst each other, then they might hope to reap all the benefit and avoid all the mischief of interference. This had already been done to a very great extent. So far from Nova Scotia having no influence, it appeared to have dominant influence, and at this moment to rule the policy of the Dominion Parliament. Every Act that had yet been passed was in favour of Nova Scotia. The first Act perhaps must be excepted—which he admitted, however, was a necessary one—to sweep away all the internal tariffs which were mutually destructive, and to pass an average tariff externally to other nations, which had the effect of raising the Customs' dues of Nova Scotia from 10 to 15 per cent. The fears of Federation felt by Nova Scotia were undue taxation, and a force put upon their local government; that their interests would be oppressed by the larger interests of Canada; and that the protective policy of Canada would over-ride the free trade policy of Nova Scotia. But see what had been done. One of the first acts of the Dominion Parliament was to take off the duties on flour, grain, and meal of all kinds. It had also taken off the tonnage duties on light-houses and placed the whole burden, which chiefly rested on the maritime Provinces, on the central revenue—proceedings all in favour of Nova Scotia. All the materials used in ships—cordage, canvas, iron, &c.—had had their duties abolished, and the duties on sugar had also been diminished in order to draw the West Indian trade to the ports of Nova Scotia. Therefore, he repeated that so far from Nova Scotia having but slight influence, the Parliament of the Dominion seemed to have studied its interests in a primary degree; and so far from the free trade policy of Nova Scotia being over-ridden, Customs' duties had been reduced, and revenue raised instead from direct taxation. In fact, the union of Nova Scotia with Canada seemed to have had the singular good effect of relaxing the protective policy of the latter country, and not of over-riding the free trade policy of the former. The Militia was alluded to by the hon. Gentleman, who said that it was not to be called out this year because Nova Scotia was disaffected. It was not going to be called out because there had not been yet time enough to put the new enactments relating to that force into operation. By the new enactments Nova Scotia would be taxed much less on this as well as the other heads. The Militia force was to be smaller in amount, but much better drilled than heretofore; and the taxation of Nova Scotia for a more efficient force would be just one-tenth of the amount she formerly paid. It was astonishing in how short a time a beginning had been made in the settlement of all these beneficial reforms; and the House must look beyond the mere first jealousies and apprehensions of smaller States, and consider the ultimate destiny of the whole Confederation. Was it possible the hon. Gentleman could tell the House that he gravely considered it practicable for a small colony like Nova Scotia to remain permanently disunited from its neighbours? It was clear that one of three things must happen to Nova Scotia: either it must rest for ever—with what chance of success he would not now discuss—upon this country for its support and defence—and here he must remind the House that there were at the present moment 12,000 regular troops in the North American colonies supported out of the funds of the British taxpayer—or else they must, as the hon. Gentleman seemed to desire, annex themselves one by one to the United States; or the third and only remaining plan was what they were now doing, to consolidate their power by union among themselves. Would the hon. Gentleman like to see these colonies annexed to the United States? The hon. Gentleman said that anxiety to prevent annexation was not a wise motive. He knew the hon. Gentleman would argue, and with great justice, that it was unwise to try to prevent any people from doing that which their own feelings and interests dictated. We certainly had no interests separate from those of Nova Scotia; nor, if we had, would we sacrifice hers. But more than that, the hon. Gentleman had a feeling of preference for the United States, and he believed the hon. Gentleman had grand ideas of their destiny of extension under one Government from the Equator to the Pole. But whatever the hon. Gentleman might think desirable, the Provinces did not wish to lose our connection, and we did not wish to lose them; and he did not know why separation was to be forced upon this country and the Provinces against the wishes of both. He knew the hon. Gentleman had a great liking for the institutions of the United States; for when the Bill of Confederation was under discussion last year the hon. Gentleman ran through its provisions; and whatever clause was in accordance with the laws of the United States that in his view was good; whatever differed from them was bad. But there was no such feeling as this in the colonies. So far from that, when the delegates met in Quebec one of the first Resolutions they drew up was that, whatever else their Constitution might be, it should be framed upon the model of the Constitution of Great Britain.

"'Twas distance lent enchantment to the view" of the hon. Gentleman of the United States. These, then, were the alternatives. Was it not obvious that the destiny of these Provinces was union? Was it not obvious that Nova Scotia and its harbour of Halifax was the outlet to the sea for Canada? And was it not equally clear that a small Province could only find its security and the elements of nationality in joining its large and powerful kindred round it, to give the whole weight and importance? And when Canada increased, as it would increase, then the union of the whole would appear as necessary for the interests of the colony as its defence would be clearly an impossible undertaking for this country. He implored the House, therefore, not to take a step which would throw back our colonial policy for half a century, which would have the appearance of an insult to the Government that had been offered a great career of self-government, and which would tend to destroy its credit and its stability; but to follow the course that was indicated in the despatch of the Secretary of State, to exercise their influence in assuaging alarms, in soothing jealousies, and in friendly aid to those engaged in the endeavour to build up a strong, a vigorous, and a self-reliant State.

Mr. AYTOUN said, he hoped the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) would divide the House on his very moderate proposal. He believed the subject to be one of the greatest importance. The union of Nova Scotia with Canada had occasioned very wide-spread dissatisfaction; and he believed there were good grounds for this discontent. The evil consequences that had arisen were certainly greater than any prospective good that could be anticipated from it. The duties on the commerce of Nova Scotia had been increased and the control over their own revenue had been taken from them. These evils might be counterbalanced by some prospect of future good; but what could Nova Scotia expect from its union with Canada? All it could hope to derive was an increase of security from aggression on the land side.

Mr. Adderley

It was notorious that Nova Scotia being attacked had no efficient defence, even this being more than real. The question was whether the union was the way to give the colony a reasonable ground of defence. He thought it had been proved that Birmingham had the Earl of Carnarvon in the position that he properly consulted and had not expressed any objection, and when, on the 10th of May, Campbell proposed to delay for a month the consideration of Nova Scotia's petition, regard to it was held, the proposition was suggested that upon the subject it should be postponed to be presented at the next session. Even the right hon. Member for South Devon, speaking on the subject for the intercolonial conference, had been passed, it related to a subject in which we were all interested. The House to a great extent had decided the case; and he hoped that by granting a Commission to judge whether it was to reverse the decision. The Under Secretary of State talked of the experience of the colonies had passed seemed to be as before. We remained united with the United States, it was our duty to retain their good offices, this by consulting them just as we hoped the Motion of Birmingham was Government, and he should support it.

Mr. CARD said, he had much to do with the North American question. The House will have an opportunity of making a decision on this question. My hon. friend has drawn a picture of the subject, of the position which prevails in terms which are in this country in sure it is with the deepest regret that we hear complaints made in Nova Scotia of the measure which we passed unanimously last year, and of the mode in which that union was accomplished. But I cannot admit either that the consent of Nova Scotia was not given to the Confederation or that the measure was any surprise to them. The history of North American Confederation is at variance with such a statement. The original idea of such a Confederation was contained in the Report of Lord Durham; but that seed remained unfruitful in the ground; and when at last it began to germinate, it was not Canada which tried to obtain Confederation from Nova Scotia, but Nova Scotia which tried in vain to obtain Confederation from Canada. Passing from the early history of this question, with which at this late hour I will not weary the House, let us come to the precise period when this difficulty arose. In 1861, Mr. Howe, the author or principal exponent of the present dissatisfaction, was at the head of affairs in Nova Scotia, and Dr. Tupper was at the head of the Opposition. Resolutions, in favour of the union of some or all the colonies were moved in the Assembly of Nova Scotia by the First Minister, Mr. Howe; they were seconded by Dr. Tupper; they passed with general consent, and I believe with unanimity. In 1862, Mr. Howe, having advised Lord Mulgrave to apply to the Duke of Newcastle for permission, wrote on the part of the Government of Nova Scotia a Circular Letter to the other colonies, inviting them to enter into union. It was Canada which then rejected the application of Nova Scotia. In the following year there was a dissolution of the Nova Scotian Parliament, and the subject was before the people. My hon. Friend says it was not the subject of a hustings cry. Was it likely that it should have been? It was not because there is no party spirit in Nova Scotia. Like most small communities enjoying free institutions, Nova Scotia had plenty of party spirit and acrimony; and if this question did not form a hustings cry, what is the natural inference? Just what you might infer—namely, that there was at that time no difference of opinion on the subject. My hon. Friend said that in 1864, when I was Colonial Secretary, I was shy in taking any steps when I received communications respecting the union of the Provinces. Feeling strongly the benefits which will result from Confederation, I shall be very sorry if anybody can blame me for lukewarmness in this matter. But I accept the charge as showing that the mother-country, through me, made no undue attempt to force on Confederation, but that we rather acted Ministerially in forwarding and promoting what we believed to be the objects and wishes of the colonists. The project of union first became popular in the maritime provinces; and the moment it was discovered that Canada was willing to enter into the union, it was received with the greatest cordiality throughout the maritime Provinces. My hon. Friend has been a little misinformed when he says that, immediately after the dissolution, they were afraid to bring forward this measure in the Assembly of Nova Scotia. There was a good reason for not bringing forward the measure, without diving into motives not upon the surface. No sane man would have proposed to unite Nova Scotia with Canada when the intervening country, the colony of New Brunswick, was supposed to be entirely hostile to Confederation. At that time there was as much disinclination to Confederation in New Brunswick as there is said to be in Nova Scotia now. That being so, what course did we adopt? We waited quietly. Within a year there was an appeal to the people of New Brunswick. The result was a large majority in favour of Confederation, and the measure was carried. I draw from what has happened in New Brunswick the inference that, though in a small community a particular grievance may have a great effect for a time in leading it to oppose a measure of general interest and advantage, that measure upon more mature consideration will by-and-by be cordially approved. Such a grievance is now felt by Nova Scotia. Let us hope that when it is redressed, the same result will follow as in New Brunswick, and that in a short time we may find Nova Scotia as sensible of the advantages of Confederation as New Brunswick now is. My hon. Friend talks about the measure being a "surprise" to the people of Nova Scotia, and that there was no time for public discussion before the Resolution was arrived at. Now, it so happens that after it was known there that the measure was before the Imperial Parliament the Assembly a second time expressed an opinion favourable to Confederation. Here is an extract, and it is the only one with which I shall trouble the House, from the Address of the Assembly to the Governor, dated March 16, 1867—

"We have learnt with deep satisfaction that the efforts to effect a satisfactory union of the British North American colonies have been so successful, and we entertain no doubt that the best interests of all these Provinces will be greatly enhanced, and their connection with the Crown and the parent State permanently secured thereby."

"Surprise?" "No time for discussion?"

"No opportunity of appealing to the public?" Why, this Address was passed six months or more after the delegates had been sent to this country, and when the news had returned to Nova Scotia that we were actually engaged at that moment in giving effect to their wishes. What are we to do under such circumstances? Determine that the Legislature of a colony is not the true exponent of the feeling of a colony? What consequences will flow from such a doctrine? When we have conceded free institutions to a colony, are we to turn round upon the representatives elected by the people, and say, "You are not the true judges of public opinion in the colony. We shall constitute ourselves the judges?" That is a principle pregnant with evil consequences, and cuts at the root of the self-government which it is our boast that we have conferred upon our colonies. We are no doubt bound to do all we can to remove discontent, and I was glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman opposite that measures are already in progress that I trust will have the effect of turning the tide of opinion in Nova Scotia. There can be no doubt in what that discontent originated. When the colonies were separate their tariffs were different; there were different currencies and different circumstances of trade. The first effect of this Confederation was to alter this state of things, and it could not but be expected that the alteration would be attended with some dissatisfaction, some dislocation of existing interests, some violence to habits long cherished. In the present instance it is at once accounted for because the Canadian tariff, which was 15 per cent, seems to have been substituted for the Nova Scotian tariff, which was one of 10 per cent. That is a case, no doubt, that calls for consideration and redress, and I am glad to understand that measures are being taken which I hope are likely to conduce to that result. I should be glad to learn that the influence of the Colonial Office is to be applied so far as it legitimately can be with the view of attaining that result. My noble Friend the present Governor General of Canada has administered office in a way the highest end and therefore I am respectful to him the period of his life has been influenced by the opinions of the Government in Canada too, that he has towards a measure with so much of office is come the duty of the new Governor—associations, and to do with the. They will then selecting one who embarrassed me who will be in a situationately of the Scotia. For my to consent to an affairs of this government that intimated that in some future day serious and a responsibility in our taking a stance arose from kindly intentions ing of discount away as it has Brunswick. Th in any colony a than there is in of our colonies more business-like and when this government and this discount will, I believe, tion with satisfaction far anything I weight with the ham in dealing terests of those case to his hands the responsibility tion to the Ministering that our i be attended with think, be pursue high position in at the same time interests of the serve.

Mr. Cardwell

MR. GORST, Motion of the hon. member for Ham, said, that that the House legislated last year in the belief that all the States concerned were consenting parties to the Bill. He could not, however, agree in the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Birmingham—that the measure was proposed by the Earl of Carnarvon with the full knowledge that Nova Scotia had withheld her consent, nor could the House be aware that such was the fact. In matters of this nature the House must to a great extent rely upon the statements of the Government; for it would be impossible for the House, with its small experience of colonial affairs, to examine such allegations as those contained in the petition presented last year by the hon. Member for Birmingham. If the House, therefore, made a mistake last year it was an innocent and inoffensive one. But it was now evident from the flood of information which had since poured in, not only that the Nova Scotians were now unwilling, but that they had always been unwilling to consent to form a portion of this Confederation. The delegates from Nova Scotia had, indeed, misrepresented the feelings of the people on whose behalf they spoke, and the people of Nova Scotia did not hesitate to use strong language; for they did not hesitate to declare that Her Majesty was led to believe that they were favourable to the scheme by means of a “fraud” and an “imposition.” How could we turn a deaf ear to the statement that the constituted authorities of Nova Scotia were opposed to the union with Canada, and that a fraud and imposition had been practised upon the House? Acting on the principle adopted last year, the least the House could do was to pay attention to the representations now made, and to institute inquiry; for it was not asserted that there was any mistake in the strong representations which the delegates from Nova Scotia had come over to make. On any ordinary question Nova Scotia might be referred to the authorities of the Dominion; but not when she complained of being included within that Dominion. We had only a choice of evils; but was it not a greater evil to coerce an unwilling people into subjection to a detested Power than to shake somewhat the security and stability of the new dominion? If kind words could stop the mouths of the Nova Scotians, the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) might conciliate them; but it was useless to attempt such conciliation when denying a right. It was so clear that the Nova Scotians had a right to inquiry, that in the event of a division he would support the hon. Member for Birmingham.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE, having presented on a former occasion a petition from 31,000 inhabitants of Nova Scotia, wished to say, he believed their disinclination for Confederation was founded, not upon any apprehension of increased burdens or damage to material interests; but rather on a fear lest their connection with this country should be imperilled, for they were distinguished by a rational loyalty based upon identity of feeling and sympathy with ourselves. After the conflicting statements that had been made, it would be unreasonable to refuse the request for inquiry.

MR. KARSLAKE said, he thought the last letter of the Duke of Buckingham to the colony, dated the present month, showed that the Government intended to consult the interests of Nova Scotia in the future.

MR. BRIGHT: I shall make only one or two observations on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies. His principal objection to my proposition was that the issue of the proposed Commission would, in point of fact, be a direct insult to the whole of the Canadian Dominion. My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) at the same time said that the Colonial Office, through its new Governor General, and that the Crown through him, would exercise certain influences as far as they might upon the Government at Ottawa for the purpose of adjusting the differences of Nova Scotia. It appears to me that if my proposition would be held to be an insult, the continual and repeated interferences of the Colonial Office, and of the Crown, through the Governor General, would be liable to the same description. Now, the difference between the Treasury Bench and the right hon. Member for Oxford and myself is this—that they do not regard the present state of things in Nova Scotia as at all as serious as I regard it. Of course, if the thing will blow over, and you can, through the Governor General coming into the harbour at Halifax, and seeing leading men there, rub away everything that is unpleasant, then my Motion is in no degree necessary; but I believe that the state of things is far more serious than either the Under Secretary for the Colonies or my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford seems to suppose. My own impression is that the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary has made a speech about the most injudicious that could possibly have been made on the question for any Member of this House holding his office; and I believe that when his speech reaches America he will find that it will have a very injurious effect in Nova Scotia, and will not tend in the slightest degree to allay the gathering discontent which is felt in New Brunswick. The right hon. Gentleman, as he does upon other occasions, did me an injustice with regard to what I said last year. He said that when the North American Confederation Bill was under discussion, I approved everything in it which would make the Confederation like America, and condemned everything in it which would make the Confederation resemble England. Now, what I condemned in the Bill was the putting a Province into it whose population had not consented; and next I called in question the wisdom of nominating a Legislative Council, or Upper House, for the whole dominion of Canada. The first part of my objection to the Bill, I think, is justified by what has taken place. Although there is no complaint now with regard to the other part of my objection, I have every reason to believe that before we are many years older we shall find that that Council will not be satisfactory to the people of the dominion. Now, with regard to dividing on this question, I have this to say—If I were to divide with a very small minority, the impression on the other side of the Atlantic would be this—that the House of Commons has emphatically shut the door in the face of the petitioners whose petition I have presented, and whose case I have endeavoured to represent to the House. At the same time, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies holds out no hope whatsoever that the Government will even fairly consider the question. His speech is a speech of indignation positively at the Canadian people coming here to lay their case before this House. As this House passed the Bill last Session, and the Nova Scotian people came here to lay their complaints before the House, surely they have a right to be treated with great consideration. The course which the right hon. Gentleman has taken forces me to ask the House to divide upon the Motion. I do not at all conceal from myself that the House may not agree to my Motion; but possibly, if they do not, they may, in the course of another year, make an inquiry into this question, and I cover that it is vowed to deace my right hon Oxford made v tory; and but hon. Gentlemen should not have

Mr. Bright

Question put
The House
183: Majority

ECCLESIA
(Mr. Mac Eo)

[BILL 37]

Order for Se
MR. MAC I port of the Lo clesiastical Tit to the other Ho
ask the House reading of this vernment prom wise he shoul House. The
second reading
MR. G. MO Motion.

Motion mad
"That the B time."—(Mr.

MR. SCHR
on the Paper tl time that day that the bette Government to sion.

MR. VANC
vernment woul
to other priva
hon. Member f

MR. GATE believed that t had several tin
the second rec Members migh perusing the F the House of measure. He would be made tion of that R mons, and wh
hon. Members find an opportu
reading of his no object in discussion of the Bill; but, having regard to the state of Public Business, he could not promise a day for it.

THE O'DONOGHUE recommended his hon. Friend the Member for Meath to divide the House.

SIR JAMES M'KENNA thought the Bill had been postponed so frequently that a division should take place without any further delay. He did not see why the legislation of the House should be stopped in reference to the opinion of a Committee of the House of Lords.

COLONEL W. STUART moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Colonel William Stuart.)

The House divided:—Ayes 142; Noes 85: Majority 57.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)

BILL—[Bill 117.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Sir George Grey, Mr. Lawson.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he did not rise for the purpose of offering further opposition to the Bill, but wished to clear himself from a statement which he was reported to have made upon the Motion with regard to a Royal residence, by the hon. Baronet the Member for Clare. ["Order, order!"]

COLONEL STUART KNOX protested, in the name of all the independent Members of every class and creed in Ireland, against the third reading of this Bill; but, as it was going to its last resting-place, he should not give the House the trouble of dividing upon it.

Bill read the third time and passed.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Lord Advocate, Bill to amend the Laws for the Election of the Magistrates and Councils of Royal and Parliamentary Burghs in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate and Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

VOL. CXCH. [THIRD SERIES.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, June 17, 1868.

MINUTES.]—Public Bills—Ordered—Railway Companies (Ireland) Advances*; Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) Amendment*; Bank of Bombay.*

First Reading—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) Amendment* [176]; Railway Companies (Ireland) Advances* [177]; Bank of Bombay* [178].

Second Reading—Municipal Corporations (Metropolis), [105] debate adjourned; Probate of Wills, &c. (Ireland)* [129].

Committee—Municipal Rate (Edinburgh)* [99].

Report—Municipal Rate (Edinburgh)* [90].

Third Reading—Inclosure (No. 2)* [162]; Alkali Act (1863) Perpetuation* [158]; Judgments Extension* [163], and passed.

Withdrawn—Turnpike Trusts [9]; Railways (Guards and Passengers Communication)* [66].

CANADA—ALLEGED FLOGGING IN A PRISON.—QUESTION.

MR. REARDEN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it be true, as reported in some American and English Papers that the Rev. Mr. M'Mahon, now confined in a Canadian Prison, has been flogged for the offence of receiving a few copies of a newspaper that had been forwarded to him?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that since he had seen the question on the Notice Paper, upon which it had appeared that day for the first time, he had caused all the American Papers in the Colonial Office to be searched, and the only allusion to anything approaching the report referred to by the hon. Member was in the Toronto Weekly Leader, in which he found it stated that one of the prisoners in the provincial Penitentiary had been discovered with a copy of the Irish American, a Fenian newspaper, and had been punished for refusing to divulge the source from which it had come. That was the only foundation for the report. The Rev. Mr. M'Mahon was a Fenian priest who had been let off being hanged, and was confined in one of the Canadian prisons, and he (Mr. Adderley) could find no foundation whatever for such a report as that to which the hon. Gentleman had alluded. As the hon. Gentleman, however, had given some currency to the report by putting his Question on the Notice Paper, it was only right that he should take some means of verifying the statement, if that could be done, because it was not proper that the Notice Paper of that House should be made the vehicle of circulation for reports of that description.

MR REARDEN said, that his only object in putting the question was to obtain a contradiction, because such a report if uncontradicted would have a most pernicious effect. He was very glad, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman had so emphatically denied the truth of the report.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS BILL.—[Bill 9.]
(Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, Mr. George Clive, Mr. Goldney, Mr. Ayrton.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said: * Sir, in introducing a Bill upon this subject last year, I stated, as fully and clearly as I could, the history of the turnpike question. I have now to carry it a little further. My Bill was referred to a Select Committee, which sat through the months of May and June, and, having amended the Bill and made a special Report, sent the Bill so amended back to this House at a period too late to allow of its being passed unless it had been adopted by the Government. Now the House, by passing the second reading of the Bill without opposition, having sanctioned its main principle—namely, that tolls should be abolished, the Select Committee had to decide upon the best means of accomplishing that object, or, rather, whether it could be well and fairly accomplished by the proposals of the Bill—the Committee—composed of nineteen Members, of whom ten sat on the Government side of the House—adopted, either unanimously or by large majorities, the proposals of the Bill with reference to the following points. First, the termination of all trusts out of debt; secondly, the inquiry into the debts of trusts still in debt; and thirdly, the manner in which the repairs of the roads should be borne after the termination of the trusts. The point upon which the proposal in the Bill was not assented to by the Committee was the manner in which existing debts should be dealt with after their value had been ascertained. The Bill proposed that the Home Secretary, at that stage of the affair, should, by an Order under his hand, apportion the debt and the annual payments in liquidation thereof between the different parishes and highway districts; that, if necessary, tolls should, by his Order, be collected, in each case for a fixed and limited period the local authorities applied to them the first instance the road repairs extend the period the term of ten years 1868, vast majority expired. After appeared to me the solution of the Committee, by an Amendment Secretary to the for North Han

Mr. Adderley

" That the Sec amount of such county rate of turnpike road is

And another same hon. Men

" That borough which do not not but through which be made to cost of the Secretary

I was unwilling for the Bill for that districts turnpike trust debt mical manager the trusts have their county pay the debts been managed debt, appeared just; and the rate, for this which were objectionable popular proposal some trifling former proposal present Bill, shall be prepared it will be well House the difficulty of this I may have the Report of last which says—

" That in any of Turnpike Trusts and amend the Bill uniform system the country, and roads should be districts, and not rately."

Sir, I agree w

port. But I maintain that, in all these cases, it is wise to proceed gradually; and that whilst my Bill will in no way prevent the future alteration of the Highway Act, it actually paves the way for that uniform system of road management which is thus strongly recommended. I do for the first time—and this the Select Committee agreed to—place the repairs of these roads upon the common or district fund of highway districts where such exist, instead of upon the individual parishes in which the road happens to be situate. And where counties have not adopted the Highway Act, I leave the law precisely as it stands, so that the liability of no individual parish will be increased by the measure, if the parish have within it a length of turnpike road; but, on the contrary, that liability will be lightened if the parish be now part of a highway district, or if the county in which it is situate shall hereafter adopt the Highway Act, when the charge will fall upon the district instead of the parish. Of course a new liability—though, as I shall be able to show, more apparent than real—will attach to those parishes which do not happen to have within them any portion of the turnpike road; but the more true it is that these roads are main thoroughfares, the more evident is it that this is a liability which ought not to rest alone upon the few parishes in which the road actually lies, and which neighbouring parishes, which equally use the road unfairly escape when a trust terminates under the present Law. But, Sir, with the leave of the House I wish now to examine into the grounds upon which this measure is opposed—A large number of petitions have been presented against it. Chambers of Agriculture have generally viewed it with disfavour, and I, whose interests are entirely bound up with those of the land, am represented as wishing to increase the burdens upon land, and to add to local taxation. Now, Sir, the position I take is this—The present turnpike system is unfair, unequal, and expensive. It has been condemned by three Parliamentary Committees, and must sooner or later be the subject of legislation. But that legislation will be more and more difficult, and the matter will become more and more complicated if we go on annually allowing some trusts to terminate, and others to obtain from Parliament a renewed lease of life for different periods of time. Therefore, partly for this reason and partly because there are such different theories upon this subject, I urge upon the House that, whether the particular plan of this Bill be adopted or not, it is high time that Parliament should lay down some clear and definite principles upon which it is prepared to legislate. The opposition to this Bill is mainly based upon three grounds—1. The fear that rates will be increased. 2. The argument that the debt ought to be paid off, partly or wholly, from the general taxation of the country. 3. The statement that the system is working itself out well, and requires no legislative interference. I must say a word upon each of these heads. Upon the first I can only repeat that, wherever the expenses are thrown over the wider area of the highway district, the rates will be lightened to many parishes and the burden will be more fairly distributed among all. Still more will rates be lightened as the enormous outlay upon collection and management gradually disappears. I need hardly remind the House that this outlay is variously estimated at from 30 to 50 per cent. upon the turnpike revenue, and even if the lowest figure be adopted there must be something radically wrong in such a system. If it is disputed that a very large amount of turnpike revenue is expended upon collection and management, I may appeal to the evidence taken before the Select Committee of 1864, especially that given by Mr. Newmarch, Mr. Talbot, Mr. Clive, Mr. Higgins, and Mr. Lees. This will bear out my statement that the estimate of this expenditure is from 30 to 50 per cent upon the revenue. But I will not be satisfied with this appeal, I will support my statement by further evidence. The seventeenth Annual Report, presented this year to Parliament under the Act of the 3 & 4 Will. IV, c. 80, states at page 4 that the amount expended upon salaries and law charges during the year 1866 amounted to something over 10½ per cent upon the turnpike revenue. But to this must be added the salaries of toll collectors, the lighting and repairing toll houses, the hire of rooms for meetings of trustees, and several incidental expenses peculiar to the present system. The annual expense of a toll gate alone has generally been reckoned at from £25 to £30 per gate, and if I take all these expenses at 20 per cent. on the revenue—saying nothing of the profit of the toll lessee wherever the tolls are let—I have here more than my 30 per cent, and I think I have shown the House that it will be quite safe to base calculations upon this amount as the saving which will actually be made under the head of collection and management—of course the benefit to the ratepayers somewhat depends upon the question of how far ratepayers and tollpayers are identical. I can only say that the evidence taken before the three Select Committees—to which I have already alluded—and the opinions of those Committees, go to prove this—that, since the introduction of railways, the through traffic—that is, the traffic created by others than the ratepayers of the district has enormously diminished—that in the great majority of instances the ratepayers are the tollpayers, and therefore that the burden which is now borne in the shape of tolls will, if this Bill pass, be borne hereafter in the shape of rates to a great extent by the same persons who bear it now. But it will be borne reduced, modified, and regulated by the provisions of this Bill, and instead of having a debt hanging over their heads, which as to its amount and duration is painfully uncertain, the ratepayers will have before them a reduced but a certain and specified debt, with the sure prospect of its early liquidation. Moreover, the expenditure will be under the control of the ratepayers themselves, instead of in the hands of an irresponsible body of trustees, so that representation and taxation will go together. And be it remembered that the majority of trusts are at this moment only kept alive by the Annual Continuance Act. By refusing to insert them therein the Home Secretary may at any time force them either to expire or to come to Parliament at great expense to obtain a new Act, the granting of which must be uncertain; so that the state of things under which parishes fear an increase of their rates does actually exist now, and may very largely prevail at any moment. To show that this is no fanciful statement of my own, I will refer the House to the case of two trusts in the county of Gloucestershire, which expired last year—the Bristol and the “Bibury and Dancy’s Fancy” Trusts. These trusts might, if they had pleased, have come to Parliament for a new Act. They did not do so, and when they terminated upwards of 170 miles of turnpike road fell upon the rates of individual parishes. Can anything be harder? The clergyman of one of those parishes writes to me thus—

“My only excuse for intruding upon you is that I am a clergyman who find myself unexpectedly taxed to the amount of near £60 a year, for the repair of the old formerly cost me very next parish I (the Sodbury Tru

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

Let all turnpikes be repaired by a trust benefited by

And this, Sir, letter which I I stated that 21 to expire within is, an average of the accuracy of challenged, I w rity. I wrote certain the num Acts, or extens
during the last number of trusts
nated, and have the same period from Mr. Harri
this branch in rate man, and,
present system.
last eleven year new Acts or tained, and with have terminated

“I cannot give considerable labour years 1861—67 in ber is 230.”

I think this sh ention of the s of existing Tru
the next twelve to legislate no ciple, rather th drift on in its satisfactory sta the argument wholly or partly taxation of th time that this fairly in the fa are otherwise provisions of still maintain debt, it should a national charg to my right hon
tary to state h
clearly, unequi
Now, let us ex
ture and amoun of nominal deb was £3,536,000 reduced by £17 December, 186
bably now abou

late that, under the provisions of this Bill, less than £2,000,000 would discharge the full amount of actual debt. I beg special attention to this fact—that the balances in the hands of the treasurers on the 31st of December, 1866, amounted to nearly £300,000, and there is, moreover, a large amount to be realized by the sale of materials and sites of toll houses and other trust property. In 1866 there were—trusts out of debt, 191; trusts in debt, 791: total, 982. Of the 791 trusts in debt, 441—representing of the remaining debt £1,900,532—paid off a portion of their debt in 1866. Of these 258 paid off at par, though some very small sums; 183 paid at various rates below par; 93 of these trusts pay no interest on their debt, or an interest not exceeding 2 per cent. 350 trusts—representing of the debt £1,461,253—paid off no debt at all. Of the whole amount of debt one-third or above £1,000,000, pays an interest not exceeding $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, of which amount £612,000 bears interest from 1*d.* per cent up to 2 per cent, and £280,000 bears no interest, or only a nominal interest. Many of the trusts which pay a high interest are just those which pay off none of the principal of their debt, and which, if the present law continues, will come to be sharply dealt with by the Home Secretary—much of their debt extinguished, and the interest lowered—if, indeed, they are allowed to exist at all. Of 150 trusts which expended money in improvements in 1866, 110 were in debt, of which 43 paid off no debt that year. These are some of the facts which induce me to believe that £2,000,000 will more than suffice to discharge the actual debt. If further proof be wanted as to the state of the debt, let me refer to the annual Report from the Home Office last year, which states at page 8—

“There are, however, many trusts whose condition is very unsatisfactory, and to remedy which the powers vested in the Secretary of State appear to be inadequate. Thus, in the accounts for 1865, it may be observed that on 445 trusts no portion of the mortgage debt was paid off; but an examination of past years shows that on 291 trusts no debt has been paid for three years; on 225 trusts none has been paid for six years; on 191 trusts none has been paid for ten years; and on 141 trusts none has been paid for fifteen years.”

Now, Sir, the payment and the management of this debt is most unequal and irregular. Sometimes money in hand, available to pay off debt, is so applied without due notice being given to the bondholders, in order that they may tender the lowest amount which they are willing to take, and so the most may be made of the money so to be applied. Constantly money is expended in improvements, or—as I have already shown the House—carried over as balances in the treasurers' hands, which ought to have been employed in discharge of debt. In many cases the whole income of a trust is absorbed in the expenses of collection and management and payments in respect of debt; while the whole burden of the maintenance of the road even now falls upon the parishes, so that the ratepayers have first to pay rates to repair the roads, and have afterwards the pleasure of paying tolls before they can enjoy the privilege of using the roads so repaired. To show that I do not exaggerate, let me again quote from last year's Home Office Report, page 2—

“The amount of parish aid received in 1865 was £31,728; but this does not represent all the aid that is obtained from the parishes, many turnpike roads being repaired by the parishes in lieu of contributing funds out of the highway rates under the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59. The number of trusts where the roads appear to be entirely repaired by the parishes is 120; while on 174 others aid in money or labour is received, making a total of 294 trusts where the roads are wholly or partially kept in repair at the expense of the parishes, the funds on most of these trusts being principally applied to the payment of the debt and interest.”

This will show with tolerable accuracy, the anomalous state of the question so far as the debt is concerned, and the hardship inflicted upon the different parishes under the present law. But, Sir, there is still to be encountered the favourite theory that part at least of this debt should be defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund. Let us consider the question fairly. Comparatively few of these roads can be said to have been made for purposes so essentially national in their character as to justify the discharge from national taxation of the debt incurred in their construction. In most cases localities have received the principal benefit, and localities must bear the burden. If not, it will be somewhat unfair upon those many localities in which, by care and economy, the debts have been paid off from local resources, that a premium should thus be paid upon less careful management; and it will be hard upon bondholders who have been paid off at a low percentage, that others should be better treated on account of the national purse being called in to aid. And I venture to say that the case of the bondholders is not one which will become stronger by close investigation. Many of these are persons who have been greatly benefited by these roads, and whose money was advanced in the first instance principally on account of that anticipated benefit. In all cases this money has been lent upon a terminable security, with a full knowledge on the part of the lender that such security was terminable. The only strong point in the bondholders' case is this, that Parliament has several times renewed this security in many cases. True, but in each case a term has again been named; and for upwards of thirty years there has been on record the deliberate and unanimous opinion of a Select Committee of the House against the continuance of the toll system, and a fair warning has been given of the probable spirit in which Parliament would deal with the question. There is a curious fact bearing upon the understanding with which these sums of money were originally lent, which was lately brought to my notice in a letter from a Devonshire gentleman, an extract from which I will read with the leave of the House—

"That all parties know that the loan was in the nature of a speculation, and that it was just possible they might never get repaid, and that the security on which the money had been advanced, was the tolls to be collected for a certain and specified term of years and no longer is clear and obvious from the fact that when, in the year 1755, the Legislature passed a Statute reducing the tolls to be taken under the local Turnpike Acts for carriages having wheels of a certain description, it made a compensation to deed-poll holders who had lent their money on the faith of the tolls granted by such local Turnpike Acts in these remarkable words, 'And to avoid the least suspicion that lessening the tolls and duties as aforesaid may be in any way prejudicial to creditors who have lent, or shall lend, their money upon the security of the tolls, be it enacted that all and every Act or Acts of Parliament made in this Session of Parliament, or heretofore made for repairing or amending turnpike roads shall be continued and be in full force for five years, to be computed from the several ends and expirations of all and every such Act and Acts respectively.' What proof can be desired more clear and conclusive than this, that the creditors who advanced their money for making or repairing the roads had done so on the credit alone of the tolls to be received during the term of years granted by the Act creating the trust, whether twenty-one or thirty-one years? If that be so, what right or equity can the creditors have a century afterwards to allege that they have a permanent claim on the tolls? What pretence have they for doing so? Clearly none—they lent their money on a contract, and by the terms of that contract they must stand or fall."

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

Sir, I have read with much interest the statement of the bondholders presented in Parliament. Their interest has been tenderly treated in Parliament, and has been at the expense of the Government. Now that we are principally electing the bondholders to favour a proposition in a mode which would liquidate their claims in a moderate statement that it may be left as a system sure it necessitates in the same disaffection of officer it is to keep them as they become and the offices working badly, trusts die out, leave toll-supporters adjacent roads constantly thrown and tear upon the same time reduced which still exists of the neighbourhood complicates the system. It is working better confusion when the want of any action of trustee of the Bristol Turnpike House a letter upon the subject from me says—

"Upon winding up the graceful scramble of the commissioners out of the Board, who censured the clerk, the professional firm in Bristol and his surveyor and his the employ of the got similar appointment wound up; the toll labourers who had at weekly wages, were no funds in and the highway materials placed on coming winter."

But, Sir, it is visions of this roads," the "holder" will see how do such people when they happen country and pay case they are, directly or indirectly, rate-payers. Then it is said, "Tolls are approximately apportioned to the use of roads." This is so far true, that no one pays the toll who does not use the roads; but it is equally true that vast numbers use the road who never pay tolls. I myself afford a good instance. My house happens to be close to a turnpike road. I have a turnpike gate seven miles from me on one side and four miles on the other. But my property being mostly situate between the two, I constantly use this eleven miles of intervening road without contributing one farthing to its maintenance. Who pay the bulk of the tolls? The farmers of the neighbourhood, great and small, who go—and send their stock—to the towns at either end of the road. We should, in proportion to our use of the road, contribute much more fairly by means of a district rate. And at the same time, whilst in driving along this road, either to Ashford or Hythe, I am met by a turnpike gate, I can drive ten miles to Romney or fifteen miles to Canterbury over a good road, supported by highway rates and under a highway surveyor. The turnpike road surveyor and the highway surveyor have to travel over each other's roads to survey their own roads; and this case affords a good example of the double expense incurred under the present system. But it is said—"the people in the towns will escape." Well, Sir, I do not want, and I do not believe that the people in the towns wish, that they should escape any burden which it is right they should bear. It must be borne in mind, however, that the people in the towns pave, watch, and light their own streets at a great expense without asking the country to contribute. And if you tax your butcher, your grocer, and your baker by means of tolls, depend upon it that the tax ultimately falls upon the consumer of the commodities which they carry out into the country. In my humble opinion, anything which tends to create an impediment to the free circulation of traffic between town and country is an unmixed evil; and this, no doubt, is one reason why this turnpike system has been condemned by our Select Committees. There is one alteration in the Bill to which I desire to direct notice. By the 11th clause power is given to the Home Secretary to inquire into the special circumstances of any trust if he shall think fit, with a view to propose a special scheme for the maintenance of its roads, subject to the approbation of Parliament. The object of the clause is this—some of these roads, though I think comparatively few, are either really main arteries, or are subject to an exceptional amount of through traffic, or of heavy traffic from non-ratepayers. It may be that a general measure, applicable to the majority of trusts, would fall heavily upon these cases, and that their condition may justify either the maintenance of toll gates, or the adoption of an area of taxation greater than that contemplated in the Bill. But instead of bringing these cases forward, as is frequently done, by way of argument against a general measure of toll abolition, I would apply general principles to the great bulk of the trusts to which they are applicable, and would give power to deal specially with the class of cases to which I have alluded. I have no doubt, Sir, that my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire will presently urge with great eloquence his objections to this Bill. I hope, however, that he will not lay too much stress upon the alleged failure of the Highway Act in Worcestershire, and the complaints against it which emanate from that county. Should he do so, he must bear in mind that, as it can be shown that, in some other counties, this Act works well and has given satisfaction, it is possible that the House may think that in the case of Worcestershire the fault lies not in the Act, but with those whose duty it is to see it carried out properly. And I beg to point out the great disadvantage under which that Act has been worked in consequence of its having been introduced—mistakenly as I think—as a permissive Act. When there has been a great opposition to an Act of this kind, when its opponents have been defeated, and when they know that it is still possible to rescind the action taken, and to get rid of the Act without coming to Parliament, they are very often not particularly desirous that a scheme should work well which they have prophesied would be a failure; and in the county of Worcester, where the Act was much opposed, and where opposition to it has assumed such a form that the question has been made a prominent one in a contested county election, I think it will be readily seen that the Act is hardly likely to have been worked with any great hope of entire success. But, whether from dislike of the Highway Act, or from love of turnpikes, the Member for Worcestershire is about to oppose this Bill. I have told the House that many petitions have been presented, and speeches made against it. But both have been evidently founded upon a great misconception as to the scope, intentions, and effects of the measure. And I should attach more weight to the petitions, if they had not been mainly the offspring of an organization which could with equal facility have produced petitions upon the other side of the question. I observed that at a recent meeting of the Warwickshire Chamber of Agriculture the Members congratulated themselves upon the fact that they had obtained 199 petitions from parishes against this Bill in answer to their circular. Well, I know pretty well what that circular was. Probably something akin to the statement issued by the Worcestershire Chamber, which embodied with singular infelicity all the old fallacies of the advocates of the toll system. This paper was extensively circulated, and created a considerable prejudice against the Bill. I found some prejudice existing in my own county, but an opportunity occurred of explaining the Bill to the East Kent Chamber of Agriculture. This is as independent and intelligent a body of agriculturists as can be found in England, and, after hearing my explanations, they adopted a petition in favour of the general principles of the Bill, adding, however, I am bound to say, that, in their opinion, the Consolidated Fund should aid in the liquidation of the debt. Sir, as the chief agitation against turnpike reform has appeared in Worcestershire and Warwickshire, and as Gloucestershire has also been discussed in the public journals, I have carefully analyzed the condition of these three counties with regard to their trusts. I am very unwilling to trouble the House with many figures, but this is a subject so interesting to the agricultural community, and bearing so strongly upon that subject of local taxation which will have to be dealt with by the new Parliament, that I must ask some further indulgence upon the subject. I take these three counties, presuming that, as in two of them at least the turnpike system seems to be so much approved, they must be favourable examples of its working, and therefore the House will see that I have not picked out the worst examples, as I might have done, to strengthen my case, but taken these three, which may be supposed to be model counties. And which appeared from Mr. Wh Worcestershire was written in Sir George Je several statements replied by antic the effect whic Bill would have

" Having the bl permission, I will Hugesen's Bill w passes. There w roads in the count the sum of £69,5 toils, and £34,244 that if tolls be ab be increased near for those expenses system; and even for the mortgage mited value of w will have to be a parishes, and liqu Secretary of State years for that pur prospect for the r

Nothing is so e such as this, an to mislead the me show the w really apply sum actually under the turn—that is, £14 and interest, a expenses. Accer I think I ha that 30 per ce upon collection saving in Glou have been £13, but £32,117 w but for these ex let me add, the abolished expen whole amount, by this Bill is ne comes this pra does not this 30 sent a larger pe the ratepayers tion of the toll-ratepayers? A evidence answer firmative. And the ratepayers would the addi quired for a lim mited debt, u than the sum ne

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

payers in tolls for debt and interest added to the 30 per cent wasted on collection and management? These questions appear to answer themselves; but if I am wrong, and if the percentage collected from non-ratepayers is greater than the sum to be saved, then, under this Bill, the ratepayers will still be able to receive this extraneous assistance under the order of the Secretary of State, so long as their debt lasts, and, in either case, they will have that which does not now exist, namely, a positive certainty that the debt will gradually and speedily disappear. Moreover, the sum stated by Mr. Whitaker to have been raised by tolls was not all so raised. I find that above £2,000 in 1865, and above £1,700 in 1866 was raised in Gloucestershire under the several heads of "Parish composition in lieu of statute duty," "Estimated value of statute labour," and "Incidental receipts." The latter head includes money received from the sale of trust property when trusts have terminated, and the former relates to money now received from parish rates where tolls are insufficient for the maintenance of the roads. It is, therefore, a great fallacy to talk, as does Mr. Whitaker, of the increase of highway rates nearly 100 per cent; and from any apparent increase must be deducted the large amount now paid by ratepayers in tolls. The value of the debt is not easily to be learned from the annual abstract presented to this House. Some trusts, as I have shown, pay off a portion of their debt at par, and then pay off no debt for two or three years. Some pay a high interest, but never pay off any of their principal, and of course something of the value depends upon the length of time which the security has to run. The few figures, however, with which I am about to trouble the House will show the condition of the trust system in the three counties to which I am alluding, and they may be taken as a sample of the rest. Mr. Frewen's Return in 1848 shows the turnpike roads in Gloucestershire to comprise about 950 miles. In 1865 there were 42 trusts in that county. Of these, 2 were amalgamated with other trusts in 1866 and 2 expired in 1867. Of the remaining 38, 20 are continued by the annual Continuance Act, and would therefore immediately come under the operation of this Bill; 13 will expire within the next ten years; 4 within six years afterwards; 1 in 1890: total 38. In 1865, No. of trusts in debt, 35; paid off at par, 4; paid off below par, 16; paid off no debt, 15: average per centage of those who paid off below par, 55 per cent. In 1866, No. of trusts in debt, 33; paid off at par, 8; paid off below par, 17; paid off no debt, 8: average percentage of those who paid off below par, 64 per cent. The trusts which paid off at par represented a remaining debt, in 1865, of £11,500, in 1866, £30,715; the trusts which paid off below par represented a remaining debt, in 1865, of £95,000, in 1866, £90,170; the trusts which paid off no debt represented a remaining debt, in 1865, of £68,700, in 1866, £45,165: total debt, in 1865, £175,200; in 1866, £166,050. And, in 1866, the trusts bearing interest above 3 per cent represented £50,124; trusts bearing interest at 3 per cent, £28,541; trusts bearing interest below 3 per cent, 87,385: total £166,050, and of the latter amount upwards of £34,000 bears no interest at all. Balance in treasurers' hands, December 31st, 1865, £10,045; December 31st, 1866, £12,463. In 1866 there were in Warwickshire 480 miles of turnpike road and 32 trusts: of these 26 are continued by the annual Act, 5 will expire within 6 years from the present time, and 1 in 1880. Of these trusts, 27 were in debt in 1866; only 9, representing a debt of £11,948 paid off any debt in 1866. It was all paid at par; but only 3 of these had paid at par, and 2 below par in 1865; and of these 2 had paid no debt in 1864, and 1 no debt in 1864 or in 1863. The 18 trusts which paid no debt represented a debt of £28,032, showing the total debt, £39,980. I may say that Warwickshire does not seem to improve, so far as paying debts is concerned, for I find that 13 trusts paid off some debt in 1863, 9 in 1864, 7 in 1865, and, again, 9 in 1866. The balance in the treasurers' hands was £4,445 in 1865, and £5,391 in 1866. In 1866 there were in Worcestershire 522 miles of turnpike road, 30 trusts: 22 of these are continued by the annual Act, 7 will expire within 8 years from the present time, and the remaining one in 1880. Of these trusts 21 were in debt in 1866—6 trusts paid off some debt at par, leaving a debt remaining of £9,388; 4 trusts paid off some debt at an average of 75 per cent, leaving £8,572; 11 trusts paid off no debt, leaving a debt of £10,863: total debt £28,823. Of the Worcestershire trusts 14 paid off some debt in 1863, 10 in 1864, 11 in 1865, and 10 in 1866; several of the latter being trusts which had paid no debt in the three previous years, or only in one year out of the three. The balance in the treasurers' hands was £8,982 in 1865, and £8,104 in 1866. A glance at these figures will show how unequally the present system works, and how well the provisions of this Bill would apply. And, as to the debt, the balances in the hands of the treasurers, and the trust property, would, in the cases of Warwickshire and Worcestershire, represent more than half the amount required to discharge the commuted debt. The value of the site and materials of toll houses has been reckoned at £70 per house; but I think this is a low estimate, and if taken at from £70 to £100 per house it will be seen that there is considerable property which might be at once made applicable to the reduction of the commuted debt. Now, Sir, I am sorry to trouble the House so long, but before I conclude I wish to refer to two cases within the three counties to which I have referred, as exemplifying some of the inequalities of the present system. I take the last trust in the Gloucestershire list—the Winchcombe Trust. This trust would have expired in 1865. Its average income for the three previous years was £1,522 per annum, during which time no debt was paid off. This trust obtained a new Act in 1865, extending its term for seven years. The law charges in that year were £337, or 22 per cent upon the average income. By the new Act the tolls were to be applied—1st. To the payment of the expenses of the Act. 2nd. To salaries, which, exclusive of salaries of toll collectors, were not to exceed £100. 3rd. To the interest of the debt at 2 per cent. 4th. To the repairs of the road, but this sum not to exceed £300. 5th. To paying off the debt. The length of the road is about twenty-two miles. Exclusive of salaries and debt the average expenditure for three years previous to the Act was £950. The sum apportioned to repairs under the Act being £300, the House will be able to judge for itself as to the position of the bondholders, and also as to what amount of extra rates is likely to be demanded of the parishes during the continuance of the Act. And now for the second instance. In 1864 there was a notable marriage in Worcestershire. The Dudley and Wolverhampton Trust, whose Act expired in 1860, and the Dudley, Halesowen, and Bromsgrove Trust, whose Act will expire in 1875, were New Inn Trust 1863. The debt, with a joint per annum, and to expire; which of £427, had the House may have expected would have been. But in 1865 a sum of £1,950 was paid off, and a further sum of £427 was spent in improvements! In 1865, the House may have expected that the plan proposed to day or the best plan could be devised that we cannot existing state of several plans, more or less followed without great principles abolition of toll area of taxation making the case which these are provided for; then lieve is adopted the rate between there is the position—there is the position—that a Commission—to value the distinction, and then divided and divided area of taxation the principles I am not oppose any of these proposals they should apply that which I propose the time is coming upon definite scheme should the responsibility right hon. Mr. Fr proposes to propose now arrived at Government has He proposes, as the Schedule large number compel them either to die quietly, or to come next year to Parliament—not under the old expensive process—to obtain a new Act, but to have their case heard before a Select Committee of this House. Of course the practical effect of this will be to postpone any legislation upon general principles until 1870. I regret this delay, and if I do not oppose the Continuance Bill now, I hold myself at perfect liberty with respect to future action. In any case, I hope that the position to which the question has now been brought will lead to early legislation; and I shall be very glad if the statement which I have made to-day, and the labour which I have bestowed on the subject, may in any degree assist those who will hereafter have to legislate upon the matter, or in any measure tend to promote the ultimate settlement of the question upon a just and equitable basis. Sir, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That the Bill be now read a second time.”
 —(Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.)

MR. KNIGHT said, that having been a Member of the Committee to which the measure had been referred, he had found that the great majority of its members were known to be what was termed “Turnpike Reformers,” and that they had gone on the Committee with the knowledge that they were to be asked to agree to a proposal for the abolition of turnpikes. The moment, however, the question arose as to who were the persons who should in that event find the necessary money, they were completely at variance. When the hon. Gentleman’s Bill was brought under the consideration of the Select Committee it contained two great proposals. The one was that the Secretary of State should allocate the amount of the debts to each of the parishes within the particular districts, and the other was that the roads should be maintained as public highway. The first proposal was rejected by the Committee, who determined that the debt should be thrown on the counties, and ultimately it was carried by a majority of 10 to 2 that the boroughs should be included, and the hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) consequently found that the first part of his Bill was set aside or destroyed. He (Mr. Knight) did not think, therefore, that the hon. Member could refer to that Committee as concurring in his views. He (Mr. Knight) never saw so little unanimity as had existed amongst the Members of that Committee. He admitted, however, that upon the question of the abolition of turnpike trusts, the Committee, with the exception of two of the Members, were unanimous in favour of such abolition. The principle of throwing the maintenance of the roads from the users of the road upon the occupiers of land had been largely discussed, especially by the Chambers of Agriculture, and it had not met with a great deal of favour. He had himself presented scores of petitions against it, and a measure founded upon this principle would certainly be contrary to the wishes of the agricultural districts. He inclined to the opinion that there ought to be, as in Ireland, two sets of roads and two systems of keeping them up—one set consisting of the great highways connecting the great centres of population, and the other consisting of the parish roads. A Parliamentary Paper published this Session showed the additional rating that would be required if the trust funds had to be provided by the parishes through which the roads went. These rates would be increased from 1s. 9d. to 3s. in the pound, and in one case the rate would confiscate one fourth of the whole property of the parish. The hon. Member for Sandwich contemplated throwing the management upon the Highway Board, where it existed; but in Worcestershire the Highway Act was not much liked, and in one or two districts it had worked so badly that the parishes had returned to the old system. The Highway Act had, in Worcestershire at least, led to increased expenditure varying from 25 to 90 per cent. In many parishes the expense had been doubled. With regard to throwing any portion of the expense upon the county rates, he believed there would be a revulsion of feeling if there was any further increase in the county rates, while the great mass of the property of the country, as had been shown the other night, paid no rate at all. Until this injustice was removed he should strenuously oppose every attempt to increase the county rates. The hon. Member concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

MR. CORRANCE, in seconding the Amendment, said, that the arguments used in support of this Bill appeared to him to be shallow and insufficient. He admitted that the payment of the turnpike debt should be local. The main objection to turnpike tolls was the expense of collection, which, it was assumed, amounted on an average to 40 per cent. There seemed to be no necessity it should be so high; for in his county (Suffolk) several roads were managed at an expense of collection of 16 per cent. He considered any expense much above that to be wholly needless, and to be the result of bad management. The argument of the hon. Member, if pressed to its logical conclusion, would show that there should be no local rates whatever. If the hon. Member proposed to do away with turnpike tolls it was his duty to find some acceptable alternative; and the hon. Gentleman had proposed three or four—the parish, the union, the highway district and a supplementary payment out of the county rate. Not one of these, however, quite met the case. If the expense of the turnpike roads were thrown on the parish, it would cause an addition to the rates which it had been given in evidence would amount in some cases to 2s. 6d. in the pound; while in other cases it would quadruple the present rates. He did not believe the proposal to maintain the roads out of the county rates would be acceptable. The hon. Member hoped that his Bill would pave the way to his favourite scheme of highway districts, but he failed to see any extraordinary advantages or any decreased expenditure from this cause. He had taken some trouble to examine the Returns from thirty-four English counties and one Welsh county. He had got Returns for nineteen of these counties in which the Highway Act had been in operation for three years; and he found that in sixteen there had been an increase even in the third year as compared with the first. He believed that the system under the Highway Act was as easily corrupted and as likely to lead to expense as the present system of turnpike management. The incidence of these rates was upon the poorer classes rather than the rich; and every attempt to increase those rates would be, he trusted, opposed in that House. Allusion had been made to the payment of these rates out of the Consolidated Fund. He should object to throw local expenditure upon the Imperial taxes; but he must admit that the maintenance of the public roads was rather an exceptional question. In almost every country in Europe the making of the roads was regarded as an Imperial question, and in no case rested entirely on local management. The Bill was not likely to pass

during the present session. It would only string of abortive bills. Parish roads were not the only roads, the old country roads would be demoralised.

Amendment word "now," to add (three months.)

Question put 'now' stand p

Lord HEN did not agree. He would not because he thought that the abolition affirmed by the dealing with the experienced by year and in the greatly aggravated permissive character. Nothing had been given him in regard to the against all per necessary to the pair of the road area that the parish near several miles of throw the whole up that road upon. At the the Member for Hugessen) had House for the attempting to lation.

Mr. BEAC the House was Friend (Mr. the attention subject, and he Gentleman had before the House satisfactory to in the way of great that it duce a measure ship on some One element in the circumstances turnpike trusts in debt, and in others they were free from debt. In some cases the Highway Act had been adopted in the district, and in other cases it had not. The Bill proposed that in districts where the Highway Act had not been adopted the expense of maintaining the turnpike roads should be thrown upon the parishes; but was it possible to conceive an Act that would inflict greater injustice? In one parish that he knew the turnpike road ran through it for three miles, but the limits of the parish only extended to the fence on the other side of the road. In that case the parish on the other side of the fence would pay nothing towards the maintenance of the road, while both would equally benefit. Take a road which had been alluded to in the North of England, between two great manufacturing towns, but passing through an agricultural parish. The towns, having Local Improvement Acts, would be exempt from the maintenance of the road, and the whole burden would fall upon the agricultural parish, which profited very little from the use of the road. It was a necessary preliminary to any fair legislation on the subject that the Highway Act should be rendered compulsory; but such a strong objection was entertained in some localities to its adoption that there would be a difficulty in forcing it upon them. Even if the Highway Act had been everywhere adopted it would not be easy to frame a system which should be perfectly fair and equal throughout the country. The debt had been reduced from £7,000,000 in 1837 to little over £3,000,000 at the present time. In some cases there was a satisfactory prospect of a further reduction; in others, there was no such probability. The trusts out of debt were to be summarily abolished. If, then, a particular trust was out of debt and all the trusts around were in debt the effect of the Bill would be to make the inhabitants of the well-managed trust, where the tolls were abolished, pay tolls when they travelled over the roads in the adjacent trusts. If the present Bill passed many inequalities must still exist. He did not think it would be fair, in dealing with the debts of turnpike trusts, to treat the mortgage holders in a harsh manner. It was said that Imperial funds could not be made use of for the purpose of liquidating the debts; but he could hardly admit that, because many of these roads were originally made for the conveyance of the mails in a safe and convenient manner, and the mails passed over the roads without paying anything towards their maintenance. The proper mode of remedying the present system, which no doubt entailed considerable grievance in many cases, was by consolidating the various trusts and extending the area of management. If various trusts were formed into one there would be a great saving in the expense of management, and they might in the end see their way to abolishing turnpike trusts altogether.

Mr. Corrance

MR. CLIVE said, he hoped the House would read the Bill a second time. The present system was the most expensive, cumbrous, and least effective possible. In his opinion the only way in which the matter could be satisfactorily settled was by making the Highway Act compulsory, and he hoped a measure would be introduced for that purpose.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that if turnpikes were abolished and the expense of maintaining the roads were thrown on the ratepayers, it was necessary that the persons who were to be called on to pay should know beforehand what the burden would be. If, after the ratepayers had been made aware of the rates they would likely be called upon to pay, they pronounced in favour of the abolition of turnpikes, there would be no cause of complaint hereafter. He thought that the bondholders had been great benefactors to the country, as being the means of effecting improvements in the turnpike roads; but now that that benefit had been secured people were about to forget the sacrifices made by those who furnished the necessary money. If the tolls were done away with, and the expense thrown on the parishes, the burden in many instances would be intolerable.

MR. PAGET said, he would gladly vote for the second reading, believing that the measure would supply them with the basis for future legislation in regard to turnpike roads. He trusted that those roads would eventually be amalgamated and placed under one system of local taxation and local control.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that there was a general dissatisfaction with the management of the public highways, and a general desire for the establishment of some system by which the petty hardships which the present system inflicted upon the community might be mitigated and gradually got rid of; but, when so many local interests were concerned, and public opinion was so little formed, it was evident that there must be many discussions in that House, and many abortive attempts at legislation, before a satisfactory settlement of the question could be arrived at. The proposed scheme was inadequate, in his opinion, to deal with existing evils, and unsatisfactory with a view to permanent settlement. Circumstances had greatly altered since the present system of turnpike roads commenced. The old toll system, which made those who used the roads pay for them, was very well for a certain period; but the railways had so interfered with the traffic of the roads, that the receipts were not equal to the necessary expenditure. But every year they were making great steps in the way of the abolition of trusts, and the debt they had to deal with became every year less. Therefore the difficulties of the case were not increasing. His first great objection to the Bill was that the manner in which it was proposed to deal with the debts of turnpike trusts was calculated to excite apprehensions of increased rates. It was proposed to impose the obligation to pay the debts on the parishes through which the roads passed. He thought that proposition most objectionable; for in many instances the parishes had not been consulted about making the roads, and the debt, too, had been incurred in making roads to serve considerable districts. Let it be remembered that the property through which these roads passed had increased in value in proportion to the easy access to towns and cities; and it was unfair to make an extra charge upon tenants who had only a casual interest in these roads, whilst the landowners, whose estates had been permanently advantaged, would be scot free. With respect to the bondholders, the House ought not in any case to under-rate the claims of those who had advanced money to farm and improve turnpike roads at a time when there existed no idea that they would be rendered comparatively useless by the establishment of railroads; but at this time of day it could not be maintained that the maintenance of any road was a national concern, and he had a rooted objection to applying to the Consolidated Fund to pay for any road. Indeed he did not think the House would seriously entertain such a proposal. He thought that a much larger area should be taken for raising contributions towards the payment of the trust debts than either a parish or a highway district, and that the county should Scotland a si under consideration and the general Commission on was that the c the area of m considerations should be divid competent over this was done tion between roads; but all Board, and a tenance was to tions of proper if they did no general system estimate had b such a system would reduce t and in no case levied exceed rizing the obje Bill, he woul with this subj plete form. T and satisfactory debt, not one v unjust. The leave the existi ways side by All the inequal would be conti to come; and be aggravated quality. The until a more m was produced. way of such shown, in the dom, that the hoped the day every turnpike without laying comparable wi tion would ren

Sir James Fergusson

Mr. C. WY he thought the done to the in area of taxation derably beyond highway distri to instance the immediately v trading and m to establish thi county Boards in them to it should be con all heavy vehicles, as it was the heavy traffic which cut up the roads. In that way, without increasing the burdens of the ratepayers, they might be able to settle the question in a satisfactory manner. He was the owner of a farm in Worcestershire, which he was obliged to have valued afresh twelve or fifteen years ago, and ever since he had been obliged to submit to a reduction of 10 per cent on the valuation then made in consequence of the pressure of tolls and the wretched state of the roads, which made it impossible to convey the agricultural produce to the nearest market except at a large cost to the tenant. He mentioned this as an illustration of the evils arising from the present defective system of administration.

MR. GOLDNEY said, it could not be fairly objected to the working of the Highway Acts that the expenses were large, as the present roads were the result of management that had continued during three or four generations. He thought that the House would agree that any tax which cost 30 per cent in collection was a vicious tax; and that was the state of things with reference to tolls. In 1866 £1,250,000 was collected, and yet only £500,000 went in the repair of the roads; £250,000 was absorbed by the debt; and the remaining £500,000 went in management expenses of one sort and another. In addition, there was £1,500,000 for highway rates, making with tolls £2,750,000; but in his opinion the whole of the work could be well done for £2,000,000. His opinion was that the abolition of the present system would impose no serious burden upon any one. The repair of the roads ought to fall on property, and not on the occupiers. Taking the existing debt at £3,000,000, a sum of £100,000 a year levied on property would suffice to provide for its extinction, and that would not amount to a rate of more than a farthing in the pound annually. The increase in the rates would be nothing, and the estates which had roads passing through them, or even placed at a distance from large towns, would be immensely benefited.

MR. M'LAREN said, the Under Secretary for the Home Department (Sir James Fergusson) had adverted to the Report of the Royal Commission of 1860, which recommended the abolition of tolls in Scotland, and of which he (Mr. M'Laren) had had the honour of being a Member. That Report took the same view in general as had just been done by the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney); it recommended that the repairs of the roads should be defrayed by a rate on property payable by the tenants with a right to deduct half from the landlord; but that during the tenure of existing lease tenants should pay the whole rate, and that debt, as valued at the market worth of the bond, should form a burden on the owner of the land exclusively. He believed that a great deal less would be paid for management under such an improved system, and he deprecated every approach to payment of the debts out of the Consolidated Fund. It would be a premium to improvident management.

MR. READ said, he had fears as to how turnpike roads would be maintained if the burden of keeping them up was cast upon parishes. He objected to the increase of rates while so large a portion of the property of the country escaped being rated; but he agreed that at present the matter was in a very unsatisfactory state. He hoped that before the 200 trusts, which had been referred to should cease, some general measure embracing all the roads of the country would be adopted.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped that a division would not be taken on the second reading of the Bill, because it raised questions on which it would not be expedient at present to pronounce an opinion, either negatively or affirmatively. This measure deals with various matters; in the first place the abolition of tolls, and then the debts of the trusts. They were told that it was proposed to deal with the debt "somehow;" it would be very satisfactory to creditors for several millions that their debt was to be treated somehow. He had the greatest respect for Secretaries of State, past, present, and to come; but this was not a question which ought to be left to any Secretary of State, be he man or angel. This debt had been created by sanction of Parliament, and should only be dealt with by Parliament. He did not agree that the debts were decidedly local; and certainly in his own county many roads in the coaching days had been made for Imperial and not for county purposes—for cutting down hills and filling up valleys to enable stage-coaches to travel nine or ten miles an hour with safety—and debt had been incurred in the course of the work. Even at the present day there was a great deal of through traffic for which local expense was incurred. The Secretary of State was not only to assess the value of the debt, but he was also to allocate it; and there would be immense difficulty in framing any rule to meet the vast variety of circumstances of different places. No one had stronger objections to tolls than he had—he had often run the risk of breaking his neck in jumping over hedges in order to avoid them—and in many instances the cost of collecting them was enormous. It would be almost impossible to frame a general Bill that would not work great injustice in individual instances. He thought that it would be far better to withdraw the Bill than to ask the House to pledge itself to any principle. The House would then be free next Session to carry a better measure if a better measure could be devised.

SIR JOHN SIMEON said, he entirely concurred in the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). In the Isle of Wight they continued to be under the Act 53 Geo. III., tolls being leviable at every eighth mile. He thought there was a great tendency to bear unduly on the rates, and to throw on them everything which could possibly be laid on them. The amount paid by the farmers for the maintenance of roads bore a very undue proportion to that paid by the inhabitants of towns. He must express his earnest hope that in the course of the discussion which must take place on this important question in the ensuing Parliament great care would be taken not to lay too great pressure on the ratepayers.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was glad that it was not the intention of the hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) to divide the House on this occasion on the Bill, and he would recommend the hon. Member behind him to withdraw his Amendment also. The discussion showed that no two Members could agree upon the vote which they would give upon the Bill, except so far as this, that they desired to abolish the present system of the management of turnpike roads. They were agreed upon nothing else, and there would be no use in their passing what would in effect be an abstract Resolution upon the question, by which no one would be bound. It would no doubt be to the general interest of the country that the existing bad and expensive system should be got culties still th Scotlan

he did solved ous pa there togethe a short and as these g to traff ment t eight r advanta consoli handed nageme conside agreed that th which what r roads, as port of the objecte be imp of deci objecte should they w road o where the par
Bill in to be of the decided though Comm
into th whethe Home reasons should about t cuss it ho the nageme
if inde as the roads roads n
But he Fund o share i
Mr.
As I an

Mr. Henley

I will not exercise my right of by criticizing, as I should under circumstances be desirous of criticizing several of the observations which been made during the debate. There were, two or three words which bound to say before I consent to withdraw this Bill. I think I may tolerate myself upon the result of discussion. I understand from the hon. the Member for Ayrshire the Secretary of State, that the Government admit the two main principles of the Bill—namely, that tolls should be abolished and the area of taxation extended. No logical sequence appears to me to the Government, holding these views, to support the second reading of my Bill but as they think otherwise, and as I could not under any circumstances go beyond its present stage during this session, I do not think I should gain anything by pressing for a division, especially as the question has made material progress in the debate. But there is one remark which I desire to make. Having stated the main principles of the Bill in my opening speech, I beg to remind the House that I most distinctly laid it down that I was prepared to accept any plan, on consideration, might seem preferable to my own, so long as it was consistent with the adoption of those two principles. I myself mentioned the county as a possible area, and I also alluded to a division of rates between owner and tenant. But another reason prompts me to consent to the withdrawal of the Bill at present. It is evident that the members are in advance of some of their constituents upon this question, and I am without hopes that some further delay will further improve the position of the Bill, and that time and reflection will be upon this subject that harmonious between the Government and their constituents, which is so much to be desired. I therefore withdraw the Bill upon the understanding of course that the Amendment is also withdrawn.

GATHORNE HARDY did not think it to be supposed that he assented to the principle of the total abolition of the Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

withdrawn.

CCXII. [THIRD READING.]

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (METROPOLIS) BILL.—[Bill 105.]

(Mr. J. Stuart Mill, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Tomline, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Layard.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. J. STUART MILL: The House is aware that this Bill is only one of two which have some claim to be considered as one, inasmuch as they are parts of a combined plan for the local government of the metropolis. The most important of them, as the House is also aware, I have been unexpectedly prevented from proceeding with. It has been decided to be a violation of the Standing Orders. It appears to me a subject well worthy the consideration of the House under what circumstances this difficulty has arisen, and that I should have been unable to propose to the House a plan for the general municipal government of the metropolis because due notice has not been given to the Corporation of the City of London. The Bill is not of private, but of public interest; the Corporation is solely interested in it by reason of the property it holds for public purposes; the City of London is perfectly aware of all that is proposed, and has made no complaint of not having received notice. The promoters of the measure do not expect to make money by it, but may have a great deal to spend in carrying out its objects; and it appears to me worthy of consideration whether the forms required by the Standing Orders were ever intended for such a case as this, and whether the promoters of the Bill ought to be required to spend several hundreds of pounds out of their own pockets to give formal notice to the Corporation. Since the House did me the honour of permitting me to introduce the former measure, a great change has taken place in the situation of this country as respects its institutions. The great measure of last Session has been passed, and our Constitution has been materially altered in a democratic direction. This new state of things imposes new duties; it requires the House, on the one hand, to do more than it was previously obliged to do; and, on the other, to consider the inconveniences, whether great or small, that may be created by the new direction in which we are proceeding, and to guard against them as far as possible. It is well understood what is the special danger of democratic institutions: it is the absence of skilled administration; and I strongly recommend to the consideration of the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck), who I believe intends to move the rejection of the Bill, that the great political problem of the future, not only for this country, but for all others, is to obtain the combination of democratic institutions with skilled administration. It is extremely desirable that this House without either idle regret for the past or vain confidence in the future should apply itself to find out how these two things may best be united. I am anxious to impress on the House the importance of reviewing our institutions in this particular point of view, and to induce the friends of democracy to appreciate the advantages of skilled administration, and the admirers of skilled administration to appreciate the merits of democratic institutions. As regards the general principle on which municipal institutions should be founded, the established practice with us is that all the ratepayers should have a voice in the expenditure. In the democratic direction, nothing further than this can be desired. But in the matter of skilled administration there is much to be altered. All the defects of democratic institutions are great in proportion as the area is small; and if you wish to work them well, I do not know any rule more important than that you should never have a popular representative assembly on a small area, for if you do, it will be impossible to have skilled administration. There will be much less choice of persons; a much smaller number, and those less competent for the task, will be willing to undertake the conduct of public affairs. And here I must direct attention to a principle of great importance. The value of a popular administrative body—I might say of any popular body—is measured by the value of the permanent officers. When a popular body knows what it is fit for and what it is unfit for, it will more and more understand that it is not its business to administer, but that it is its business to see that the administration is done by proper persons, and to keep them to their duties. I hope it will be more and more felt that the duty of this House is to put the right persons on that Bench opposite, and when there to keep them to their work. Even in legislative business it is the chief duty—it is most consistent with the capacity of a popular assembly to see that the business is transacted sons; confine to the enforce publicity of t con; the offer who do the w a check upon do anything value the imp longer they h principle, wh administration strong light in that has only area, tries to public business most ineffectiv ness can be doi body approach assembly like great distance large area, and work to do, is that its busin self; its busin to do it, and t trolling them

Mr. J. Stuart Mill

lision of opini
bers may pro work out of t tors. The ad
lutely requires representative which our loc on, should no local board, b
—as large a unity of inter they have to a ness of the i in kind, amon tive bodies, an most minute n various parish by means of and there are belong to the most multifar
There are 37 of births, 58 f
ing Act, 19 d
30 County Cor districts. The ministration c lidation of t
Among the ad consolidation and economy.
more than to against this I

effects will be to raise the rates ; that is not only impossible, but it must have the contrary effect, because in proportion as the present divisions approach the size they would all reach when combined under the plan I propose, economy has been effected. Compare the two districts, for example, of Marylebone and Westminster, which are about equal in population. Marylebone is all one parish under one local government, and is an approximation to the system I would establish, and its administrative expenses amount to £8,000 a year. Westminster is divided amongst five boards, and the five boards cost £20,000 a year. Probably not more than a third of the number of officers employed in Westminster is employed in Marylebone. In fact, the more an area is divided into independent districts, the more paid officers there must be, and the less skilled they will be. The small districts cannot afford to pay for the greatest skill, and the smallness of the districts prevents the officers from acquiring it. Add to this the expense now arising from quarrels and litigation, which, of course, would not exist if these boards were fused into one. I find that no less than 4,000 persons are engaged, in some capacity or other, in the local government of the metropolis. I cannot help asking, would any person now think of establishing the present system of administration in the metropolis if it did not already exist? Would it exist at all except for the accidental growing up of arrangements that have never been reviewed? In a great metropolis, who cares about his parish, except for its church? and, as we are going to get rid of church rates, the parish will have no common interest at all in future. If we are to have a body that can do the work well, the first condition must be unlimited publicity—publicity which must not be theoretic, but real. It is not only that the people should have a right to know what is done; but that they should really and actually know what is being done. You must get them to give their attention to it; and that is not accomplished on the present system, because the area of administration being on so small a scale, the public does not take sufficient interest in the subject to inquire into what is being done. Except in a large parish, no light is thrown on what is going on. I am far from undervaluing what the local institutions, imperfect as they are, have done;

but they are doing much less every day, as the conditions on which they were established become less adapted to existing circumstances. It is very generally believed that it is an extremely frequent thing for persons who sit in vestries of the metropolis to be landlords of small tenements utterly unfit for human habitations, men whose interest—I do not say they always yield to that interest—is not to promote those sanitary arrangements for the improvement of the dwelling places of the great mass of the community which it should be our object to promote. In the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens)—the Labourers' and Artizans' Dwellings Bill—it was desired to give greater powers in dealing with that class of property, but no authority could be found that was deemed fit to exercise those powers. At first the Bill intrusted those powers to the vestries; but the vestries were not trusted, and the Select Committee preferred intrusting them to the Metropolitan Board of Works: and then it appeared that the Board of Works was not trusted either; and I have received repeated applications to oppose the Bill on that ground. It may be said that, acting on the principles I have enunciated, I ought to have proposed one municipal government for the whole metropolis. There is a good deal to be said for such a course. But on the other hand, it might shock settled ideas to propose at once to entrust the whole local government of so vast an area, with about 3,000,000 of inhabitants, to one local body. The business to be intrusted to their management would, moreover, be too great, and it would give them the control of too large an amount of revenue; and it would have been useless to attempt to obtain the consent of the House to such a measure. Probably it is better to have local municipal bodies for the different Parliamentary boroughs, and that the central Board should not be troubled with any business but such as is common to the whole metropolis. The Parliamentary boroughs offer a medium between the contemptibly small size of an ordinary parish and the inordinate size of the whole metropolis; and in them there has grown up, from the circumstance of their being Parliamentary boroughs, a certain feeling of local connection amongst the whole of the inhabitants. This feeling exists in a very great degree in the old Parliamentary districts, the City of London, Westminster, and Southwark;

and some amount of it has grown up even in those which were created by the Act of 1832. I therefore propose by the Bill which I ask you to read a second time, to create municipalities for the Parliamentary districts, which shall exercise the powers of the municipalities under the Municipal Corporations Act, and also those of the vestries and local boards of the metropolis, except so far as Parliament shall otherwise dispose. It may be said that the Metropolitan Board of Works meets the idea of a central Board. The Metropolitan Board is a clumsy creation, arising from the felt want of some body to represent the whole metropolis. It was at first called into existence to carry out a great sanitary improvement which is now nearly completed, and its existence would in consequence have soon expired, but that Parliament in the meantime found out the necessity of some such central body, and threw upon it a great variety of duties, which originally were not contemplated. It never was intended that the Board should be a municipality for the whole of London; and I cannot conceive that that body can continue to discharge those duties without its construction being at least greatly modified. I could not expect that this Bill would pass at this period of the Session, even if the Government were to adopt it; but I think it is right to remind the House of this question, and to prepare the public mind for a more mature consideration of it. On these grounds I beg to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."
 —(Mr. J. Stuart Mill.)

Mr. BENTINCK, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, that he did not wish it to be said that the Bill had been dropped solely in consequence of the lateness of the Session ; and he therefore desired to obtain the opinion of the House on the Bill. He confessed his surprise that the hon. Member should attempt to proceed with it after his other Bill had been prevented from being discussed. Having been a Member of the Committee on Metropolitan Local Government which sat last Session, he would remind the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) that in the opinion of the Committee the mainspring of reform in the municipal government has been the creator of the body. Last night himself referred to the most important question that to proceed from which there would be a new House. The question of London is that the separation of so many districts should not be denied should first be afterwards decided. No doubt from want of division into but the divisions boroughs were the hon. Member's anomalies. The hon. Member between the be no jealous corporations, but be augmented the creation of. At any rate, have shown that the would be as the municipalities commended in the Committee.

Mr. J. Stuart Mill

"It is desirement should asxpolis can be bes in accordance w

When he loc
Bill, all ideas for one of th that each n spacious tow paraphernalia mined before in his opinio oipal corporat
a year in en pensing hospi the pockets benefited by gard to the B
ducing perso those now i from the hor ber proposed
No doubt it alderman; bu who would b these council

they might be dubbed aldermen. The hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Colonel Hogg) served on the Vestry of St. George's, Hanover Square, with great credit and popularity; but he (Mr. Bentinck) doubted whether he would like to exchange the title of "the gallant colonel" for that of "the worthy alderman." He apprehended that the first thing his hon. and gallant Friend would do on being made an alderman would be to send in his resignation. Another objection to this Bill was that any measure dealing with the local government of the metropolis ought to be brought in by the Government—and that was one of the recommendations of the Committee. But the main objection to the Bill was that it was entirely repudiated by the mass of the ratepayers. Early in the year a deputation went to the Home Office on the subject of this Bill. There were in the metropolis thirty-eight vestries, representing an annual value of £14,000,000; and nineteen of these Vestry Boards, representing an annual value of £9,000,000, joined in the deputation against this Bill. What was there on the other side? The Vestry of St. James's, at a meeting at which only seven members were present, refused to petition against the Bill, by a majority of 1—that one being Mr. Beal, the author of the Bill. A public meeting of the inhabitants was afterwards held in St. James's Hall, when a resolution was carried against the Bill with only four or five dissentients. A subsequent resolution was carried without a single dissentient—namely, that Mr. Beal be thrown out of the window. The vestries might be unpopular, and the inhabitants might wish to get rid of their jurisdiction; but all sensible men were opposed to the principle of this Bill, which would only increase the expenditure, insure misgovernment, and make the existing state of things worse than ever. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Bentinck.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that while rendering full credit to the able and temperate manner in which the Bill had been introduced, he thought it was impossible at this period of the Session to pass the Bill. Another objection was that it was necessary to have the other Bill of the hon. Member before the House at the same time, so that his whole scheme might be discussed and considered at once. The Bill was generally condemned by the metropolis; and he believed that the interests of the ratepayers would be seriously injured if it became law. It would only have the effect of creating larger vestries with larger powers of taxation. Then the various officers now employed were to be compensated. The expenses of carrying out the Act would be so great that he was not surprised that the ratepayers looked upon it with alarm. He objected to any Bill of this kind being brought forward without a general call for it; and there was no such call. He could testify that the deputation from the vestries expressed a strong feeling against the Bill. The object of asking the House to read it a second time was to stamp it with a certain amount of approbation; whereas the House at present cared little, and knew less, about the subject. The whole subject of metropolitan local government had been referred to a Select Committee last Session. They took evidence, and recommended that it was desirable that Her Majesty's Government should submit to Parliament a Bill to carry their Resolutions into effect. This would be far better than leaving the subject in the hands of a private Member.

COLONEL HOGG said, this bill was founded on an entirely false basis, and was altogether a very crude measure, and would be utterly unworkable. Instead of tending to produce economy, it would, he thought have an opposite effect. He had been present at an immense meeting in St. James's Hall, called together by the friends of the measure, and only four hands were held up in favour of the Bill. Great stress was laid upon the number of petitions presented in favour of the Bill, but, after all, he found that the number of petitions was 259, and the number of signatures 241. The fact was that a public meeting of ratepayers having declared against the Bill, the only resource the supporters of the measure had was to send round petitions to be signed by single individuals, who forwarded them to the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), who, of course, was delighted to present them. The parish of St. James's, with a population of 35,000, was the only parish that had declared in favour of the Bill, and that by a majority of 1 only, in a vestry meeting of about seven individuals, whilst vestries in number nineteen and representing an annual value of £9,000,000 were strongly opposed to the Bill. He very much objected to the provision in the Bill which proposed to hand over the charitable funds of the metropolis to the municipalities. He thought the Board of Works had done its duty, and was, if it increased taxation, only supplying the deficiency of former years.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he could not undertake at this time of day to discuss the philosophical principles laid down by the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), and as the hon. Member had said he should not press the Bill this Session he did not think it necessary to discuss it. He might remark that the Bill was opposed in its principle and details to the Report of the Select Committee which had inquired into the question. One of their recommendations was that the question should be dealt with by the Government; but he need hardly remind the House that circumstances had prevented the Government taking up the matter this Session. The principle of the measure, to divide the metropolis into new boroughs, was wholly at variance with the principle of the Municipal Corporations Act, which provided that new boroughs were to be created by the Crown, on petition by the inhabitants. He agreed with an hon. Gentleman who had spoken (Mr. Harvey Lewis) that a Bill of this kind should be introduced upon the responsibility of the Government, and not on that of a private Member. At all events it was such a Bill as could not receive the support of the Government.

MR. AYRTON suggested the withdrawal of the Bill. From the complicated character of the subject it was one which could only be efficiently dealt with by the Government. The measure before them only touched a fragment of the question, which should be dealt with as a whole. He would suggest that the Amendment should not be pressed, and that in it a Resolution should be substituted, declaring that it is the opinion of the House that the Government should introduce a Bill providing for the better government of the metropolis.

MR. LOCKE hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department would accede to the proposal of the hon. and Tower Hamlets Member who had said that some alteration in the government principle of administration highly approved by the City of London would greatly benefit ratepayers. I must, however, commend the hon. Member's suggestion of the Bill for the Tower Hamlets.

Colonel Hogg

SIR STAFFORD SMITH said that the proposed Bill was Government's business, and he would not discuss it in the House out of order.

And it being the clock—

Debate adjourned.

BR

Mr. Whitbread, Member of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, has written to the Editor of the Standard, stating that he had been asked by an undue Elector of Bristol, to which he had referred to them.

—Thomas Basil, Esquire; Lord G. Robert Jasper M. Howes, Esquire, &c.

Report to lie on the table.

RAILWAY COMPANIES

On Motion of Mr. Stansfeld, to authorize the further repayment of Advances made by the Railway Companies, Act, 1866, order of the House of Commons, SOLAR-BOOTH, Esquire, presented, and read.

LANDS CLAUSES

AM

On Motion of Mr. Stansfeld, to amend some provisions of the Consolidation Act, 1866, in by Mr. SOLAR-BOOTH, Esquire, and Lord John Russell, presented, and read.

BANK OF BOMBAY BILL.

On Motion of Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, Bill to enable Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Failure of the Bank of Bombay to examine witnesses on oath in the United Kingdom, ordered to be brought in by Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and Sir JAMES FERGUSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 178.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, June 18, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—

Established Church (Ireland) (157); Drainage Provisional Order Confirmation* (158); Inclosure (No. 2)* (159); Judgments Extension* (160).

Second Reading—Jurors' Affirmations (Scotland)* (104).

Committee—Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites) (128-161); Unclaimed Prize Money (India)* (121).

Report—Unclaimed Prize Money (India)* (121); Poor Relief (155-162).

Third Reading—Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy Act Amendment* (148) and passed..

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND) BILL.

FIRST READING.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON moved that the Bill be now read the first time.

EARL GREY thereon gave Notice that he should move as an Amendment to the second reading that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Bill read 1^a; to be read 2^a on Thursday next, and to be printed. (No. 157.)

RELIGIOUS, &c., BUILDINGS (SITES) BILL.

(The Lord Cranworth.)

(No. 128.) COMMITTEE (ON-RECOMMITMENT.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to Order).

LORD ROMILLY moved to omit Clause 2 and insert the following instead thereof:—

“Provided also, that every such alienation grant, conveyance, lease, assurance, surrender or other disposition shall be absolutely and to all intents and purposes null and void unless and until the same or some deed or instrument declaring the trusts thereof shall have been enrolled in Her Majesty's High Court of Chancery.”

If deeds giving sites for religious and charitable buildings were not enrolled, occasion would be given for great abuses. The Bill as it at present stood did not propose anything that could not be done at present. The object of his Amendment was to make the effect of the deed date from whatever time it might be enrolled. His proposal would admit of enrolment without the intervention of a solicitor. A deed might be sent up by post, and then it would only be necessary that some one should call for it and pay the fees. There might be printed forms of deeds as there were of leases, which, in fact, required more revision. His sole object was to combine cheapness with security.

LORD CRANWORTH doubted the expediency of insisting on the formality prescribed by the Amendment. The Bill dispensed altogether with the necessity of enrolment in the case of these small grants. In manufacturing towns there were many little buildings such as chapels, schools, and mechanics' institutions, the conveyances of which became null and void unless they were enrolled, and yet in nine cases out of ten they were never enrolled. The Court of Chancery, indeed, could authorize their enrolment after the time for it had elapsed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR opposed the Amendment. The Bill only dealt with cases where the land taken was for the purpose of erecting a building upon it for the promotion of religion, literature, or science. It was also provided that the grant or purchase should have been really and bonâ fide made for full and valuable consideration, and that the land granted or purchased should not be more than two acres in extent. The Bill proposed that in such cases it should be no longer necessary to enrol the deed in the Court of Chancery. It should be remembered that the Mortmain Act was passed on account of many large and improvident dispositions having been made by dying and other persons for charitable uses, to take effect after their death, to the disherison of their lawful heirs. But nobody could imagine that the sale of two acres of land would produce dangerous consequences in that respect. There was no doubt that under the Mortmain Act the system of enrolment was not contemplated at the time that Act received the sanction of the Legislature; and one religious body, the Wesleyans, had resorted to the practice in order that if any question should arise their deeds might be referred to with facility. The question at issue, therefore, was whether an unnecessary hardship ought to be imposed on all Her Majesty's subjects because the practice of registration had proved a convenience to a particular religious denomination. He might mention, however, that the passing of the present measure would not prevent parties from enrolling their deeds in Chancery if they thought fit to do so. On the whole, he thought their Lordships would do well to adhere to the original clause.

Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 161).

POOR RELIEF BILL—(No. 155.)

(The Earl of Devon.)

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order.)

THE EARL OF DEVON said, it would be in their Lordships' recollection that in the course of the discussion the other night he stated that, in the event of the House deciding on the rejection of the clause for removing idiots from workhouses, he would on the Report propose the clause that was originally in the Bill, but which had been rejected by the Select Committee. An objection was thereon taken by a noble Lord (Earl Grey) that such a clause ought to originate in the other House. Recognizing the force of that objection, he should be wanting in respect to their Lordships if he were now to propose the clause, and therefore he abstained from doing so.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, that the Bill originally provided that strange ministers of religion should be allowed to visit the workhouses only "at the request of an inmate." Now these words were struck out of the present Bill. But unless the noble Earl had some valid and convincing reason for the omission of these words, he hoped he would re-insert them.

THE EARL OF DEVON said, he must decline the suggestion for two reasons—first, that the words were found to interfere with that freedom of religious opinion which it was the object of the Poor Law Board to secure; and secondly, that there were often inren and other nize the valu and in fact th important to ask for visitor

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, the reasons for not complying at all satisfactorily

LORD REDCLIFFE said, it was a right which the bodied pauper once a week them to attend place of work was an indulgent principle on should be desirous to be a convenient distant permission to religious work those facilities mischief in paupers to give leaving their would moreover give of discipline

EARL FORBES said, much in the opinion of the man of Court fettering the these matters, such a course unwilling to assent

THE EARL OF DEVON said, he thought the Bill of giving the opportunities of

LORD LYTTON said, that the objection (Earl Fortescue of Committee)

Amendment To-morrow; as (No. 162).

SALE OF POISONS AND PHARMACY—AMENDMENTS

(THE LORDS)

THIRD READING

Bill read 3^d

LORD REDCLIFFE said, the introduction of a collection of the form bottle for called "the

The Lord Chancellor

duction might be gradual but in course of time it would come to be recognized by all. He had originally suggested on the Report the adoption of a bottle of a particular shape ; but on reflection he had no objection to leave the matter to the decision of the Privy Council and of the Pharmaceutical Society. He believed that there was no objection to the introduction of this clause, which he felt confident would tend in practice to the prevention of very serious danger.

After Clause 17, moved to insert the following Clause :—

“ From and after the Thirty-first Day of December One thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight it shall not be lawful to sell any Poison in a Bottle required to be labelled as aforesaid unless such Bottle shall be of a Shape and Character to be thenceforth known and described as a Poison Bottle ; and it shall not be lawful to sell any Preparation not poisonous in any such Bottle ; and any Person offending against either of the aforesaid Provisions shall be liable to the Penalties herein-before enacted for selling Poison not distinctly labelled. The Shape and Character to be prescribed by the Pharmaceutical Society, with the Consent of the Privy Council, within One Month after the passing of this Act, and advertised and published in such Manner as the Privy Council shall direct.”—(The Chairman of Committees.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the noble Lord had failed to answer the objection raised on a former occasion by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, that many of the poisons which he proposed to put into these special bottles were poisons entering into the almost daily prescriptions of physicians.

LORD REDESDALE said, the noble Marquess was mistaken. The only poisons with regard to which his clause would enforce the use of a special bottle were those which by the previous clause were required to be labelled as poisons.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that one so well versed in the rules of the House as the noble Lord must see that there was great inconvenience in discussing a totally new provision of which no notice whatever had been given. The distinction taken by the noble Lord it would be seen on examination was not well founded ; for the earlier clause provided that no person should sell any poison, wholesale or retail, unless in a wrapper distinctly labelled. A letter in The Times recently had given the names of some of the drugs in constant use, such as arsenic, prussic acid, strychnine, all poisonous vegetable alkalies and their salts, aconite, corrosive sublimate, belladonna, and cantharides. Every one of these drugs entered into the prescriptions of physicians, and were used sometimes in cases of great emergency. A physician in some urgent case might send to a chemist in whose possession he knew the particular drug to be ; and yet that chemist, merely from the fact that his stock of this particular poison bottle happened to be exhausted, would be absolutely prevented from supplying the medicine. The bottle, of course, would be patented, being the invention of some particular person.

LORD REDESDALE : It is not a patent to begin with.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : Well, then, it was to be defined and published.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had already expressed his willingness to leave the shape of the bottle to be settled by the Privy Council and the Pharmaceutical Society.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : But there was great inconvenience in introducing extensive additions of this kind upon the mere discussion of some particular clause of a Bill—and that, too, without Notice. Apart from the practical objection that a particular medicine sent for in great haste in the middle of the night might fail to be procured, in the absence of the poison bottle, he objected to the whole principle of the proposed legislation on this point. Hitherto we had proceeded upon the principle of protecting persons from wrongs or injuries wilfully wrought by others ; but we had never acted upon the principle of protecting sensible people from possible dangers merely because foolish people might have it in their power to injure themselves. Because somebody might be foolish enough to get up in the middle of the night, and, without taking the trouble to strike a light, might drink off the contents of a bottle, therefore the noble Lord proposed to introduce entirely new restraints affecting a whole profession. This was a principle of legislation not unknown to foreign countries, where Governments were very fond of protecting people against the consequences of their own acts ; but it was totally opposed to the habits of this country, its direct tendency being to hinder the general business of mankind. The principle was one that, if adopted in this country, would tend, he felt sure, to greater evils than those which it sought to prevent.

EARL GRANVILLE thought that the clause framed by the noble Lord might be modified with advantage before it was submitted to the House. On this subject he had received a letter from a gentleman of much practical experience; and read to the House the following extract:—

"I find that Lord Redesdale retains his faith in the poison bottle, and intends to propose it again on the third reading of the Pharmacy Bill, adopting that which I certainly believe to be by far the most distinctive bottle ever used. But the more I consider his Lordship's proposition, and the more I think of the value pertaining to special bottles of any shape, when used according to the discretion of dispensers who understand their business, the more impressed I become with the impolicy of specific enactments concerning them. I have already told your Lordship that most chemists in London use distinctive bottles for dangerous articles and external applications; they have done so for the last six or seven years, the practice gradually increasing. I have also said that the use of these bottles should be restricted to such articles. Now, I presume the words 'poison' and 'poisonous' in the proposed clause must be construed according to Clause 2. If so, we should be prohibited from using such bottles for every medicine not in the Schedule, and I need scarcely say the Schedule does not contain a sixth part of the dangerous preparations daily passing through our hands. I should not think now of selling laudanum in any other than a poison bottle. Laudanum is not in the Schedule; consequently I must, if the Amendment pass, discontinue that precaution. I know Lord Redesdale thinks it is the inconvenience of the compulsory enactment which actuates the Pharmaceutical Society in resisting his proposal; but I can assure you most honestly that they are anxious, both by example and recommendation, to promote his views, and really apprehensive that his Amendment would prevent their doing so."

If the securities sought by the clause were not complete it would be worse than no precautions at all, and resemble that very dangerous gun invented some years ago, which was provided with a complicated contrivance to prevent its going off.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that although the clause had been greatly improved since last it was offered to the House he thought the disadvantages connected with the proposal outbalanced the advantages. The better course would be to leave it to the discretion of the Pharmaceutical Society and the Privy Council to take what precautions they thought necessary against the careless sale of poisons. If they thought it necessary to adopt a peculiar bottle they could do so; but such a course ought not to be imposed upon them by Act of Parliament. The proposal of his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) was defective, inasmuch as his Schedule of poisons for which used omitted more harmful the result would be placed comparatively bottles. He reco not to press the LORD REDE to know what offered against means conclusion of the nob of Salisbury) the practice to me those who were themselves, he many instances existed; per punished for st tion, and it wa they could do thought it wo clause, that it the House of C

The Marquess of Salisbury

THE EARL o mists were of not be gained b particular bottl there would b taking medicin application for ternally. An e he had receive case might ari acid would be of a spoonful highly poison Both would be and no securit lotion would n acid. His corr ships would n they wished to ment.

After a few AIBLIE and LO

On Question —Contents 39 jority 6.

On Question THE MARQUE understood to e visions of the F tended to Irela.

Bill passed, 1

NOVA SCOTIA.—PETITION.

LORD CAMPBELL, who had given Notice—

“To present a Petition from Nova Scotia alleging the Existence of much Discontent in the Province in regard to an Act passed last Session under the Title of The British North America Act; and to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to appoint a Commission to proceed to Nova Scotia for the Purpose of examining the Causes of the alleged Dissatisfaction with a View to their Removal.”

said he rose to postpone his Motion. His reason for doing so was chiefly on account of the lateness of the hour, and the existence of certain rules or understandings with respect to the conduct of Public Business on Tuesdays and Thursdays. A good many Members had left the House on the understanding that the subject would not come on after six.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that this Motion had been twice on the Paper and had been twice postponed. He protested against the continual postponement of important Notices—a course which was highly inconvenient to noble Lords who felt interested in the discussions which were likely to arise, and one which was also highly detrimental to the public interests. It was now only half-past six o'clock, and he could not see why the Motion should not be proceeded with.

LORD LYVEDEN remarked that the inconvenience arising from the course adopted by the noble Lord (Lord Campbell) was felt not only by many Members of their Lordships' House, but also by the Delegates from Nova Scotia, who were naturally anxious to be present at the discussion. He trusted that the noble Lord would place his Notice on the Paper for a day when it could have precedence, and that the date would be sufficiently early to admit of the Delegates from Nova Scotia being present at the discussion before leaving this country.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)
BILL.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said: My Lords, I beg to give notice that on the Motion for the Second Reading of the Suspensory Bill relating to the Irish branch of the Established Church I shall move that it be read a second time that day six months.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Seven o'clock, till to-morrow,
half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, June 18, 1868.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For Stamford v. Viscount Ingestre, now Earl of Shrewsbury.

Select Committee—Curragh of Kildare, General Dunne, Sir Colman O'Loughlen added.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Electric Telegraphs [82]; Ecclesiastical Commissioners* [168]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 6)* [175].

Referred to Select Committee—Electric Telegraphs [82].

Committee—Representation of the People (Ireland) [71]; Representation of the People (Scotland)* [166]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 5)* [160]; Navy and Army Expenditure*—R.P.

Report—Representation of the People (Ireland) [71-179]; Representation of the People (Scotland)* [166]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 5)* [160].

Considered as amended—Representation of the People (Scotland)* [166]; Boundary* [165]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 5)* [160]; Courts of Chancery and Exchequer (Ireland) Fee Funds* [146].

Third Reading—Representation of the People (Scotland)* [166]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 4)* [159]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 5)* [160]; Municipal Rate (Edinburgh)* [99], and passed.

Withdrawn—Weights and Measures (Scotland)* [109].

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC PETITIONS.— BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. C. FORSTER moved that the Special Report of the Public Petitions Committee of the 28th of May last be read; but that, in the case of those Petitions to which the Report refers, the Order of the House that they do lie upon the Table be read and discharged. The hon. Member said, he had to bring under the notice of the House a Breach of Privilege, committed in the case of these Petitions. By the Standing Orders it is required that every Petition shall bear at least one signature on the sheet containing the Prayer of the Petition, and Petitions are frequently returned to hon. Members because this regulation is not complied with. But in the case of these Petitions an attempt was made to render them formally correct by taking a signature from the body of the Petition and placing it on the sheet containing the Prayer. Examination showed that this had been done in the case of 100 Petitions. The facts are admitted by the party implicated, who says he was not aware that he was committing a Breach of Privilege: and as he is now aware of the impropriety of his conduct, and is in an infirm state of health, the Committee of Public Petitions think sufficient punishment will be inflicted by discharging the Petitions. If, however, other cases of a similar character are brought before the Committee, they will adopt a much more severe course.

Special Report of the Committee [28th May] read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the Motion deserving of consideration by the House, as a question arose whether the rules at present in force were judicious, and ought to be maintained for the future. It was well known that many bond fide Petitions were presented with every intention of complying with the rules of the House, and yet were often returned to the Committee on Public Petitions as being informal. The hon. Gentleman, as Chairman of the Committee, had called the attention of the House to the fact of certain Petitions having had no signatures on the side on which the Petition was written. Now, if the rule of the House were complied with, the security it afforded only amounted to this, that there was one bond fide signature required to be on the same side, so that a hundred Petitions might be accepted, provided this condition were fulfilled. He thought this was straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, and that it would not bear the scrutiny of common sense; and it would be desirable that the Select Committee on Petitions should revise the rules, and consider whether they might not be improved, so that persons anxious to comply with the Orders of the House should not fall into a trap unawares, and have their Petitions rejected. There was another rule, of which the propriety was also very questionable, that no Petition should be received by the House that was printed. The object, he supposed, was to take precautions that the actual words professing to embody the sentiments of the petitioners should emanate from themselves, and not be suggested to them by some one else. But did the rules really accomplish that object? They knew perfectly well that some person clever in expressing himself concisely was employed to draw up the form of a Petition; they were sent round, and the petitioners had only the trouble of getting some person who wrote neatly to copy out the Petition again. He was not aware that the House derived any advantage from insisting on the observance of that rule, and he thought the Committee should consider this was so. He should have thought the House, and not the Committee, should have rejected from its rules.

Mr. C. Forster

Motion agreed to.

Order, That the Petitions to which the Motion relates lie upon the Table. (Mr. Charles

IRELAND—

MR. GREGG asked Mr. Charles Stewart whether Her Majesty's Government intend to legislate during the present Session on the subject of whether before a statement is adopted in dealing with future Parliaments the Government do intend to take any measure on that subject during the present Session, and that by the Government having to enter into the subject of Business, and the matter being in this Session.

TURKEY—NEW EMBASSY

MR. MONK asked Mr. Charles Stewart Under Secretaries of State, whether the New Embassy to Turkey were sent home, and whether a recent set aside; and whether the intention of the Government was to prepare plans already.

MR. SCLAIR said that as the Member was not present, he would answer the question. He had not been informed of those sent to Turkey. From unavoidable little delay he was out of the way.

TURKEY—REPAIRS TO THE EMBASSY AT CONSTANTINOPLE.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will state the name and profession of the gentleman who is responsible for the large excess over the Estimate given for the repairs of the Embassy at Constantinople; and, whether it is not true that no Officer of the Corps of Royal Engineers is responsible for the Estimate or the expenditure in question?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH replied that no Officer of the Royal Engineers could be held responsible for the works performed at the Embassy. He supposed the hon. Gentleman alluded to complaints made in that House a few years since with respect to the withdrawal of the clerk of the works from Constantinople. No doubt the expenditure at that time was incurred by the Office of Works here through their agent at Constantinople; but he was not prepared to say that the expenditure showed any excess over the Estimates.

GRANT TO THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true that the Government have announced their intention of withdrawing the small grant of five hundred pounds which has for some years been made to the Royal Academy of Music; and, whether the Government contemplates the creation of any institution for musical education, to be supported from the public funds?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to withdraw the grant referred to by the hon. Gentleman, it having been withdrawn already. There was no provision for the £500 in the Estimates of this year; and notice being taken of the omission an explanation was given at the time. The discontinuance of the £500 had not been fatal to the institution, for the aid which it required was much larger; and the Government, after investigating the matter, were of opinion that they would not be authorized in recommending any enlargement of the grant, the results of the institution not being, in fact, of a satisfactory character. They were of opinion that provision for a cheap musical education should form part of our national system; but, although the subject had engaged not a little of their attention, he was not prepared to say anything further upon it at present.

IRELAND—RANGER OF THE CURRAGH.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PACK-BERESFORD said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is aware that the gentleman acting temporarily as Ranger of the Curragh has made a claim for £1 for each horse entered to run for the Queen's Plate at the Curragh in April last, and also for £5 from the winner, as fees due to him; and, on what authority that gentleman makes such a claim?

THE EARL OF MAYO, in reply, said, he apprehended that all these arrangements would be altered by the Bill now before Parliament.

NEW SOUTH WALES—TREASON FELONY ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If a Copy of the Treason Felony Act, lately passed by the Legislature of the Colony of New South Wales, has been received by the Colonial Office; and, if so, whether there is any objection to lay a Copy of it upon the Table of the House, with any Despatch that may have accompanied the same?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that the Colonial Office had received a copy of the Treason Felony Act lately passed by the Legislature of New South Wales. It was chiefly copied from the Imperial Act; but it contained some provisions which appeared objectionable, and amendments had been recommended which would, he hoped, be adopted. It was inadvisable, therefore, at present to lay it on the table.

INDIA—REPORT OF THE MUNICIPAL COMMISSIONERS OF BOMBAY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has had transmitted to him officially the Report of the Municipal Commissioners of Bombay for 1867; when the Statistics of India with Maps will be laid upon the Table; and, whether any arrangement has been made for the more rapid issue of the Sheets of India Atlas; and when the next sheets will be issued?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, he had not officially received a copy of the Report of the Municipal Commissioners of Bombay for 1867. The India statistics were nearly ready, with the exception of certain Returns, respecting which further communications with India were required; and arrangements had been made for the issue of sheets of the India Atlas by the Surveyor General of India. He believed some further issues would shortly be made.

CROPS IN CEYLON.—QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Colonial Office has been informed of the failure of the Crops in Ceylon, and of the dying out of large numbers of the Native population; and, whether it is proposed to institute any inquiry, or to take any special measures to meet the scarcity of food?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that no information had been received by the Government of the failure of the crops in Ceylon, and of the dying of large numbers of the population. They had, however, heard of a great drought in the island; but it was not attended by the consequences suggested in the Question.

CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

SIR J. CLARKE JERVOISE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he is aware that a paragraph in The Times of the 7th of September, 1867, announced that the International Veterinary Congress held at Zurich—whether this determination was carried out, and with what success; and, whether the Report of the Resolutions come to by the Congress will be distributed?

“Determined to request the Russian Government to appoint an International Commission to consider the possibility of arresting the cattle plague in its place of origin, the Steppes of Russia?”

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I am not aware, Sir, of the paragraph in The Times to which the hon. Baronet alludes; but have no doubt that such a paragraph would not have been inserted in that paper without good grounds for the statement. The matter does not come under the cognizance of the Privy Council Office, and the inquiry should be directed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Colonel Sykes

BATTA TO

MR. BAILL would beg to ask for India, If Government to served in Aby as troops servi regards batta,

SIR STAFF a communicati Sir Robert Na that batta shor Her Majesty's the great hard gone in the car they have suf have according troops six mont

ARMY—Q MILI

COLONEL KI beg to ask th War, Why, co individuals and ments from Qu being able to re allowance, he pension or reti 27 of the prese enable him to Militia Pay and for the future ance; whethe pensions and r always inserte Clothing Acts termasters wer Militia Regime have been re-in ment in 1854 termasters are sions under the

SIR JOHN said, he was a power to provid ances to Quart present Army l irregular to ad Estimates, and introducing a The matter w consideration, e was not suffici Supplementary COLONEL KI to know, Whet

hon. Gentleman to undertake that the matter should be provided for in the Estimates of next year?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I am not in a position to give any promise on that subject.

INDIA—FACILITIES FOR RELIGIOUS WORSHIP IN THE ARMY.

QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether an Order has been issued by the Governor General in Council for India—

“Relative to providing a room in the lines of European regiments in India to which the men can resort for private reading and prayer, and for holding prayer meetings and other meetings of a similar character, and directing that a room of a suitable size, with such furniture as may be deemed to fit it for the purposes above mentioned, shall be considered one of the recognized requirements in the barracks of every British regiment or considerable detachment of British troops; and, further, that a residence would be assigned to a scripture reader in the married quarters.”

Whether the rooms contemplated in the above Order will be available for the Roman Catholic soldiers for similar purposes of united and public prayer, and other devotional exercises consonant with their religion; and, whether in cases where Roman Catholic soldiers comprise the majority, or other large portion of the troops, a residence will be assigned to a Roman Catholic catechist or religious teacher, as in other cases to a Protestant scripture reader.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that an Order had been issued at the instance of the Commander-in-Chief for India, in which it was stated that a room of suitable size should be considered one of the recognized necessities of European regiments in India. As regarded the other part of the Question of the hon. Member, it rested altogether with the authorities in India; but if the hon. Member would put the Question formally to him he would send it on to them.

MR. O'REILLY said, he wished to know whether if such an application were made it would be granted?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that the matter was one entirely for the consideration of the Governor General of India.

MARRIAGE LAW COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Report of the Marriage Law Commission will be laid before the House?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that the Report of the Marriage Law Commission was ready, and he hoped would be laid on the table before the end of the Session.

ADMISSION OF FOREIGN CATTLE.

QUESTION.

MR. HORSFALL said, seeing that the Order in Council for the admission of Foreign Cattle into certain Ports in this Country specified that such Order was to continue in force until “the end of July, and no longer,” he would beg to ask the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to renew such Order—say for twelve months, or at least until the assembly of the new Parliament, except, of course, in the event of any case of the Cattle Disease arising?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Sir, it is the intention of the Lords of the Council to continue the Order relating to the importation of French and Spanish Cattle until after the meeting of the new Parliament, unless the case alluded to by the hon. Member should arise.

IRELAND—LAW OF PAWNBROKING.

QUESTION.

In answer to Mr. PIM,

THE EARL OF MAYO said, that the question of the law of pawnbroking in Ireland was one of considerable difficulty and intricacy, and he could not promise any legislation on the subject in the present Session. If any vacancy occurred in the offices of pawnbrokers' auctioneers care would be taken that the appointment was made subject to such conditions as Parliament might impose in any legislation on the subject.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. DISRAELI: I have now to move the revival of the Standing Order recently agreed to on the subject of Morning Sittings, and which regulates our Sittings when we meet at two o'clock and adjourn at seven. This Standing Order does not, however, interfere with our Sittings when for any reason the House shall prefer to meet at the usual hour of twelve and to adjourn at four.

Mr. BOUVERIE thought that the matter more immediately before them was the making of arrangements for meetings of the House at two o'clock exactly conformable to the meetings at twelve, only that, instead of their sitting till four and re-assembling at six, they should, when the Minister chose, meet at two and continue to sit till seven. He understood the Prime Minister to say that the two fashions of holding Morning Sittings were still to go on together. Now that, he thought, would be a very inconvenient practice, and they would never know the day before a Morning Sitting whether it would be the pleasure of the Minister that they should meet at twelve and sit till

Mr. DiSaia

Mr. DISRA Question of the Kilmarnock (M that the Stand moving is pre adopted last ye it whatever.

thought it would have that altered myself, if I as Government Editor of a Morning Star course, do with two o'clock, as last year there objected to be de meeting at two do so; and I reviving, as we live, the plan be most prudent precedent of last fully, and to last Session with. With respect

hon. Member Gibson) as to Business, I am aware that I l ral view I laid ago. I then Government - rally, as one u duct of Busin measures of should proce plementary R despatch as pe
we have proce patch; that w vances with th ticipate that

sible with respect to any of them. But I said, at the same time, that there were two measures before the House — namely, the Metropolitan Cattle Market Bill and the Electric Telegraphs Bill—upon which, for particular reasons, we wished to take the opinion of the House. Unfortunately, we have not had that opportunity, owing to the debate the other day terminating in an unexpected manner. And therefore I think the course that I have adopted to-night is one more conducive than any other to a satisfactory result in the general despatch of Business in this House. Originally, I had placed the Electric Telegraphs Bill and the Metropolitan Cattle Market Bill as the first two Orders of the Day; but, in consequence of the strongly-expressed opinion of the House that we should lose no time whatever in coming to a virtual conclusion on the Irish Reform Bill, we changed the Orders in deference to the wish of the House, and placed the Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill first on the Paper. I am not disposed myself to think that Bill will take any considerable time. We shall then proceed with the Electric Telegraphs Bill; and I have an idea, from all that reaches me, that that measure also will not take any considerable time, but yet that the House will arrive at a result which will be satisfactory to those who are greatly interested in that subject. The other measure is one in which Gentlemen take a very deep interest, and I feel bound to give them an opportunity of expressing their opinions upon it. But I have no doubt they will adopt that concinnity of expression and condensation of thought which becomes them. Therefore, I will not take that gloomy view of the state of Public Business which the right hon. Member for Ashton does; but I regard it as being on the whole very satisfactory, and I think we shall be able to send the three Supplementary Reform Bills up to the other House with considerable promptitude. I therefore hope the House will not change the arrangement I have this evening proposed, which I believe is one that will much advance the course of Public Business.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH asked, what course was to be taken with respect to the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill?

MR. DISRAELI: I have already said that when the three Supplementary Reform Bills have passed this House I should then consider what are the most efficacious means we can adopt to carry the Corrupt Practices Bill; and I think we had better clear the Paper a little before we commence with that Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That, unless the House shall otherwise order, whenever the House shall meet at Two o'clock, the House will proceed with Private Business, Petitions, Motions for unopposed Returns, and leave of absence to Members, giving Notices of Motions, Questions to Ministers, and such Orders of the Day as shall have been appointed for the Morning Sitting.

Resolved, That on such days, if the business be not sooner disposed of, the House will suspend its sitting at Seven o'clock; and at Ten minutes before Seven o'clock, unless the House shall otherwise order, Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the Debate on any business then under discussion, or the Chairman shall report Progress, as the case may be, and no opposed business shall then be proceeded with.

Resolved, That when such business has not been disposed of at Seven o'clock, unless the House shall otherwise order, Mr. Speaker (or the Chairman, in case the House shall be in Committee) do leave the Chair, and the House will resume its sitting at Nine o'clock, when the Orders of the Day not disposed of at the Morning Sitting, and any Motion which was under discussion at Ten minutes to Seven o'clock, shall be set down in the Order Book after the other Orders of the Day.

Resolved, That whenever the House shall be in Committee at Seven o'clock, the Chairman do report Progress when the House resumes its sitting.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM— REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 71.]

(The Earl of Mayo, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 15th June.]

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. DISRAELI said: I wish to take the earliest opportunity of expressing the opinion of the Government respecting the clauses of this measure which were postponed the other night. I quite agree with many Gentlemen who spoke the other evening on the subject, that it is by no means expedient to disturb the distribution of electoral power which exists unless there is a prospect of considerable advantage being obtained; and I also agree that the distribution of seats in Ireland could probably not be very much changed, and that no very great benefit in strengthening the representation could be secured thereby. But, at the same time, taking a general view of the electoral system, and having to propose very extensive changes in England as to the distribution of seats, and some not unimportant changes of the same kind in Scotland, we did not wish to appear unwilling to consider the case of Ireland, although we knew it did not offer facilities for improvement in respect to the distribution of seats by any means equal to those presented by England and Scotland. We therefore gave our best attention to the subject, although the area was limited, and the means at our disposal comparatively insignificant. I can assure the House, if it be necessary, that in the project which we brought forward, and the proposition which we made, we were not for a moment influenced by any consideration whatever of party interest. And, although there may be even in this House some Members who are incredulous on the subject, I can say for myself and for my Colleagues that in regard to the distribution of seats, not only in Ireland, but also in England and Scotland, we never have been influenced by petty and contracted views of that kind. I have always thought it a great mistake, when considering these questions, to attempt to carry out any arrangement which could not fairly be justified, with the short-sighted notion of its serving some party interest or connection; because I have lived long enough to know that the opinions of individuals change in a very remarkable manner, that Liberal Peers sometimes become Conservative, and, I am sorry to say, decided Conservatives sometimes become very ultra-Liberals. Therefore, the only consideration with us has been whether we could practically propose any changes which would really improve and strengthen the representation. I flatter myself that, as far as England and Scotland are concerned, the results at which this House has arrived have greatly had that effect. With regard to our proposition in respect to Ireland, I regret to say that it seems to have found very little favour on either side of the House. I am perfectly aware what the cause is of that general dissatisfaction. There exists, very naturally, among those Gentlemen who are connected with Ireland a feeling that the borough representation should not be decreased. But we must, at the same time, see that the borough representation in that country has not that robust character which prevails in England and, to a certain degree, in Scotland. At the same time, it is a consideration of great importance that it should be a primary object, in the re-construction of a civic principle of development as we say that I trust of Ireland will with so much have a representation more satisfactory under all the feeling that changes unless that a great is great advantage Her Majesty's to insist on the 11 and 12, and I move that the believe we shall will, on the the general facilities facilitating the same. With which have Friend the Chief Earl of Mayo] tunity of stating reference to the proposed of we clauses.

Mr. Disraeli

Clause 1 (a)

Clause 2 (A)

THE EARL of right hon. Mr. Fortescue) who providing for the diversity with the purpose Parliament, the opinion that he is the shape of a that view he has in the clause word "only." man's Motion words might be

MR. CHICHESTER accordingly in words.

MR. FAWCHEY for Louth sh clause of which namely, that the Queen's I return two Members.

MR. CHICHESTER said, he had a clause in reference sentation in Ireland, and should bring it up.

Words omitted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 struck out.

Clause 10 (Disfranchisement of certain Boroughs).

THE EARL OF MAYO moved that the clause be omitted from the Bill.

MR. J. GOLDSMID entered his protest against the policy which was proposed, and wanted to know upon what principle the small boroughs of England had been sacrificed, while those of Ireland were not to be molested? In Ireland, too, the boroughs were much smaller than in England; and in the former country Kingstown was the only borough with more than 10,000 inhabitants which was not represented in Parliament. If these small boroughs in Ireland remained represented this would furnish a reason why the new Parliament should interfere with the Reform measures. The matter of Reform had been left much in the hands of the House, and he hoped that the House would take upon itself to disfranchise the small boroughs in Ireland. He should oppose the omission of the clause.

MR. PIM said, he was well pleased that the Government scheme of re-distribution was given up, as he considered it a very bad one. He particularly objected to the transfer of representation from the boroughs to the counties; but, as he understood from the speech of the Prime Minister, that all idea of such a transfer was now abandoned, he would merely say, that, while the proportion of county representatives in England was only 37 per cent of the whole, it was in Ireland at present 62 per cent of the whole; and, under these circumstances, he thought it a most extraordinary proposition to increase the number of country gentlemen, imbued with the same ideas and class prejudices, whichever party they might belong to, and close up so many of the avenues by which the trading and professional classes obtain access to the House. The line of 5,000 which had been adopted in England was no rule for Ireland. The small boroughs were, in fact, quite as independent as some of the larger ones. Mallow was quite as respectable as Athlone, and although the borough of Carrickfergus had a population exceeding 9,000 there were really only 4,028 persons in the town. It was in fact a small county. The only way, in his opinion, to render the small boroughs independent was to group them. This had been resorted to in Scotland and in Wales, and with success. English Members disliked the idea of grouping, and it appeared to be unpopular in Ireland also, but the Scotch and Welsh Members thought well of it. In fact, it was disliked by those who knew nothing about it practically, and approved by those who had experience of its working. Sir Hugh Cairns (now Lord Cairns), although opposing its adoption in England in 1866, had stated that when adopted in Scotland and Wales, "the object was to secure a borough representation, and that there could not have been such a representation at that time in Wales except by aggregating the towns which form these groups." Mr. Gladstone had also defended grouping as a "real Reform," conducing to independence and purity of election. He (Mr. Pim) had put on the Notice Paper, a plan of grouping. He did not expect that plan to be adopted, because he thought any plan to be acceptable to the House must emanate from the Government; but he had suggested that plan in order to show the effects of grouping if done on a large scale. By that plan 200,000 persons would be added to the total population of the cities and boroughs of Ireland, and the borough electors would be increased by about 10,000. This would strengthen these constituencies and take away any plausible excuse for transferring Members from boroughs to counties. Grouping was, in his opinion, the best mode of strengthening the borough representation of Ireland, and rendering it independent; but even as it now stood, if you will disfranchise the small boroughs, there were several large towns unrepresented. The claims of Kingstown were universally admitted, and there was Queenstown, and Fermoy, and Nenagh in the South, and Newtownards, and Lurgan, and Portadown in the North. Why not give Members to these towns instead of to the counties? It was not well to act in so important a matter in the total absence of any expression of public opinion, and there was no such expression in Ireland at present. In fact, the thoughts of the people of Ireland were so engrossed with the important question which had lately been brought before them, that they thought of nothing else. Therefore, while he regretted much that the City of Dublin should not get the third Member to which its population and its position as the capital fully entitled it, and while he thought a proper re-distribution of seats was of great importance, he could not regret that the Government plan had been withdrawn. Before sitting down he must advert to the claims of Ireland to an increased number of Members. If the whole number of 658 was divided among the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, it would be one Member for 44,000 persons nearly. This would give 132 Members as the proportion for Ireland. But even comparing Ireland with Scotland, Scotland had got seven additional Members this Session, making up the total to sixty, which was ten less than their proportion according to population—but, taking Scotland at sixty, Ireland would, on the same scale, be entitled to 113; so that we were now eight Members deficient of what we were entitled to on a comparison with Scotland. If some of these were given to us, the strong claims of the county of Cork to be divided into two ridings, with two Members each, might very properly be acceded to, as ought also those of the city of Dublin, and the town of Belfast. Mr. Gladstone, in the late debate respecting the county of Sutherland, had stated that "the principle of our representation is founded on the basis of population," and surely if this be a good argument for maintaining the property of a Duke, it is equally valid to support the claims of a nation.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT said, he was opposed to the re-distribution scheme of the Government, and he was glad it had been withdrawn. There was no doubt that the case of Ireland was different from that of England, as there were not so many populous boroughs and large cities; but so far as such claims for representation existed, they ought to be satisfied. The population of Londonderry was 20,875, and it had only one Member, whilst Galway, with 25,000 inhabitants, had two.

CAPTAIN HAYTER condemned the course taken by the Government in disfranchising a number of English boroughs, while they allowed such places as Mallow, Kinsale, Downpatrick, Dungannon, Portarlington, and Cashel to be represented. By adopting this course they forfeited all claim to be considered Reformers, and he was sure the first question for the new Parliament would be that of re-distribution of seats in the three countries.

Clause struck out.

Clauses 11 and 12 struck out.

Mr. Pim

Clause 16
Offices not to of another Off

THE EARL
this clause, a in the Registi

Clause struck Clauses 17

THE EARL
the following

(In certain b the owners of w titled to be reg
1868 has been p

"In the Boro Belfast, and Wa entitled to be re of Parliamentary section three of pation of lands,
which the owner Act is liable to of the occupier) rate in respect paid the said that he has no registered at the tary Voters, sub
That all poor ra which have bee
July, one thous and before the eight hundred paid on or before and eight hund

Clause bro time.

MR. CHIC thought the
Those persons Ireland had l
the payment paid by occupi the burden of owners to the payment of r
the first year.

MR. SERJE
jected to the c
made the poss five boroughs, £8, depend other persons fected could And, further, should be paid
it was perfectl could not bee would propose, out all the "Waterford," would give th

out the payment of the last rate. It appeared to him that this would meet the justice of the case.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the clause was drawn up precisely on the same model and contained the same provisions as the clause which it was proposed to insert in the Boundary Bill for England. The principle of all the Bills was that no person was entitled to be registered in respect of the occupation franchise unless he had been rated and had paid his rates; but, as in certain cases there were some occupiers who could not have the opportunity of paying the rates, it would be impossible, if some indulgence were not given, that they could vote this year. If, however, the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman were adopted, the electors in question would have an advantage over other people.

MR. MONSELL urged that it was altogether unfair to put it in the power of another person, who might be of different politics, to deprive his tenants of their votes by not paying the rates.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, that the 1st of July was the last day for paying the rates, and he believed that the rates were all paid by this time. The fact was, it was not in the power of any landlord to disfranchise his tenants, because everything the landlord had was liable for the rates, and it was not to be conceived that he would subject himself to penalties for the sake of depriving his tenants of the right to vote.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that he held in his hand a letter which stated that a large amount of rates due by landlords in Dublin remained unpaid up to yesterday. If that were the case, was it not a monstrous thing that a landlord, by keeping the rates unpaid until the 2nd of July, might have it in his power to deprive his tenants of their votes?

MR. SYNAN argued that no principle was at stake, since the operation of the Amendment would expire on the 1st of January next, and that it would be unjust to deprive occupiers of their votes in consequence of the act of their landlords.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he was prepared to agree to the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Serjeant Barry) on the understanding that it applied only to the rate which had just been struck, and not to any future one. He admitted that there was some force in the argument that persons might otherwise be disfranchised through causes beyond their own control, and he did not wish to place any unnecessary obstacle in the way of their getting upon the register. He thought the object in view might be obtained by adopting the former part of his clause, and omitting the condition that rates payable between the 1st of July, 1867, and the 1st of January, 1868, should have been duly paid before the 1st of July next.

Clause read a second time, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY moved to amend the clause by striking out all the words after the word "Waterford" in line 1, in order to insert the following words:—

"So far as regards the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, and so far as regards any subsequent year until a new rate shall have been made and a register of voters formed in respect of such rate, the occupiers of lands, tenements, and hereditaments in the Boroughs of Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Belfast, and Waterford, respectively, rated at the net annual value of less than eight pounds and more than four pounds, shall be entitled to be put on the register of voters, and to vote for the Election of Members of Parliament for such Boroughs respectively, notwithstanding that in the last rate for the time being the immediate lessor of such lands, tenements, and hereditaments shall have been rated in respect thereof, and notwithstanding that any rates made on such immediate lessor shall remain unpaid."

Clause brought up, and read a first time.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he would agree to the clause if it was understood to apply only to the rate that had been struck, and not to future rates. He should, however, prefer to have the words of his own clause, which, without the condition appended, would carry out the intention of the hon. and learned Member.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, it would be necessary, either in this Bill or in the new Registration Act, to provide machinery for having the names of these occupiers furnished to the proper authority, so that they might be placed on the register.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, the matter would receive his attention.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he did not know whether Members sitting below the Gangway were supposed to take any part in the debate; but for the last half hour there had been such a conversational tone maintained between the Gentlemen on either side of the table that not one word had been heard below the Gangway. Hon. Members sitting there did not know what was the Question before the House, for the Bill had been so altered that they

Oxford and Cambridge, provided for the discipline and residence of only 118 of its undergraduates, while with respect to 518 it was on the footing of the Queen's Colleges or the Scotch Universities; and in regard to 581, it was upon the footing of London University, giving degrees solely on the passing of certain stated examinations, and not requiring either attendance at lectures or residence in College. There was no such violent contrast between the two Irish Universities as that which was last year described as existing between the Universities of London and Durham; and the parallel was much stronger between them and the Scotch Universities, which had just been united for the purposes of Parliamentary representation. Last year they gave London University one Member, while Dublin University now enjoyed two. Again, London University and the Scotch Universities having now received Parliamentary representation, the want of such representation would now be felt by the Queen's University in Ireland as a much greater disadvantage and grievance than heretofore. There were other proposals on the Paper for attaining the same end as he contemplated. Among them was the proposal of the hon. and learned Baronet (Sir Colman O'Loughlin), which he believed would not be pressed, for depriving the University of Dublin of one seat and giving it to the Queen's University. That was a more violent plan than his, and not likely to be as acceptable. Then the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) proposed the grouping of certain small Irish boroughs in order to obtain an additional seat for the representative of the Irish Universities. The plan of grouping having, however, been given up, that proposal was out of the question, and his own proposal was, he thought, the most natural mode of doing some justice to that body of Irish graduates which could be suggested. Although, no doubt, they would prefer separate representation, yet they would admit that his plan was not unimportant to their academical interests. It would increase the dignity of the Queen's University, while it would also improve the University representation of Ireland generally. It would likewise considerably strengthen the lay element in the constituency, a matter of no slight importance; and it would compel the Members for the Universities to take into account the opinions and interests of a wider and much more varied class than they had now to consider. He believed that his proposal, while removing the grievances under which a body of Irish graduates now laboured, would strengthen the University representation of Ireland by adding to it some of the best educated men of the country. With these views he confidently moved his clause.

Clause (In all future Parliaments the University of Dublin and the Queen's University in Ireland shall jointly return two Members to serve in Parliament for said Universities.)—(Mr. Chichester Fortescue),—brought up, and read the first time.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, it seemed to have been agreed, by the almost general consent of the Committee, not to entertain now any question with regard to the re-distribution of seats; but the Amendment was a proposal for re-distribution. It was one of an objectionable character; for it was like a proposal to join the London University with one of the older Universities for the purpose of representation, and such a proposal, when made last year, did not find much favour, while the proposal to join Durham University to that of London was opposed by the Liberal party. The Amendment proposed to join for the purposes of representation two bodies that were essentially distinct—which had different opinions upon almost every subject; and whose combination could produce nothing but discord. The strongest argument against the proposal was that it was not demanded by anyone connected with these two bodies. A distinguished and influential member of Convocation of the Queen's University had written to him—

"The project of uniting the constituencies of the two Universities as proposed was discussed among ourselves the other day at a committee of Convocation, and unanimously condemned. I do not think a single voice was raised in its favour. We should nominally have two representatives who would virtually represent another institution."

He had always entertained the opinion that if it were possible it would be desirable to bestow Parliamentary representation on the Queen's University, and he would have proposed to give it in the re-distribution scheme which had been submitted to the House but for the pressing claims of the large populations. In any future scheme the claims of the Queen's University must be considered. It would now give a constituency of 880, but in a few years it may be expected that the increase of Members would give a large and independent constituency. The present arrangements with regard to the qualifications for voters for the Dublin University were not altogether satisfactory. The voter must be an M.A., and pay £5 for registration and £9 10s. on taking the degree, so that it cost £15 to become a voter of the University. Hence the disparity between the roll of Masters and that of electors, the latter containing 1,870 names, and the former the names of 1,496 additional who did not possess the franchise. He was empowered by the authorities of the University to say he should be prepared, when the Registration Bill was before the House, to make an alteration in the system which had hitherto prevailed in the University of Dublin. He would propose a clause to give the franchise to every M.A. on taking his degree, without requiring as a condition the payment of any registration fee. The list of M.A.'s would then be the electoral roll. Seeing that the Board of Trinity College were prepared to make so large a concession, and that neither University favoured the Amendment, he hoped the Committee would pause before adopting it, for it would not add to the weight of the representation of Trinity College, nor meet the case of the younger institution.

MR. GREGORY said, he wholly dissented from the position of the noble Lord, that because the Government had abandoned their scheme of re-distribution they were not to form any new constituency. A more miserable confession of pusillanimity had never proceeded from a Treasury Bench. But how did that confession contrast with the spirit of the right hon. Gentleman at the Head of the Government at Merchant Taylors' Hall the night before, in which, describing the magnificence of the edifice the Government had reared, and the new system of Parliamentary Reform which was to leave its stamp of glory on their names for ever, the right hon. Gentleman spoke of "a political settlement which has successfully reconciled the traditions of our ancient country and the requirements of modern times." The Government had abstained from interfering about six miserable boroughs, which, taken altogether, would not make one good constituency. The noble Lord laid the whole stress of his case on the fact that Trinity College did not wish for that which was proposed. Of course it did not, for it was one of the closest corporations ever known. What was it except the representative of that Established Church which we were determined to do away with? What were the Members for Trinity College chosen for except to be pieces of the C. One of its Members of every measure of every measure of civil and religious the other was Government - "All honours the University to represent always sent to Church and Government, the was broken up was to give a University he that there ought degree in Ireland Protestant and would stamp that the representation necessarily Presbyterian; intellectual or proposal had Liberalism up everyone would representation Ireland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (IRELAND) said, in this Motion, as interests of the in that of the sented. If the Universities with overwhelming strength in the you would intr and of rivalry, triumphing or make itself ob antagonism between the two to prevail. At the Queen's borne in elect body of that a constant tem ber of its men dard of its deg to be gained by the Queen's were unwilling wise enough to been presented no meeting of it; it was hon. Gentlemen his alone. The

The Earl of Mayo

to have a Member of its own, and he hoped the day would come when it would have one.

Question put, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 173; Noes 183: Majority 10.

MR. FAWCETT said, he understood that the Government were not averse, while opposing the grouping together the University of Dublin and the Queen's University, to give the latter representation. He himself, indeed, did not think that the proposal which had just been rejected was the best for giving effect to that object, and he would therefore move that Portarlington, the smallest borough in Ireland, be disfranchised, and the seat taken from it conferred on the Queen's University.

THE CHAIRMAN informed the hon. Gentleman that he must put his proposal in the shape of a clause.

COLONEL FRENCH then rose to move a clause which stood on the Paper in his name, but was interrupted by

MR. FAWCETT, who asked the Chairman to be good enough to inform him in what terms his Motion should be couched to render it formal?

THE CHAIRMAN: The proper way for the hon. Member to proceed is to frame a clause giving effect to his intentions. He can then move the second reading of that clause.

MR. FAWCETT said, that by the assistance of a Friend a clause embodying his views had been placed in the hands of the Chairman. He begged, therefore, to move that it be now read a second time.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the clause was not ready when the hon. Member for Brighton concluded his speech, and that the hon. Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) had just risen to move a clause of which Notice had been given. Under these circumstances the hon. Member for Roscommon would have the right to move his clause first; but the hon. Member for Brighton would be at liberty to move his clause afterwards.

MR. FAWCETT thereupon stated that he should move his clause as soon as he had an opportunity of doing so.

COLONEL FRENCH again rose for the purpose of moving his Amendment, when

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the convenient course had been usually adopted in Committee of considering the new clauses in the order in which they stood upon the Paper. On the present occasion, however, the clause of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth (Mr. C. Fortescue) had been taken first, under circumstances which the Committee would remember. But, as that had been disposed of, it was natural to revert to the ordinary course of taking the clauses as they stood upon the Paper; and therefore the hon. Member could not move his clause first, except by the common consent of Gentlemen who had clauses on the Paper preceding his. If those Gentlemen wished to move their clauses first they were at liberty to do so. The first clause on the Paper was that of the hon. Member for Athlone (Mr. Rearden).

MR. REARDEN said, he would not press the clause which stood in his name.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER rose to move the clause of which he had given notice. Its object was to assimilate the law of England and that of Ireland with respect to the expenses of clerks of the peace. In England the clerks of the peace were entitled not only to be repaid the sums expended by them, but were also entitled to reasonable remuneration for their time and trouble in performing the services and duties imposed upon them in regard to the registration of voters. This was not the case in Ireland, and he therefore begged to move the following clause:—

(Definition of the word "expenses.")

"The word 'expenses' contained in section seventy of the Act of the thirteenth and fourteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter sixty-nine, shall be deemed to and shall include and apply to all proper and reasonable fees and charges of any clerk of the peace of, or acting for, any county, county of a city, or county of a town, or by any clerk of the peace of, or acting in or for, any borough situate in a county at large, to be hereafter made or charged by him in any year for his trouble, care, and attention in the performance of the services and duties imposed upon him by the said Act or by this Act, in addition to any money actually paid or distributed by him for, or in respect of, any such service or duties as aforesaid."

MR. G. MORRIS seconded the Motion. The justice of the case required that these officers should be paid.

Clause brought up, and read a first time.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he was unable to assent to the insertion of the clause which related to the clerks of the peace for all the counties in Ireland. Those gentlemen were already remunerated sufficiently for the work they performed, the arrangements as regards their duties in connection with the electoral lists having been settled by the Act of 1850. He had not heard that there was any indisposition on the part of gentlemen to fill vacancies when they occurred, through a feeling that the remuneration was insufficient. He thought there was no ground whatever for making an addition to the local taxation by increasing the remuneration of this particular class of officers.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN regretted that the noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo) would not agree to the clause, as, in his opinion, there ought to be no difference made in this respect between England and Ireland. If the salary were only one-half its present amount there would be the same number of applications for the situations when vacant.

LORD JOHN BROWNE reminded the House that the question of the remuneration of clerks of the peace in Ireland had been under the consideration of the Grand Jury Committee upstairs, who, if those officers were not sufficiently paid already, would, in all probability recommend the increase of their salaries.

MR. VANCE thought that, as additional duties would be imposed on the clerks of the peace by this Bill, they were fairly entitled to additional remuneration.

MR. BRADY asked why those gentlemen should not be compensated for the additional duties placed upon them?

MR. SERJEANT ARMSTRONG said, he saw no objection to giving power to the Grand Jurors, whose interest it was to keep down the county expenditure, to consider whether or not some reasonable allowance should be made to the clerks of the peace in consideration of the extra duties imposed on them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WARREN), observed, if the Amendment should be carried the clerks of the peace in Ireland would be entitled to an increase of salary, and from the inquiries which he had made he saw no reasonable ground for additional payment.

MR. SYNAN doubted whether the presentments of the Grand Jury would be compulsory under the Act of Parliament.

MR. BAGWELL said, he did not believe there was any class of officers in Ireland who deserved less to have an increase of salary. It was generally a complete sinecure, and the holders of the office got deputed to whom they

The Earl of Mayo

THE O'CONNOR said that the salaries were much greater than the same, the much diminished

MR. BARRELL said that the clerks of the judicial emoluments

LORD JOHN BROWNE said that the salary of the clerks of the duties would be

Clause with

SIR GEORGE BROWNE said that he should be the event of the gallant Member (French) being

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said the following

(Freemen's franchise) existing freemen

"After the passing of the Bill, he would be entitled to vote to serve in Parliament by reason of being a borough, save and except of the passing of the Bill, he would be enrolled as freeman of a city or borough.

The hon. Member said that the number of boroughs which had franchise existed of those the number exceeded 10; in three it was 143; in 350; in Galway 752; and in to the freemen's cause, it was a system, which detriment of exercised a elections for the didates who fringes had to Skinners' Alley and belts, or in obtaining the whether the (Mr. Vance) and belt he was in conjunction with represented the city of Dublin; perhaps they might also be useful for the electors of Armagh. There was no reason why freemen should not have votes as rate-payers; but one great objection to the present system was that while ratepayers were bound to pay their rates by a particular day, freemen avoided the payment of rates; and they were also privileged to have a separate polling-booth for themselves. Bribery and corruption prevailed in every borough where freemen existed. In Dublin elections a certain number of freemen must be bought whoever might be the candidate. Every election petition that had been presented charged bribery to have existed to an enormous extent. In Galway, too, it had always been the custom to pay the freemen so much per head. His clause would enact that after the passing of this Act no freeman should be enabled to vote except those actually on the roll. The freeman franchise was a remnant of Orange ascendancy in Ireland, and therefore he hoped the House would do away with it, saving the rights of existing freemen.

Clause (Freemen's franchise abolished, saving rights of existing freemen,)—(Sir Colman O'Loughlen,) — brought up, and read the first time.

MR. VANCE said, he did not think that at the time the Notice was put upon the Paper that the hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) seriously intended to bring the subject forward, because he had always expressed himself opposed to disfranchisement. He did not see why an exception should be made in the case of Ireland in respect of the freeman franchise. This franchise had not been interfered with in England; and the hon. and learned Baronet was the last man whom he should have suspected of a wish to disfranchise any class of the citizens of Dublin. In that city there were many Roman Catholic freemen who had not shown themselves favourable to him when he was a candidate for Dublin; but he should not like to see them disfranchised nevertheless. The hon. and learned Baronet objected to political power being continued in hereditary succession; but was not legislative power so continued in the other branch of the Legislature? He hoped that within the next few days the other House would give another proof of the advantage of hereditary powers in legislation. After one of his elections for Dublin there was a petition against his return in which the conduct of the freemen was greatly impugned. That petition came in due course before an Election Committee composed of three Gentlemen from the Opposition and two from the Ministerial side of the House. That Committee acquitted the freemen of Dublin of any corruption or any improper practices, and, finding the conduct of those electors perfectly pure, the Committee unanimously refused to report against the freemen. The hon. and learned Baronet had given the House an amusing account of a society, styled "The Aldermen of Skinners' Alley." He (Mr. Vance) belonged to that society, and he could assure the House that the hon. and learned Baronet was inaccurate as to his description of their sashes. They had no uniform, but they had principles which he was afraid would exclude the hon. and learned Baronet from the privileges of membership. The origin of the society was this — When James II. abdicated the Throne of this country and went to Ireland, he found in Dublin a Protestant Corporation. He determined to substitute for it a Roman Catholic Corporation; but the Protestant Corporation, unwilling to lose their regalia and paraphernalia carried them to a place of retirement in Skinners' Alley. The Aldermen of Skinners' Alley were a society which met annually to commemorate that event, and he could assure the House that it was a society of which no Protestant need be ashamed. The only case that the hon. and learned Baronet had made against the freemen of Dublin was that the majority were true Conservatives.

MR. G. MORRIS said, that in the borough of Galway, which he had the honour to represent, the freemen constituted about a third of the constituency. That they were not hereditary Orangemen was shown by the fact that only about thirty of them were Protestants, while the remaining 400 and odd were Roman Catholics. No doubt the freeman system in Galway had its origin in the wish to encourage a Protestant settlement in that town. There was a recital to that effect in the Act of Parliament; but about the year 1842 a change was made, by which Roman Catholics were admitted to the freedom of the town. If they were to compare the sums expended on elections in Clare as against the expenditure for a similar purpose in Galway, the latter would come out of the ordeal very well. It had been stated that he was the first Member returned for Galway without bribery. Now, he had succeeded a very near relative in the representation of that borough; and he had personal knowledge of the fact that 92 per cent of the electors had voted for his relative. Two petitions had been presented against his return, and not only had those petitions been declared groundless, but the Committee had given his relative costs on the ground that they were frivolous and vexatious. He himself had been returned for Galway without a contest at all. On those facts he thought that he was entitled to submit that the electors of Galway were not as black as they were painted. This was intended to be an enfranchising and not a disfranchising Bill, and he therefore regretted that attacks having for their object to disfranchise existing classes of voters should have been put forward, and that from the Liberal Benches. The hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim) thought that Galway, with a population of 25,000 or 26,000 was not entitled to a second representative; and the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) proposed at one sweep to do away with one-third of his constituents. If anything could confirm him in the view which he entertained that he was sitting upon the right side of the House, it would be the fact that attacks like these upon his native town had proceeded in both cases from the Liberal Benches. He trusted that the Government upon this occasion would support the freeman franchise.

MR. MONSELL said, he thought the case against the freemen had been so clearly established by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare that he would not have thought it necessary to address the House but for the observations of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. G. Morris) and the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance). The hon. Member for Galway had contended that the freemen of Galway were not a corrupt class. In answer to that he would refer to an extract from the Report of a Committee appointed to try the election in 1857, which stated that while many of the voters had eloped the number of those who would be got at and who were proved to have been bribed was 179, of whom all but four were freemen. Even the hon. Member for Armagh spoke of the purity of the freemen of Dublin, and said the Committee appointed to try his election for that city decided that there had been no bribery. That was perfectly true; but the Committee also reported that promises to bribe on the hon. Members behalf he on behalf of hon. Member make the point the merits of anxious to hear the opposite how? He had all the personal of qualification when the franchise, what freemen who, possess the franchise? Those from the same land only admittance. In Dublin and of these in right of daughters of which were and which were practice in Dublin trusted the to the system

Mr. G. Morris

MR. PIM intention of the anomalous should be ordinary franchise every respect. The only objection and less O'Loghlen)

inchoate right therefore proposed to the Member serve these the second by the hon. the second move the add

"And these twenty-one years the claim be on years, if the claim

With this Amendment would the noble Lord Ireland, would

THE EARL the Committee aious on the had invariably refusing to a body of elect consideration long existing grounds. It appeared to him that the principal objections of the hon. and learned Member for Clare to the freemen was the same as the objection of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. C. Fortescue) to Trinity College, that they sent Members to that House who were opposed to them on politics. That was a curious objection to come from Liberal Members; but he was sure it would have no weight with the Committee. The number of freemen in Ireland were 4,900, and of these there were 2,500 in Dublin. This was a proposal to disfranchise about one-sixth of the constituency of Dublin, and one-third of the constituency of Galway. In Waterford, too, it would disfranchise nearly one-third, certainly one-fourth of the existing constituency. On all former occasions the House had refused to destroy this franchise; for, though the Reform Act of 1832 certainly did place it under restrictions, its abolition was never contemplated. Inasmuch as the House had hitherto refused to destroy this franchise, he certainly could not think that the House would consent to deal with this last of the measures affecting the representation of the people in a manner different from those which had already been finished, and he trusted, therefore, that the Committee would negative the proposition.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, he was of opinion that no one who considered the subject in its true bearings could doubt the advisability of adopting the proposal now before the Committee. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen said "Oh, oh" so loudly without knowing one iota of the subject. In 1857 an election had taken place in Dublin, and there voted for two of the candidates 6,027 persons of property, station, and position, and those candidates had in the number 728 freemen. There were two other candidates who obtained the votes of 3,267 persons of property and position, and the votes of 3,800 freemen. So that the property votes were disfranchised by the votes of the freemen, who contributed nothing to the taxation of the city, or, indeed, to taxation of any kind. The Government had hitherto congratulated the House on having established the representation on the basis of taxation; but no argument of that nature could be urged in favour of the retention of this franchise. Indeed, in the city of Dublin the freeman vote was simply outrageous. Hon. Members might talk about its being hereditary; but the "grand birthright," as it was termed, according to legal definition, was derived from men who steadfastly refused to create any freemen who were not Protestants, or any Protestants whose opinions differed from their own. Of 2,858 freeman, no less than 1,755 were admitted to the vote in consequence of marrying daughters and granddaughters of freemen. When a right existed flowing from so corrupt a source, it ought not to be allowed to continue. He was certainly not previously aware that the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance) was an Alderman of Skinner's Alley; but he could not compliment the hon. Member on having transferred the saturnalia to that place. He was one of the candidates who obtained the votes of the 3,800. Every man of common sense would see that the proposal ought to be adopted, and he therefore trusted that it would receive the consent of the Committee.

Mr. HENLEY said, he understood the object of the legislation of the last two years to be to enfranchise, not to disfranchise. When that House was asked last year to disfranchise the freemen of England they had refused to do so, and he should refuse to disfranchise the freemen of Ireland upon the present occasion. The right hon. Member for the county of Limerick (Mr. Monsell) said that some of the freemen of Ireland had wives who might use their influence to make them vote a particular way; but surely it was not an enormity for a man to vote in the way he was required by his wife. One of the privileges that a lady obtained by marriage was the power of influencing her husband in many things, and surely the right hon. Gentleman would not disfranchise all the freemen of Ireland because they had the good taste to get married. But the right hon. Gentleman went a step further, and complained that many of the freemen were guilty of the enormity of having fathers and grandfathers. The right hon. Gentleman said that the freemen had swamped the voters who exercised their votes under a property qualification; but he forgot to mention that in future that property qualification would consist simply in having occupied for a twelvemonth a tenement valued at £4 per annum, whereas the freemen were usually members of corporations who took a pride in being placed upon the register as freemen. Believing that the present Bill was framed for the purpose of enfranchisement, he refused to consent to its being converted into a disfranchising instrument.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, the right hon. Gentleman had one, and one only, fundamental argument against the proposition which had been made from that (the Opposition) side of the House. He says that the Reform Bill was a Bill by which they enfranchised, but did not disfranchise. [Mr. HENLEY dissented.] He (Mr. Gladstone) took direct issue with the right hon. Gentleman. They disfranchised by the English Reform Bill a great number of persons who possessed the franchise. He could not be aware of this—that when they extended the suffrage in towns they disfranchised a great number of persons. It was true that it might be said that while, on the one hand, these people were deprived of their county votes, they obtained a borough vote; but what became of the leaseholders in towns who were deprived of their vote without receiving any franchise in return? Did the right hon. Gentleman shake his head now? No, he did not, because he could not deny that the statement he had made was correct. When the House had seen occasion to abolish any particular franchise it had not been deterred from so doing by the mere cant word “disfranchisement.” What was the difference between the cases of the leaseholders and of the freemen? The noble Lord (the Earl of Mayo) had said with great truth that at the time of the passing of both the last Reform Act and the Reform Act of 1832 the House refused to disfranchise the freemen; but that circumstance was owing to the existence of a party in the House which was willing to trade upon the favour of this particular class of voters in the expectation of making capital out of them at the next election. The exertions of that party were aided by those of a number of weak brethren on the Opposition Benches, who assisted to postpone the period of the destined immolation of this class of voters—one of the least creditable of the episodes in connection with the last Reform Bill. The real question to be determined on the present occasion was whether or not the freeman franchise operated beneficially to the country. At one period, undoubtedly, it did operate beneficially to the interests of the country, as it afforded a means, and the only means, of the opinions of the working classes being in any way represented in that House. But now that the broad principle of household suffrage had been adopted, there was no longer any reason for maintaining this particular franchise, which every Member in that House source of corruption last year destroyed of England was the case again assumed, would have been shown to be £10 household corruption tainted with it man was calculated that the franchise as they were going on the Why should franchise be a daughter of a deceive of anything him the idea This he would which the House kind would a of its earnest stop to corrupt extinguish corruption as they continued to the working party. The £8 franchise pleaded, but a modern class to the desirable to give what became they had carried meanest tone was bound to kind, it was to keep up a franchise far more respectable which occurred who yielded certainly supported

Mr. Henley

Mr. J. LO observations in South Lancashire corruption of freemen could only be removed from the roughs of Leamington, and to remind the House of the case. Of electors in the 1,006 were freemen not extraordinary of the corruption were freemen, half a dozen freemen; and portion of the

could have been attributable to freemen. In the case of Reigate, there was not a single freeman upon the register; and in the case of Great Yarmouth, it would be recollected that some years since the House in its wisdom thought fit to strike at the root of corruption by disfranchising the freemen of that borough; and therefore those persons could scarcely be held responsible for the corruption that had occurred subsequently to their disfranchisement.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had not the figures by him at that moment; but he could tell the hon. Gentleman that he was not so entirely unaccustomed to the handling of statistics as to be misled by the gross proportion as between freemen and householders which he had quoted in the case of Lancaster. The comparison he drew was not between the gross number of guilty freemen, and the gross number of guilty householders, but between the proportion of guilty and innocent freemen and the proportion of guilty and innocent householders; and, if the hon. Gentleman would take the trouble to refer to authentic documents, he would find that they would bear out what he (Mr. Gladstone) had stated.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowther) had given some electoral facts with regard to England; he would give one fact with respect to Ireland. A Parliamentary Commission reported on the Galway election, in 1857, that 179 voters in the borough had been guilty of receiving bribes, and that of these 179 voters there were only four who were not freemen.

MR. VANCE said, in regard to Galway, he might remind the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Fortescue) that since the year 1857 two petitions had been presented against the sitting Members for Galway; and so much had the freemen improved that not a single charge of corruption had been established against them.

MR. G. MORRIS said, that in 1865 two petitions were presented against the Members returned for Galway. It was shown that 92 per cent of the constituency had registered their votes, and after a thorough inquiry the petitions were declared frivolous and vexatious. That took place ten years after the occurrence upon which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. C. Fortescue) had relied for proof of the unfitness of the Irish freemen to retain their franchise.

Question put, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 109; Noes 155: Majority 46.

MR. FAWCETT proposed that Portarlington be disfranchised, and that its Member be given to the Queen's University. He should much regret the absence from the House of his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Lawson); but he thought the Queen's University was justly entitled to representation, and as the Government had objected to the proposal to unite it with Dublin University the only alternative was to provide it a Member at the expense of the smallest borough. The population of Portarlington was under 3,000, there were only 106 electors, and at the last election his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Lawson) was returned by 46 votes—35 being given to the other candidate. The Queen's University, on the other hand, though only established a few years, would form a constituency of nearly 800, comprising a considerable portion of the intelligence of the country, and with an annual increment of 100 or 150 the number would probably increase in six or seven years to 1,500. This was not merely a question of re-distribution, but of enfranchisement; and persons who had passed through a curriculum as severe as that of Oxford or Cambridge ought not to be debarred a privilege that would be enjoyed by every University of the slightest consequence in England and Scotland.

Clause (In all future Parliaments the Queen's University in Ireland shall return one Member to serve in Parliament for such University, and the borough of Portarlington shall cease to return a Member to serve in Parliament for the said borough,)—(Mr. Fawcett,)—brought up, and read the first time.

THE EARL OF MAYO stated that the re-distribution portion of the Bill having been abandoned, the Government could not entertain this proposal.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE advised his hon. Friend (Mr. Fawcett) not to press his proposition, the present not being a final measure with regard to Irish representation, and the University question being still unsolved.

MR. FAWCETT, contending that his proposal involved an important principle, felt bound to take the sense of the Committee upon it.

Question put, "That the said Clause be read a second time :"—The Committee divided :—Captain Grosvenor, one of the Members for the City of Westminster, came to the Table, and stated that having been in the House when the Question was put, but not having heard it, he had not voted :—Whereupon the Question was again stated to him, and being informed by the Chairman that he must vote, he declared that he voted with the Noes :—Ayes 55 ; Noes 210 : Majority 155.

COLONEL FRENCH rose to move the following clause :—

(Occupation franchise in counties.)

"From and after the passing of this Act, the first section of the Act of the thirteenth and fourteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter sixty-nine, and all other sections or parts of the same Act which relates to or affect the franchise conferred by the said first section, or the registration of voters upon whom it is conferred, and in which are the words 'twelve pounds' in reference to the said franchise, shall be read and construed as if the words 'more than eight pounds' had been used and were substituted in the said first and other sections, instead of and for the words 'twelve pounds,' so and in such manner that subject to all the provisions of the said Act, the occupation of lands, tenements, or hereditaments rated at the net annual value of more than eight pounds shall be as effectual to qualify any man to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote at any Election of Members to serve in Parliament for any county in Ireland to be held after the passing of this Act as the occupation of lands, tenements, and hereditaments rated at the net annual value of twelve pounds and upwards was before the passing of this Act ; and in all provisions relating to such occupation, registration, or voting, and in all lists, returns, precepts, notices, or other forms made or issued in pursuance of the provisions of the Registration Acts, the words 'more than eight pounds' shall, when necessary, be substituted for the words 'twelve pounds.'"

The hon. and gallant Member complained that while the Bill made but a slight addition to the borough franchise in Ireland it left the county franchise wholly untouched. He asked the House for no favour—justice alone he sought. If the House was governed by principle or consistency they could not refuse to deal with Ireland in this matter in the same spirit as they had dealt with England and Scotland. He asked Members to forget the insinuations that had been made that his object was to destroy the influence of the landed interest. Ireland had long been unfairly treated in regard to the county franchise ; its ancient 40s. freehold franchise—one as old as that which existed either in England or Scotland—having many years ago in England it touched. Ab were disfranchised constituency was 140,000. In when Lord R Government the people in franchise was rating, under £12 per annum the £50 and titled to vote from the franchise. He now desired from a £12 to extensions of 1 year in both England, and being granted to the counties to the borough 100,000—the proposed to extension of and denied that of that of the received in the England had principle, in any resemblance. In 18 in this House rating franchise Peel, who was took occasion figure, and then for it. A rate the same price land as a £1 of England. of rated ten was 5,500 ; in land, 11,000 an increase in land but 33, notion with allowed a fair this was altered was agreed on was ultimately assured that an was equivalent England ; at such a limit The entire no added to the ally with Ireland about 32,000

Mr. Fawcett

hon. Gentleman opposite would be able to justify themselves with their consciences or their constituencies if, having reduced the county franchise in England and Scotland, they did not also reduce it in Ireland.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, that if the proposal of the Government with regard to the Irish county franchise was to make any substantial difference between the county franchises in England and Ireland, there would be great weight in what had been said by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down. The result of passing the Bill before the House would be that the county franchise in Ireland would be placed on precisely the same footing with the county franchise in England as fixed by the Bill of last year. The fact was that Ireland had anticipated England in this matter. In 1850 an Act was passed which created for the first time in Ireland an occupation franchise, fixed at £12. So it had remained ever since, and had given general satisfaction. The effect of this change was an enormous enfranchisement in Ireland, the number of county voters being raised from 41,000 to 176,000 or 178,000. When, therefore, it was said that no provision had been made for the extension of the county franchise in Ireland, the fact was lost sight of that a very large extension had already taken place—a larger proportional extension, he believed, than had been effected in England by the Act of last year. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not shown that there was anything in the circumstances of Ireland to justify a lower county franchise than in England; and his proposition rested principally upon the difference between valuation here and in Ireland, which he said had the effect of placing the franchise in Ireland at a higher figure than in England. In 1852 it was enacted that valuation in Ireland should be based upon the value of agricultural produce, and also upon the principle adopted in this country; but, although there was a difference in the process between the two countries, the result in both was very nearly the same. The scale of valuation for produce laid down in 1852 was somewhat too low. It was conceded on both sides that the basis of the valuation was not a satisfactory one, and it would be absolutely necessary for the Government in power next year to propose great alterations in it. In the Bill of the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) introduced last year, the value of agricultural produce as a basis of valuation was given up as untenable, and the annual letting value was substituted free of rates and taxes, and with deductions for expenses, insurance, and repairs. It was necessary to remember that the earlier valuations were affected by the average of poor rates for three years; and, the average having fallen, a corresponding variation had been made. That applied to a great part of Ulster, which had been more recently valued, and where flax was not included in the Schedule of agricultural produce. At present the valuation came as near as possible to that of this country; but with regard to the counties which were first valued, some change in the system of valuation must shortly be made. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had declared it was necessary, and the late Government had recorded their opinions in a Bill. The alleged difference between the systems of valuation in England and Ireland fell to the ground, and no case had been made out for the exceptional course proposed. It was the duty of the House to maintain the county franchise in Ireland as nearly as possible at the same point as in England; and he believed that that equality would give Ireland as many votes in proportion to its population as England and Scotland had. There was really no substantial reason for the difference proposed.

MR. SYNAN said, that the noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo) had forgotten that this was an economical question as far as concerned the two countries. Did £12 rating in England represent the equivalent of £12 rating in Ireland? It was not the figures we had to deal with, but the persons; and the £12 occupiers in the two countries belonged to different classes. It could not be maintained that £100 at the West End of London was equal to £100 in a provincial town. On that principle, when this House fixed the occupation franchise for Ireland at £8 the Lords raised it to £15, and £12 was adopted as a compromise. Valuation in England was fixed by local authority on the principle of the letting value. This must necessarily give a higher valuation than fixing it for the purposes of taxation; and it was admitted that the present valuation for taxation in Ireland was far below the letting value of the land. Apply that with the economical reasons stated to the figures before the House, and the franchise must be reduced to £8 or £9.

Mr. OSBORNE said, he was sure the great majority of the Committee would agree with him in the opinion that one of the most unpleasant ways of passing a hot summer evening in the month of June was in discussing the clauses of a so-called Irish Reform Bill. [A laugh.] He said "so-called" Irish Reform Bill, because he believed that in the minds of the tenant-farmers of that country—and especially of persons who lived in it but were not connected with it by representation—the measure was neither desirable nor desired. It was, in fact, altogether an ignis fatuus; for the re-distribution portion of it, its only good feature, had been entirely wiped out. That being so, his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) proposed to reduce the county franchise from £12 to £8, and if that reduction would really confer a free and independent franchise, he should give the proposal his support. He had, however, his doubts upon that point. He believed that the true reform which was wanting in the constituencies in Ireland was not so much the lowering of the franchise as protection to those by whom the present franchise was held, and he was strongly of opinion that if it were reduced from £12 to £8 without such protection to the tenant, a positive injury would be done him by the Bill. Why did he take that view? It was very much the fashion in that House to grow enamoured of the principle of rating. That was the principle which prevailed in Ireland, but how did it operate? There existed there unfortunately a self-registering system, under which the tenant was left no option. His name was placed on the register, contrary in most instances to his own feelings, especially if he happened to have no lease. His interests dragged him one way, his convictions another. If he voted in the South of Ireland, where by conviction he was generally opposed to his landlord, in accordance with his conviction, he sometimes received notice to quit. If he voted according to his interests what was the result? Why that his priest gave him another notice to quit, having reference to another world. Such were the consequences produced by the self-registering system, the system of rating to which hon. Members had become so partial, and it was quite clear that between the landlord and the priest the vote which it was sought to confer upon him would be a positive ex-lease. Such real state of any man could it. But what the evil to which gifting the tenant hereditas, would find a vote to accompany ballot. He elected again priest; but reduction of £4 would be had no will like a serf powers—the

Mr. GRIFFITHS proposed reduction have the effect Ireland below and said he
the result in would be to to a certain with a small the present impending in its character since the day and he did not that country daring as to in the exercise OSBORNE: Let fall upon the be that as it was quite clear with good reason against his influenced in giving miserable tenants and gallant franchise. But it to be his and gallant G

Mr. O'REILLY telling the most fact, he had the change with Friend advocated result in no
He added, his him that the Ireland were independence who occupied re-distribution future Parlian

Mr. Synan

had been left to a future Parliament. ["No, no!"] He repeated the assertion. He knew that a desire existed that it should not be left to a future Parliament, and that the present vote should be considered final, but that vote would be challenged hereafter. He might further observe that the deduction from the value of agricultural land in England was never more than 15 per cent, whereas from the official reports of the valuations in Ireland it would be seen that it would amount to 25 per cent, so that a £10 rating in Ireland would be equivalent to at least a £12 rating in this country.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he was of opinion that a compromise might be advantageously arrived at. He believed there was no strong or general feeling in Ireland on the subject of the county franchise, either one way or the other, and that many of the Liberal party in that country thought it would not serve Irish interests to lower the county franchise to £8. The Irish Liberals were generally of opinion that if any considerable extension of the franchise were made, it would be desirable to divide the large counties, such as Cork, Galway, and Mayo, as the expense would be so great that none but very rich candidates would be able to stand for them. Many hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House were adverse to the proposed reduction of the franchise, but they did not like to vote against their party. For his own part he thought it would be better to compromise the matter by fixing the county franchise at £10.

MR. GLADSTONE: Some statements have been made in the course of this debate the effect of which will be to justify those who decline making any Motion for the improvement of this Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) takes a very despairing view of the measure, which he regards as containing no provisions of any value; and my hon. Friend is consistent, for in his opinion the only thing to be done is to give to the electors the protection of secret voting. Now, I can easily understand the course of those who with my hon. Friend think that such protection ought to be given; but as I have never supported secret voting in England, I should hesitate to introduce it into Ireland in this exceptional way, and therefore I cannot walk in the footsteps of my hon. Friend. Much has been said about the dependence of the Irish voters, and I have no doubt it has been said with a great deal of truth; but, at the same time, it must surely be admitted that those statements have been somewhat highly coloured. At any rate, there are on record some facts which history has commemorated, and I may say made immortal, for at one General Election a greater triumph was achieved in Ireland through the medium of the people themselves than can, perhaps, be pointed out in any General Election with regard to any portion of the United Kingdom. I own it appears to me that my hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) is perfectly right in his general doctrine, that the extension of the franchise tends to create a stronger and a healthier state of public opinion, and as I have an Irish Reform Bill before me—although, as my hon. Friend truly remarked, it contains much that stands over for consideration by a future Parliament—I do not feel justified in passing by a point of such importance as the county franchise without making an honest endeavour to place the measure on something like a satisfactory footing. Therefore, I have to ask myself in what position we shall leave the county franchise if we leave the Bill as it now stands? I am not at all bound by the Bill of 1866, for our position is greatly changed since then by the fact that in dealing with England and Scotland we have adopted a far wider basis than was then proposed. We must, therefore, observe a certain proportion in dealing with the case of Ireland. If we pass this Reform Bill as it at present stands, I apprehend it will contain no other great provision by virtue of which it can claim the honour of sisterhood with the Bills for England and Scotland but that which provides for an extension of the franchise to a comparatively limited number of persons, and it appears to me a very doubtful question indeed whether Parliament ought to allow the country to suppose for one moment it imagines that by passing a Bill of so limited a scope it has disposed of the question of Reform for Ireland. Now, what is the relative position of the Parliamentary franchise in England and Ireland? If this measure passes as it now stands, you will leave the franchise in Ireland higher at three points and lower at none than the franchise in England and Scotland. In the first place, you will leave the franchise higher in the boroughs, because the "hard and fast" line, of which we have heard so much in reference to England, has been adopted for Ireland. Then rating is carried down to a certain point at which rating and the franchise are stopped together, so that no one inhabitant of Ireland living in a house under £4 will be enabled to vote, while to the multitudes in England and Scotland living in houses under £4 you have given the franchise. And when we come to the county franchise, which in Ireland is the most important, we find that the most popular form of the county franchise in this country—namely, the 40s. freehold—does not exist in Ireland at all; and therefore there is to be in England a low popular franchise, of which no counterpart exists in the sister country. As to the occupation franchise the noble Lord (the Earl of Mayo) has admitted that under the semblance of apparent parity there is a real difference between the occupation franchise in England and that in Ireland. He has admitted that the occupation franchise in Ireland at £12 is higher than the occupation franchise in England, not only on every fair ground which we ought to take into consideration as to the relative wealth and poverty of the two countries, but that it is also equivalent to a higher figure on account of the low scale of population and of agricultural produce in Ireland. The noble Lord says, however, that any Government which may be in Office must pass an Act to alter the valuation of land in Ireland, and therefore he remarks there will virtually be a considerable addition made to the present constituencies. My answer to that is two-fold. In the first place that is an argument which is utterly valueless as regards the valuation in the present year; and in the next place I am not by any means so sanguine as the noble Lord respecting the time when the alteration of the valuation is to take place. He says it must be done almost immediately, whatever Government may be in Office. Now, I know that when we were in Office it was a matter of such formidable difficulty that, though we were most anxious to carry a Bill on the subject through the House we did not even make the attempt. And why, may I ask, has not the noble Lord done it? He has been in Office for two years, and has had every motive to do it; but nevertheless the valuation of Ireland still remains unamended. That being the case, I must say I do not place so much confidence in the sanguine expectations of the noble Lord as I might have otherwise done. In regard to every important point it is proposed that we should leave Ireland with a higher franchise than that which has been given. Now, to me it cannot help but appear that the franchise should be more liberal in Ireland than in England, and that it ought to be in a position of parity with the persons entitled to the total population of the country. The noble Lord thinks, about the population of England—now we were about 10,000,000. But we have in England a franchise of 10,000,000. In Ireland, we have a franchise of about one million. Now, I cannot but think it is unreasonable in Ireland, to what was done in England, an effort was made to call the attention of the representative of the object of the franchise in Ireland what land and Scotland to the position to occupy in England and Scotland. What is the proposition common? It is proposed by the noble Lord and moderated at that time in the House of Lords. The law has been declined to enter into it, and it has ceased to be a reality. It is still a reality, and it was no revolution.

Mr. Gladstone

"I am one of the extensive franchise of giving my vote. I have given it to

I hope hon. Gentlemen will lay these words to heart, so that when this Bill passes from the doors of this House, it may in some particular be more worthy of the object at which it professes to aim than in its present condition it is.

Question put, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 205 ; Noes 241 : Majority 36.

MR. BRADY moved that the Chairman do report Progress.

MR. DISRAELI hoped, considering the comparatively early hour, they might be allowed to proceed with the other clause.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Brady.)

The Committee divided :—Ayes 79 ; Noes 289 : Majority 210.

MR. BERKELEY moved to report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Committee having just divided on that Question, it could not be put again now.

MR. BRADY rose to move the following clause :—

"And, in order to enable the electors to exercise the elective franchise according to their conscience, Be it Enacted, That their votes at all Elections of Members to serve in any future Parliament shall be taken by ballot."

He said that, notwithstanding the impatience manifested on the Ministerial Benches, he was emboldened by the importance of the subject to ask if any extension of the franchise could satisfy the just claims of the Irish people without the security of the ballot? The House having rejected the Motion for the reduction of the county franchise from £12 to £8, was an additional reason for granting this security. He begged to move that the House do now adjourn. ["Chair, chair!"] He should move instead that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

MR. DISRAELI: From communications that have reached me the last ten minutes, I understand the Amendment of the hon. Gentlemen is now the only one left for us to discuss. Hence, I think the Committee will see that it is most important we should if possible close this matter to-night. At the same time, I am very desirous in every way to meet the convenience of the hon. Gentleman and of the Committee. I am perfectly ready either to listen with patience to a discussion of the subject now, or, which would perhaps be the best way, the hon. Gentleman might not insist on moving this new clause now, but might bring it up on the Report, and obtain for it upon that occasion a fair and patient discussion. Such an arrangement certainly would very much facilitate the progress of Public Business, and I should be perfectly ready to facilitate in every way the discussion of the Question.

MR. BERKELEY said, he hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Leitrim would adopt the suggestion which had just been made to him.

MR. BRADY said he could not accept it. [An Hon. MEMBER: You will never get such a chance again.]

MR. BAGWELL said, that Members on that side were as anxious as the Government to bring the debate to a conclusion; but he begged to state that the question of the ballot in Ireland stood in a different position from what it did in England.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member could not proceed to discuss the question of the ballot, no Motion upon that subject having yet been made. The only question at present before the Committee was the Motion that he do leave the Chair.

MR. BAGWELL said, he did not at all wish to discuss the ballot but merely to say that, being a very important question, it was difficult to discuss it at that hour of the night. On the other hand, to bring up the clause on the Report was as much as to say that they were not to discuss it at all.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman was justified in proposing that they should not proceed now, but that the question should be raised on the Report, in order that it might be discussed on a future day. But he thought they were entitled to an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that the Report would be considered at such a period of the evening as to enable the question to be discussed.

MR. DISRAELI said, he should not think of bringing on the Report of the Irish Reform Bill, especially under the circumstances adverted to, at any other than a reasonable hour. His object in making the suggestion was to insure to the hon. Member an opportunity for a fair discussion of his proposal, which he seemed to think it was not likely to obtain at present.

Mr. OSBORNE thought the hon. Member for Leitrim was making a very great mistake. He never would have again a similar opportunity. Certainly it was not likely that upon a topic of equal importance he would never again address so large a House. He believed the question was thoroughly well understood, though he did not know what its fate might be. He himself should vote with him, and the advice he gave was this—let there be a short discussion, and let them go to a vote that evening.

SIR JOHN GRAY begged the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady) not to allow himself to be drawn into giving up the question, as he would never get such another opportunity. As the hon. Member valued the question, and was anxious that the proceedings in that House should not be misunderstood in Ireland, he (Sir John Gray) pressed him to go on with the question. They had now a large House, and he ought to have the question fairly discussed and voted upon, in order that he might ascertain the opinion of the House whether the Irish people, whom they preferred to enfranchise, should be free to give their votes, or merely the puppets of those who exercised an unfair authority over them.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. LAWSON moved the following clause:—

(Freemen voters.)

"No person who shall after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, be elected, made, or admitted a freeman of any Borough returning a Member or Members to Parliament otherwise than in right of birth or servitude, shall be entitled as such to be registered as a voter, or to vote at any Election of a Member or Members for any such Borough; and no person after the passing of this Act shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, or to vote as a freeman in respect of birth, unless his right be immediately derived from some person who was a freeman, or entitled to be admitted as a freeman, previous to the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight."

Clause agreed to.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, as no other Member was disposed to move the addition of this clause, he rose to move in the words of the Notice which had been given—

"And, in order to enable the electors to exercise the elective franchise according to their conscience, Be it Enacted, That their votes at all Elections of Members to serve in any future Parliament shall be taken by ballot."

At so late an hour he should not trespass

Mr. Disraeli

further on the but simply clause.

Clause (Vo John Gray,)-first time.

Mr. BRAD his hon. Friend

Mr. KENN

The great di land was to the country, a required. N could be gain for the major der the presen returned to re

House would rative measur

tors of Ireland THE O'DO

Chairman rep COLONEL marked that i bers did not d interpreted t Ireland as pa

over the peopl priesthood, fo would be no p Mr. CRUI

mittee was as at once as it mind had bee question.

Mr. DISR the suggestio

Member who (Mr. Brady) w

the Committee tive course wa which the Gov to do. The s it very undesir he was quite Tralea (the O tion act in n wishes of the a course he at

hon. Gentleme matter being p be brought up to permit the

tion at that st Mr. CHIC said, he hoped allow the ques to a division.

Mr. BRAD

to accept the proposition of the Prime Minister.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided : — Ayes 126 ; Noes 225 : Majority 99.

MR. BRADY gave Notice that, on the bringing up of the Report on the Irish Reform Bill, he should move the clause of which he had given Notice—

"And, in order to enable the electors to exercise the elective franchise according to their conscience, Be it Enacted, That their votes at all Elections of Members to serve in any future Parliament shall be taken by ballot."

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, that at that late hour of the night he would not press the clause of which he had given Notice. Although the clause was of importance, still it was of greater importance that progress should be made with the Bill.

Schedules agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 179.]

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS BILL—[Bill 82.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stephen Cave, Mr. Selater-Booth).

SECOND READING—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [9th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time ;" and which Amendment was—

To leave out from the words "That the" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "question of the expediency of purchasing the Telegraphs by the State be referred to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Leeman,)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. AYRTON said, it would be unnecessary to pursue the debate upon this Bill, as he understood the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) was desirous of withdrawing his Amendment, in order that another Motion, to the terms of which he had agreed, might be substituted for it. As he understood the matter, the House by reading the Bill a second time would not be taken to express any opinion upon the Bill, the subject of which it was proposed to inquire into. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shook his head ; but it was a matter of indifference to him what his opinion upon the subject might be.

MR. HORSFALL said, he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not agree to any arrangement with regard to this Bill until after its second reading. The subject was one of great importance to the commercial interest of the country, and any delay with regard to it would be regarded with great jealousy.

MR. CHILDERS said, that being himself favourable to the Bill he had been in communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and hon. Members who took an opposite line, with a view to prevent delay in its discussion upstairs. He thought the best course would be to read the Bill a second time, on the understanding that it should be referred to a Select Committee, to be constituted in the way in which Hybrid Committees usually were ; but special Instructions should be given that they should make inquiries with reference to the questions put with so much force the other night by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire—namely, the question of monopoly ; that of the power of the Government to make less charges to the Press and other bodies than were to be paid by the public generally ; provisions for secrecy and for assuring the public as to the telegraph not being abused by Government for political purposes ; the dealing with submarine cables and so forth. He had prepared Instructions which had received the concurrence of both parties, and which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would move.

MR. LEEMAN said, he was somewhat disappointed with the course that had been pursued by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), who, he understood, was to have proposed a Motion to be substituted in lieu of the one he had intended to withdraw. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman would propose the Resolution in his possession, and in the readiness of the House to adopt it he was perfectly ready to withdraw his Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman that the whole subject of the Post Office and Telegraphs be referred to a Select Committee he should have objected, because it would have had the effect of postponing the question for another year. He had consented to the proposal for a reference of the Bill to a Hybrid Committee; and as there were some points which such a Committee could not ordinarily very well consider, he had expressed in private, and now expressed in public, his willingness that they should receive certain Instructions. He proposed that they should inquire whether it was desirable that the transmission of messages should become a Post Office monopoly, whether news or messages should be furnished at reduced rates, the secrecy of messages, arrangements for working the submarine cables, and for hearing the telegraph companies by counsel. He understood that his hon. Friend was satisfied that the Bill should be referred to the Committee with those Instructions, and he was perfectly ready to move a Resolution to that effect. He would not be so discourteous as to retort upon the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, and say that it was immaterial to him what construction the hon. Member chose to put on the arrangement. What he did believe, however, was that the House, by assenting to the second reading of the Bill, would simply acknowledge that they did not object on public grounds to the Post Office working telegraphs, leaving the question of private interests entirely to the decision of the Committee.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he did not think it right that the House should be supposed by consenting to the second reading to be committed to such a principle as that suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If the course now proposed were adopted, it should be on the understanding that the object was one of inquiry, and that the House had not assented to the principle now contended for.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought he had been misunderstood. He did not ask the House to say that there was no objection to the Post Office taking possession of the telegraphs belonging to existing companies, but to affirm the principle that there was no objection on public grounds to the Post Office working telegraphs.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he did not think the public interests ought to be handed over to a Department. A Parliamentary Inquiry ought to have preceded this measure. He was intended the same was country?

MR. NORRIS said, in which Press would were postponed fourths or for the provinces and the result the proprietors intimidated. In one case, Belfast had approved this was received don, containing

"The time a directors should contract with you and I have no doubt which may affect your own news terms."

This was no that had occurred been employed shire, though ness of the h them any further that the Government bring in a bill affording protection against the likely to ensue the Government

MR. AYR said, he had said any discourteous man. All those who themselves the matter with their Report.

MR. NEW said, to guard against a danger of telegraphs the doubts on both sides, that the Report be accepted discussion.

MR. MAG said, he stood that the on this Bill not understood asked to read without assenting to its principle. The string of subjects to be inquired into as suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, could not be settled for months. He begged, therefore, to move that the debate be now adjourned.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. BONHAM-CARTER asked if the Bill was a Hybrid Bill, who was to represent the public? If the Bill was referred to a Hybrid Committee the House would not commit itself to the principle, because the Preamble would have to be proved before the Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had got the best assistance in the House in connection with this subject. He found that by moving the Instructions in the form he had stated everything necessary would be done, and he believed the public interests would be just as effectually protected as the interests of private persons.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," — (Mr. Maguire,)—put, and negatived.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on June 23, Committee nominated as follows:— Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. GOSCHEN, Sir FREDERICK HRYGATE, Mr. LEEHAN, Mr. CHARLES TURNER, Mr. NORWOOD, and Five Members to be added by the Committee of Selection:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, June 19, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Representation of the People (Scotland)* (164);
Local Government Supplemental (No. 4)*
(165); Local Government Supplemental
(No. 5)* (166); Municipal Rate (Edinburgh)* (167).
Second Reading—Lee River Conservancy* (140);
Local Government Supplemental (No. 2)*
(119).
Third Reading—Unclaimed Prize Money (India)*
(121), and passed.

ABYSSINIA — RETURN OF THE ARMY. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I wish to draw attention to a matter which appears to me of serious importance. I apprehend that before we meet again a portion of the troops who have served in Abyssinia will arrive in this country, and I am extremely anxious to know in what manner Her Majesty's Government intends that they should be received. In my opinion they ought to be received with all military honours. If I am asked what precedent there is for this course, my reply is that such a reception will be of the highest benefit to the public service, and that it is the duty of statesmen to make good precedents and not to follow bad ones. Is there any example to be found in modern history of services like those which have been performed by these troops? I know of no mountain campaign comparable with that in Abyssinia since the passage of the Alps by Hannibal. True, there have been campaigns in mountains; but they were mountains in civilized countries and through which passages had been made by roads and bridges. In the mountains of Abyssinia there were no roads and no bridges. Since the Creation, Nature had been doing everything which could be done to render the country difficult of access, if not impassable, and man had done nothing to supply the means of communication. The success of the General depended not only upon his own prudence and his own ability, nor even upon the ability of the officers by whom he was supported—but it depended upon the endurance, the perseverance, and above all the forbearance of the troops he had under his command. That long line of communication, extending through such mountains for 400 miles, could never have been supported and maintained by a force treble the strength of that under the command of Sir Robert Napier had there been hostility on the part of the people of the country. The good-will of that people, their abstinence from all hostility, and their assistance in providing supplies, could only have been obtained by the most absolute forbearance and good conduct on the part of the troops; and we are told there has not been a single instance of complaint against them. Some centuries ago the highest honour that could be paid to a distinguished soldier in the French army was that of giving him the title of "Knight without fear and without reproach." We have the honour of possessing an army in which every man has proved himself worthy of that title; it is not only without fear but absolutely without reproach. The despatches which give an account of this extraordinary campaign will be the manual to which every military man in Europe will refer to make himself master of the principles of mountain warfare. We know that throughout Europe the conduct of our troops is to all military men the object of the most entire admiration; and it is not fitting that we should appear to be less sensitive of the great services and merits of our troops, or that we should appear to appreciate their conduct less than it is appreciated by those in foreign countries. It is impossible for us, do what we will, to make the military service popular by means of extraordinary pecuniary rewards; we can only make it popular by attending to every claim that may be made upon us for that honour which is the principle of military service; and I do trust that we shall not be found wanting on this occasion. I have always thought, and I trust now that it will appear to be the feeling of Her Majesty's Government, that the first of all professions is that of a soldier, and that the first of all rewards is military honour.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, no man in this House can doubt that the noble Earl who has just sat down is a competent judge of military honours. He has himself been included in the highest honours of military success; he has had great experience in the effect of these honours upon a soldier's mind; and I am not surprised that the noble Earl on an occasion like the present, after one of the most glorious successes which the army of the country has achieved, should stand forward as the advocate of honour to the soldier. But I must remind the noble Earl that to a certain degree we are—whether rightly or wrongly—a nation of routine, and that routine is a necessary principle in every part of the service. We must remember that precedents in the army are of the greatest consequence; because if we are not careful how we dispense these honours, however much they may be deserved, and if they are given to the army upon occasions, perhaps analogous to former occasions, on which they have not heretofore been given—they may come to be almost as much a mark of offence to those who have gone before as the omission of them now made accomplished as from saying precedent for the upon our army foreign countries never be been, the hearts, cold it have won the ships think as so, there can which have deserved before when they a Earl will pardon before I give because the considered by the count, and it rious Duke who is a soldier has seen served these matters me to give a Earl.

The Earl of Ellenborough

THE DUKE sure there is anxious than to the gallant cent campaign the other hand hardly wish to done, I believe the troops should occasion. Its honour to the thinking we thing of the times. I shall my noble Friend wish these honours doubt he will the army in London on its return it was received occasion upon able and proper it should be as do not know or when they tainly will not therefore, if a siderable arrangements made. If we days, the position to this count meal, and I can any gratification received in that no doubt arrangements can be made. It will be understood by the army that it was the desire of your Lordships and the country that all honour should be done to them and their Commander-in-Chief, and, if they are not formally received, it is not from any want or failing on the part of the country to appreciate the distinction they have achieved. I have no doubt the subject will be considered by the Government; but my noble Friend was prudent in not committing himself to a decisive answer.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: If there is a will to remove any difficulty, it will be removed very soon. There is not the slightest objection to successive honours being given to detachments of the troops as they arrive; and the circumstance that they will not arrive simultaneously affords a convenient opportunity for any needful preparations.

EARL GREY: I cannot allow the conversation to conclude without expressing my regret that the suggestion of a public reception has been made publicly by the noble Earl in his place in Parliament. If he thought it desirable that such honours should be paid to the troops, there could be no objection to his making the suggestion privately to the Government. It appears to me it is a constitutional principle of great importance in this country that all honour should be bestowed by the spontaneous action of the Crown. But this principle is departed from when in either House of Parliament private Members who are under no responsibility bring forward proposals for conferring honours or boons on the troops or individuals who have performed public services. They may thus win an easy popularity for themselves, but they place the Government in a position of great difficulty, by compelling it either to forego its proper function of initiation, or appear to be ungracious by declining to do what is asked. I entertain, on principle, the strongest objection to suggestions of this kind being made in either House of Parliament. Remember if these things are done here they will be done elsewhere; and I ask your Lordships, in the present condition of men's minds, and the desire of persons to put themselves forward in quest of popularity, whether danger may not arise from encouraging practices of this kind? In this instance, I have an additional objection to the suggestion, and it is that no Notice of it was placed upon the Paper. A Committee of this House has strongly recommended that Questions of this kind shall not be brought forward without Notice, so as to prevent your Lordships being taken by surprise when you are not prepared for discussion; and I think this case furnishes a singular illustration of the inconvenience of departing from the rule laid down by the Committee.

LORD LYVEDEN: A source of difficulty in this case is that part of the troops return to India, and they have behaved in exactly the same manner as those who return to England; and I cannot see how honours could be given to one detachment and not the other. I have every disposition to do honour to the soldiers; but I think that under the circumstances stated by the noble Earl and the noble Duke it will be impossible to give such a reception to the troops as the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) desires.

FORESHORE AND BED OF THE SEA— THE BOARD OF TRADE.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he desired to direct their Lordships' attention to a Memorandum of the Board of Trade lately presented to both Houses of Parliament as to the dealings of that Board with the Foreshore and Bed of the Sea. He was happy to say that the remarks he was about to make were in no way of a party character, and he was anxious to state in the outset that he had no complaint whatever to make against his noble Friend who now presided over the Board of Trade (the Duke of Richmond). On the contrary, in a case which had occurred to himself in reference to this subject he had been treated by his noble Friend with the utmost courtesy, and he believed it was his noble Friend's desire to modify what was, in his opinion, a very erroneous system of management. Before endeavouring to explain to the House what there was worthy of public attention in this particular document, it was absolutely necessary to say a few words on the position of the contest between the Crown as regards its claim to foreshore and the bed of the sea and the private individuals who had claims over the same portion of the soil. Not being a lawyer, he should not venture upon an exposition of the state of the law on the subject; and, indeed, he believed it would not be an easy task for even the best lawyers in their Lordships'

House to give a clear account of that law, which was, to a great extent, unsettled. That, however, did not interfere with what he might term the outside boundaries of the question. He apprehended it would not be questioned by anyone that the Crown had certain claims and rights over the bed of the sea and foreshore; and, on the other hand, he believed no one had ever questioned, on the part of the Crown, that the claims of the Crown, whether claims of ownership, or as trustee for the public, were subject to certain rights on the part of the public, and on the part also of private individuals. Those rights mainly depended — first, upon Common Law; secondly, upon charters; thirdly, they were incidental to the tenure of property which abutted on the foreshore, and were necessary to the enjoyment of the land; lastly, there were rights acquired by individuals or public bodies in consequence of use and prescription, which was the foundation of a very great deal of the property held by Members of that House as well as by the public at large. Some years ago, his attention had been directed to this subject by a very great change which occurred in the spirit of the administration of the Crown rights in Scotland. A case arose in reference to his own property on the Firth of Clyde, and led in 1855 or 1856 to a correspondence with the Treasury, which had since become a Parliamentary Paper. He would state the general result of that correspondence, and the impression it left on his mind—which impression, he believed, would be produced on the minds of all who perused it—at all events, the impression it left on his mind was that a systematic attempt was being made in Scotland, and he thought in England also, to convert the limited ownership of the Crown into a claim of absolute and unrestricted ownership over the bed of the sea and the foreshore; and that, in the second place, it was intended that this alleged absolute property of the Crown should be made a source of revenue. Now, he was bound to say that that correspondence and the circumstances which arose in connection with it left an impression on his mind that the public Department which professed to represent the Crown—the Office of Woods—was proceeding to enforce its claims in a very oppressive spirit, and, he might add, in a very insidious and oppressive manner as regarded the interests and rights of private individuals. He ventured to call attention to that correspondence in severe remarks immediately as he had read of the facts of the Government. a Member, and the manager of the Crown from the Board of Trade. In the first had no pre to be a Revenue Woods and Forests; and he it might have presided over most of what the Crown; being a Revenue qualified to assist and with a view interests. The to which he arose from the the first document of these claims professed to be upon which to be administered document of interest, as it but also an interest. He would not the form in which. In the course the Woods and Forests was placed under in consequence incurred some the Parliamentary ment. Some the Department presided over the Crown, and the Cabinet, Government. the administration Forests was, ~~consequence~~ separated and responsible for. The administration then intrusted permanent Office his correspondence that there was material chief to therefore, apply who was then at the head of the Treasury, and asked to whom he ought to address his complaints. He was told that there was no public authority to which he could address them, except the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury. Now, in his experience of the Lords of the Treasury, he had always found it extremely difficult to convince them that any act which gave them an increase of revenue was unjust to individuals, who were consequently placed at a considerable disadvantage when they had to complain on such a matter to such an authority. However, as there was no other authority to appeal to, he directed his appeal to the Treasury. Here again the transference to the Board of Trade promised a remedy for this evil—since that Board had a Parliamentary responsible head. But this document came directly from a subordinate officer. It was a Memorandum from the Board of Trade, professing to give an account of the policy to be hereafter pursued, and yet it was not signed by a responsible Minister—it was signed by Mr. Farrer, a gentleman of great respectability, who presided over a particular Department in the Board of Trade; but surely so important a document ought not to be signed solely by one of the permanent Civil Officers of the Crown! The policy it enunciated was a matter of great importance to a large section of the public, and the Board of Trade ought to be responsible for that policy through their Parliamentary head. In looking over the document the first thing which struck him was the animus which pervaded it as regards the rights of private individuals. He need hardly remind their Lordships that the rights of individuals and of public bodies over foreshores depended to a great extent on user and wont. On the first page the following passage occurred in reference to the resistance offered to the claims of the Crown by private individuals:—

The Duke of Argyll

“In many places acts of ownership, or apparent ownership, are going on, and we either do not know of them, or cannot prevent them. The law seems to have decided, absurdly enough, that while the statutory period in case of actual and complete adverse possession sufficient to give a title as against the Crown is sixty years, yet that enjoyment for a much shorter period and of a much more limited kind may be enough to justify a jury in finding that an original grant from the Crown is to be presumed.”

Now, he ventured to appeal to the House, and to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, whether this was the kind of language which ought to be used by a permanent Civil Officer of the Crown when speaking of the rights of property as defined and secured by the Courts of law. Mr. Farrer said the Courts of law had decided “absurdly enough;” but he (the Duke of Argyll), on the other hand, maintained that the legal decisions were strictly in accordance with the justice of the case. The following passage also occurred in regard to the claims of the Crown:—

“Its title is ousted by adverse possession of sixty years, instead of twenty-one. On the other hand, it has no one to look after its rights; and the lawyers have practically altered the Statutes of Limitation applicable to the Crown, by the fiction of allowing a jury to presume a grant.”

Such was the way in which this permanent Civil Officer spoke of the Judges of the land, and of the decisions arrived at in the Courts of law. He would now read another passage which exhibited the same animus, and showed that the Board of Trade, as far as Mr. Farrer could be taken to represent it, was pursuing the same tactics as the Woods and Forests formerly pursued, against the rights of individuals—

“This”—[the assertion of the rights of the Crown]—“which logically ought to be the first thing done, it will probably be prudent to postpone.”

The Memorandum went on to state—

“I have no doubt that in the end we shall have done something to ascertain or determine these rights; but with the present prejudice against the Crown it would be unwise to stir the question now.”

In consequence of what the Memorandum described as “the present prejudice against the Crown,” but which, in reality, was a prejudice for right and justice, it was considered unwise to stir in a general manner. It was thought more prudent to proceed step by step—to get individuals to acknowledge the rights claimed for the Crown. In page 3 of the Memorandum he found this statement—

“We shall have no public support in protecting a mere title which does not appear to be of any immediate public advantage. And we shall be not unreasonably found fault with if we interpose obstacles to the execution of a really useful work. In such cases we must endeavour, as well as we can, to encourage the work, and at the same time get the parties to make some acknowledgment which may reserve the Crown's rights.”

That was the principle on which the Department appeared to have proceeded—to “get” individuals to acknowledge rights of the Crown over those foreshores by the payment of a small sum. He then came to a passage in the Memorandum which had been incidentally referred to the other day. In the last paragraph of page No. 3, there was this passage—

"Lastly, in cases where the Crown's title is doubtful we must act in the same way as if it were good, except that we must do so with greater caution, and be more ready to compromise the question on the principle of reserving to the public their rights and easements over the soil."

Now, these were the precise tactics that had been previously adopted by the Office of Woods and Works. He wished this to be distinctly understood, and to go forth to the people of England and Scotland, that when the Board of Trade claimed for the Crown rights over foreshores, such a claim did not afford the slightest presumption that the Crown really possessed any such rights. If any persons had such rights, they would do well to follow the example set them in Scotland. There an association was formed for the defence of the rights of individuals, and he was happy to say that in nearly every case of legal proceedings they had been successful. He presumed that to this fact might be attributed the tone of complaint adopted by Mr. Farrer of the Board of Trade. The Memorandum was very useful, as showing the way in which affairs were managed by permanent Civil Servants not subject to the control of Parliament. That observation might appear to be in contradiction to his statement that he had no feeling against the Board of Trade; but the sequel would show that he was not making any charge against his noble Friend the President of that Department. He would give an example of the way in which these matters were administered in Scotland. On a property of his own on the Firth of Clyde, a person who held a feu from him had commenced to take sand and gravel from the foreshore to make an embankment on his own feu. There was a long coast with an advancing tide in that neighbourhood; the roads were very close to the sea shore, and the proprietors had been put to great expense in preventing injury to the land by the encroaching tides. It was, therefore, a matter of great importance that the foreshores there should be preserved. Their Lordships would observe that, as the proprietors were road trustees as well as owners of the land, it was not likely that they would remove gravel or other materials to an extent which would do injury to the sea wall that had to be kept up; but it was quite another thing when a public Office stepped in and grants take gravel as of setting up case to which was taking his (the Duke) Acting on advice before the Sheriff first came before who decided had no right sand; but the Sheriff Depute, as of his (the Duke) they were a Licence from rizing the ten Substitute he to do! That been issued a Substitute he whom it was Duke of Argyll with the fact Friend the Trade, who, issuing of the system adopted of Trade. I after making licence, and ret been paid for this system a knowledge right with no inquiry might arise to the shores, and that in ninety removal of sand in Scotland was property. I granting of licence sand in the way the case to most illegal; that no such future without locally interested memorandum, was a responsible there was a decision which he wished their Lordships of a Mr. Rail the Government Bill was introduced Board of Trade by the Woods the foreshores Crown, he (the take any part in reference to the introduction of the Bill; he did, however, express to his Colleagues his opinion that in any measure of transfer from the one Department to the other, care should be taken that it should be nothing more than a transfer, and that no provisions should be introduced involving directly or indirectly any increase in the power of the Crown. Lord Palmerston, the Prime Minister, the then President of the Board of Trade, and Mr. Gladstone thought that he was right in that view; but when the Bill, as framed by the Department, came to be discussed in their Lordships' House, there were some noble Lords who thought that it contained material additions and material alterations—that not only was there a transfer, but that there were provisions giving the Board of Trade power greater than that possessed by the Woods and Forests. He rather thought that was the view taken by his noble and learned Friend on the other side (Lord Chelmsford). Well, in consequence of the objections taken by his noble and learned Friend and other Members of their Lordships' House, the Bill was altered with a view of securing that no power should be exercised by the Board of Trade which had not previously been exercised by the Woods and Forests. Now, what was the observation made on that circumstance by Mr. Reilly, whom he supposed to be the legal authority under whom the Bill had been drawn up—

The Duke of Argyll

“I have considered ‘the Crown Lands Act, 1864,’ with reference to Mr. Farrer’s note of the 10th instant, and its inclosure, and his note of the 11th instant. I concur generally in Mr. Farrer’s view of the effect of the Act. It is not necessary to go into details for the present purpose. It is plain that the Board of Trade will find itself seriously fettered in the administration of the foreshore by the terms of the Act as it passed. When the Bill was undertaken and introduced it was not contemplated that the transfer of the foreshore to the Board of Trade from the Woods and Forests should be clogged with the provisions introduced into the Bill in its passage through the House of Lords.”

The opinion of Mr. Reilly was entirely at variance with the understanding which he had had with his Colleagues in Lord Palmerston’s Government; and certainly it was an illustration of the esprit de corps existing between the permanent Civil Servants in reference to matters of this kind. There was another passage in this Memorandum which he must read to their Lordships—

“When the Bill went up to the House of Lords objections were raised to it on the part of some proprietors of land in Scotland—the Duke of Argyll, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Duke of Sutherland, and others—who alleged, among other things, that the Crown’s rights to the foreshore are not, by law, of the same nature or extent in Scotland as in England. The result was, that in order to save the Bill it became necessary to put it into the form in which it received the Royal Assent.”

Here again were observations which ought never to have been submitted to Parliament in such a shape. When a Bill left their Lordships’ House, and was assented to by the other House of Parliament, it became an Act of Parliament. It was not the deed of individuals either in one House or the other; and it was, to say the least, unusual and irregular that a gentleman in the position of the writer of this Memorandum should designate certain individual Members of their Lordships’ House, who were represented as taking in their own interest a course contrary to the law and to the declared opinion of Parliament. He must say that, taking the document from beginning to end—the absence of the signature of any responsible Minister—the language which it held with regard to the rights both of individuals and of the public, and the references which it contained to individual members of their Lordships’ House, it was a most improper document to proceed from any Public Department, and it ought at once to be withdrawn. The future policy of the Government, moreover, upon matters of this kind ought to be decided by a Minister responsible to the Government and to the country, and not by permanent Civil Servants of the Crown, who, however honourable and upright in their conduct—and he should be the last to deny or doubt the immense value of the permanent Civil Service to the administration of public affairs—were apt to take a very limited, and almost a selfish view in the interest of their own Department, without regard to the general policy of the country. He hoped that his noble Friend who now presided over the Department would take effectual steps to lay it down, both as an official rule and as a matter of honour that, in future, whenever measures affecting, or that might affect, the rights of individuals in foreshores were about to be submitted to Parliament ample notice would be given to all parties affected by such proposals. A Bill had been brought in some time since with regard to fisheries which, if it had passed without alteration, would, in the opinion of some of the most eminent legal Members of that House, have materially increased the power of the Crown over foreshores, to the detriment of individuals, and he fully believed of the public also. It was perfectly natural that permanent Civil Servants of the Crown, who administered the business of the several Departments irrespective of the change of parties, should argue themselves into the belief that all the powers which they possessed or claimed were powers to be exercised in the service and for the benefit of the public. But he entirely denied that the control claimed for the Crown had been exercised formerly by the Office of Woods and Forests, and recently by the Board of Trade, in the manner most conducive to the public interest. It was idle to talk of foreshores, and of any rights of the Crown in them, as a source of important permanent revenue. He believed that rights to the foreshores formed as much the subject of private property as rights to the land, and ought to be enjoyed as such, subject, of course, to public use when necessary, and to such control by the Board of Admiralty as might be necessary to secure the interests of navigation. But, subject to these necessary conditions, the interference of officials ought to be restrained; for he had begun at last to fear that proprietors would be unable to embark or disembark their own timber from their own estates without the leave of some official in a public Department in London previously obtained. The course taken by the Woods and Forests for many years past, and now taken by the Board of Trade, was adverse, he maintained, to public rights and to the public interest. And the action taken by the association in Scotland was not more necessary to assert the rights and defend the interests of individuals, than it was to protect the public from this strained assertion of the rights of the Crown.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that before entering upon the details of the matter brought by the noble Duke under the notice of their Lordships, he begged to express his acknowledgments for the manner in which his personal share in the conduct of the Department had been alluded to. But the noble Duke, if he had been lavish of his praise as far as he (the Duke of Richmond) was concerned, had been equally lavish of his abuse upon one of the permanent Civil Servants of the Crown, the permanent Secretary to the Board of Trade—then whom, as far as his short official pronounce an public servan Departments. to some claus Sea Fisheries of individual been serious occurred wit the instance c Lord Chelms withdrawn a to meet the noble and l pointed out; faction he fo received the Lordships. B "another pla former Colle gave notice very clauses speech that which had t their Lordshi

The Duke of Argyll

THE DUKE shall be ur again.

THE DUKE that comple among the A tration. To marks conta was necessa ment origina the power o hands of the Forests. In which the ne in consequen in which it v great incon having to d of a cognate transferring from the Wo of Trade. never havin with this a able that a l up for the i lle was not Government count seek Memorandur not fail to p tion of entir ment it wa some system action in al cisions might be avoided. The noble Duke complained that this Paper was not signed by a responsible Minister. True, it was not signed by a Member of the Government; but for every Paper emanating from the Board of Trade he (the Duke of Richmond) felt himself responsible, although it might not actually bear his signature; and he believed the practice in very many of the Departments was for the documents to be signed by the Secretary of that Department. What might have been the practice in the Departments with which the noble Duke had been connected he was not, of course, prepared to say; but certainly, in the Department of Foreign Affairs, and, he believed, in the Departments of the different Secretaries of State, though the practice was not to require the signature of the Minister himself, in each case the Minister was just as responsible as if he had signed the Paper with his own hand. This document, as he had stated, was drawn up as a guide to the Department in the conduct of the additional business with which it had been charged. At the time there was not the smallest intention of letting the Memorandum go outside the Department; it was a mere code of rules to be acted upon by the Department, showing the principles by which it should be guided in dealing with the foreshores. The document came before the public at the instance of a private Member of the House of Commons, who asked the Vice President to the Board of Trade whether there was any objection to lay upon the table the Memorandum of Instructions under which the Department was acting. The Vice President, not thinking there could be any objection to such a course, said he should be very happy to lay the Instructions upon the table, and did so without further consideration. Had it been intended at the time the Memorandum was framed to make it a public document, though the same facts would have been embodied, it would have been much more carefully worded, and some of the passages referred to by the noble Duke would not have been included. In substance the Instructions would have been the same, but the wording would have been more respectful and the details not so fully given. He might, perhaps, remind the noble Duke that this matter rested in England and Scotland on a somewhat different footing. Without professing to be a lawyer they might, in his opinion, take it that prima facie the foreshore vested in the Crown, and that when individuals had a right to foreshore that right arose—in England at all events—from the fact that they had received that right by express grant from the Crown, or that it was the result of prescription or immemorial usage, in which case an original grant from the Crown is assumed. With regard to the Scotch question, he believed the position was somewhat different; and when he became the President of the Board of Trade he found himself in a somewhat invidious position, because, as a Scotch proprietor, he had subscribed to an association the views of which, to say the least, did not exactly coincide with those of the Department. Under those circumstances he had thought it highly desirable that this question should be set at rest, and a case was drawn up for the purpose of taking legal opinion. As, however, a great number of intricate questions were involved that opinion would take some time in preparing. He had not yet received it; but he was told that it would shortly be ready. Before he went into the English part of the question he would quote a passage from the case to show the animus which influenced the Department in this matter—

“It further appears that the pecuniary interest of the public in the foreshore in question is a secondary one, and that the primary object of a Government Department charged with the functions now committed to the Board of Trade should be to protect the public in the due enjoyment of the rights of navigation, fishing, boating, bathing, walking, &c. But in the present state of the law the Board of Trade are bound to deal with the foreshore, if belonging to the Crown as property, while the rights of the public over it, as well as the title to it, are constantly matters of dispute. The first step towards a settlement appears to be to ascertain what is the actual position of the Crown in Scotland as regards ownership of the foreshore. And it is with a view to determine the question that the present case has been prepared.”

The case was a very long one; but from this passage it was evident that the objects of the Board of Trade were to protect the rights of the public and distinctly define the rights of the proprietors. The noble Duke had, with great skill, selected passages from the Memorandum here and there, first from one part and then from another, with a view to show that the object was to drive the proprietors into a corner and make them submit to a compromise. Now, the noble Duke had referred to the following passage:—

“Lastly, in cases where the Crown’s title is doubtful, we must act in the same way as if it were good, except that we must do so with greater caution, and be more ready to compromise the question on the principle of reserving to the public their rights and easements over the soil."

He was prepared to say that that was a very proper paragraph, and one every word of which he was prepared to endorse. But if the noble Duke had looked at the former paragraphs he would have found these passages—

"The course to be adopted on receiving notice of such encroachment must differ according to the circumstances. The Act may not be injurious to the rights hitherto enjoyed by the public, and may only be objectionable on the ground that it tends to establish a title adverse to that of the Crown, and may thus help to prevent the Board of Trade from asserting that title in subsequent instances. In such cases we may be placed in great difficulty, especially if the Act itself is useful, and if the title of the Crown is doubtful.

"In another class of cases we shall see at once that the Act is immediately injurious to the public, and that there is reason to interfere, not only on the ground of its affecting title, but because it tends more or less directly to deprive the public of some existing right or enjoyment."

The whole tenour of this Memorandum went on to show that the object of the Board of Trade was to protect the rights of the public, as was fully proved by the following extracts:—

"These clauses will probably give us ample power to make provision when the working plans are submitted to the Board of Trade both for the protection of public rights, of navigation, &c., and of the Crown's title; and we have only to see that the clauses in question are properly incorporated and not impaired by other provisions."

"Supposing it proves that what is proposed can be done (with or without modification) so as not to prejudice public rights or enjoyments, we may enter on the question of terms of purchase."

"The above suggestions have reference to the protection of the public, and though their tendency will be to diminish the value of the soil and the purchase-money of what we sell, we must be most careful to put them prominently forward."

Their Lordships must bear in mind that this was a Memorandum drawn up for the purpose of guiding the Department in their conduct with reference to the foreshores. The Memorandum went on to say—

"There is one other point on which we should be careful. The frontager, though he may have no legal title, has certainly a considerable interest in the foreshore, and we must take care that he is heard, and that we do not hastily or wantonly authorize works on the foreshore which will be detrimental to him. For this purpose it will be right to require every intending purchaser and lessee to give notice to the frontager. And it may often, if not generally, be found both just and expedient to give him the right of pre-emption."

He would not trouble their Lordships with

The Duke of Richmond

the many ex all of which was to prot stance desig Now with re the noble D pressed a ho be afforded f would, with read the dire reference to ing Comman

"I am to re report for the What use is at of the shore in men, or the p shore is now, o lie for walking gathering seaw 2. Whether th question will abridge the ex now or hithert with any use t been made by a mentioned? T in the event of tion, what are which, and w public notice of order that the and particular been accustom may not, with any rights to w

Thus the ne was enforced could, in hi ployed. He ships for h these Papers enter into th remarks mad regard to the Duke, in wh verterently gra the following Board of Tra plaint—

"Your Grae that this Boar mentioned in y in question wa been known, r granted. And them to notice In order that y the circumstan granted, a copy Campbell is en upon which thi with cases of th your Grace's l randum which l and which cont of those princip

The right to take gravel from the foreshore must have been obtained from the Crown. He said that, however, subject to the correction of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. The foreshore in England must at some time or other have belonged to the Crown, and no individual owner of a foreshore had a right to remove gravel unless he had acquired that right from the Crown. If there were minerals on the foreshore the Crown would have an undoubted right to work them, as well as to give third parties a right to remove boulders and gravel. In speaking thus he referred to England only—he could not say what might be the case as regards Scotland. Although he had almost exhausted what he wished to say upon the subject, he must be permitted to say that he disputed some of the assertions of the noble Duke with regard to the Department over which he had the honour to be placed. He could assure the noble Duke that Department was actuated by no ill-feeling towards individuals, and that it had never attempted by means of threats of legal proceedings to compel proprietors to lease the foreshores. The only object of the Department was to preserve the rights of the public without injuring the rights of individuals. He hoped the noble Duke would allow him to condole with him upon the manner in which he had been treated by his Colleagues when they were in Office. It appeared that the other day, when a private gentleman had paid 2s. 6d. for a licence to remove gravel, complaint was made, and within twenty-four hours the licence was revoked, and the half-crown was returned. Contrast with that conduct of the present Board of Trade the conduct of the Board of Works appointed by the Government of which the noble Duke was a member, which had kept a threat of legal proceedings hanging over the noble Duke's head for four years, although the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown was that the case against him would not hold water for a moment. He thought it unnecessary to go further into the Correspondence, as by the extracts he had read to the House he had succeeded in showing that the conduct of the present Board of Trade was not so bad as that of the former Board of Works had been.

LORD ROMILLY said, he would lay before the House a circumstance bearing upon the subject under discussion, which had recently come to his knowledge. Within the last fortnight a gentleman who was the proprietor of land adjoining the sea shore of South Wales, and who derived a very beneficial income from the sale of the limestones on the beach which were washed down from the cliffs, received a letter from the Board of Trade, stating that an application had been made to them to grant a licence to take the limestones, and asking if he had any objection to their granting such a licence. The gentleman replied that he had just as much objection to their dealing with the limestones as he had to their interfering with any other part of his property, and stated that the right to deal with the limestones had been enjoyed by himself and his ancestors from the time of Charles I. What the result of his communication was he had not heard. He was not going to dispute the doctrine stated by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond) that the ownership of the foreshores lay originally in the Crown; but the same might be said of every acre of land in the country. The attempt on the part of the Board of Works to set up a claim to the foreshores on the part of the Crown was a most insidious one, and would be injurious instead of beneficial to the public interest, which required above all things that the rights of property should not be rendered insecure for the mere purpose of creating an income for the Government. He did not think that the document which had been so much referred to was ever intended to be made public, as it was presented to Parliament by accident, and was therefore infinitely more dangerous than if it had been drawn up for publication; especially as the principles it laid down were calculated greatly to render insecure the rights of property. Could any greater injury be done a man than for the Crown to pick out a portion of his property, and say, "This is Crown property; unless you can show your title to it you shall not continue in possession?" It was very difficult for individuals to resist pressure from the Crown for so small a payment as 2s. 6d. or 5s., and yet the payment of such sums would take the right from the proprietor and vest it in the Crown. He trusted that Parliament would not sanction such an attempt to steal persons' property from them.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, it was only just that he should state that in the case referred to by the noble and learned Lord, the Board of Trade had communicated with the gentleman who owned the foreshore, and had informed him that after the title he had shown no further proceeding would be taken against him.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought the mode frequently resorted to for establishing the rights of the Crown by obtaining some acknowledgment from private proprietors, by the payment of some small sum, 2s. 6d. or 5s., was highly objectionable. This was a mode of proceeding very often adopted in Wales, where the officers of the Woods and Forests were continually making claims on the part of the Crown. Very extraordinary proceedings had, to his own knowledge, happened in the case of the trustees of the river Weaver. This was a matter which required the attention of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) and the Board of Trade. He hoped a more liberal spirit would in all these cases be adopted with reference to the rights of private proprietors.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was quite clear that the Board of Trade had duties to perform in protecting the rights of the Crown; but those duties ought to be performed in the largest spirit, and in the manner least annoying to individuals. He hoped the result of this debate would not be to induce the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) to abandon the protection of the rights of the Crown, although he confessed he was a little shaken in his conviction by something that had occurred to-night. He admired the submission of his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll), to his Colleagues during the years he fought with such energy and ability in vindication of his rights; but no sooner had the present Government come into Office than he obtained his request and the half-crown was returned to Mr. Campbell. There was another point worthy consideration. The public had certainly a right to know the general principles on which the Board of Trade proceeded in these matters; but because a Member of either House called for that information, it seemed astounding that a confidential Paper, evidently drawn up for use within the Office, should be immediately produced, accompanied by an Appendix containing the opinion of the Legal Advisers of the Crown. With such documents made public, the Department would find it impossible to defend themselves against the eager litigants.

LORD DELAMERE said a few words which were not heard.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it

The Duke of Richmond

was extreme of this kind to canvass the title of the in opposition beg their Lord had been a spoke last but entirely conc and knowledge were he had anyone who gaged in su the Crown, a long purse. what was the public foreshores. the foreshor right of the gation, to see the right of the other w with regard and the bed things as to the one was public Depar right to the the other w public Depar had—namel had got it. as a source tely within It was a que on which I opinion—for were lost i would have way. But whatever ri shore, the I whether the branch or t Department ment, and t until altered the Crown i assigns to t bad law or all doubt i that the wh prima facie the Crown foreshores c unless you scriptive ri otherwise b case differed had been put of a stranger or a neighbouring owner saying to some possessor of property inside the country, "I assume you have a bad title; I call on you to prove your title, or I will take possession of your land." That was not the law; but the law was that the Crown had a prima facie right to the foreshore of the kingdom. Day by day acts might be done on the foreshores which would lead a jury to presume that the rights of the Crown had ceased; and it would, therefore, be perfectly idle to have a public officer to attend to the rights of the Crown, unless he asserted the law as it stood and took care that no encroachments were made injurious to those rights. If Parliament should please to say that such should no longer be the duty of the public officer, his functions would, no doubt, be lightened; but until he had instructions from Parliament to that effect he would be guilty of a dereliction of duty if he did not take care that encroachments were not made on the rights of the Crown. The Memorandum to which the noble Duke alluded appeared to be a kind of soliloquy in writing, proceeding from the rooms of the Board of Trade, and contained a very good statement of what the duties of the Board of Trade were with respect to the foreshores and the bed of the sea. One passage in the Memorandum was in the following terms:—

"In cases where the Crown's title is doubtful, we must act in the same way as if it were good, except that we must do so with greater caution, and be more ready to compromise the question on the principle of reserving to the public their rights and easements over the soil."

That passage, though a little amusing when read without comment, exactly described the duty which the head of the Department was charged with; for he could not tell what acts of ownership might have been committed by persons in the course of thirty or forty years until he called on them to make good their title. The opinion of Mr. Reilly had been commented upon by the noble Duke. Now, Mr. Reilly was one of the most accomplished men at the English bar, and was favourably known to many of their Lordships as an experienced Parliamentary draughtsman. That gentleman, in his opinion, referred to the Bill of 1866, which on its first introduction, when the noble Duke was a Member of the then Government, undoubtedly contained the clauses to which the noble Duke now objected. Mr. Reilly alluded to proceedings in their Lordships' House, but it could not be deemed that there was anything disrespectful in his giving an explanation of the way in which those clauses were lost. The concluding sentence of Mr. Reilly's opinion contained a suggestion than which nothing could be fairer. It was in the following words:—

"The only difficulty would be with regard to Scotland. It would be necessary for the Board of Trade either to come to terms with the Scotch proprietors or ascertain by legal proceedings the exact nature and extent of the Crown's right to the foreshore in Scotland, and then propose legislation on that basis."

For his part he was only anxious that nothing should fall from their Lordships to lead the public Department, which was intrusted with the care of this public property, to suppose that it would be acting rightly in neglecting the duty confided to it, or to cause any persons out-of-doors to fancy that Members of their Lordships' House, whose private interests ought most properly to be protected, were desirous to place those private interests in opposition to the just rights of the public.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET was understood to say that the duties of the Board of Trade in regard to this matter were two-fold—they had to watch over the rights and interests of the Crown and those of the public. He thought that in all grants or licences which in any way affected the rights of proprietors adjoining the shore, they ought to receive due notice.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had never intended to convey to the House that he entertained the smallest doubt that it was the duty of the Board of Trade, as it was formerly of the Department of Woods and Forests, to defend the rights of the Crown. Among the objections which he had urged against the Memorandum was that it throughout evinced the greatest antipathy to those rights of usage and prescription on which a large portion of the rights of property in this country depended.

NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY rose to put a Question to Her Majesty's Government, of which he had given Notice, with respect to the new Courts of Justice, and said the subject to which he was about to invite their Lordships' attention was not, he was afraid, one in which they would take as much interest as in the exciting topic which they had just been discussing. He desired to make an Inquiry of his noble Friend who represented the Government in that House with regard to the competition for the new Law Courts. The facts of the case were as follows:—The Government issued conditions under which architects were to compete for designs for the new Courts, and a Treasury Minute embodying those conditions stated that the award made would be accepted as final. Very great stress was laid by the conditions on the question of utility in connection with the Courts. They state that—

"The chief points to be kept constantly in view and to be treated as superseding, so far as they may conflict, all considerations of architectural effect, are the accommodation to be provided, and the arrangements to be adopted, so as in the greatest degree to facilitate the despatch and the accurate transaction of the law business of the country; and in carrying out this design the first object should be to provide ample uninterrupted communication and accommodation for those who have legitimate business in the new building. Again, the arrangement of the Courts and Offices is of vital moment; on it mainly depends the success or failure of their concentration, and its importance cannot be over-estimated."

Such were the conditions under which the architects were invited to compete. They did compete, and sent in their plans and estimates. The Judges who were appointed to decide on the comparative merits of those plans and estimates each delivered their award, the result being that in regard to all points of convenience, and in all points of accommodation and of arrangement for facilitating the despatch of business in the new Courts, Mr. Barry's design was declared to be superior to the others; but that on one point alone—that of architectural elevation, which the conditions distinctly stated to be of lesser moment—the design of Mr. Street was deemed to possess greater merit. That was the nature of the Report which was sent in to the Government; and one would have imagined that having issued certain conditions—that having declared that the award of the Judges should be final, and the Judges having informed them who the architect was whose design best satisfied the conditions, they would at once have selected him as the architect of the new Courts. That, however, was not done; and the complaint he had to make was that Mr. Barry's plan having been pronounced to which the most important aside and Mr. His noble Government say that he was displaying rance in p the subject inasmuch as the university invited no attention and to select not successful admit was then he wo practice was sisted in w the character buildings w tects—at least putation—w that at the l be taken fro be deprived which they a decision dt the Board their Lordsh the early pa of DERBY: Woods and the Board the Woods distant peric closely unite it was a ve themselves, Government architectural ducted unde advantage, i which had b stance. The in the matte open to gra ought, he c carefully bel They wisely utility in the the most im competition preference for ornament the man wh matter of ori man who w utility. Now a great deal too much of that sort of thing. In countries in which artistic effect and æsthetic feeling had greater influence than in our own, utility could always apparently find a place without difficulty. But here, where that feeling was somewhat of an exotic, and required careful nurture, attempts were constantly being made by enthusiasts in architecture and art to treat utility as a matter of secondary importance. Their Lordships sitting in that Chamber ought, however, he would venture to say, to be the very last persons to sanction such a preposterous mode of proceeding. All those who had occasion to speak or listen in that House had reason to regret the preference which had been given by their predecessors to the merely ornamental over the useful. Better be without the ornamentation by which they were surrounded, and have a decent and sober building, in which the Public Business could be more satisfactorily conducted. In the case of the new Law Courts, at all events, he hoped the error would be avoided of causing utility to give way to ornament. The first requisite in such a building it appeared to him was that those whose business took them there should be able to breathe and see, and hear each other speak. When those objects, and adequate means of communication, were secured, then it would be time enough to think of ornament and architectural effect. Entertaining those views, he most earnestly deprecated the decision at which the Government had arrived, and he trusted it was not too late to re-consider it. As the House was aware, there were serious doubts expressed by competent judges as to the expediency of erecting the new Courts on the site which had been already purchased; and if a final decision as to that point still remained to be come to, he hoped the unfortunate decision in favour of Mr. Street and against Mr. Barry might not yet be regarded as irrevocable; but that a question which seriously affected the future administration of justice in this country might still be left open for the consideration of both Houses of Parliament. The Question which he had to ask of Her Majesty's Government was—were instructed that Utility and convenient Arrangement were to be preferred to architectural Effect?"

The Marquess of Salisbury

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he hoped that, as he had the honour of presiding over the Commission for the building of the new Law Courts, his noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) would permit him to answer the Question put by the noble Marquess. He must first however be permitted to express his satisfaction that the subject had been brought under their Lordships' notice, for an opportunity was thereby afforded him of correcting a great deal of misapprehension with respect to it which prevailed out-of-doors. Answering the question of his noble Friend categorically, he had simply to say that the Government had neither rejected nor adopted any design; and he would briefly explain to the House how the matter really stood. Some years ago the duty of superintending the building of new Law Courts and having designs prepared for the purpose was assigned by Act of Parliament to the Treasury, with the co-operation of Commissioners who were to be appointed by Her Majesty. The Commissioners, who were a very numerous body, and composed of various elements, were accordingly appointed, and proceeded to the performance of their task. The question was at the outset discussed of the propriety of throwing open the preparation of designs to unlimited competition amongst architects. That point was decided in the negative; and it was then resolved that six or eight architects should be selected for the purpose of competition; and that number was ultimately, as the result of a Motion made in the House of Commons, increased to eleven. The architects who were thus selected very naturally felt that a Commission which was very numerous and which was chosen so that it might represent various interests might not be the best body to form a judgment as to the relative merits of architectural designs; and in order to meet their views a select body was appointed by the Treasury, with the consent of the Commissioners, who were called the Judges of the Designs. Those Judges were five in number, and were—Sir Alexander Cockburn, Lord Chief Justice; Sir Roundell Palmer, then Attorney General; Mr. Gladstone, then Chancellor of the Exchequer; Sir William Stirling-Maxwell; and Mr. Cowper, at the time First Commissioner of Works. With those Gentlemen were associated Mr. Shaw and Mr. Pownall, as professional

"If it is true that the Government has rejected the Design which was recommended by the professional Judges and the Judges of Designs as the best for Plan and internal Arrangements, and has adopted the Design which was recommended for Elevation only; and, further, if the Competitors advisers; and there was a third professional gentleman appointed to test the accuracy of the estimates which might be submitted to the Commission. These appointments having been made the competition commenced, the architects competing sent in their designs, which were exhibited to the public for several months. The terms on which the architects were to compete were laid down in a Treasury Minute—that was the basis of the contract which was made. By the terms of that contract each of the competitors was to receive a certain sum as compensation for the time and pains he devoted to preparing his plans; and in return for that sum his plans were to become the property of the Commission, whether he was the successful competitor or not. The Commission took care that the result of the competition should place them in the position of owners of all the plans of every kind which should be submitted to them. The terms of the competition further provided that the five Judges of the Designs should state in their opinion who was the successful competitor; and those terms also stated that the internal arrangements of the Courts and Offices was of vital importance, that on it mainly depended the failure or success of their concentration, and that its importance could not be over-estimated. It was a mistake to suppose it was ever intended that the competition should result in the selection of a particular design, which was thenceforth to be the design adopted for the Courts. Its object rather was to test the relative merits of the different plans without pledging the Government to select a particular design, and erect the Courts according to that design. It was conceived that it might very well be that various useful hints might be taken from different designs; and the Judges of the Designs were to decide which of their authors showed the greatest skill and capacity for the superintendence of the erection of the new Law Courts. The Judges of the Designs proceeded with their work, and a very arduous work it was; and they were unable to say which one of the competing architects had been the most successful. They accordingly sent in what was called their "Award" to the Treasury, stating that they were unable to agree upon any one competing architect as being the most successful, but that putting two of the designs together—those of Mr. Barry and Mr. Street—they thought that of Mr. Street was the best for the external elevation, and for the interior, and that he had received the most valuable assistance from the Designs, point out to the importance. I said the Judges tested the designs, on and, in the end, felt itself in there had been competing a round, the Judges of two together the scale against other competitors. I said the Judges of the Designs Report they that this did they still could of any one and they had done ready to give power, but to award. While some of said that it conditions of had entered singly, but combined, and that as technically Treasury the sion, which ference had the Attorney cordance with ditions. Then into the case at the decision decision was that the awards, as far concerned, was award was Street could solves the subject the whole project at an end, signs had as other award. It then became ment to consider the responsibility the architect tion of the Commissioners had also before

The Lord Chancellor

Judges of the Designs, as far as it went, that Mr. Barry and Mr. Street had showed the greatest amount of skill in respect to the points to which he had previously referred. He (the Lord Chancellor) must encumber that matter with another statement which connected itself with what he had already said. About the same time there had been going on another competition for the National Gallery; and, singularly enough, it resulted just in the same way as the other. The Judges of the Designs in that case, presided over by a Member of their Lordships' House, reported to the Treasury that, having endeavoured to exercise their judgment on the competing designs submitted to them, they were not prepared to recommend any one individual design for adoption, but they pointed out the design of Mr. Barry as exhibiting the greatest amount of architectural merit. The Government, having thus cast upon them the double duty of choosing an architect to superintend the erection of the Law Courts, and also of choosing an architect to superintend the erection of a National Gallery, took this course—They certainly had in those two Reports testimony of the highest value in favour of Mr. Street and Mr. Barry; and in the exercise of their judgment, and on the responsibility which devolved upon them, they assigned to Mr. Street the task of superintending the erection of the Courts of Law, and they assigned to Mr. Barry the task of superintending the erection of the National Gallery. The Government and the Commission were in possession of all the designs; they had the right to make any use of them which they might think desirable; they were not limited to those designs as regarded the internal arrangements; and there was much in all the designs as regarded the internal arrangements which was capable of improvement. Therefore, concurring in all that had been said by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) about the importance of the internal arrangements of the Courts of Law, and the great advantage of the three requisites to which he had referred—namely, that those Courts ought to be places in which persons could breathe, see, and hear—attributes which his noble Friend had reminded them could not perhaps be said to be all possessed by the Chamber in which their Lordships then sat; although he was bold enough to say that with respect to hearing, no man had less right to complain of that House than his noble Friend; but while concurring with him that those requisites were vital to a Court of Law, and also, while regretting that the award of the Judges of the Designs had failed in the manner he had described, he yet believed that the course the Government had taken would ultimately prove the one most conducive to the erection of a building which he trusted would secure the end that Parliament and the public had in view.

THE EARL OF STRADBROKE considered that some of the architects had been unjustly treated. After a short discussion in the other House it was determined to propose to a considerable number of our best architects to send in plans for which they were offered a certain sum (£800), on the condition that these plans were to become the property of Her Majesty's Government. Some of the most eminent among them declined, on the ground that they apprehended a want of fair play; to which it was replied that two professional gentlemen should be added to the list of Judges; and, on their names being mentioned and approved, all, being eleven in number, undertook the heavy task of forming plans for building the Law Courts, and the architects were particularly instructed to consider that light, air, quiet, and convenience in the various Courts were of primary importance, far more so than the outward appearance. After a long and minute consideration of the subject, the professional Judges determined that 41 points were in favour of Mr. Barry, 29 in favour of Mr. Scott; next came, I believe, Mr. Lockwood and Mr. Waterhouse giving to Mr. Street three points of preference, one being the exterior, and two of minor importance. They added at the end of their Report, that they considered that Mr. Street's exterior was superior to the others, this being the gothic style. This was called no decision, because two architects were named, and Her Majesty's Government slipped out of their agreement. After such treatment, it is scarcely possible to believe that men of eminence will compete for the future.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had considerable doubts as to the course that had been adopted. It seemed to him that they were bound to adopt one or other of the designs, and that Mr. Barry was entitled to the preference. He also thought it very unfortunate that, because of the injustice done to that gentleman in regard to the Law Courts, it had been resolved to adopt his plans for a new National Gallery. He thought there could be no immediate haste for a new National Gallery, when the Trustees were about to have possession of the whole of the rooms in the present building, and he believed that no one was satisfied with any of the plans that had been exhibited, and he regretted, therefore, that Mr. Barry was to receive that commission. A considerable sum must be voted for this new building, while only £12,000 were to be allowed for the new Government Offices, although the public were paying rent for hired buildings, in which the public business was transacted, and which were dispersed all over the town. This was a most unfortunate mode of dealing with these public works. He must express his opinion that Mr. Barry had not been fairly treated in the matter of the Law Courts, and the arrangement which had been come to was in every respect unfortunate.

LORD OVERSTONE said, he could not allow the remarks of the noble Lord upon the National Gallery to pass without a protest. He could assure their Lordships that the accommodation provided for the national pictures was very insufficient. It was defective in not providing the best light, in not giving due facilities for the circulation of the public, in the regulations for police purposes, and in the accommodation for students. The Trustees would gladly welcome the additional space acquired by the rooms now occupied by the Royal Academy; but it would be a great mistake to suppose that this would justify any delay in the erection of a new National Gallery worthy of our splendid collection of paintings. He hoped that the question of the National Gallery building would not be treated as secondary to any other. He must, moreover, express his regret, that though we had already had an opportunity of having a National Gallery sufficient for all requirements, and vastly superior to any other gallery in the world, and this at a small expense, yet for some reason which he was unable to penetrate, this plan was set aside and treated with contempt. He alluded to the proposed plan, by Mr. Barry, for the erection of a new National Gallery on the site of Burlington Gardens, which, had it not been unaccountably rejected, would now have been in an advanced state, and, indeed, near its completion; whilst the National Gallery as now proposed was wholly unsettled as a nitely postpo its completi

Lord Redesdale

Lordships co

LORD CRANWORTH said, he was sorry to see from him to see but one right in representation, given in representation, not attend, not mainly, to a question, conviction, doubt it was a façade could the Instructions internal arrangements Cranworth's of holding the Commission only engage through competent Law accommodation and these Regulations Instructions competing a Barry to say Instructions or that the Instructions the best mode and facility those employed public; and I knew nothing, tion now uncompetent to respective places Barry to represent prominence questions of the Law Office their opinion had any legal architect of the designs property of the Government had of the selection fair arrangements appointed to the National of the Courts

THE EARL OF MANSFIELD said, he could not say one between but whether employed in was the chief architect who prior in regard

ment. It seemed to him that the Government were going to employ the architect who in this respect had shown least capacity of all; and the public had the least likelihood of being provided with the building it required by the present arrangement. The Government had not only unfairly disappointed the architect who had earned the title of having sent in the best design, according to the Instructions, but had overlooked the public interest in their selection. He would ask, was it too late to re-consider the question of site? A few years ago, when this subject was first brought forward, a site by the river side was only in prospect, but now it was an accomplished fact—a splendid site had been provided by the Thames Embankment, and there was a general feeling that this should be the site of the new Law Courts. The grandest buildings should be erected on the noblest sites. Independently of all architectural considerations, the river side had the strongest possible claims—it was the best in regard to freedom from noise, security against fire and popular troubles, and opportunities of access. The site by the river side had almost every superiority except one—it was convenient to the Temple, but not so convenient to Lincoln's Inn. Inasmuch, however, as Lincoln's Inn had managed to carry on a successful business when the Chancery Courts sat in Westminster Hall, he did not think that even Lincoln's Inn would be greatly injured, if the site for the new Law Courts was on the Thames Embankment. If the matter were not finally settled, beyond all redemption, he would urge upon the Government to consider even now whether a nobler and more useful site could not be found by the river side. As to the present site, there would be no access to the Courts except from the Strand. With that exception there would be no one decent street which would give an entrance to the Courts, and as much money must be laid out in providing new approaches as had been expended in purchasing the site. He believed that if the Government adopted his suggestion, they would be able to re-sell the present site for pretty nearly what it had cost.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he had an impression that Mr. Barry had had a scant measure of justice, and that impression had been rather deepened than removed by the statement of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. His noble and learned Friend said that, if ornamentation and utility came into conflict, the latter, according to the conditions laid down, should have the preference; that the Judges of the Designs thought Mr. Barry's plan superior in respect of utility and Mr. Street's in respect of ornamentation; that their joint recommendations being referred to the Attorney General, he decided that the award was to be regarded as no award at all, and that, under these circumstances, it was in the discretion of the Government to make any use of the plans, whether, he presumed, in the way of adoption or combination. His noble and learned Friend added that while this matter was pending the question of the National Gallery arose, and that Mr. Barry being unquestionably first in that competition, and, being doubtfully first with regard to the Law Courts, the Government had thought it right to split the difference, and assign Mr. Barry the prize—a much smaller one—for the National Gallery, and Mr. Street the larger prize for the Law Courts. Now, he (the Earl of Carnarvon) maintained that Mr. Street had no claim, as far as the conditions were concerned, to the latter, and he could not see why the National Gallery should have been mixed up with the question of the Law Courts. If Mr. Barry was unquestionably first in the case of the National Gallery, he was plainly entitled to the prize; and if he was also first by virtue of the conditions in the case of the Law Courts, he was equally entitled to that prize likewise. Supposing him to be successful in both competitions, he could see no reason why both prizes should not be awarded to him. Happily, both these architects were very eminent in their profession, and the question could therefore be discussed with the less invidiousness. He did not expect much taste from any Government, for, as a rule, he thought they did not show much capacity in this respect; but Parliament was bound to insist that when conditions had been laid down they should be rigidly and faithfully adhered to, and he agreed with his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) that it would be most unfortunate as regarded the profession, and still more unfortunate as regarded the Government and the country, if public works were dealt with in this manner. He trusted that the Government would re-consider their most ill-advised decision.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was not aware that in any document Mr.

Barry had been described as unquestionably first in the National Gallery competition. The Judges were unable to recommend any one design submitted to them for the Law Courts; but they stated that they thought Mr. Barry's designs were the best in respect of internal arrangement, and Mr. Street's the best as an architectural composition. Now, the condition was that the plans of the greatest merit, both as regarded the interior and the exterior, should be preferred. But he had no passage before him which stated that if these two came into conflict the former should be sacrificed. The only stipulation of the kind, of which he was aware, was this—

"The arrangement of the Courts and Offices is of vital moment; on it mainly depends the success or failure of their concentration, and its importance cannot be over-estimated."

He maintained that there had been no breach of contract, and he was not aware that such a thing had been alleged or suggested by any of the architects. The contract, in fact, according to the terms proposed, miscarried; and it being impossible to decide on a successful competitor, it became the duty of the Government to choose the person they believed to be the best. As to the collateral Report of Messrs. Shaw and Pownall, those gentlemen were in no respect the Judges, but were simply the advisers of the Judges; and he believed their Report was disagreed from by all the various bodies of the profession, who after all were the best qualified to decide with respect to internal accommodation. This was neither the time nor the place to discuss the question of site; but he believed that were the profession consulted they would, not merely by a large majority, but with something like unanimity, declare that the present site, though it might be less ornamental, was much more useful than one by the river side would be.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was anxious that there should be no conflict on matters of fact. In page 11 of the "Conditions" it was said that the chief point to be considered was the question of accommodation and convenience. Now it was not merely Messrs. Shaw and Pownall, the professional assessors of the Judges of the Designs, but Mr. Cowper, Chairman of the Judges of the Designs who reported to the Government that Mr. Barry's designs were the best with regard to convenience of plan and internal arrange-ment, as to elevation of Friend had any stipulation conflicted until he would ren-

The Lord Chancellor

"The chief point and to be true may conflict, in effect, are the same the arrangement of the greatest degree accurate trans country."

THE LORD said that the preference as regarded Street's as expressed not by the Commission Pownall's Report the question noble Marquess him, but he part of the con-

HOUSE

From

Notice taken present; He not being present

HOUSE

Minutes

MINUTES.—Earl of Cranborne's PUBLIC BILLS—Management Committee—Pitt, &c. (Confirmation of the Report—City and Harbour Pier and Harbours (139); Report (141); Jaro-

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACTS

AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Metropolis Local Management Acts — Was presented by The Marquess Townshend; read 1^a. (No. 169.)

Their Lordships having gone through the Business on the Paper without debate—

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, June 22, 1868.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Report — Poor Rates Assessment &c. Committee [No. 342].

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolutions in Committee—Navy and Army Expenditure*.

Ordered—Lunatic Asylums (Ireland)*.

First Reading—Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy Act Amendment* [181]; Poor Law and Medical Inspectors (Ireland)* [183]; Lunatic Asylums (Ireland)* [184].

Second Reading—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) Amendment* [176]; Bank of Bombay* [178]; Prisons (Scotland) Administration Acts Amendment* [155]; Bankruptcy Act (1861) Amendment [145].

Referred to Select Committee—Prisons (Scotland) Administration Acts Amendment* [155].

Committee—Government of India Act Amendment [91]—R.P.; County General Assessment (Scotland) (re-comm.)* [172]; Entail Amendment (Scotland) (re-comm.)* [140]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 6)* [175]; Renewable Leasehold Conversion (Ireland) Act Extension* [61].

Report—County General Assessment (Scotland) (re-comm.)* [172]; Entail Amendment (Scotland) (re-comm.)* [140]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 6)* [175]; Renewable Leasehold Conversion (Ireland) Act Extension* [61-182].

Considered as amended—Representation of the People (Ireland) [71]; Petroleum Act Amendment* [171].

Third Reading—Boundary* [165]; Courts of Chancery and Exchequer (Ireland) Fee Funds* [146] and passed.

COINAGE—HALF-CROWNS.

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the fact that no half-crown pieces have been coined for some years past at the Mint, and if it is the intention to allow that useful coin ultimately to be withdrawn from circulation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, it was true that no new half-crowns had been coined for fifteen years, but the present supply was adequate to the demand. Half-crown pieces formed about 30 per cent of the silver coinage, and there was no present intention of withdrawing them from circulation.

TENURE OF LAND (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the Tenure and Occupation of Land in Ireland; and, if so, when will the Commission be issued?

THE EARL OF MAYO: It is the intention, Sir, of the Government to issue the Commission to which the hon. Gentleman refers. It is our earnest wish to endeavour to induce some Members of both Houses of Parliament to serve on the Commission; but, having regard to the Business of both Houses and the convenience of Members, it will be impossible to appoint the Commission until the termination of the Session.

EX-GOVERNOR EYRE—PETITION.

QUESTION.

MR. GRENFELL said, he wished to preface his Question on this subject by a few remarks. He was a member of the Jamaica Committee, which had been subject to the unceasing persecutions of an irresponsible body of persons signing themselves "The Eyre Defence Committee."

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member is not acting in accordance with the Rules of the House in not confining himself to such matter as is necessary for explaining the grounds on which he puts the Question.

MR. GRENFELL said, he did not wish to trespass on the Rules of the House, and if it were necessary he would move the Adjournment. He was a member of the Jamaica Committee, and he had taken it upon himself to ask the hon. Member for Bute, On what grounds he stated, on Friday June 5th, that the Petition which he presented praying for an early re-appointment of Mr. Eyre to Her Majesty's Colonial Service was signed by 71 Peers, 6 Bishops, 20 Members of the House of Commons, 40 Generals, 26 Admirals, 400 Clergymen, and 30,000 other persons, when, in fact, it is only signed by 3 Peers, 1 Bishop, 6 Members of Parliament, 20 Generals, 9 Admirals, 171 Clergymen, and 10,000 other persons? He should not have ventured to ask this Question if it merely contained a Prayer that the expenses of Governor Eyre should be paid by the country, because there would be nothing astonishing in a Petition of that kind from a large number of irresponsible persons who might not have had the blue books before them, and might have signed the Petition in ignorance of the facts.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member has now stated everything necessary to give the information he desires to convey.

Mr. LAMONT said, he must beg the indulgence of the House while he gave a brief explanation of the circumstances attending the exaggerated statement referred to. When that Petition was given to him for presentation to the House it was accompanied by a short statement in writing, purporting to be an analysis or summary of the Petitioners. He did what he imagined the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent or any other Member of this House would have done—he did not analyze this immense number of names himself; but he accepted the written statement as being substantially correct, and he read it to the House. He had now to express his regret that he committed himself to an unintentional exaggeration of the numbers, and he trusted that the House would believe him when he said that he stated that which he believed at the time to be strictly correct. It appeared that this exaggeration of the numbers was caused by the clerk who made up the statement supposing that he was entitled to include as Petitioners all those who had subscribed sums of money, however small, to Mr. Eyre's Defence and Aid Fund. With regard to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, of which he had private notice, he begged to say that, considering the vast preponderance of opinion in favour of his distinguished friend among the educated and enlightened classes of the community, and especially among those who know anything about the colonies, he apprehended that there would not be the slightest difficulty before the prorogation in procuring a Supplementary Petition from the borough of Stoke-upon-Trent and the borough of

Mr. Grenfell

Westminster signed than

MAJOR A make one of himself in to move the . When the hands of the information Secretary of ferring to fig make use of the Secreta ment in qu Member for mistake tha the member mittee were statement t public.

THE CAT

SIR J. (he would b State for F aware that the 7th of that the Inte held at Zurich

"Determine ment to appoi consider the Plague in it Russia ;"

whether the this determi with what support of the Congress wil

LORD ST I cannot gi mation he paragraph in tion refers a called the I gress have Zurich. No has, howeve and I am no has been m Question.

MERCE

Mr. CAN ask the Vi Trade, If I for the ame the Mercha

Table of the House before the close of the Session, that the Country may have an opportunity of considering its provisions before the meeting of the next Parliament?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, in reply, that, when it became evident that there was no chance of passing this Bill during the present Session, the draughtsman was directed to employ himself on work of greater emergency; and therefore the consolidation of the Merchant Shipping Acts was not proceeded with with as much rapidity as before. He hoped, however, to lay the Bill on the table before the end of the Session, and to distribute it to Members sufficiently early for those who were interested in the question to express an opinion upon it in ample time before the meeting of the next Parliament.

METROPOLIS—THE RIVER THAMES AT BARKING.—QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What steps he means to take with regard to the Memorial that has been addressed to him by the Vicar and other Inhabitants of Barking relative to the state of the River Thames in that neighbourhood?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that he received on Saturday last a communication from the Thames Conservators on the subject referred to in the noble Lord's Question, stating that they had not completed their investigation; and he did not wish to take any further steps until the inquiry was complete.

POST OFFICE—LONDON LETTER CARRIERS.—QUESTION.

MR. BATHURST said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Why a fixed standard of height is required for London Letter Carriers?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, in reply, that great inconvenience to the public service arose some years ago from the want of some standard of physical strength in the minor Departments of the Post Office. The standard of height had been altered from time to time; and he knew of no reason why the present standard should be maintained, except that an ample supply of candidates for the service could be obtained at that standard.

THE NEUTRALITY COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Recommendations of the Neutrality Commission have received the attention and approval of the Government; and, if so, whether a Measure will be introduced for the purpose of giving effect to them?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I have read the Report of the Neutrality Commissioners with great interest and attention, and I may say that in the general scope of their recommendations Her Majesty's Government entirely concur. But with regard to the details of those recommendations I require more leisure than I have yet had for considering them before I give an opinion upon them. In the actual state of Business I conceive that it would be quite useless to attempt to legislate on the subject during the present Session; but if I have the opportunity I shall certainly be prepared to do so when the new Parliament meets.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.—QUESTION.

MR. GROVE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the official restrictions imposed for so many years on the late Surgeon in Chief of the Metropolitan Police Force, and announced as a necessity to the candidate, on his retirement, have been entirely relaxed, notwithstanding that the strength of the Police Force has so materially increased; and, whether the present Chief Surgeon is required to visit the sick of the different divisions, and perform the other duties of his office in the same manner as his predecessor, who was prohibited from engaging in private practice?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he found that in April 1866, while the right hon. Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) was at the Home Office, the relaxation of the rule in regard to that matter was first made. Mr. Holmes was allowed to take private practice on condition that the salary, which had been £800, was reduced to £500, and that he should at all times be available for police duty. Mr. Holmes undertook so to be, and there was no complaint of his not having attended to that duty.

ARMY—NON-PURCHASE CORPS.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Government have yet decided on an amended scheme of retirement from the non-purchase corps; and if, before taking the Vote for Retired Officers in the Army Estimates, he will lay upon the Table any Correspondence on the subject between the Departments of Government, and the actuary's calculations of the cost of the plan proposed by the Select Committee of last year?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, he was not able to say that the Government had yet come to a decision on the subject, which was one that must be very carefully considered. They had a plan before them, and the Report of an actuary, and information received from other quarters; and if he could devise a plan that would receive the sanction of the Government, he would lay it on the table in the course of the Session, in order to act on it hereafter. It was more desirable that the plan should be prepared with due caution than that it should be prepared quickly. The subject was not a pressing one, and there was no immediate hurry. The really important object was to have the plan prepared with the greatest care. There was no Correspondence, and he was sure the hon. Member would not ask him to produce any Official Minutes. He had no objection to give him the Report of the actuary, if he would move for it.

ARMY—CASE OF CAPTAIN BROOKE.

QUESTIONS.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true, as alleged in The Pall Mall Gazette of the 13th instant, that Captain Brooke, of the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, has been under arrest for one month without being brought to a Court Martial?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that it was quite true that Captain Brooke was under "open" arrest for nearly a month; but the course pursued with respect to him was quite in accordance with the 18th Article of War.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House Copy of the Correspondence which has Peel (late Wetherall,

the Horse G cause of under arres

Sir JOH not think it ence of the of that nat therefore, n
he believed Officer asks to the char great pleas

nothing in impugning
Colonel Pe

In answe

Sir JOH
Brooke had month and that time h

ECCLES

Mr. MAC
ask the Fire
tion he had Whether b tunity of a the Ecclesi
he will state ment intend

Mr. DIS
any Notice

Mr. MAC
per on Frid

Mr. DIS impossible

Business w find an opp

he would;
would state

intended to

FEVER

Mr. J. A
ask the Un Colonies, W
Mauritius, i has been pr

Mr. AD despatch he

May, which in the previ

in April, 18

and only 1,216 of these 2,036 were from fever;—there was great hope that the fever was dying out. The proposed sanitary measures, if fairly carried out in Port Louis, may greatly diminish the chance of its recurrence.

SEA FISHERIES BILL—[BILL 170].

(Mr. Stephen Cave, Mr. Edward Egerton, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre.)

LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Lords' Amendments considered.

Amendments, as far as the Amendment Leave out Clause 46, agreed to.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the Amendments which had been made in "another place." Two years ago the late Government had brought under consideration a Bill for facilitating the establishment of oyster fisheries. Lord Derby's Administration took it up, devoted much attention to it, improved it and passed it into a law. It was working well. Many applications had taken place under the Act for the establishment of oyster fisheries, and so far as he knew, the measure was giving general satisfaction. In the Sea Fisheries Bill it was thought desirable that all the statutes relating to sea fisheries should be consolidated into one, and therefore the Oyster Bill was put into the Sea Fisheries Bill as a matter of consolidation. Important Amendments had been made in the Bill in the House of Lords, which, if adopted by Parliament, would go far to defeat all the main objects of the measure intended to encourage the establishment of oyster fisheries. It might be right enough to amend, but it was not the proper way of doing it in a Consolidation Bill without notice or discussion. If the Oyster Fisheries Act was to be repealed, it should be brought under the consideration of Parliament; the object should not be effected in an indirect manner by the insertion of Amendments in a consolidating Bill by the other House of Parliament. The Bill enabled persons to appropriate unproductive, useless areas on the sea-shore for the cultivation of oysters; but care was to be taken that all proprietary and other rights should be respected, that all parties concerned should have due notice and an opportunity of being heard against any such appropriation of the sea-shore—not only before the Board of Trade, but if they thought fit before a Select Committee of the House, as in the case of a private Bill. There were many parts of the sea-shore which might be appropriated to oyster beds without injury to anybody; but unless private rights, frequently of undefined and valueless character, were barred, after persons had received a grant and gone to a great expense in laying down oysters the persons who had rights of dredging might come and dredge them all up. He would bar any such right; but he would not do so without notice, and consent or compensation. What, then, had been done? The House of Lords said that it was right that areas of the sea-shore should be appropriated to oyster fisheries; but they inserted clauses to the effect that the Board of Trade Order should bar no rights except those of parties who had given their consent. Now, what would be the effect of this? There might be the inhabitants of a village who might have undefined prescriptive rights though of no real value, whose consent could not be obtained, and they might lie by whilst the Order was obtained, and then after the unfortunate grantee had invested his money they might come forward and say that their consent had not been obtained, and therefore they had the right to take the oysters. Certain Scotch proprietors appeared to think that there was some intention to interfere with their foreshore rights; but they would find that this measure for the promotion of the oyster fisheries would be most beneficial to them in the end. He thought that the Lords' Amendments ought to be rejected—in the first place, because what they proposed to do was not a fair mode of defeating the intentions of the Legislature when it passed the Oyster Fisheries Act. The clause in that Act which he supported was the law of the land. If, however, it could be shown that under the existing law adequate compensation was not given for the interference with the rights of any person where they were affected injuriously by any provisional Order of the Board of Trade, he should be ready to accede to an extension of that law in order to secure that object. The Lords' Amendments did not provide for the compensation of individuals for such an infringement of their rights, and, therefore, he moved that, instead of those Amendments, a clause be inserted in the Bill providing that the Lands Clauses Acts should be deemed to be incorporated in every Order of the Board of Trade made under this Act, and that grantees should make full compensation under the Lands

Clauses Acts to all persons whose rights of fishing or any of whose rights were injuriously affected by any Board of Trade Order, or by any confirming Act, under the Oyster Fisheries Act of 1866.

Leave out Clause 46, the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he could not deny that he preferred the clauses as they stood in the Bill passed by that House, and he certainly agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ashton that this alteration would to some extent curtail and fetter the operation of the Board of Trade, and so far impede the granting of Orders for oyster fisheries. At the same time there was considerable force in the arguments which induced the House of Lords to adopt these Amendments—namely, that a Government Department ought not to have the power of interfering with or taking away any property or right, however small or ill-defined, but that such power ought to be vested in Parliament alone. Inserting the Amendments in a consolidating Act might not have been the best way of proceeding; but they knew that it was the constant practice of Parliament to unite amendment with consolidation, and he did not think that they could find fault with the House of Lords on such a ground. The House of Lords thought that the power ought to be vested in Parliament alone to take away rights, and that it would be hard to call upon people to defend their rights before Parliament because the Board of Trade had made an Order which would curtail those rights. Very high legal authority had declared that the clauses in the Oyster Fisheries Bill were hardly constitutional, and ought not to have passed in 1866. That was a question which he must leave the right hon. Gentleman to settle with a former and probably future Colleague of his own; which, if they might judge from the ordinary sources of information, he would not find a very easy task. On the other hand, it might be said that in practice the present Board of Trade had been so careful of existing interests that not only had there been no objections on that score in respect of any of the Orders already issued, but they had drawn upon themselves complaints, he might even say taunts, from people speaking and writing in the interest of applicants for grants of oyster fisheries, on the ground of their being unduly scrupulous; so that the Board of ment in the ment for th had been re clearly con Parliament

any persons of the occu ment, who scrupulous.
Amendment
only cases grant oyste which no op they should tection to was probab legislation o thero would thrown in t and especia
Boston Dee mussel span proposed as of the Land hardly meet simply provi
perty comp jection made at all to t given by it regretted th made. On be inclined defer to the place" for the property was hardly of the rig
this matter,
ments, rathe
the Bill alth Act proved necessary t
Board of T future subst
SIR AND
lieved that Amendment conferred b
ago. He tr with regard taken to res of the fores
Mr. SHA support the Friend the of two year
quence of th a Commissio

Mr. Milner Gibson

subject, and the only complaint that had since been made with regard to the working of that Act was that the Board of Trade had put its provisions into force too cautiously. It was preposterous to imagine that the House of Lords would, if the Amendments were rejected, throw out the Bill, because by so doing they would leave the law precisely in the state of which they complained. He therefore trusted that the House would not consent to Amendments which the Vice President of the Board of Trade did not attempt to defend, and which would entirely defeat a Bill which had been very beneficial to the public, and was only objected to by certain Scotch Lords, who, not content with owning a great part of Scotland, wished to extend their imaginary rights even into the sea.

GENERAL DUNNE said, he hoped that the House would accept these clauses which had been inserted in the Bill with the strictest attention to public rights, and in thorough harmony with the spirit of the Constitution.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that as the Bill originally stood owners of foreshore were liable to deprivation of their rights by an Order of the Board of Trade, confirmed by an Act of Parliament, and the only way in which they could preserve their rights was by defending them in the passage of the Act through Parliament. The House of Lords perceived that this was a very strong piece of legislation, and they now endeavoured by these clauses to provide a remedy; for it certainly was hard that a man who had bonâ fide rights over a fishery should be deprived of those rights, however desirous he was of preserving and exercising them, or be compelled to oppose the passage of a Bill through Parliament.

MR. LAWSON said, that the working of the Act had been attended with great benefit in Ireland, and it was unreasonable that so well-considered a measure as this had proved to be should be defeated by a side-wind, as now contemplated by the other branch of the Legislature. It appeared to him that the tendency of the Amendments was not so much to protect real rights as to give a colour to imaginary rights, and thus occasion useless litigation.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, he agreed with the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Milner Gibson) as regarded oyster fisheries; but must remind him that other rights were affected by the clause in question. For instance, Hastings had an ancient charter giving its corporation a right to take shingle from the foreshore to mend the roads; the Board of Trade, however, instead of inquiring as to the right exercised under this charter, sent its circular ordering coastguard officers to report cases of removal of shingle, and thus interfered with the unquestionable rights of the people. The question was a serious one for Hastings, because metal for the roads other than shingle cost the corporation almost as much as coal.

MR. COLERIDGE said, he feared the Attorney General argued on the erroneous basis that it was desirable to grant rights for compensation, and to treat the matter entirely as a private concern, without admitting those large considerations to which a great Government Department ought always to give due weight. The power of the Crown over foreshores had been vested in the Board of Trade, and administered by that Department to the general satisfaction. He highly approved the Circular of the Board recently presented to the House, because it dealt with foreshores on the principle that the public was concerned in them. The case quoted by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie) did not affect the expediency of issuing a general Order by the Board of Trade. No doubt a simple representation from the Corporation of Hastings would have secured a due consideration for its rights under the Royal Charter.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought the hon. and learned Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) had failed to appreciate the point under discussion. The more careful legislators in the House of Lords, with whom he agreed, objected to depriving subjects by force of rights they had long enjoyed. [Mr. MILNER GIBSON: There is compensation provided for.] That was precisely what the Lords objected to. Rights were to be taken away by force and compensation given. The only argument used against the view taken by the other House was that some parties would lie by by design while their rights were being dealt with; but the Lords said that if the rights of individuals were to be interfered with it should be done by an Act of Parliament, and not by a Government Department.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he trusted the House of Lords' proviso would be maintained as far as Scotch foreshores were concerned; but if the Irish Members particularly wished to have their foreshores placed entirely at the disposal of the Board of Trade, by all means let it be so.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that parties whose rights were affected had ample means for protecting their interests. Their Lordships appeared to attach some peculiar sacredness to the rights of foreshores which entitled them to be treated in a different manner to that in which Parliament had acted in sanctioning inclosures and all public improvements.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he must complain very strongly of the language of the Circular drawn up by the Board of Trade. The Crown having always failed to establish their rights to the foreshores in Scotland in a straightforward manner, it was now sought to circumvent the proprietors of foreshores by the systematic course of action laid down for the Department.

MR. M'LAREN said, it was altogether a mistake to suppose that the Board of Trade were grasping at any jurisdiction. The Bill merely recited the law as it now stood; and it was the other House of Parliament who wished to alter the law, and deprive the Crown of its rights. The Crown in this case was but the personification of the public interests, and the Board of Trade, in the name of the Crown, were merely protecting the public. He recommended the House to let well alone, and not to alter the existing state of the law.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he wished to explain. He had been misunderstood by the learned Attorney General. The Motion affected no rights, altered no proprietary rights, and set up no titles. His only object was to apply to rights over the sea-shore the same formula which was applied to rights over land—namely, consent or compensation. But their Lordships would have no compensation.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Milner Gibson.)

The House divided:—Ayes 125; Noes 133: Majority 8.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments, as far as the Amendment Clause B, agreed to.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE, in moving the insertion of Clause B, as inserted by the Lords, said, he should like to say a few words on this Amendment. In 1839 a Convention was concluded with France

Mr. H. Baillie

fixing a close seas between France from of September not to apply mile limit, r Channel. 2 the oyster d England, wh vent their tal fishing the three miles; low Banks, 4 to the Report 1856, the Is close month So that the tion was th the Channel French and being free might have any time. Channel, w the English against the cruizers, w generally t against the complained, ment. For this system open sea wa Fishery Col late Govern point being ment, negot Government an entire abt tion of the the French the rule, no deep-sea be to some ex cause they effectually t territorial l ment succes the close ti law in oth There was, ing that we sense in wh used; and, might be 1 might be fi the Channel continuance existed bef concluded, s ished by the new Convention, inasmuch as the close time had been cut short by six weeks; and he need scarcely say that if the Bill were thrown out, or the Convention suspended, and the old Convention consequently ipso facto revived, the Irish banks would be exposed to the danger of which the Irish Members were now afraid, for six weeks longer. Whatever might be the ancient doctrine of mare clausum, or property in the bed of the sea, an opinion had been given by the Law Officers of both countries that the Irish Fishery Board never had any authority outside the three-mile limit; and when it was represented that the interests of Ireland were sacrificed it should be remembered that the Irish Sea was left in precisely the same position as the Bristol Channel, and the whole of the seas washing Scotland and England beyond the English Channel, in all of which were valuable oyster beds. Moreover, Ireland was left in this better position according to her own views, inasmuch as she had the power of completely regulating the fisheries within three miles. It had been asked, why should we not have a close time for oysters as well as for grouse or partridges? But oysters did not sit upon eggs, and everyone knew, in reference even to game, that close time was of no use, unless sufficient birds were left to breed. It was not dredging in close time which had diminished the supply of oysters, but partly failure of spat and partly over-dredging in open time. Hence the scarcity was felt in France, where close time was strictly observed. When oysters were taken in a sick, unhealthy state, it was when they had just spawned. Like other fish, they were wholesome shortly before spawning, when their capture, of course, still more prevented increase of brood. But he must say, with all deference, that this desire on the part of Ireland to obtain powers to which she had no claim by law, and which she had never exercised, ought scarcely to have been made a ground for impeding a Convention concluded nearly two years ago with a friendly Power—a Convention in which that Power made considerable concessions, and the principles of which had received the approbation of the late as well as of the present Government. It would not have been creditable to this country to inform France that we could not carry out our engagements because a section of Parliament endeavoured, by opposing this Bill, to obtain concessions at variance with the principle of entire freedom in the open sea, to which we endeavoured throughout the discussions to obtain the assent of the French Government. In order to avoid this the noble Duke the President of the Board of Trade reluctantly consented to the introduction of this clause, to which he moved that this House do now agree—

“The Irish Fishery Commissioners may from Time to Time lay before Her Majesty in Council Byelaws for the Purpose of restricting or regulating the dredging for Oysters on any Oyster Beds or Banks situate within the Distance of Twenty Miles, measured from a straight Line drawn from Wicklow Head to Carnsore Point on the Coast of Ireland, but outside of the exclusive Fishery Limits of the British Islands, and all such Byelaws shall apply equally to all Boats and Persons on whom they may be binding. It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to do all or any of the following things—namely, (a) To direct that such Byelaws shall be observed; (b) To impose Penalties not exceeding Twenty Pounds for the Breach of such Byelaws; (c) To apply to the Breach of such Byelaws such (if any) of the Enactments in force respecting the Breach of the Regulations respecting Irish Oyster Fisheries within the exclusive Fishery Limits of the British Islands, and with such Modifications and Alterations as may be found desirable; (d) To revoke or alter any Order so made. Provided that the Length of Close Time prescribed by any such Order shall not be shorter than that prescribed for the Time being by the Irish Fishery Commissioners in respect of Beds or Banks within the exclusive Fishery Limits of the British Islands. Every such Order shall be binding on all British Sea-Fishing Boats, and on any other Sea-Fishing-Boats in that Behalf specified in the Order, and on the Crews of such Boats.”

Clause B, the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GREGORY said, that Ireland had great cause to complain of the three-mile limit, because the greater portion of some of their most valuable oyster beds were outside that distance, and consequently the great difficulty was how to protect that portion which was outside the municipal limit. He objected to the power of making by-laws being taken from the Sea Fisheries Commissioners and placed in the Board of Trade. At present every person interested in the oyster fishery had full opportunities of making objections, and in that respect the system had been found to work well. But it was now proposed to put an end to that system, and instead of their being one set of by-laws and one uniform limit, the Bill would create two limits, to be regulated by two sets of by-laws; a state of things that could only produce confusion. The effect of the Amendment he proposed would be that the by-laws for both limits should be sanctioned by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in Council. The hon. Member concluded by moving to leave out in line 2, the words "Her Majesty, and to insert in their place, "Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor of Ireland."

Amendment proposed, in line 2, to leave out the words "Her Majesty," in order to insert the words "the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor of Ireland,"—(Mr. Gregory.)—instead thereof.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that as one of the Members of the recent Fisheries Commission, he desired to observe that, in the opinion of Professor Huxley and Mr. Caird and himself, no close season was desirable at all, and that the late failure in the supply of oysters was attributable to the exceptionable state of temperature that had been experienced, and other extraneous circumstances, and not to over-dredging or to the non-enforcement of a close season. The Commissioners themselves were therefore willing to do away with the close season altogether. But the French Commissioners with whom they came in conference, in negotiating the new Convention, though of the same opinion themselves, represented that the French fishermen were not yet prepared for so great a change; and upon this representation the Commissioners agreed not to recommend the abolition of the close season, but that it should be shortened from four months to two and a half months. It was also agreed that the limits within which the close season should be enforced should be very nearly the same as those under the old Convention of 1844, that is to say, the English Channel only, and not the East Coast, or the Irish Channel, or the Irish Coast. The line was drawn from the North Foreland to Dunkirk, and from Land's End to Ushant. It was not therefore because they believed in the advantage of a close season that this limit had been agreed upon; in fact the close season was to be confined to as narrow limits as possible. He apprehended that the same policy which the Commissioners thought best for the East Coast of England was also best for Ireland. It could not therefore be said that they had neglected Ireland. But as there was a difference of opinion on this important subject among the Irish Fishery Commissioners, as there was a certain advantage in trying two opposite systems, it was not his intention to adopt giving to the power of the three-mile limit conditions, and that limit. the Queen's supervision.

Mr. Gregory

GENERAL of the Irish quately repre The most fisheries was. Regard ought the people's opinions of theorists, when the limit it was they would within the jurisdictioners, instead subject to H there be any two rules with the twenty was a model yers; but then over again extent of the follow because it that they world.

MR. BLA hon. Member (Lefevre) that rities on the the Irish Co the oyster gentleman was the able and of the Sea, one of the companies and Dr. Fr naturalist, as of the greater oyster fisher convinced we same fact, th lished a close not to be paid the gold he was inclined want of oysters causes connected partly also ing which pre the Whitsun visit to two or three of the best oyster fisheries in the kingdom; he found at all of them a great want of spirit, and he was convinced that unless the oyster fishery was properly protected by legislation its deficiency next year would be felt even more severely. Ireland was better adapted than any other country for the successful culture of oysters; but if the beds were dredged without being replenished they would soon be exhausted. The Irish Members were evidently unanimously in favour of a closer season, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman opposite would yield to their united opinion.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, it was shown in 1856 that the Irish fishermen did not observe close time. But the question really before the House was this, whether Her Majesty should or should not be ousted of her authority over the Irish seas; and whether the Lord Lieutenant should for the first time in history be endowed with an authority extending beyond Ireland? That would be the practical result of the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman opposite. It should be remembered that the Bill only proposed that by-laws enacted by the Irish Fishery Commissioners should be subject to the sanction of the Queen in Council. There could be no conflict between the authorities, for it was provided that the close time should be the same both within and without the three miles limit, within the lines laid down in the clause already adopted by the House, and the by-laws, when sanctioned by the House, would be enforced within the whole area by the Irish Commissioners.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The House divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 46: Majority 29.

MR. GREGORY moved to increase the penalties to a maximum of £50 and a minimum of £10.

Amendment proposed, in line 13, to leave out the word "twenty," in order to insert the word "fifty,"—(Mr. Gregory.)—instead thereof.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that if anything, £20 was too much, as under the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 106, the Irish Fishery Commissioners could only impose a penalty of £5 for such offences within three miles; and it would be most unreasonable that they should be allowed to impose ten times that amount outside the three-mile limit.

Question, "That the word 'twenty' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Clause B agreed to.

Subsequent Amendments to be taken into Consideration upon Thursday.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 91.]—COMMITTEE.

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir James Fergusson.)

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD WILLIAM HAY said, he wished to offer some general remarks on the measure, having been prevented from doing so at an earlier stage. There was a general agreement that some change should be made in the constitution of the Council, and he offered no objection to the second reading. The principal clause in the Bill was to alter the tenure of the Council from a tenure for life to one for twelve years. That was a great improvement; but it was the only change of importance proposed by the Secretary of State to be made in a Bill passed ten years ago for the better government of India. The right hon. Gentleman assumed that no other change was necessary, and that, with the exception of the tenure of office the constitution of the Council was just what it ought to be. To that proposition he would not assent. He thought that several changes might be made in the constitution of the Council, especially in regard to the power possessed by the Council of overruling the Secretary of State upon matters affecting the expenditure of the Indian revenues. That was a very unfortunate defect, because it placed the centre of power and real authority regarding the government of India in the hands of the Council. It was wrong in principle, and it was opposed to the opinion of those whose opinion was best worth having, among others of Lord Macaulay, who was not only well acquainted with the details of Indian administration, but had also had the advantage of having spent several years in that country; and who said in 1853—

"India is, and must be governed in India. That is a law we did not make, which we cannot alter, and to which we should do our best to conform our legislation."

But the existence of this power in the hands of the Council had a directly contrary effect. A Secretary of State for India was not chosen for his fitness to govern India, but because of his ability to manage his Council. This was a great misfortune, and one remedy would be to take away from the Council the power they possessed in respect to Indian expenditure, and to give the Secretary of State the same power on this as on other subjects that came before him, and which were scarcely of less importance. The Secretary of State had the power of giving away a country like Mysore, which was almost as large as Scotland; yet when the question arose of an expenditure of a few hundred pounds he was liable to be over-ruled by a body that ought to be purely consultative. The result of such a state of things was that, instead of accelerating the dispatch of public business it lowered the position of the Governor General of India. He feared that there was a tendency, owing to the facility of communication, to interfere with the Governor General of India, and this tendency was increased by throwing so much power into the hands of the Council. He did not believe that the influence they exercised had accomplished the object which Parliament had in view—the control of the Indian expenditure. He believed that it had led, on the contrary, to great extravagance in our expenditure that never would have been tolerated if the chief and main power had been left in the hands of the Governor General of India. This was not his own opinion merely, and he was surprised that the Secretary of State for India had asked the House to agree to the second reading of an Act to amend the Act passed a few years ago without giving the House the slightest opportunity of forming an opinion how the Act had operated. Lord Cranborne, in his speech last year upon the Resolutions moved by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) said—

"We all know that this Council was constituted at a time of considerable difficulty, and that it was the result of Parliamentary compromise. Therefore, we cannot expect that it will work as well as a scheme matured under better auspices."

And Lord Cranborne added—

"You cannot always expect, if you choose to place extravagant powers in a particular body, that those powers will not be sometimes misused."

—[3 Hansard, clxxxix. 1880.]

Lord William Hay

The Session was too late, the Committee, who upon the subject of Indian authority, but the men who hoped to be in the Council, and be taken with. The witness before such who had lived during which time. For I had the evidence just returned. He would of course be consultative, but the power of commendation and recording be laid upon would, however, over-ruling then the Council should be, a pervasion of. At present have a Council when it would Council at a to obtain the character which bers of the then he advised the Secretary of State to advise him the Secretaries it was unable to give the control over year. But take a strong the opinion without very the control India, but which was a question of points—first, point of view be called the In the first payer thought he could obtain of the India taxpayer him one, he believed the great ex

India, both English and Native, when he said they would prefer the guarantee that would be afforded them by a Secretary of State, independent of his Council, whom they could question in that House about everything connected with Indian expenditure. That was preferable to the guarantee afforded by the check given to a body of gentlemen who were wholly irresponsible to any human being, and only responsible to their own consciences. The noble Viscount proceeded to say that the Council were at present practically irresponsible—

“I think, therefore, the protection of a Council which has power to limit the expenditure is desirable, and should be sustained; but the point to which I take exception is that the responsibility for that expenditure is not thrown on the Council. . . . Remember that the Council have every item of expenditure, large and small, under their control, and every act of the Government which can involve expenditure—that is to say, the vast majority of its acts. But you never blame the Council if the Government of India goes wrong. You blame the Secretary of State; he is the figure that stands before Parliament. . . . What I wish to do is to impress upon the House that you hold the Secretary of State responsible for a policy in India and what it produces; but you never know whether he carries out his own policy, or a policy imposed upon him, either by the absolute votes of his Council or by a clear indication of their will.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxix. 1381.]

Lord Cranborne, therefore, argued that, if the Council was to control the Secretary of State, it ought to bear the responsibility; and he must confess that noble Lord also expressed the opinion that it was necessary the Council should have the power to which he was now objecting. But Lord Cranborne had not then before him the important alternative suggested by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton)—namely, that the expenditure, which was really in the hands of the Secretary of State, should be submitted to that House in the shape of Estimates, and that, therefore, the check should be transferred practically from the Council to that House. He thought the constitutional objection that the Secretary of State ought not to have the power of dealing with the revenues of India would be entirely, or at least practically, met if that suggestion were carried out. But Lord Cranborne, when he said last year that the Council should have that power, seemed to assume that the Council was altogether free from those temptations to mis-spend money to which the Secretary of State was supposed to be so open. It was thought that the Secretary of State was ready to be drawn into every rash or extravagant scheme which might be brought before him, and that he required to have several Councillors to step forward and prevent him from committing indiscretions of that sort. Now, those who took that view assumed that the Councillors themselves were exposed to no temptations of the same description; but he held that the contrary was the case, and that with a body of men responsible only to their own consciences they had no guarantee whatever against all kinds of jobbery and maladministration. If the House had an opportunity of examining the Estimate every year with respect to the portion of the Indian revenues that was spent in England, this great advantage, as it appeared to him, would be secured—that the House would be induced to take a deeper interest than it took now in Indian affairs. The First Minister of the Crown once said—

“We have heard over and over again that India never could command attention here, however great the magnitude of the subject. The explanation is simple, if humiliating: Englishmen have never yet had to pay for India. That is the reason why India never has produced any interest in this country.”

It might be humiliating that they should take no interest in India because they did not pay for India; but it was far more humiliating when they considered that India paid for them in many respects, and that they did not even then take the slightest interest in her. He said that India paid for us; at least there were many items of a doubtful character for which many plausible reasons might be advanced why they should come out of the English Exchequer rather than the Indian. Take, for example, the expenditure on the Abyssinian War and the late Entertainment to the Sultan. Assuming that both that war and that entertainment were necessary, the matter ought to come before the House in this form—“Which of the two taxpayers is to pay for them, the English or the Indian?” How were such points settled at this moment? In the case of the Abyssinian War the question how much India was to pay was really decided in the English Treasury, which made up its mind that India should bear a certain portion of the expenditure and that England should bear the rest. As to the Ball to the Sultan, the question was no doubt decided by the fifteen Gentlemen who sat in the Council. On every occasion in which any expenditure was involved which might be referred to either of those two Exchequers the question ought to come before the House to be decided in this shape—"Shall this expenditure, which everybody admits ought to be incurred, be paid by England or by India?" He ventured to think, if that were done, that in nine cases out of ten India would gain very largely by that arrangement. If all that category of items, of which the portion of the Indian revenue expended in this country mainly consisted, came before the House as proposed by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) in the form of an Estimate, they would have what was so desirable—namely, at least one night in the year that was devoted to a real and not to a sham debate on Indian affairs. The opinion the House took on that question had a very important bearing on every clause of the present Bill. The 1st clause related to the length of the tenure of office in the Council. If the House agreed with him in thinking that the veto should be taken away, and that the Council should be reduced to a consultative body, they might feel that they could very well reduce the term of Office down to seven or perhaps even five years. On the other hand, if they were really to make the Council the rulers of India, objectionable as, in his opinion, that would be, still he must admit, as a consequence of that arrangement, that they must have a more permanent body of men in that position. With regard to the admission of members of the Council into that House, there were, he was aware, many objections to it; and if the vetoing power was retained he should object to it himself. But if they were to alter the constitution of the Council he could see considerable advantage in having some of its members sitting in that House. As to any objection that might be made on the ground of their being placemen, he did not think it of much weight; because, as was proposed by the Bill, they would hold Office only for a certain number of years. There was no doubt that the people of India took the deepest interest in this matter, and would be very much pleased to see one or two members of the Council with seats in that House. He could not understand, however, how that was to be done if the Council should remain constituted as it was at present. But, whatever view the House might take on that point, he hoped that they would proceed to deal with the Bill, bearing in mind those two very important do all they of the Gov induce the interest the country.

Lord William Hay

Mr. J. S. with the not important the India, and t in the chang rendered con easier to le part of the all, they con control, the control coul out men to lied upon to there must l question wa Secretary o tary of Stat point he did said anythi it was bette Secretary o the Secretar had an effe had admitte Secretary o sons who l India. Ab ference of Lord and h not possess they were u they never weight whic would be a machinery. giving their so powerful his own sub did not thin constituted they could t modes of d some of wh ments. Per ment if a po sit in that l surprised, h said that i Council were its Member that House; away then l vantage the such an exp him at variance with the whole course of the noble Lord's argument, because he had contended that the Council were irresponsible, and that the Secretary of State was the only one who had any responsibility. But what responsibility had the Secretary of State? It was that he could be called to account in that House, and if he did not succeed in defending his measures he could be turned out of Office. But the same thing would happen to the Council. They could be turned out after a period of trial, because the proposal of this Bill was to make the duration of Office as a matter of course shorter. But of all the surprising things in the speech of the noble Lord that which had surprised him most was that the noble Lord should have brought forward the tendency of this country to throw all expenditure, when any excuse could be found, on the people of India, as a reason for asking the consent of England, not India, when such expenditure was in question. If there was one thing which might be held absolutely certain, it was that the majority of a body constituted like the Council would in such matters be on the side of India. The Court of Directors had always been so, and many a battle to his knowledge had been fought by them with the Board of Control, in order to prevent such expenditure from being thrown upon India; and they often succeeded, but, he was sorry to say, still oftener failed. Now, if the power of sanctioning expenditure were taken away from the Council, which represented India, and given to that House, which did not represent India; and which seldom troubled itself about India at all, but which did care about England and its burthens, and if the noble Lord believed that the House would be actuated in such matters by a generous and chivalrous spirit and would take the burden from India to throw it upon their own constituents, he must say that the noble Lord had a far higher opinion of the virtue of that House than his (Mr. Stuart Mill's) experience had taught him to have of that or perhaps any other public body in similar circumstances.

COLONEL SYKES said, that nothing had surprised him more than the assertion of his noble Friend (Lord William Hay) that the Government was impeded by the power of the Council of India. Why, the Council were the mere agents of the Secretary of State, with the exception of the control of the finances of India, which his noble Friend would do away with. The power which the 41st clause of the India Act gave the Council of controlling the expenditure of India was the only power which they possessed. They could not see a despatch unless it were referred to them, by the Secretary of State. They were little more than automata, except in financial matters, and were on an entirely different footing from the Directors of the East India Company who had as much freedom of action as a Member of the House of Commons, and he spoke from nineteen years experience. The Secretary of State, much to his credit, upon his own authority, had restored to the Prince of Mysore the dominions which had been taken from his family, and that was a power which the Secretary of State, under the circumstances, ought to possess; but he ought not to have the sole control of £50,000,000 of revenue, or the power of guaranteeing £60,000,000 of money — he believed it was now £80,000,000 — for railways. That was a power he would give to no man, inasmuch as the House of Commons did not allow a Secretary of State to spend a £100 unless it had been placed at his disposal by a previous Vote of the House. Neither would he allow an individual to lend £500,000 for irrigation works, without the advice of those who had had experience of the necessities and advantages of such works in India.

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON said, he regretted that means had not been taken to furnish the House with reliable and authentic information with respect to the working of the Council of India. There was a vast number of points on which such information was needed before Parliament proceeded to legislate further in the proposed direction for that country. The very question involved in the financial power of the Council, for instance, was one which it was very important should receive elucidation. How had that power operated? Had the Council assisted or impeded the Secretary of State with reference to financial operations? How often had they exercised anything like a veto on financial measures? Did the Secretary of State over-rule their decisions in matters not connected with finance? So far as he had an opportunity of obtaining information, his opinion was that the Council were in reality a very great assistance to the Minister for India; that they were, in a word, an auxiliary, and not an obstructive body. But the subject was one on which adequate knowledge could be secured only by means of an inquiry before a Select Committee empowered to examine those who, from the position which they occupied, were most conversant with it. The Session was, however, now too far advanced, he was afraid, for the appointment of such a Committee, but he trusted the Secretary of State for India would throw some light, before the House proceeded further with his Bills, on the working of the present system.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, that after what had fallen from one or two hon. Members whose opinions on Indian matters deserved the greatest consideration, he felt it to be his duty to make a few observations on the subject. The hon. Member who had just spoken seemed to think it very desirable that the present measure should be preceded by some kind of inquiry before a Select Committee. Undoubtedly in former times it was the practice to institute an inquiry into the mode in which the East India Company used to conduct the affairs of that country, and the terms on which their charter should be renewed at the expiration of the several periods for which it had been granted, and some might think that that formed a precedent for inquiry in the present case. The old and the new systems of government for India were not, however, exactly parallel. Under the former, Parliament delegated to a body extrinsic to itself and peculiarly constituted—for it was originally nothing more than a private company—certain functions of an Imperial character. It was therefore only reasonable and proper that Parliament should from time to time review the proceedings of that body. But the present Government of India was in the main neither more nor less than one of the branches of the Executive, and under those circumstances he did not think there was any standing occasion prima facie for a review of its working beyond that which existed in the case of the Admiralty, the War Office, or any other public Department into whose affairs the House might, when it deemed fit, order inquiry to be instituted; while, upon the other hand, those who were responsible for the transaction of its business would very properly, in the event of setting about making any alteration in its Constitution, submit their proposals to the consideration of a Select Committee, or even move for a Select Committee to investigate the whole subject before proposing any such change. It was not, however, the opinion of the present Government, nor so far as he Office, that t. adopted for whole, work contrary, as believing it well be devise it was true deemed it de be introduce of the House discussion. opinion might the House right that t vestigated b should not, l advanced, of being taken. same time w made out fo was by no t the House which the pr out such an as the hon. deen (Colon that the Cou the bidding The hon. at ting forward lost sight o under which and which Secretary of despatch or cation to se ception of th to pass thro the event, t arising, the ceed to act but then it v for the cour lay those r STOKES: Su mit to them reference to to be sent of the Coun dissent from and each of for and laid cretary of S ties of com when anyth matter was Council. S only two let out to India

Sir Henry Rawlinson

—the one written by his immediate predecessor in Office with reference to the Mysore question, the other by himself in connection with the Abyssinian Expedition. There might be one or two other cases in which letters had been written in the Secret Department, and usually, after the immediate occasion for secrecy had passed away, had been transferred to the Political Department. But, as a matter of ordinary routine, almost everything went before the Council of India. The mode in which business was done was this—The Council was divided into a certain number of Committees—the Political Committee, the Finance Committee, the Military Committee, and so forth. Every letter which came from India, with the rarest exceptions, was first opened in the Department to which it belonged. It then, if of sufficient importance, was submitted for the opinion of the Secretary of State. Afterwards it came before the Committee to which it belonged. That Committee met every week. They fully considered and discussed the subject, and prepared for the consideration of the Secretary of State the answer which they thought ought to be sent. This answer, again, was reviewed by the Secretary of State, and when approved by him was brought before the Council, where the matter was once more fully discussed and voted upon. Thus, every question underwent a careful sifting, first before the Committee, and afterwards before the whole Council, the Secretary of State being privy to the whole of the proceedings, he being in constant communication with the members of the Committee, and being able to discuss freely with them and with the Council all the business which had to be transacted. If there was an objection to this system, it was that the system was somewhat cumbrous, and that business did not proceed quite so rapidly as one could wish. But, on the other hand, when you considered what the Council of India was meant to be and what it ought to be—namely, more in the nature of a Council of Review and Control than an Executive Council, the same objection would not apply with the same force as it would to a Department which was altogether executive. He agreed entirely with the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) that the Executive Government of India must be conducted in India, and that, as far as possible, the hands of the Viceroy must be strengthened; and he thought that when the proposals in these Bills were considered it would be seen that their tendency was to strengthen the hands of the Executive in India. But you must have the power of review and control here, and the question was, how that power could best be exercised? His belief was—and it was strengthened by his experience of the working of the Council since he had been in Office that you exercised the power best by a Council constituted very much as the present Council of India was constituted. He believed that there you had the means of thoroughly discussing the questions which arose, and that the Secretary of State was thereby really put in possession of the merits of a case and enabled to exercise his discretion much better than in any other way. Possibly there were faults in this system as in all others; and one was that the members of the Council, being for the most part gentlemen who had served for many years in India, who had acquired much practical knowledge of details, were rather too prone to import their own knowledge into the discussion and into the regulation of matters decided in India. There was, perhaps, a tendency on the part of members of the Council to examine and criticize the acts of the Government of India a little more in detail than was desirable. At the same time, though that was a natural temptation to gentlemen who saw anything done with which they were practically acquainted, and who saw it done, perhaps, not exactly in the way in which they would have done it in India ten or twelve years ago, yet he was bound to say that the animating spirit of the Council of India was a desire to support the Government of India. He was not at all disposed to find fault with the Council of India for any tendency to meddle or interfere too much in petty details. He only said it was a temptation; but it was one which generally was very fairly resisted. As to the speech of the noble Lord, which was an extremely interesting one, he rather gathered from it this view, with which he agreed—namely, that the Executive Government of India should be in India; that the control should be exercised in England by the Secretary of State, using his Council simply as his advisers, the responsibility being concentrated as much as possible upon him, and he being responsible as much as possible to this House; that the control, in short, should not be that of the Council, but that of the Secretary of State informed by his Council, with the sanction of this House. The effect of such a system would be to throw a much greater amount of direct control into the hands of this House than existed at present. Now, with all respect to this House, he did not think that it would be as good a body to control the Indian Government as the Council of India. It was a great advantage to have a body independent of Parliament, which concentrated its attention on the affairs of this great dependency, which was adequately informed upon the affairs of India, and which had a direct interest in India, and the control of such a body was likely to be much more effectual than the loose control which must be exercised in this House. Perhaps there might be here twenty, or thirty, or fifty Gentlemen who understood a good deal about India; but they were always liable to be overborne by Gentlemen who knew little about it, whose ideas were crude, and who might do a good deal of mischief. Therefore he was entirely for maintaining the present Constitution of India, keeping the control in the hands of a body apart from this House, not influenced by political exigencies, and with no other object than the good government of India. It was desirable to shorten the tenure of office of the members of such a body in order that new blood might be more frequently infused into it, and newer ideas respecting India might be represented; but otherwise he should be jealous of interfering with the independence of the Council of India. He was much obliged to those hon. Members who wished to give more control to the Secretary of State, and who said they would rather trust him than the Council. But he did not desire to have for himself or his successors greater power than he now had. If the Secretary of State chose to exercise it, he now had quite as much power as was necessary. There was no doubt that upon matters not connected with expenditure he had the power of over-ruling the Council. Even in other matters, however, he had great moral power, and through Parliament and in other ways, could bring to bear so great a leverage and pressure upon the Council that he did not believe they would for a moment resist it. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Frome asked whether the Council had often over-ruled the Secretary of State. He did not think there were many cases in which a direct vote had been taken, and the Council had outvoted the Secretary of State. At the same time there were many cases in which,

if it had r
Secretary c expenditure not been in cit exercise on the whe
—in checki
otherwise
There were stopped an tary of Sta
but, lookin Council ha their influ mischief on other. The of praise t
State, who fellow, whi stopped hin good. Now did not he Secretary c for the inf heard of th
State would for the Co matter, the 3rd chapter him—"The
be with me,
I did eat."
always temp that you p this mischi the Council the Secretar any point portance he and let the take upon h was properl holter him oil, unless I House that present syst factorily as with a Coun
a task as th Parliament
tion de nou that there w for the old separate po
However, th not go back there were pany and tl
—one balan
Executive i made more

Sir Stafford Northcote

was because a much greater force was brought to bear on the Governor General under the existing system of unity of action, and because a greater directness of control was exercised upon the Governor General through the rapidity of communication by the electric telegraph, that he wanted to strengthen the position of that functionary. That was the object of one of the Bills he had introduced.

Mr. KINNAIRD said, he was of opinion that it would have been right to have referred the Bill under consideration to a Select Committee in the first instance; and he believed that great evil was being done in consequence of the restraint exercised upon the Governor General by persons who could not know so well as he the circumstances arising in India.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Members of the Council of India to be in future elected for a Term of 12 Years).

Mr. AYRTON said, he hoped some modification would be made in this clause, which was open to great objection. The clause, while it enacted that new Members of the Council, after holding office for twelve years, should not be re-eligible, said nothing about the existing members of Council, who held office during good behaviour, so that, if new Councillors should be appointed under the present clause, there would exist a Council consisting of two classes of members, and the appointment of one class would condemn the existence of the other class, for both systems could not be admitted to be right. In the Act constituting the existing Council a proviso was introduced declaring that if Parliament should think fit to reduce the number of the Councillors, or alter the terms and conditions on which they held office, no Member of the Council who had not served ten years should be entitled to claim compensation. Therefore, Parliament then concluded that it would be a proper time at the end of ten years to reconsider the mode in which the Council should be appointed, and if a change should be made in the terms and conditions of appointments to the Council for the future, the Committee was bound to apply the new conditions to the members of the Council now existing, so that they might also be on the same footing. For what purpose was the Council formed? The Council was desirable to supply a link of connection between the Secretary of State and those who were engaged in administering affairs in India. For this purpose it was absolutely necessary that those forming the Council should have a fresh knowledge of everything that was going on in India, should have been recently in India, should know those engaged in affairs there, and be able to speak of the effect of measures which were being carried on. Another function of the Council was to prevent the Secretary of State from writing any inconsiderate despatch or sending out any indiscreet Order to India. That function could not be well and effectually performed unless the Councillors had a fresh knowledge of the immediate views with which the Government was administered. If ten years ago they had been enabled to consider this question with due regard to principle, they never could have arrived at the conclusion that the members of Council should hold their offices during good behaviour. If they were to have in the Council gentlemen of eighty years of age, who perhaps had been away from India for thirty or forty years, it was quite evident that the purposes for which the Council had been established could not be fulfilled. Persons at the age of eighty were as able to receive their salary and to enjoy honours as when they were in the vigour of life; but unfortunately there was no means provided by the Act of bringing the councillors to a test of their efficiency and capacity, because they were not bound to do more than they pleased. They might remain, in point of fact, as long as they liked, until they chose to present themselves to the Secretary of State as wholly unfit for any further services. No one up to this time had been found incapable or inefficient for the performance of the duties of the Council. Was that a state of things they should encourage? The Secretary of State would be prepared after this year to get them to retire on pensions of £500 a year; but he denied that this was the proper mode of treating this question. They should show some regard for the revenues of India. Members of Council were in receipt of very large pensions from the Indian revenues already. They had been Directors of the East India Company, with £500 a year and unlimited eating at the India House, and now they were in receipt of £1,200 a year. What possible moral claim then could they have to receive pensions. They were perfectly free to examine this question; he therefore urged on the Secretary of State the necessity of putting the whole of his Coun-

oil on one uniform footing—a footing more consistent with the purpose for which it was intended. What was a reasonable period during which a person should hold the office of Councillor without his position being subject to review? Having regard to the fact of there being fourteen Councillors—[Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Fifteen]—he thought there should be a change of at least two every year. This would run no risk of disturbing business or subverting the policy which regulated the course of affairs, while it would enable them to introduce into the Council men who had just returned from India. The Secretary of State for India proposed that one should retire after twelve years, but that appeared an extremely long period. It did not offer sufficient rapidity of change to ensure efficiency. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would listen to the appeals which had been made to him and re-consider his proposal. It was necessary to carry this clause much further than the Secretary of State proposed. The whole Council should remain subject to legislation, and the period for which the office of member of Council was held should be shortened very considerably below that which the right hon. Baronet proposed. But the right hon. Baronet no doubt stood in a delicate position with regard to his Council. In order to bring the question properly under the consideration of the Committee, he should move the Amendment of which he had given Notice. He had fixed seven years, but there should be the power of re-appointment. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice—

“To leave out all after ‘Council,’ and insert ‘shall continue in office until he shall retire in manner following, unless he shall by any other means previously cease to hold such office; the two members of the Council, one having been elected and the other appointed, who have been longest in office, shall retire on the first day of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, and in every subsequent year, but any such member may be again elected or appointed a member of the said Council; and when two or more members shall have been elected or appointed on the same day, the Secretary of State shall determine the order of retirement of such as were appointed, and the said Council shall determine the order of retirement of such as were elected.’”

COLONEL SYKES said, he had an Amendment on the Paper limiting the term of service to five years; but he was willing to accept the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton). The term of twelve years was decidedly too high. If a man of forty-five to fifty India, were mental and in the interior of India. Council directors, and out every for re-election of a year, if they had they had an office there verner General sidencies and appointments same principles Service, as to high cost than five years different principles. By the means and ability of the Indian

Mr. Ayrton

MR. THOMAS speech of who had a Committee was identical learned Mr. (Mr. Ayrton) former proposal should be thought it far as he was positions were and learned proposed the Council at year, from the hon. that the Office for from that the question as to the hon. and Mr. Hamlets.

had now a on retiring understood the Council ten years’

SIR ST. the way the Act there of Parliament ten years, Council were

MR. THOMAS was only a members of the Council that they would not be displaced without a pension. Under the proposed system, however, the members of the Council would be appointed for a fixed term of years, and would not be entitled to a pension. The term of service proposed was undoubtedly too long, and the effect would be that there would not be an introduction of sufficient new blood.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he was glad that the principle of a limited term of service—for which he contended in 1858—was now recognized not only by Members of the House but by Her Majesty's Government. Most of the Members of the Committee were, however, agreed that the term of service proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State was too long. He thought, at all events, the term should be reduced from twelve years to ten. According to the proposal before the Committee, the members of the Council were to be nominated by the Council or by the Secretary of State; but he thought it was unadvisable that the members should feel that their re-election depended upon the good-will of their colleagues or the judgement or caprice of the Secretary of State. Balancing the advantages and disadvantages of the two terms proposed, he felt bound to support the proposal of the Government; but he should be happy to support so much of the Amendment moved by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) as did not refer to the eligibility of the retiring Councillors.

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON approved the principle of infusing fresh blood into the Council. It did however appear to him close practice that when there remained only about two months to the time when the Councillors originally appointed were entitled to claim their pensions this right should be altogether done away with. [Mr. AYRTON: That is not proposed.] As he understood the Amendment it would certainly have the effect of abrogating the right which the present Councillors would have to a pension at the expiration of ten years' service, that period having very nearly expired. He could not help regarding that as hard. He might remind the Committee that though absence from India might be a disqualification for Members of the Council, age could not be regarded as such, their functions being purely consultative. Concurring as he did in the principle that an infusion of fresh blood was advisable, he was inclined to give a preference to the suggestion that the term should be reduced to ten years.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it was perfectly clear that Parliament might alter the constitution of the Council, or, indeed, abolish it altogether, without the members being entitled to any legal claim for compensation, a provision to that effect having been inserted in the Act of 1858. Inasmuch, however, as two or three members who might retire by reason of infirmity next year would be entitled—morally, at all events—to a pension, he agreed in the opinion that it would be rather sharp practice now to deprive them of that right. Those members had performed their duties to the best of their ability, and it would be hard that they should be deprived of an advantage to which they might possibly have been looking forward for some years. The recognition of that principle would not interfere with the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), because the cases to which he referred would be included in the words “unless he shall by any other means previously cease to hold such office.” He doubted, however, whether the proposal made by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was the best, because the hon. Gentleman proposed that the two senior members should retire every year, independently of those who resigned from other causes. As there would constantly be some member or members retiring in this way, it was extremely uncertain whether any member of the Council would be able to serve the full period, whatever the period they might fix upon might be, inasmuch as through the vacancies so caused, he would be called upon to retire before his allotted period of service had expired. Some of the present members would probably retire in a few years, and probably the average number of years' service would not amount to seven—it might be five, or even four. He thought that they should give a salary, and not a pension, and that a gentleman ought to know how many years he was likely to serve. The objections which had been urged against the re-election of the members of Council were certainly strong ones, and it was therefore proposed that there should be no re-election. Although he had placed the term of service at twelve years, he thought it might be reduced to ten, but not to a less term, because length of service undoubtedly increased a man's value. He attached great weight to the remark of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) some time ago, to the effect that care should be taken that the Council did not fall below the permanent and assistant Secretaries in experience of Indian affairs. It was highly important that new blood should be infused into the Council from time to time, but it was also important that the body should know of the past history of the Government. Whenever a new Secretary of State was appointed all the old complaints and grievances connected with his Office were re-produced, and unless his Department numbered among its officers one who could tell him how and why those matters were formerly disposed of, his time would be largely occupied by the consideration of frivolous cases. On the whole, he recommended his own proposal in preference to that of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. AYRTON asked whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed the present members should hold Office for life?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not think any object would be gained by altering the position of the present members of the Council, because retirements would be tolerably frequent, and because the Councillors had been appointed on the presumption that they would act as long as they were able.

COLONEL SYKES asked whether the old arrangement by which the directors of the India Company elected seven members of the Council and the Government nominated eight, would continue?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said it would.

LORD WILLIAM HAY said, he would be willing to pension the present members of the Council, no matter what it cost, because he was sure the expenditure would be a cheap bargain in the interests of India. They would have a thoroughly efficient Council by getting rid of those who, in his opinion, were no longer fit for their work.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he was in favour of putting new blood in the Council, and suggested the expediency of occasionally appointing others than Indians, on the ground that such Councillors would look at questions from an English, and not exclusively from an Indian point of view. He thought ten years too long a term.

MR. AYRTON said, that as the Secre-

Sir Stafford Northcote

tary of State system he to take the simple question of the Council their office leave to w

LORD WILSON of the passion appointed.

Amendment 14, to leave passing of pointed."

Question to be left

The Council Noes 109:

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought taken place as an adopted recommendation had no of the term of believing it able to the and he also suggestion (Lord Wilton) if they in India, and If these A clause might grow could stood the other Business

Clause 1

House of

Committee upon This

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION

(1891) (The Earl of

Bill, as

MR. BRIDGES said that in taking Thursday the two clauses of his into the Bill, he an arrangement he had entered into. The clause to which he referred had been drawn with the assistance of one of the most distinguished Members of that House, and he believed it to be a clause of great importance. Wishing, therefore, that it should be fully discussed, he had agreed with some of his hon. Friends not to bring it on after a certain hour on Thursday night. Under those circumstances, when he found that he could not bring it on before that hour, he thought the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was one he ought to accept. Unfortunately, his hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) moved a clause. His hon. Friend had since written him a letter on the subject, which letter was of a most satisfactory character. ["Read."] He did not think it necessary to read the letter. His hon. Friend made his Motion under a misunderstanding, being under the impression that he (Mr. Brady) had not accepted the proposition of the First Lord of the Treasury, who had placed him in the position in which those who supported him desired he should be. He wished the House to understand that he, at least, was in no way responsible for the disorderly scene which had taken place on Thursday night.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he could not allow this Bill to pass through this its final stage without giving expression to his unqualified dissatisfaction at the manner in which it dealt with the interests of the Irish people. When the noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo) introduced the Bill some months since, he stated his objections to it. He stated that it was, so far as he could judge, framed upon no principle which had been previously accepted or adopted by the House. It proposed to increase the county representation by five Members to the injury of the urban representation as it stood. It left quite untouched the great question of the county franchise, and avoided the freemen so long objected to by Irish representatives. The Bill had now passed through Committee without any important Amendment, with the exception of the abandonment by the Government of their proposal for disfranchisement and re-distribution of seats—the borough franchise had been fixed at a figure above £4, the county franchise remained at £12, and the freemen, with all their objectionable characteristics, remain in the full possession of all the powers which they have so long misused. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire told the House on Thursday last that the claims made for the increase of the county constituencies were fair and ought to be considered. He told you that even in 1850, when the English figure of qualification was six times what it now is, this House agreed to a reduction to £8. He quoted the remarkable words of Sir Robert Peel, and he reminded the House that the £12 figure then fixed was arrived at as a compromise. He might have added to the authority he quoted many others almost of equal weight. He might have said that Mr. Hume considered that an £8 Irish rating was then equal to a £30 English rating; and he might have given the words of Sir James Graham, that, in a great nation of 8,000,000, to have an electoral body of less than 50,000 was an anomaly quite inconsistent with the safety of the State or the security of our institutions. But the right hon. Gentleman's arguments were unavailing, and the county franchise remained untouched. He much regretted this result, as he must entirely disagree with the remarks which fell from his hon. Friend the Member for Galway and his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham. He did not believe there would be any danger to the Liberal cause in giving votes to the Irish tenant-farmers valued at £8. He believed them to be as independent and as well entitled to the franchise as the English tenants. The very impatient manner in which the subject of Irish Reform was received by the House on Thursday last left those who represented Irish opinions and Irish interests little to hope for. The Bill was in Committee for some few hours on Monday night on merely formal matters. It was resumed on Thursday, and it was with difficulty those hon. Members who were anxious to express their opinions upon a subject of such moment were able to do so. Be it so; but such a course, they might rest assured, will not be lost upon the Irish people. What had they done by this Bill? They gave to Irish voters an increase of 9,000. Scotland receives 50,000 voters; and England 570,000 voters by the English Bill. They were told that our representation was sufficient for our population of upwards of 5,000,000. If the proportion added to England's register was to be taken, they should be increased 50,000 at least—20 per cent. If the numbers on their own register were to be taken, they should be increased by one-fifth—40,000; and yet we receive only 9,000. Such a measure is a mere mockery. He protested against its being called a measure of reform of the Irish representation; it was only a stronger proof that the Parliament did not deal with Ireland as it dealt with England and Scotland. The House might rest satisfied that the estimate which the Irish people would form of this debate would be shown by the unanimous expression of their opinion at the approaching elections, and that they would tell that House and the Ministers that they would no longer submit to legislation so unequal in its character and so unjust to the best interests of their country.

MR. BAGWELL said, he thought that a measure so small and so absurd had never before been brought before the House. In agreeing to it the Irish Liberal Members only relegated the question to a Parliament of more authority and vigour. But they certainly had hoped that a more extended county franchise would be at once adopted. He did not complain of hon. Members opposite, who had only acted in honest accordance with their principles; but he could not and would not say the same for Members on that (the Liberal) side. Irish Members had sat there night after night patiently endeavouring to make the other two Reform Bills worthy of England and of Scotland; but when they came to debate the question of their county franchise they found themselves deliberately, basely deserted by the men they had supported. What had this Reform Bill done for Ireland? Why, it had only reduced the franchise in towns from £8 to over £4. The county franchise it had left precisely as it stood before. He felt exactly as one might feel that found himself abandoned by his comrades in the face of danger. Of course, to those English and Scotch Members who had supported their Irish Friends these remarks did not apply; but whomsoever the cap fitted, he might wear it. In common with, he believed, all the Irish Liberal Members, he protested against the Bill; and if by saying "No" he could throw it out, he would willingly pronounce that word.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he thought English Members had no just ground for complaining that too much of the time of the House had been occupied by this measure. He did not complain of the time occupied or by the Secretary of this two evening's sentiments of the Member. Having analysed the subject was a majority of for extending and abolishing; but the out those objects of the apathetic Liberal Member down to the brethren in the land. This Reform Bill mere lowering. He deeply been taken the hon. Member with respect of very served serious was unfortunate brought on the suggestion Crown to be accepted. The Member for hon. Member and the right (Mr. Milner) to address the question an entirely on which it the Reform have the opinion Treasury on the right hon subject should tion, because the right hon ciple opposed to think the believed the servative measures would be Bill. He was hon. Gentlemen his party were the purpose. authority, for years ago, on the right hon ference to the extension of the franchise and the ballot—

Mr. O'Beirne

“The disposition of property in England throws the power of the country into the hands of the natural aristocracy. I do not believe that any system of suffrage or any method of election would direct that power into other quarters. It is the necessary consequence of our present social state. I believe that the wider the popular suffrage the more powerful would be the natural aristocracy. That seems to be the inevitable consequence; but I maintain this proposition on the clear understanding that such an extension should be founded on a fair and not on a factious basis. Here then arises the question of the ballot, into the merits of which I shall take another opportunity of entering, recording merely my opinion that in the present state of the Constitution even the ballot is in favour of the power of the natural aristocracy, and that if the ballot were to be contemporaneously introduced, with a fair and not a factious extension of suffrage, it would produce no change in the distribution of power affecting the natural aristocracy.”

Now, the extension of suffrage made last year, according to the opinions of hon. Gentlemen on the other side, was made not on a factious but a fair basis, and therefore if the right hon. Gentleman's view was to be acted upon, the time was come when the ballot should be introduced into the Constitution of the country. It was for that reason he was anxious that the right hon. Gentleman should have had an opportunity—as he would have had if the debate had gone on—of expressing his opinion on the question. It would be very unfortunate for hon. Gentlemen opposite to go to the country without knowing the views of the right hon. Gentleman on the ballot; for in that case they might have to unsay next Session what they might state at the hustings this year, and he thought it was for the interest both of political parties and of morality that the right hon. Gentleman should have expressed his opinion. This subject he would not enlarge upon as he had risen merely to endorse the opinion of the hon. Member for Clonmel as to the nature of the Bill, and the manner in which they had been treated by Gentlemen on that side of the House; but in doing so he would not but express his regret that the debate on the ballot should not have proceeded, for the reasons he had stated.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, he wished to point out how unjustly the provisions of the present Bill would operate. They had given to England a rating franchise for the boroughs, whereas in Ireland they restricted it to houses of £4 rental. In England the county franchise was fixed at £12, and one of the best authorities in the House had shown that a £12 franchise in Ireland was practically equivalent to a £30 rental in England. One or two figures would enable the House to understand the real character of this Bill, which was called a Reform Bill for Ireland. [“Oh, oh!”] He perceived no argument in these extraordinary noises, and he thought that hon. Gentlemen would do better to use the English language. Take the county of Clare, and compare its present condition with its condition forty years ago. It had then 17,000 electors, and now only 5,300. The county of Mayo had 20,300 electors in 1828, and only 3,400 in 1868. The Bill would not add as many electors to the whole constituent body of Ireland as had been deducted in 1828 from the constituency of the one county of Clare. With respect to the ballot question, he would only say, that the observations of his hon. Friend near him (Mr. Brady) in the discussion the other night had been quite inaudible. Now that he understood from his hon. Friend that he had accepted the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister, he regretted much that he should have interposed between his hon. Friend and the House.

MR. ESMONDE said, all the friends of Reform must look upon this Bill as in no way a settlement of the question. He should feel guilty of a dereliction of duty both to himself and to his constituents, if he were to omit entering his protest against it. It must be perfectly understood that they would re-open the question on the very earliest opportunity. As regarded both the county franchise and the freemen's franchise, they would consider no settlement satisfactory, no matter what Government might be in Office, which did not deal with both these subjects.

MR. REARDEN said, he rose to propose a clause, altering the qualification to one of the net annual rental value of £6 or upwards for counties, and £3 or upwards for boroughs, of lands, tenements, or hereditaments. He thought that after Irish Members had assisted in passing Reform Bills of a character so liberal for England and Scotland, they were entitled to a better return. The present Bill would make an addition of only 9,000 voters in a population of nearly 6,000,000. Were a measure so restricted proposed for England, it would be burned at the market cross of every town throughout the country. But if the House would accept the clause he now proposed it would in effect hold out the olive branch to Ireland and do something to establish friendly relations with that country.

Clause (Alteration of county and borough qualifications.)—(Mr. Rearden,)—brought up, and read the first time.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he only rose to correct the impression which might be derived from the statement of the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Bagwell) regarding the part taken by the Scotch Members. No less than twenty-one Scotch Members voted in favour of the Motion for reducing the Irish county franchise to £8, and only seven on the other side.

Motion made, and Question, "That the said Clause be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

MR. VANCE proposed a clause extending the residence of electors of the city of Dublin from seven to twelve miles. He remarked that, in the case of the English metropolis, the limit of residence had been extended to twenty-five miles, and as railway facilities induced many persons to live by the seaside or otherwise beyond the distance of seven miles from Dublin, he hoped a similar boon would be extended to the Irish metropolis.

Clause (Residence of Electors for City of Dublin extended to twelve miles.)—(Mr. Vance,)—brought up, and read the first time."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he thought there was much force in the argument of his hon. Friend. The circumstances of Dublin were very peculiar, and of late years a large proportion of the most respectable citizens had lived outside the town. The seven-mile limit at present excluded a number of persons from the enjoyment of the franchise, and, considering the concessions agreed to with regard to London and that the class who would benefit by this provision were much the same as in that case, he thought the clause was a reasonable one.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I should like to have a few words of explanation from the noble Earl as to the application of this principle to the cases of other large cities and towns, before we assent to the Motion made by the hon. Member for Armagh

Mr. Rearden

(Mr. Vance). degree on the metropolis, argue the Empire is of the same the metropolis privilege was not of England or metropolis; in conditions with the fact of the in on all sides of great extent mass of population different matter principle that a metropolis, different from containing an is also a metropolis in many cases; distance out of has been given with the case and Salford, No such privilege though in Liverpool of the inhabitants the year at fifteen miles from modern systems these towns have railroads running I submit that be sanctioned on the ground metropolis; but in affecting the ought to be I cannot conceive of this kind compliment to mode of recognition. SIR JOHN resident of London upwards, and number of electors in the city. With the exception was within the no considerable for sea residence though growing the county of miles from the would be brought not occasional villas, who live purpose of election and did not municipal burdens of the city. It would admit, in short, a large agricultural population, having no direct connection with the place such as ought to belong to electors and who had already votes for the county. In behalf of the citizens of Dublin, he should oppose the clause.

MR. VERNER said, he was surprised at the view taken by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) who himself had a villa residence outside Dublin, while his place of business was in the city. He thought there were good grounds for extending the limit of residence to twelve miles. He knew that many persons engaged during the day in business in Dublin resided at Bray.

MR. PIM said, he was in favour of extending the privilege granted in the case of the City of London to towns like Manchester and Liverpool, and also to Dublin. He could not see why there should be a seven-mile limit excluding gentlemen who had an interest in that city though they lived in country houses.

MR. ESMONDE said, he was surprised that the Government should support this clause. He had understood that it was agreed on all sides to accept the Bill in the condition in which it left the Committee. If this understanding were not adhered to there would be an opening up of many clauses besides this in the Bill.

MR. MONSELL said, he thought it was a very suspicious measure to select one place in which to make a distinction, as was now proposed with reference to the city of Dublin, without any special circumstances connected with it. It looked very like a party and political move. ["Oh."] Hon. Gentlemen seemed to flinch from the imputation, and he did not wonder at it. He challenged any hon. Member to answer the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), and to explain why this proposal should be adopted in Dublin and not adopted in the large towns of England.

MR. VANCE said, he wished to state that he had had no consultation whatever with Her Majesty's Government, and that he was entirely responsible for the Amendment.

SIR ARTHUR GUINNESS said, that as a challenge had been thrown out for hon. Members on his side of the House to deny if they could that this Amendment had been made from party motives, he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman

(Mr. Monsell) that he and his Colleague (Mr. Pim) by no means sailed in the same boat on political questions, and that his hon. Colleague was going to vote for this Amendment. That plainly showed that the Amendment was not proposed from party motives.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, that the Amendment would favour an increase in the number of freemen voters, and this explained the proposal.

MR. COGAN said, he hoped that the Government would re-consider the course they seemed disposed to take, and which would end in the whole question of Irish Reform being re-opened.

MR. GREGORY said, that, believing that this was a clearly defined party proposal, he would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Gregory.)

MR. DISRAELI said, he had been quite ignorant of this "party struggle" until the subject was introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance). Much might be said both for and against the Amendment. No doubt the precedent established last year in regard to the City of London, and which—although explained by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire—was one of very doubtful import, quite justified his hon. Friend in bringing forward this proposal. If his hon. Friend had, however, consulted him he should have said that upon the whole, and in the present state of the Irish Reform Bill, it would not be expedient to open this question. This would show what exaggerated statements had just been made, and how completely unfounded was the conclusion to which the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Gregory) had arrived when he hinted that this was some deep and sinister party move. He would say that, although his hon. Friend was quite justified in making this proposal, which was not only plausible, but very reasonable, and which was supported by both the Members for Dublin, still it was not expedient to press the Amendment to a division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. VANCE said, he had made this Motion in the interest of his former constituents, but, as it did not meet with the general concurrence of the House, he would withdraw it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause withdrawn.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he rose, according to Notice, to move the following clause:—

(Assimilation of franchise in boroughs, counties of cities, and counties of towns.)

"Every man shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote at the Election of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for any borough who is of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity, and who is seized of a freehold estate in such borough, or of any rent-charge arising out of any freehold estate in such borough of such value and subject to such conditions as would if in a city or town, being a county of a city or county of a town by itself, entitle such person to register his vote for such city or town, or who holds as lessee or assignee any lands or tenements in such borough for such term as the provisions of the Registration Acts shall apply to of such value and subject to such provisions as would if such lands or tenements were situate in a city or town, being a county of a city or county of a town by itself, entitle such person to register his vote for such city or town; and all the provisions in boroughs on whom the franchise is hereby conferred in the same manner in all respects as far as is practicable as they now apply to such voters in cities and towns."

His object was to extend to the rest of the thirty-three boroughs of Ireland a franchise which was now peculiar to eleven of them. Considering they were now reducing the borough occupation franchise to about £4, the addition by his proposal of from 2,000 to 3,000 of the most respectable and independent class, who possessed property of considerable extent, to the Irish borough constituencies would be a valuable improvement, wholly unconnected with any party advantage.

Clause (Assimilation of franchise in boroughs, counties of cities, and counties of towns.)—(Sir Frederick Heygate),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he hoped that the clause would meet the same fate as the last, and that the First Lord of the Treasury would recommend the hon. Mover to withdraw it. The franchise which it proposed to extend was properly a county franchise, and he objected on principle to its introduction into the Irish boroughs generally. At present, it was almost exclusively in the boroughs which and it had no land.

Mr. Vance

MR. VAN said, which sought to franchise the few English and many Irish boroughs counterpoised the borough Bill.

SIR PATRICK said, one of the objects of the public mind in the Bill was to enable the people to express their opinions on it. But Londonderry was carried forward to it into constituencies, which made faggot constituencies, which were not evenly balanced.

MR. NEW said, so often before, the distinction between the franchise in the new and the old was not supported.

MR. DISE said, he protested against the Bill, which the hon. Colman O'Loghlen having been asked to support. He understood the hon. gentleman to the agreement of the matter was to the Reform Bill, which was usually closed, but he touched some particular reason for his protest.

COLMAN O'LOGHLEN was glad that he had acknowledged the amendment of what Disraeli's amendment was. He thought that the day night the Bill might have as many very important particulars upon the ballot, which was forward by the hon. (Mr. Brady). He also of due Notice had proved how utterly erroneous and unfounded was the statement of the hon. Member for Clare. He found from the Paper that the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Staepoole) had given Notice that he would call the attention of the House to the propriety of lowering the borough franchise, while the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Serjeant Barry) intended on Clause 4 to move to omit certain words which would entirely alter the character of the lodger franchise, and there was also the Notice of the hon. Baronet who had brought forward the present question. The House, therefore, ought to decide upon this question on its merits, and it appeared to be one well worth consideration. He believed if a decision was arrived at in favour of the proposition they would add greatly to the strength of the town constituency and improve the representation of Ireland.

Mr. CARDWELL said, he was greatly disappointed when he heard that the right hon. Gentleman intended to support this clause. Whatever arguments might have induced the right hon. Gentleman to do so he was sure there was one to which he would lend no countenance—namely, the argument brought forward by the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance). That hon. Gentleman had said that they had reduced the borough franchise to so dangerous a level that this clause was intended to act as a counterpoise. Well, as the House had adopted the borough franchise for Ireland proposed by the Government themselves, Her Majesty's Ministers at least would give no countenance to such an argument. But what was the House really asked to do? They were asked to do in the case of Ireland what the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had reminded them they had repeatedly refused to do in the case of England. If there was one objection more deeply felt and more strongly urged than another to the proposals of the Government in 1859, it was that county voters should be removed from the counties of England, and transferred with the same franchise to the boroughs. They had rejected that proposal for England; they ought now to reject it for Ireland, for if bad for England it was far worse for Ireland, where there was not so large an infusion of the commercial element in the county constituency. The creation of rent-charge votes in small constituencies was very objectionable. If they agreed to this clause they would add another anomaly to those which already existed, and another argument in favour of re-opening the question of Irish Reform.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, he should oppose the clause on the ground that this franchise had been left where it was in 1832, both with regard to England and Ireland; and as it had not been extended by the late Reform Act in England, it ought not to be extended in Ireland. Such an attempt as that made by the hon. Baronet would have a very bad effect in Ireland; for it would furnish with a new argument that increasing class of persons who maintained that it was useless to look for justice to Parliament, when it was seen that the Government had taken good care not to suffer the power of the landlords to be threatened in the counties, and now endeavoured to give them new influence in the towns. He begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. MURPHY seconded the Motion for an adjournment. He said the object of the clause brought forward by the hon. Baronet was to give county voters a vote also in the boroughs, a procedure that was manifestly unjust.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, this clause has been supported on two grounds. The hon. Member for Armagh supported it on a ground worthy of the attention of the House and the country—namely, that the propositions of the Government with regard to the borough franchise are of so dangerous a character that they require to be counteracted and neutralized, and he thinks he finds in this proposition of the hon. Baronet the remedy he wants. I confess I think it would have been much better if the hon. Gentleman had exposed this dangerous character of the propositions of the Government when they were made, and had not supported them in silence. But, whether he is happy or not in the choice of his opportunity, I wish to protest against the principle that we are to counteract by restrictive propositions the effects of those enlarging propositions which we have applied to the franchise. On that ground it appears to me it is totally impossible to defend the clause of the hon. Baronet, and I do not know whether the hon. Baronet will be obliged to the hon. Member for the character he has given to the clause as retroactive, and meant to restrain the effect of that exceedingly slight enlargement of the franchise which we have made by our so-called Irish Reform Bill. But, putting aside the doctrines of the hon. Member for Armagh, I do not think it right to give a vote on this question without fairly warning hon. Gentlemen opposite of what appears to me to be the certain, although perhaps not the immediate upshot of a Motion such as this. The hon. Baronet opposite proposes to introduce into the whole of the boroughs of Ireland a county franchise, and, to give its full effect within these boroughs, to withdraw it from the counties. Now, does the hon. Baronet imagine that the House can take such a step as that, and, having taken that step, can stop there? My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) has stated, and stated truly, that in 1859 a similar proposition was made by the Government of that day. That proposal, however, differed from the proposal of the hon. Baronet, in that it was a complete proposal. While the county franchise was carried into the boroughs, the borough franchise was carried into the counties. And let hon. Gentlemen lay their account with this, that if they choose now to tamper with the subject, and carry in Ireland the county franchise into the boroughs—I know not what its bearings on parties may be; I see what is involved as a logical consequence in such a measure—it must inevitably be followed by its counterpart, the carrying of the borough franchise into counties. And when you have carried the county franchise into boroughs—and are congratulating yourselves or condoling with yourselves, as the case may be—you must be prepared to have the same change carried into England. I do not say whether it will be a good change or a bad change. But I think it my duty to say that it is a change for which you must be prepared. It is impossible to adopt proposals of this kind—involving in themselves certain principles of broad application—for your own immediate purposes, and then think you can stay their application within the limits to which they can be conveniently carried.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Serjeant Barry.)

The House divided :—Ayes 156 ; Noes 198 : Majority 42.

Question again proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. PIM rose to move the adjournment of the House, but there were calls for

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE who said, he was not convinced by the arguments he had heard against his proposal which he had made without any motives. It had been said that a great difference existed between the county and the borough franchise in this—that the former was based on property, while the latter rested on occupation and residence. But it had been forgotten that great part of the English county franchise—all resting on the Chandos Clause—depended on occupation. If, however, an assurance were given that the Bill should be allowed to proceed, he would not allow his proposal to stand in the way, and would withdraw the clause.

Mr. Gladstone

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause withdrawn.

Amendments made.

Bill to be read the third time Thursday.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT (1861) AMENDMENT BILL.—[Bill 145.]

(Mr. Moffatt, Mr. Crawford, Mr. Ayrton, Charles Forster.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MOFFATT, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to amend the present law of bankruptcy. It dealt exclusively with deeds of arrangement.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said he should offer no opposition to the second reading of the Bill, some portions of which would effect an improvement in the present law.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Earl of Mayo, Bill to make provision for the Audit of Accounts of District Lunatic Asylums in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by The Earl of Mayo and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 146.]

House adjourned at 12 after One o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, June 23, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Boundary* (170); Courts of Chancery and Exchequer (Ireland) Fee Funds* (171); Uniformity of Public Worship* (173).

Second Reading—Voters in Disfranchised Boroughs* (153); Representation of the People (Scotland) (164); Municipal Rate (Edinburgh)* (167); Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement (Loans) Act Amendment (156).

Committee — Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) (142-172); Local Government Supplemental (No. 2)* (119).

Report — Local Government Supplemental (No. 2)* (119).

Third Reading—Poor Relief (162); Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation, &c.* (120); Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (139); Jurors' Affirmations (Scotland)* (104), and passed.

Withdrawn—Metropolitan Roads* (150).

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

LORD PENRHYN, seeing on the Notice Paper two Notices of Amendment that this Bill be read a second time that day six months, wished to ask the Lord Privy Seal, Whether he had any objection to state what were the intentions of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the Amendment of which the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had given Notice? It would be convenient for many noble Lords to know what course the Government proposed to take.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: In Answer to the Question of my noble Friend, I have to state that Her Majesty's Government are undoubtedly extremely anxious at once to follow the noble Earl (Earl Granville) who has given notice of the Motion for the second reading of the Suspensory Bill, inasmuch as it is a question of the very highest magnitude and importance, and one which should be dealt with by Her Majesty's Government as soon as possible. According to the forms of your Lordships' House, it would be—I will not say the right, but at all events, the usual practice—that Her Majesty's Government should follow the Mover of the second reading on such a question; and under that impression I have done my best to obtain that position for Her Majesty's Government. I have written to the noble Earl who has given Notice of his intention to move the Amendment—I will mention his name as he is not present, Earl Grey—stating my reasons for wishing that Her Majesty's Government should take the initiative in opposition to the Bill; but I am sorry to say with no effect. The noble Earl still perseveres in his intention of moving the Amendment; and that being the case I should think it unseemly if we were to test in any way the wishes of the House as to who should take precedence. I think it better that Her Majesty's Government should give way to the noble Earl; and therefore I conclude that on Thursday night he will proceed to move the Amendment to the Motion for the second reading.

POOR RELIEF BILL—(No 162.) (The Earl of Devon.)

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

THE EARL OF HARROWBY moved to add clause—

“Where any Parent having resident with him a Child not earning Wages, above the Age of Six years and under the Age of Twelve Years, applies for Relief, the Guardians may make it a condition of out-door Relief that the Parent of such Child shall send him to School at the expense of the Guardians, provided there is a School of the religious denomination of the parent, or to which he does not object on religious grounds, situate within two miles of his residence.”

His object in proposing this clause was to promote the education of the most neglected children in the country—those of paupers in the receipt of out-door relief. He admitted that some progress had been made in this direction by Mr. Denison's Act, passed a few years ago; and although what he now proposed would be no great step in advance, yet, considering the class of persons to whom it applied, it would be well to do what they could. Paupers receiving out-door relief were supplied with the mere means of living—they had no means of providing for the education of their children. There would be some difficulty in making it compulsory upon the Guardians to impose this condition upon giving out-door relief; for the short period during which this relief was frequently given would make such a condition illusory. The clause would, therefore, leave it optional with the Guardians to require that applicants for out-door relief should send their children to school at the expense of the parish. There would be no tampering with the religious faith of the parents; the schools would be filled;

the children would be kept out of the streets as long as the relief was received ; and an immenso advantage would be conferred in this way on some of the poorest of the population. He believed that at Birmingham the number of children who would be sent to school by a provision of this kind was 1,500 or 1,600, while the expense to the rates would be almost nothing. By implication the clause repealed one in Mr. Denison's Act, and, being optional, it could do no harm, and might do much good.

THE EARL OF DEVON said, that prima facie a strong justification should be made out for accepting a clause which adopted a principle which had been distinctly negatived by the Legislature a few years since. He would say nothing about the policy of Mr. Denison's Act ; but strong opinions were then expressed against the plan which the noble Earl now recommended. The whole history of Poor Law legislation, from the time of Queen Elizabeth downwards, showed that the destitution of the applicant had been the one recognized ground of justification for giving relief. It was true that able-bodied paupers were required to give certain labour ; but he could nowhere find in any measure for the administration of the Poor Law the insertion of any other condition of relief except destitution. The possible operation of the clause would furnish their Lordships with additional ground for withholding their consent from it. He was not one who thought lightly of the discretion ordinarily exercised by Boards of Guardians ; but he would shrink from intrusting them with the power to apply this clause. He could conceive that crotchety Guardians might, by annexing the prescribed condition to the relief, interpose, however unintentionally, various difficulties in the way of obtaining necessary relief by the really destitute. Another objection to the clause was, that Guardians might allow their wish to promote education to determine whether they should grant in-door or out-door relief. On these two grounds the operation of the clause was likely to be attended with dangerous results. If the condition was to be introduced as preliminary to the granting of out-door relief, why should not other conditions be imposed ? The Guardians, for instance, might insist on an applicant for relief attending church. If once we went beyond the simple ground of destitution, well examined and ascertained,

The Earl of Harrowby

we got into the end of. clause recog- pulsory edu- and various to be adopt clause intro Poor Relief mittee of 18 question of impose it a with the pri was establis

founded on p the clause w of that Com

THE DUKE the clause, missive, and Guardians w numbered t into workh why should applied for that re-con force of the to the claus

LORD LY oppose the operation, i effect on th tion, by indi lief with the educated at

THE EAR proposition jected by t was, no dou to those wh tion of the matter whe to insist up school. Th the relief o possible, c object of th thing seem tended to it of the law.

education proved tha when their To go so t to persons cause by children ec rates ; and crease the to him ol struggled and send their children to school would not like to see worthless persons obtaining out-door relief because they would not work, and, at the same time, throwing the cost of the education of their children on the rates. He was a strong advocate for the education of the poor; but he did not wish to promote it in an indirect manner.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, his own experience told him that the clause would act satisfactorily; and, while it would give a fair and proper amount of out-door relief, would at the same time afford education to children whose parents had positively no means of educating them. Though very loth to divide the House, he must press the adoption of his clause.

After some observations from the MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH who was understood to support the clause.

Amendment negatived: Amendments made; Bill passed and sent to the Commons.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM—
REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
(SCOTLAND) BILL. [No. 164.]
(The Lord Privy Seal).

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, in moving the second reading of this Bill, I need not descant on its importance. Your Lordships will see at once that it is part of a great system of the Reform of the Representation of the People of the United Kingdom, being the part of that system which applies to the representation of Scotland. My Lords, I think it would be for your Lordships' convenience if I were not to go at any length into the Bill this evening, because I shall propose that your Lordships take it into consideration in Committee on Tuesday next, and I presume that is the stage in which any of your Lordships who may propose to move Amendments will find it most convenient to do so. I shall, however, give your Lordships a brief sketch of what is proposed to be done by this Bill. In the boroughs a vote will be given to all householders who stand in the same position as the householders in this country to whom a vote is given under the English Bill—that is, who have paid their rates. With regard to the payment of rates, there is this difference between the English and the Scotch Bills, that the assessment is not made in the same manner. At first it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make the law in this respect identical in the two countries; but when the Scotch Members considered the proposition of the Government they unanimously gave it as their opinion that the law of assessment in Scotland ought not to be altered, and that therefore it would be better to arrive at the object in view by retaining the mode of assessment hitherto in operation in Scotland. In Scotland the valuation is by a system of county assessment, which secures the advantage of a more exact valuation than can be had by means of our more local system. But there are 100 parishes in Scotland which pay no poor rates at all. In those parishes the provision for the poor is managed by a voluntary arrangement. There has been no assessment in these parishes beyond the assessment of the county assessor. But under this Bill, while following up the present system of assessment in Scotland, it is provided that those 100 parishes shall be valued like others, and will have to pay poor rates, and that no one who is unable, from poverty, to pay those rates, and who is exempted on that account, will enjoy the franchise. Then, in the counties, there is the same provision with regard to the payment of rates as is made in the English Bill; but £14 is the figure fixed on as the qualification for the franchise, that being considered the equivalent in Scotland for a £12 rating qualification in England. So much for the franchises under the Bill, and the conditions under which those franchises are to be enjoyed. With respect to the re-distribution of seats, we propose a very moderate scheme. We propose that the Universities—of which there are four in Scotland—should return two Members—that is to say, that the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's should return one Member, and that another should be returned by the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen. We propose that the counties of Selkirk and Peebles, which are very small, should be united, and that a new district of burghs, consisting of Hawick, Galashiels, and Selkirk, should be created, and together return one Member. The town of Dundee and the counties of Lanark, Ayr, and Aberdeen will each return two Members to serve in Parliament in future; and certain counties named in the Schedule to the Bill, are to be divided. I do not know that I need say more at present with respect to the framework of this Bill, but if your Lordships have any Amendments to offer, either of principle or to any of the details of the Bill, I respectfully suggest that it would be better to do so in Committee; and if that proposal were assented to, I should propose that the Committee be taken upon this day week.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Privy Seal)

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, this Bill, dealing with one of the subjects most important to Scotland that could come under the consideration of this House, was only printed and distributed to Members of the House this morning. In "another place" the Bill was debated for weeks, and it is exceedingly difficult for anyone who has not given the closest attention to the debates to follow all the changes, and all the consequences of the changes, which were made during that time. The Government now move the second reading of the measure. Under ordinary circumstances, I should take objection to the proposal, not deeming it a fitting course, either as regards the Scotch Members of your Lordships' House, or as regards the House at large, that they should be called upon to approach a Bill of this magnitude without a full opportunity of considering its details. But I understand that there are circumstances which make it not unimportant that this Bill should go through Parliament as quickly as possible, inasmuch as some of its provisions affect not only Scotland but several seats in England, which the noble Earl forgot to mention. It, therefore, may be convenient to discuss any proposition which hereafter has to be made, upon the Motion for going into Committee, instead of upon the Motion for the second reading; and on that understanding, I am willing to assent to the proposition of the noble Earl. In the meantime there will be sufficient interval to examine and form an opinion upon the details of the measure.

On Question? agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

SALMON FISHERIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.
(The Duke of Richmond.)
(No. 142.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL desired to call attention to one unforeseen result of recent legislation affecting the herring fishery trade. Various Bills had been passed for

The Earl of Malmesbury

the protection which he n ject; but a on another most injurio eries. He ized trawlin been repres fact had co that the rea been remov large nets embouchure and, under rings, carri valuable cha trary to the the earlier virtually rep against suc
was introdu storing the the salmon rendered to therefore, to what were ment with r

THE DUKE question wa especially a been recentl happy to fi noble Duke suitable for submitted to

THE EARL
the stringer that related factures on nothing was make string they had no moved to o

THE DUKE had inserted them in a considered which had p
though it w Lower. He
some weight and if the n Amendment
Report.

Amendme
withdrawn.

Amendme
to be receiv
July next; amended. (

THAMES EMBANKMENT AND METROPOLIS IMPROVEMENT (LOANS) ACT. AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Clinton.)

(NO. 156.) SECOND READING.

LORD CLINTON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: This is a Bill to extend the provisions of the Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement (Loans) Act of the year 1864, and to authorize the application of the London Coal and Wine duties to the Metropolis Improvement Fund. It also enables the Metropolitan Board of Works to borrow an additional sum for the completion of its Embankment works on the north and south side of the Thames, and the new approach to the Mansion House from Blackfriars. By several Acts of Parliament since the year 1861 the Metropolitan Board have been empowered to raise sums amounting in the whole to £2,480,000 for carrying out their works on the banks of the Thames; but, for various reasons, with which perhaps it would not now be necessary to trouble their Lordships, this sum has been insufficient for the purposes for which it was intended. The Board is therefore authorized to raise a further loan of £1,850,000, and the Bill enables the Treasury to guarantee this additional sum. As collateral security to the Government, the Board charge these loans upon the metropolitan rates and also upon the lands purchased for these improvements. It has been agreed with the present mortgagees that £185,000 a year will pay off the principal and interest of the existing debt by the year 1882, and as the amount of the Coal dues, which by an Act of the present Session have been extended to 1888, produce upwards of £210,000 a year, the security to the Treasury appears adequate, and it is not likely that any charge will fall upon the rates of the metropolis. I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH IN IRELAND. PETITION.

LORD LY-TTELTON presented a Petition of Clergymen of the Church of England in favour of the Disestablishment of the Established Church in Ireland. He did not propose to go into the merits of the question to which the Petition related; but still he thought it of sufficient importance to call their Lordships' attention to it. The prayer of the Petition was for the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland, and it was certainly a subject worthy of attention that this Petition should be signed by such a number of beneficed clergymen, who were all residing and beneficed in England, with one exception. There was, indeed, one distinguished man who had otherwise taken an active part in this controversy—Dr. Maziere Brady, who was a beneficed clergyman in Ireland: but except him, all the subscribers to this Petition were resident and beneficed in England. It was obvious that it must have been a very painful and invidious task for them to put forward their opinions in favour of the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland. The signatories said that they felt that they placed themselves in an invidious position by petitioning to the effect they had, but they also felt that no other course was open to them if they wished for justice to Ireland. The number of signatures did not adequately represent the clergymen who held the opinions embodied in the Petition, which he might remark had not been made in any way the subject of a canvass. The Petition was signed by 261 clergymen who desired to show that they did not in any way agree with the sentiments expressed at the meeting held some little time since at St. James's Hall. Having looked through the list of names, he was unable to say how many of those who had signed the Petition belonged to the "High Church," the "Low Church," or the "Broad Church." Some, however, he was able to recognize as belonging to the High Church party, but his belief was that the majority might be regarded as Broad. Among others who had appended their signatures to the Petition were Professors Kingsley, Maurice, and Jowett; the Head masters of Winchester, Harrow, Rugby, Haileybury, and the City of London School; while there were also the names of many Rural Deans, and Fellows and Tutors of Oxford and Cambridge.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he would remind the House that a great many Petitions had been presented lately by noble Lords against the proposed disestablishment of the Irish Church; and though the names appended to those Petitions did not perhaps stand so high as those whose signatures were presented by the noble Lord, they were yet much better able to judge of what was good for Ireland than any of those High, Low, or Broad Petitioners.

LORD REDESDALE: My Lords, it is impossible not to remember that the service to which the property of the Irish Church is devoted is a high and holy one, and not to regret that a Petition, asking that what has been devoted to God's service should be taken away and applied to other purposes, should have proceeded from the present Petitioners.

LORD LYTTELTON said, that they petitioned for no such thing.

LORD REDESDALE: It means that, or it means nothing; for it is impossible to separate the Petition from the Bill which will occupy your Lordships' attention on Thursday. Then I am justified in saying that it is simply a proposition to alienate what is devoted to God's service and apply it otherwise. [Lord LYTTELTON: No, no!] Then what is to be done with it? Is it desired that it should be applied to the support of the Roman Catholic Church, whose doctrines, in the opinions of those who signed this Petition, must be considered erroneous? The noble Lord has said that the signatures were nearly all those of beneficed clergymen in England. I must say that I think it ungenerous in them thus to come forward, and without regard to the feelings of their brethren connected with the Irish Church to say, that to maintain the Irish Church is an injustice legitimately offensive to the majority of the Irish people. How long has it been so? Forty years ago, when the Emancipation Act was passed, we were told that it was no offence to the Irish people, and that they did not desire its removal, and upon the strength of that assurance the Emancipation Act was passed. But now it appears that, for recent purposes, the Church has just been discovered to be a legitimate offence; but on the same ground, many other things may be described in the same manner—anything, in short, that is offensive to the religious opinions of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. My Lords, this is a question with respect to which a great number of people feel very deeply. I say for myself—and I say it with all possible earnestness and sincerity—that to deal with the property of the Church in the manner proposed “elsewhere” would be, in my opinion, an act of sacrilegio. I should consider it to be not only impolitic, but sinful. Your Lordships must also consider that there are many persons who hold this opinion. I say that this is a question which delicate hands believe it has have taken to deliberate remember that be successful to come in a of the Irish that the Sovereign opinion as I you ask me think you are would be sin supposing that such a proposition could be lightly put necessity of before commensurability. Look the Sovereign maintenance the Church difficult to be a barracade. The question of pleasing the rid of the F was to be done proposal was of people for another. I most impolitic in many cases may have lately, and induced by the lished Church was a clergy the tithes were tenance of t tions he expressed. Was it to be would be considered or that the prived of the man would are about to bitter feeling that, instead discord and of these proposals a political not to be most desirable. EARL GREVILLE think it was that they which was therefore he the argument of the noble Lord. He would content himself with pointing out that the noble Lord had most amply justified what his noble Friend (Lord Lyttelton) had stated—that the persons who had signed the Petition had exposed themselves to much obloquy, because they had the courage to protest against what they believed to be an injustice. He could not sit down, however, without entering his protest against the charge of sacrilege which the noble Lord, by inference, had brought against the Petitioners and those who supported the Bill.

The Earl of Longford

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD desired to make one remark with respect to the Petition. He had only had time to go through 111 names out of the 261 signed to the Petition, and of the 111 he could say that eighty-seven were not incumbents at all.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had understood his noble Friend who had presented the Petition to read the names not only of incumbents, but of persons who are not incumbents—for example, Professors, and the heads of some of the greatest educational establishments in the country.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD wished to say that he had given to deans and others the benefit of being beneficed clergy; but there were some who could merely be regarded as clergymen unattached.

LORD LYTTELTON said, that the Petitioners had not described themselves as incumbents at all. All that the Petitioners stated was that it was the Petition of “the undersigned Clergy of the Church of England.”

Petition to lie on the Table.

UNIFORMITY OF PUBLIC WORSHIP BILL. [H.L.]

A Bill for better enforcing Uniformity in the Performance of Public Worship in the United Church of England and Ireland—Was presented by The Earl of SHAFTESBURY; read 1st (No. 173).

House adjourned at a quarter before
Seven o'clock, to Thursday next,
half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 23, 1868.

The House met at Two of the Clock.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—New Zealand (Legislative Council)*.

First Reading—New Zealand (Legislative Council)* [185]; Poor Relief* [186].

Second Reading—Adulteration of Food or Drink Act Amendment* [161]; Military at Elections (Ireland) [95], further adjourned; Railways (Ireland) Act Amendment* [123].

Select Committee—Registration* [167] nominated; Petit Juries (Ireland)* [70] nominated; Married Women's Property* [89] nominated; Electric Telegraphs [82] nominated. Committee—Public Schools (re-comm.) [135]—

R.P.

Third Reading—Local Government Supplemental (No. 6)* [175], and passed.

Withdrawn—Ecclesiastical Titles [37].

ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENT OF JAMAICA.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would now beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he can inform the House whether Sir J. P. Grant, the Governor of Jamaica, has acted in accordance with his Despatch to the Earl of Carnarvon of the 24th November 1866 (Parliamentary Paper, Affairs of Jamaica, July, 1867), in which he states that he has proposed to the Bishop of Kingston to fill up no vacancies occurring in the Ecclesiastical Establishment of Jamaica between the date of such Despatch and the close of the year 1869, when the Colonial Statutes affecting such Establishment expire; and, whether there has been any Correspondence between the Colonial Office and the Governor of Jamaica respecting the course to be taken upon the expiration of the Jamaica Clergy Acts; and, if so, whether he will lay such Correspondence upon the Table of the House?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that Sir J. P. Grant had acted in accordance with the views of the Home Government, that the Ecclesiastical Establishment of Jamaica should be reduced on account of its being considered excessive; and that consequently no vacancies would be filled up at present. Several vacancies had occurred since the Despatch alluded to had been received, but arrangements had been made to have the duties of these clergymen temporarily discharged in view of the revision of the whole system, which would take place in December 1869, when the present Jamaica Clergy Act expires. With regard to the latter part of the Question of the hon. Gentleman, he had to say that the Governor of Jamaica had expressed his belief that it was premature to advise at present what course should be taken upon the expiration of the Jamaica Clergy Acts, and the Colonial Office would wait for further communications before taking any step in the matter.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to know, If the total abolition of the Ecclesiastical Establishments of Jamaica will be proposed if it should be thought expedient?

MR. ADDERLEY said, the total abolition of the Church Establishment in Jamaica was by no means contemplated either by the Governor of that Island or by Her Majesty's Government; but that nothing which had been done would preclude such a proposition as that being made if such a thing could ever be thought desirable by those concerned.

METROPOLIS—CLERKENWELL EXPLOSION.—QUESTION.

MR. NEATE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he has received a statement of the amount of the sum raised by private subscription for the relief of the sufferers by the Clerkenwell Explosion, and of the past and proposed future application of such sum; and, whether he will lay such statement upon the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that the Papers to which his hon. Friend referred had only just come into his hands, and he must have time to consider whether they were of such a nature that he could lay them on the table as public documents. He thought they were exceedingly indebted to the gentlemen who had undertaken the duties of the Relief Committee, and who had shown the greatest and most philanthropic assiduity and kindness in dealing with the cases of distress which had come under their notice; and there could be no doubt that the sufferings of those who had been the victims of the explosion had been very much alleviated by the exertions of the Committee. It would be necessary to propose to the House in the course of the present Session an Estimate of the damage done to the owners of property through the explosion, and he hoped that on that occasion he would be able to make a statement of what subscription sufferers.

Mr. Adderley

PUBLIC
(Mr. Walpole)

[B] Order for Motion r
"That Mr Chair."

Bill consi

Clause 5
to alter thei
Mr. NE
Amendment
out "sixty.
in order to p ing governin
1870, instea
1869. The date fixed thought the country wo Election, w for governin plaint had t

Amendme
to leave out insert the delegate.)—in

MR. PO
mittee on th
sirable to co verning bod standing th
by the hon.
desirable tha be as short of the exist suggesting and as there existence fo contended th them ample
Some of th
gaged in th would susta Committee
schools to period a per would carr needed.

MR. KAR
ment, think

Newdegate) asked very little in demanding that the present governing bodies should discharge their duties for another year.

MR. NEATE said, that the mistake which was made throughout the Bill was in confounding the governing body of these schools, who knew little or nothing about them, with the Master and Fellows of the Colleges of the University, who really were the governing bodies of the Colleges. The recommendations of the Select Committee were unanimously made, and he hoped the Committee would reject the Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE protested against the hon. Member's assertion that the governing body of Rugby, of which he was a member, knew little about the School. The evidence taken before the House of Lords would show that this was a total, entire, and gross mistake. The governing bodies resided within a limited distance of the School, and met four or five times to consult about its affairs. But the object clearly was to get rid of their interference altogether.

MR. NEATE complained of the words "gross mis-statement" as un-Parliamentary. The evidence in regard to Rugby was that the regulations of the School were in practice delegated to the Head master; that the interposition of the governing body was unusual, and the present Head master said he could call to mind no instance of such interposition within his experience.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the word he used was "mistake." He could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that the functions of the governing body of Rugby were no sinecure.

MR. LIDDELL said, that the "governing body" of Eton had been the Provost, and he, in his desire to extend and improve the School, had obtained large dispensing powers from the visitor in regard to the interpretation of the statutes. The bursar was strongly in favour of running out the leases, and he therefore claimed for the governing body of Eton the desire of improving and extending the benefits of that School. He had much greater confidence in the present governing body than in the body of Commissioners proposed by the Bill. He would certainly support his hon. Friend's (Mr. Newdegate's) most reasonable and sensible proposition to give at least a little time to those governing bodies to look round them, undisturbed by those external influences which had been referred to, before that alteration of the statutes which appeared to be so much desired by the House.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH described the legislation which had taken place in respect to our Universities and schools as hap-hazard. He thought that there was really only a nominal distinction between the present governing bodies and those which it was proposed to substitute for them. Another anomaly in regard to that Bill was that it was treated as a Government Bill, although, if any Government was really responsible for it, it was not the present, but the late Government. It was a mistake to deal in that way with a measure of that kind, which ought to be left to the free judgment of the House.

Question put, "That the word 'sixty-nine' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 109; Noes 25: Majority 84.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Governing Body to make Statutes, under Restrictions).

MR. NEWDEGATE moved the omission of the word "new" in line 10; his object being, he said, to leave the existing governing bodies as unfettered in the right of making suggestions to the Commissioners as the bodies by whom they were to be succeeded would be.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 10, to leave out the word "new."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

MR. WALPOLE said, that alteration was, in point of fact, an attempt to renew the discussion which had already taken place on the Motion of his hon. Friend on another clause; and, if successful, would leave everything in a state of uncertainty.

Question put, "That the word 'new' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 133; Noes 9: Majority 124.

MR. J. LOWTHER moved to leave out in page 3, line 28, the words of the 3rd section—

"With respect to the privileges and number of boys who, under any Statute or Benefaction, may be entitled to any rights to education or maintenance."

The object of those words was to enable the choristers of Westminster Abbey to be introduced into Westminster School; and the authorities engaged in education at Westminster School were of opinion that such an arrangement would not work, for the hours at which the choristers were required to attend in the Abbey would preclude them from following the course of education in the School. If it were suggested that the choristers had a claim under statute to be provided with education, he could only say that such a claim was not supported by the Royal Commission. They had no more right than the Chapter tenants.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he thought that many Members who voted in the last division were not aware of the effect of the votes they gave, and therefore he wished to know whether, under the words introduced into the 5th clause, power would be preserved to the existing governing body to make recommendations with respect to boys on the foundation, for the 1st section of the present clause appeared to give that power only to the new governing body?

Mr. WALPOLE explained that the existing governing bodies were empowered to make statutes for the constitution of the new governing bodies, and the power was conferred on the new governing bodies, and on them alone, to make the statutes for the future regulation of the schools.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was most anxious to have the matter properly cleared up; because he was at a loss to understand what the governing bodies of Rugby and Harrow had done that an Act should be passed incapacitating them even to recommend statutes with respect to the future constitution of the schools.

Mr. ACLAND said, he confessed he did not exactly understand this very complicated Bill. He wished to know whether the statutes referred to in Clause 6 were to be permanent or distinguishable from the other statutes and regulations to be passed at the end of next year.

MR. WALPOLE said, the clause embodied that class of statutes which were likely to be permanent for the regulation of the schools.

MR. BENTINCK, being responsible for the proposal made before the Committee with reference to the education of the choristers, was bound to say, in reply to the observations of his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Lowther), that the Committee had been unanimous on the subject, which his hon. Friend would find by referring to the Report, of their proceedings. His hon. Friend did not seem to have informed himself as to the true pared the c tenants of t was no anal

Under the had learnt th was entitled School, or to The educatio risters was school, to w to send the means equal others main The provisio permissive.
the governin risters into did not see a power, if th boys under masters. Th in assuming ster were op condition of was most u greatly impr carried into Amendment.

Mr. J. ST
that the Cor Amendment
for York.

abuses conn was that the education o could not aff had been in of those who Whether thi did not kno choriaters at the Dean and virtue of the
did not defin ther such ri
the governin
whether such measures w subject had the working own knowle in the North the working of their right minster Sch dowed schoo were taken t measure of amongst the much stronger, and the House might expect to hear a great deal more of it. It was not merely that there were rights, but the rights were known by the persons for whose benefit they were created. The House would do well to give to the authorities who were to make the new statutes the power of considering this matter amongst others.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE opposed the Amendment. The clause was merely permissive, and put it in the power of the governing authorities to make the best provision they could for these boys. When the matter was brought before the Public Schools Commission they were of opinion that it was not desirable to attempt to force these boys into the School but that some other provision should be made for them, by apprenticing them, or otherwise providing for them at the expense of the funds of the School. He hoped that the clause would be retained in the Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE hoped that the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) would not persist in pressing his Amendment.

MR. MARSH observed that the foundations at Westminster had always been open to competitive examination, and therefore could not be regarded as the exclusive right of any particular class.

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply to the observation of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) that the clause was permissive, stated that it was for that reason that he objected to it. The words of the clause were vague and unmeaning, and might contain a great deal more than appeared on the face of them. The proposition, if carried, would re open a controversy that had lasted for many years, and would leave to the new governing body a damnosa hereditas. An hon. Member had complained that he had not brought down the Latin statutes of that House; but the fact was that he had quoted from the Report of the Royal Commission.

MR. ACLAND concurred in the proposal for separating the seven schools mentioned in the Bill from the question of the general grammar schools of the country; but, at the same time, he entreated the Committee not to place the inhabitants of Westminster, Eton, and Winchester in a worse position for the sake of the higher education which it was desirable should be maintained in these schools. The House would not be acting justly towards the artizans and small farmers if some portions of the rich foundations of these schools were not made available for the education of their children.

MR. LOCKE begged to read the following extract from one of the statutes:—

“The choristers shall go to our school that they may gain a proficiency in grammar, and remain there for at least two hours and be taught by the master.”

That clearly showed that these boys should, to all intents and purposes, be placed in the same position as the scholars of the Westminster School. He did not see why these scholars should be entirely of the richer class. They were established for all classes—rich and poor. It would be unfair and unjust, and at variance with the foundations themselves, to appropriate these schools only to the rich. He should give his support, therefore, to that portion of the clause as it stood; but whether it was sufficiently definite he could not say.

Amendment negatived.

MR. ACLAND repeated his suggestion with regard to the propriety of making provision for the establishment of third-rate schools.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought it was rather inconvenient in the middle of the discussion on this clause to raise such a question. If any proposition of the kind were made he was sure the Committee would consider it.

MR. KARSLAKE suggested that by referring to part of Clause 7, the hon. Gentleman would get an answer to his question.

MR. NEATE moved in page 3, sub-section 7, at end, to add—

“And in the case of Eton and Winchester Colleges, with respect to future income and all other emoluments of the future provost and fellows and the future warden and fellows, and with respect to the number, emoluments, and advantages to be hereafter enjoyed by all the members of each foundation, or by those now entitled to any payment thereout, and subject thereto, for the establishment or foundation of some other College or School in connection with Eton and Winchester Colleges respectively, and subject to the same governing body as the College in each case.”

MR. WALPOLE explained that he had himself prepared an Amendment in reference to the same point; but confessed, if it were at all necessary—which he doubted—that he would prefer his hon. and learned Friend's provision to the one he had prepared himself. The matter was complicated, and he should like to confer with the draftsman before he finally adopted it. He therefore proposed to postpone it on the understanding that it should be again brought before them on the Report.

MR. WHITBREAD protested that nothing had been said with reference to the poor foundations. He was sure that when these schools were placed under the new governing bodies, large bodies of boarders and foundationers could not exist together, but the rich boarders would gradually eat up the foundationers. He hoped care would be taken to prevent such an evil.

MR. NEATE said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. AYRTON was about to address the Committee, when

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. and learned Member that the Amendment had been withdrawn.

MR. AYRTON said, that to put himself in Order he would re-move the clause, for the reason that he doubted whether the clause that had been put on the Paper by the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) would cover the whole ground covered by the clause proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate). The clause contemplated the continuance of the objectionable governing bodies of Eton and Winchester, whereas the proper manner of dealing with the subject would have been to consider how they could have been abolished. They were Colleges only in the sense of gathering together half-a-dozen idle, useless people, who are maintained at the public expense. In conclusion the hon. and learned Member re-moved the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford.

MR. WALPOLE said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, on the ground that it would be difficult to deal with Eton and Winchester in the manner proposed in the same Bill that had reference to schools differing from those named in the proposed clause. If the Question was postponed to the time when the Report was brought up they would have an opportunity of having the clause better considered.

Amendment negatived.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, he wished to impress upon the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), who had charge of the Bill, the importance of the suggestion that had been made in Devon (Mr. case they schools generally intended for highest class posed that be given to the working But, on the classes had sort of education them. To in the lower highest out-pense of the educational this was a requiring to so much by House was Committee no part of to be appropriating the such person referred.

Mr. Walpole

MR. WA great advantage conferred upon had been the opportunities to obtain the tion; and men who schools have classes. The clause indicated the Committee in the other than and participate therein.

MR. AICI to accomplish been shown school for the middle class it was not to be paid out £20,000 at educational

MR. LII Winchester boy could what his son pass a comp

Clause 29

Clause 7 of existing

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the clause would give the new governing body and the Commissioners the power to consolidate and amend statutes enforced, whether by Act of Parliament, charter, or other instrument; and he wished to point out that, taken in conjunction with Clause 20, a very novel precedent would thereby be set, by which an unknown number of Acts of Parliament might be repealed by Order in Council, merely on condition that the scheme for doing so was laid before Parliament for a certain time, without the attention of Parliament being necessarily called to it. He also wished to remind the Committee that the Bill provided no compensation for the rights of which the lower, middle, and labouring classes were about to be deprived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 8 to 11 agreed to.

Clause 12 (General Power to make Regulations).

SIR HARRY VERNEY moved, in page 7, line 11, after "given," to insert "and whether it is desirable that the Head master should keep a boarding house."

MR. NEATE said, he entirely agreed with the Amendment.

MR. WALPOLE opposed the Amendment as being incongruous with the language and general structure of the clause.

MR. ACLAND, having been in the Head master's house at Harrow, bore testimony to the advantage arising from Head masters keeping boarding houses.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 13 (Appointment of Masters).

COLONEL SYKES complained that the physical sciences are not more extensively taught in our public schools.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 14 (Scheme for Harrow and Rugby).

MR. KARSLAKE rose to move the omission of the words relating to Harrow, in accordance with which the governing body of that School would be empowered to submit to the Commissioners a scheme for appropriating a suitable part of the revenues of the foundation to the promotion of education within the parish of Harrow, in the shape, if deemed expedient, of providing for the maintenance of a separate school. The hon. and learned Gentleman contended that it was contrary to law that the revenues which had been appropriated by John Lyon for the foundation of a grammar school should be diverted to a totally distinct purpose; and he entirely concurred with those who thought it desirable that those great foundations should be made as far as possible available for middle-class education; but then the combined effect of the 6th and 10th clauses would, in his opinion, do all that was necessary in that respect. Let everything be done to ameliorate those foundations and to extend their objects; but it was not right to take a school such as John Lyon founded and cut it into two, thereby departing from the intention of the founder. In making these observations, he believed that he expressed the opinions of the inhabitants of the locality. He had here a letter of the Vicar of Harrow, who coincided in the views of those who wished to see Harrow School modified to meet the requirements of the time, having a lower form, with power to the pupils of that form to rise to the higher ranks of the School, but who did not desire to see a lower school established separate from the present School. If once the House adopted the principle that they might entirely upset the intentions of the founders it would be impossible to say where they could stop. He entreated hon. Members to be merciful to Harrow School, which certainly had a fair claim to the sympathy of both sides of the House, having educated a great number of Members, and among them two Prime Ministers. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving in page 8, line 18, to leave out from commencement to line 41, relating to Harrow School, and make the formal alterations consequent on leaving out such part of clause.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he believed the fact to be that, as regarded Harrow, no tradesman or farmer there had sent his son to that School for thirty years. The object of the clause was not to take away the educational privileges of the lower classes, of which they at present did not take advantage, but to give them a school better suited to their station in life, and which would be better adapted to their educational wants. Under the present law, the privileges of Harrow were considerably abused. Parents who were not connected with the locality went to Harrow and located themselves there solely with the view of getting a cheap high-class education for their sons, although they were perfectly able to pay in full for that education. The clause was designed to mitigate that evil, and by way of compensation to the lower classes it was proposed to establish another school for them. There was great difficulty in combining a day school with boarding, and the system was not found to be in accordance with the best interests of the school. The objection raised to the alteration proposed by the tradespeople of Harrow and Rugby was contained in the last words of the memorial referred to by the hon. and learned Member—it would tend to the depreciation of their property; in other words, they were afraid their houses would not let so well if there was not this migration from London to obtain a gratuitous education.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, he had possessed the advantage of having been what John Lyon had termed a "foreigner" at Harrow, and he was inclined to think that the views of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester and those of his right hon. Friend the Member for London were not so incompatible. On the one side was the undoubted fact that John Lyon had intended his foundation primarily for the inhabitants of Harrow itself; and, on the other, the fact that those educational advantages were abused by reason of the cause just mentioned, Harrow having, in consequence of improved communication—and specially, thanks to the London and North Western Railway—for some time past laboured under what was the misfortune in one point of view and the advantage in another of having virtually become a suburb of London. Building operations had gone on extensively at Harrow; part of the advantage being the cheaper education which John Lyon's foundation afforded to residents. To call that a gratuitous education was an exaggeration; for, although the Head master's fee was excused, the payment to the tutor continued; but it was certainly cheaper, and it was taken advantage of by many who ought to blush for shame. Still there were poor gentlefolk—widows and others of very limited means—who in the exercise of the highest common sense, amounting almost to a Christian virtue, went to Harrow in order to send their children to the School. It was difficult to draw the line; and each case must be dealt with for itself. Again, there was the case of the tradespeople, who looked to Lyon's foundation as a means of obtaining, and, at the prestige of old and famous that John I thized with of the clause so went to genuine inhabitants that Lyon his the material of the town. It is certain of his proper Harrow and only a dribble was something the case, and be advanced been brought learned Mr Karalake). its lights, he sent use of such as he b though it v were sent to pay the fee not do so. was a case, such as the vesting the cretionary p anyone to se well establi ought to be foundation s dent one. by the Amer Friend, and way by the Member for he thought culty would commercial master the the town be lower forms application. power shor master to ac tlemen to th ho deem it should be c test the bo master coul cheaper clas parent was ordinary fee boys could same time, quite silence the sentimental grievance which, backed as it was by a clause for substantial advantages, might otherwise become troublesome. Moreover, the claim as it stood had the disadvantage of making the master of the proposed new school independent of the Head master of the old one. It required but little knowledge of human nature to see how likely this would be to create jealousy and disputation. On the whole, then, he would advise the promoters to withdraw the clause, and see if some arrangement could not be reached. The question could be brought up again on the Report.

Mr. Goschen

MR. AYRTON said, that the real question was, whether the endowments should be allowed to be kept for the wealthier classes of society, or not, and whether children of the poor should be deprived of the education intended by the founder? Then came the question, how the clause affected a large class of persons who did not wish their sons to have a high classical education; but who were nevertheless reluctant to give up any privileges they had at present? He could not understand why the operation of the clause should be confined to Harrow and Rugby. If they were to finally dispose of the funds of the founders they ought to have regard to the rights of the boys in the district. It appeared to him that the clause was intended to restrict the advantages of the schools to the wealthier classes. The proper mode of treating the clause was to make it not special, but general, so that some part, at least, of the endowments might be made available for the benefit of all classes of society living in the neighbourhood of the schools.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was anxious that Rugby should be included in the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Colchester (Mr. Karslake). The founder of Rugby, Lawrence Sheriff, intended that all classes of persons in and around Rugby should participate in the benefits of the School, and by his will expressly provided against the separation of classes. The sons of the poor of Rugby had frequently risen to eminence in consequence of the education they had received at the School; and the inhabitants of that town joined in the prayers of the people of Harrow that their children might not be deprived of the advantages to be obtained at that School. The present system avoided the separation of classes; it encouraged the settlement in the town of retired officers and others, who sent their sons to the School and watched over its social welfare, and it enabled poor boys of talent to rise to a higher position. He hoped, therefore, that Rugby would be included in the Amendment, as the case was stronger even than that of Harrow.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he believed the inhabitants of these towns greatly prized the privileges they at present possessed, and thought the Committee should hesitate to curtail them.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE remarked, that if the clause were omitted the Commissioners, or the new governing body, would have ample powers, under previous clauses, to proceed in the way directed by it. The only object of the clause was to give them precise directions, instead of leaving the matter to their discretion. The Public School Commissioners recommended that, in consideration of the change of circumstances, the exclusive privileges enjoyed by the residents of Harrow and Rugby should be curtailed, and that, as some compensation, provision should be made for their benefit. Now, their recommendations had been embodied in the Bill with the intention of benefiting this class; but as it appeared that they not only were not grateful for it, but were inclined to oppose it, he thought the wisest course would be to abstain, on this as on other points, from giving precise directions, and to intrust the Commissioners and new governing bodies with wide powers. It would then be open to them to consult the inhabitants of these places, and ascertain what was the best and most acceptable scheme. A noble Lord opposite (Viscount Enfield) had suggested a lower, instead of a separate school, and this raised a very important question; but he doubted whether it could be so well considered by Parliament as by the Commissioners. He would suggest, therefore, that the early part of the clause should be withdrawn or negatived, retaining the proviso at the end for the preservation of the rights of persons now living.

MR. LABOUCHERE, as a representative of the county in which Harrow was situate, thought the suggestion just made by the right hon. Gentleman eminently satisfactory. The clause was introduced for the benefit of the tradesmen of Harrow, but they did not like it, and said they did not want it.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he was opposed to all restrictions.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) would be eminently satisfactory to the inhabitants of Harrow.

MR. KARSLAKE said, that there was a decided objection on the part of the inhabitants of Harrow to the establishment of a new school. He had no objection to withdraw his Amendment in favour of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

Clause 15 (Saving of Rights).

MR. ACLAND said, he would be glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) that the Commissioners would have power to establish subordinate schools.

MR. WALPOLE said, he could not then give an off-hand opinion in answer to the question.

Clause added to the Bill.

Clause 16 (Appointment of Commissioners).

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE moved that the clause be postponed. There were certain Gentlemen who were upon every Commission, and a little change was wanted.

MR. AYRTON wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to insert any other names?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it might happen that one of the Gentlemen nominated might not like to serve; but it was not thought desirable at present to propose any additional names.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) represented the views of a great number of persons on education, and it was desirable to have the right hon. Gentleman on the Commission.

MR. LOWE said, he was much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for the compliment, but he would much rather be excused.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE suggested that perhaps the right hon. Gentleman did not like the Gentlemen with whom he would be associated. Perhaps if the Committee put in the names of some of the same kidney he might accept.

MR. WALPOLE said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member who moved the postponement of the clause (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee) would not press his Motion, because the Committee would not thereby get an inch nearer. If it were thought necessary to add other names it would be better to put invidious and the names other. The mission who as the public

Mr. Serjeant Gaselee

MR. LAB right hon. . serve on the real sound education, a system of the Greek, which them all.

MR. KAI of the junior university (Mr. sition to the

CAPTAIN be desirable another day

MR. BROM they were discussion.

MR. POW sion propose tuted in a w

MR. DAI the practice ried into eff

MR. WAL had been gi clause, it w

the propriet out havinge before them

Commission meet with tl

House and t composition was not dee

Gentleman, Amendment ward after suggest that and if anyt was thought mission it m the Report.

MR. AY. Members of position if were throwi perly devolv tleman oppo might be d tory. The clause was York, who preserve inv character of the schools, which no doubt he would do with all the zeal and dignity that belonged to his character and his sacred calling. Then, the second name was that of the Marquess of Salisbury, a party man of such strong Conservatism that he would not associate with the present Government on account of its Liberal tendencies. If, however, the Government acted fairly they would have also added the name of some eminent Member of the other House who was known and admired for his Liberal views. The nomination of one Gentleman from each side of the House of Commons was a fair selection as far as that House was concerned; but it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman himself to re-consider that matter, and to propose a name or names.

MR. ACLAND thought that no substantial objection had been urged against the composition of the Commission, and hoped the Committee would support the Government in the proposal which they made.

MR. GLADSTONE expressed his concurrence with the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) in the opinion that it was not desirable an individual Member of the House should take upon himself the responsibility of naming a Gentleman to be placed upon the Commission; because what they had to look at was not merely the qualities and characteristics of an individual considered alone but the manner in which he entered into the composition of the Bill as a whole. It was only the framers of the Bill who could, he thought, take the initiative in that respect with advantage. He therefore was opposed to any vague postponement of the clause, which could lead to no practical good, and which might have the effect, at this period of the Session, of preventing the passing of a measure which, it must be admitted, would on the whole accomplish a very great and important change. The Commission was not, so far as he could see, in any way open to the charge of having been constituted with anything like palpable unfairness; and he should, under these circumstances, give his support to the proposal of the Government. The political element seemed to be fairly balanced.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE argued in favour of the postponement of the clause in order that the composition of the Commission might be more fully discussed. He should like to know how many of those Gentlemen whose names were proposed as members of it were remarkable for their Ritualistic tendencies. He did not see that the Noblemen and Gentlemen named in the Bill were more fit to perform the office of Commissioners than many others who could be named.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 140 ; Noes 2 : Majority 138.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress ; to sit again To-morrow.

ARMY RESERVE.

MOTION FOR A COMMISSION.

LORD ELCHO rose to move the following Resolution—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon our Military Organization, in so far as it relates to the establishment of a sufficient and economical Army of Reserve, and the means it offers of speedy and efficient expansion to meet the requirements of war, more especially for home defence."

The noble Lord said that he offered no apology for bringing the subject before the House, because he considered it to be one of very great importance; but he hoped that the imperfect manner in which it would be brought forward would not prevent it from receiving from the House and the country that attention which it merited. At present all Europe was engaged in re-organizing its military power in the most efficient and economical manner. Prussia set the example; Austria was not slow to follow in the footsteps of her successful rival, examining the cause of the Prussian successes, and placing her army on a sounder footing: France, the jealous neighbour and rival of Prussia, had likewise endeavoured to trace this cause, and nearly the whole of the winter had been employed by the French Chamber in discussing the amendment of the military law. Whether those nations were thus engaged for defensive or for aggressive purposes he did not pretend to say. Unquestionably, if they looked at the language used in the French Chamber as to the necessity that France should maintain her legitimate influence in Europe, and should therefore have a large standing army, the impression left on one's mind was that the French people intended, as the phrase was, that no gun should be fired in Europe without the consent of the Tuileries. One could not help feeling that the re-organization of the French army might lead to aggressive tendencies on the part of that people. But England, too, had of late years been re-organizing her military forces. No one could pretend that in so doing we were actuated by any aggressive intentions. We were satisfied with our legitimate influence in Europe; we had no frontiers to rectify; and our re-organization was solely in the interests of peace and for national defence. No complaint then could be made by any other Power of our attempts at re-organization, and he believed that such a re-organization was much needed. Remembering that our Estimates were £15,000,000, and remembering on the other hand what we had to show for that expenditure, he was inclined to think that our military machine was not as efficient as it might be or as economical as it ought to be. In this belief he asked for a Royal Commission, because he maintained that whatever might be the industry and ability of the right hon. Gentlemen or noble Lords who had held, or might in future hold, Office as Secretary of State for War, it was not possible that they, with their multifarious Parliamentary and departmental duties, could take this machine to pieces, oil it, change some of its parts, and put it properly together again. He did not believe that we required any new laws, but simply proper, judicious, courageous changes in existing laws and our existing system. These changes, however, were such that possibly no Minister might have the courage to propose, and no Parliament the courage to adopt them, unless fortified by the opinion of a Royal Commission of independent and able men, and it was on this ground that he proposed the appointment of such a body. Having premised thus much, he would now state in detail the grounds on which he made this Motion, taking the standard of foreign armies as that by which to judge our own military organization. The main ground lay in the amount of our Estimates, and the small number of men we had to show for the money. In the debate in the French Chamber it was stated that at the present day Russia was capable of bringing into the field 1,600,000 men; Austria, 1,200,000; and Italy, 900,000. Passing by these Powers, however, he would take the standard of other Powers nearer home. In France, as all know, the system of the age of liable to see portion of taken. The annually in a population her taken in annual contingent—a contingent varied from 140,000 down to 100,000 had given 8 men, and a 600,000 men. Probably the but out of the France there duce the number made up from was under the would give 8 and Reserve Mobile, making Now, what was M. Jules Simon soldiere in equal to £14 showed more world the p successful r upon a new system called reserve, unless cause, and numerous. That though, down by the more than 4 out in 1813 an army of while after 1 250,000 men with a population 1866, with within three war, Prussia 400,000 men guns, with the first li 717,000 men tion of Prussia Germany, a forces were men could and the price came to me was much, this country about 30,000

Lord Eitch

voted this year by Parliament was 203,157, and the reserves numbered 329,000, making a total of 532,157. Deducting from a total of £15,455,400, the cost of the army serving in India, and the cost of the Indian depot in England, and taking the cost of transport for the army from the Navy Estimates, and of stores for the Navy from the Army Estimates, and deducting also, from the total named £1,250,000 for pensions, so as to give a fair standard of comparison with foreign armies, he arrived at the conclusion that the 128,000 men in our regular army cost £11,310,400, while in France the estimated cost of 400,000 men was £14,000,000; and in Prussia, according to Colonel Reilly, 217,000 men cost £6,545,944. The House would readily perceive the great difference there was between the English and the foreign Estimates. It appeared that, man for man, our soldiers cost—a Regular £90, a Militiaman £11 10s., a Yeomanry soldier £6 or £7, and a Volunteer £3 10s. This calculation was based on the Estimate of £15,455,400 for the whole army; and, making the deductions and allowances he had enumerated, he arrived at £11,310,400 as the cost of our 128,000 Regulars. Coming to organization, every one knew that in France that was complete. The army was composed of great divisions, each complete in itself. The Invalides was being converted into an arsenal in the centre of Paris, with equipment for 200,000 men; and such was the power of contraction and expansion that 100,000 men could be summoned to the ranks and sent back again in a fortnight. There were, therefore, complete efficiency, and complete power of expansion; but the power of expansion and contraction was greater in Prussia than in any other country. Within three weeks of the breaking out of the war in 1866 Prussia put on the field 400,000 men and 900 guns, ready in every respect; and these men as we knew, marched from Berlin to the gates of Vienna. That efficiency in time of war was, after all, the result of steady preparation and organization in time of peace. But the Prussians in time of peace practised war, for being at Cologne with Lord Clyde in 1863, he found the operations of war going on. They saw about 50,000 or 60,000 men under arms, and divided into two bodies, each body being in itself complete with the general and staff ready for a campaign. The manœuvres of the troops extended over a fortnight, and they did not know on the one day where they were to meet the next morning. On one occasion he was near a regiment when the bugle sounded to stop work for the day, and he inquired, "Where are you going to sleep?" from an officer, who pointed to the ground, and said, "There." In war material, transport, commissariat, medical department, and stores of every description, each division was complete, and each had the same officers and staff in time of peace that it would command in time of war. He remembered reading accounts of the campaign in 1866, in which occurred the names of the officers he had seen at Cologne in 1863. Colonel Reilly, from whose book he had drawn much information, described Prussian organization in these terms—

"The Prussian army rests upon a system where the whole nation is accustomed to arms, and moderately disciplined, and where, in time of peace, all means are taken to instruct the staff, and keep up the departments forming the machinery of the army complete in all details; and opportunities are given to all of gaining such knowledge of their professional duties that when war comes the army and its departments can be expanded with confidence in their efficiency."

Was our state of preparation, as regards military organization, at all comparable with that of Prussia or France? Was our organization such that when war came, "the army and its departments can be expanded with confidence in their efficiency?" Unquestionably, in England there had been very great improvement in the state of our military organization. Before the Crimean War we had a small available army, but we had no Militia and no Volunteers, and but twelve guns equipped. It was really astonishing that the nation should have been allowed to fall asleep as it were, and to remain in the defenceless condition it was. Now, we were armed, but were we sufficiently organized? He did not pretend to say that much had not been done, and that we were not in an improved position; but would anyone say that our military organization was satisfactory, that our departmental and staff arrangements were all that could be desired; and that our transport, commissariat, medical stores, and camp equipage were sufficient for the army, including the Reserves? Much had been said lately as to the organization of our Volunteers, which was described by a high military authority as a sham; but he contended that it was not more a sham than the organisation of our Militia or Yeomanry, because the organization of the army was supposed to be sufficient, as regarded staff and departmental arrangements, for the Militia and the Yeomanry as well as the Volunteers. To give the House an idea how utterly inadequate the staff alone was, although it was larger in proportion than that of any other army for the purpose it pretended to serve, he might mention that the staff requisite for the Volunteers alone would number 700. This was the calculation made by Colonel Erskine before he left the War Office; and would any man pretend to say that the staff of the army was sufficient for all that was required if we were suddenly called upon to put ourselves in a state of defence? Would any one say that the commissariat, transport, camp equipage, and other departments, which were quite as essential as men to the army, were capable of immediate and ready expansion within three weeks or a month? Whenever war came it would come suddenly, and the advantage would be with nations that were so prepared. Would anyone say that within a month our staff and departmental arrangements could be put in all respects upon such a footing as it would be necessary to guarantee in case of war? It was on these grounds he asked for—"A Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon our Military Organization, in so far as it relates to the establishment of a sufficient and economical Army of Reserve, and the means it offers of a speedy and efficient expansion to meet the requirements of war, more especially for home defence."

He wanted to know whether it was the opinion of his right hon. Friend that our present system offered the means of such an expansion. He (Lord Elcho) did not believe any answer on this subject could be satisfactory which was not preceded by a searching inquiry. But to return to the question of the men. He confessed himself he did not trust our system of recruiting which was at present in force; still less did he trust to our Reserve system. He asked whether this latter system worked as well as the House would wish—as they would all wish? He was inclined to think that a good deal more was required. Now, he distrusted our system of recruiting, because he did not think it would bear the strain of the requirements which war would bring. What had occurred when the Crimean War broke out? We were then 27,000,000 or 28,000,000 of people. ing was in of State for to the House called a "F. with our 28 markably on that we had countries an Parliament such a thin country. V Bill? Two One, the 11 German, m We were at Militia regim A Militiareg right hon. ar ber for Nort Patten)—di More than t of the servi the colonies most unwilli who had sol he brought let the Hou of our army War, notwi tious aids. numbers et serving, 180 would now organization abroad he b brought me and we had recruiting the most possib could have Compare th the time of with a popu than 177,00 the field, a with so com ried even t nails. Our failed in wa cause the R this subject recomendati scheme of h the Member by which an to both the currently w an increase and the Mil

Lord Elcho

Hear!] His right hon. Friend cheered him; but he did not think he could be prepared to assert that the whole of that good result was due to the Government. Unquestionably the increase of pay had had its effect; but concurrently with the increase in recruiting there had been a period of distress and stagnation of trade. The class from which recruits came was affected by that state of circumstances, and, therefore, one could not say how much of the increase in the recruiting was due to the increase of 2*d.* in the pay, and how much to the stagnation in trade. His right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon before he left Office proposed what he called a scheme of Army Reserve, and that proposal was being carried out by his successor in Office, the present Secretary of State for War. He observed that the right hon. and gallant General (General Peel) shook his head; and no doubt he would be able to show in what respects his scheme was not being carried out. The impression entertained by himself and others was, however, that the present Secretary for War was endeavouring to give effect to the plan of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon. He was not going to enter into details on this subject; but he believed he was correct in stating that the intention of his right hon. and gallant Friend was to have in reserve 50,000 men, who, in case of emergency, should be at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief. His right hon. and gallant Friend did not, perhaps, think that a sufficient Army of Reserve; but when he entered Office he found none at all, because the system of Reserve attempted by Lord Herbert had proved a signal failure. The Army of Reserve under that system had become a standing joke. But how, at the present moment, stood our Army of Reserve, which was to have amounted to 50,000? It consisted of two branches—of men who had retired from the army without having completed their full term of service and of men who had served in the Militia. At the present moment we had of the former 2,900 and of the latter 2,006, giving a total of 4,906 for our whole Army of Reserve. He thought it very questionable whether this system of a Militia Army of Reserve would work as well as they all wished it might work. The Militia Army of Reserve depended entirely on the feeling with regard to it existing in the Militia. He had been told on the previous day by a Militia officer the impression abroad was that in bringing this Motion before the House he wished to set aside the Militia and to bring the Volunteers more prominently forward. He presumed, therefore, that such an impression existed somewhere, but he must say for himself that he regarded the Militia as the backbone of our military system. He thought that every effort ought to be made to strengthen the Militia and bind it up with the army and the Volunteers. But, unquestionably there did exist on the part of the Militia a feeling that of late years the public laid less stress on the value of their assistance, and that they received less consideration than they deserved. As one of the public he must say he did not believe that to be the case. The difference of feeling arose from this, that the Militia were drilled at Aldershot or in the country away from London and other large towns, and did not therefore appear so prominently before the public, and that consequently they could not draw a comparison of the nature of their services as they could if they were brought together in large bodies like the Volunteers, who were collected in large towns, and who came prominently before the public. So far, therefore, as the Militia were concerned they were under a false impression with reference to the opinion of the public. He spoke not as a Volunteer, but as one of the public, when he said that the Militia were the backbone of our military system. ["Hear!"] The cheers of hon. Members indicated that such was the feeling of the House of Commons. The Militia officer to whom he had just alluded, and who had been introduced to him as a gentleman who had given great attention to the question, assured him as the result of communications with his brother officers that the Militia Reserve system was not looked upon favourably by Militia officers. It appeared that out of three regiments of Militia which had just completed their drill—the 1st Surrey, the Oxfordshire, and the Hampshire—only eight men offered themselves for the Army of Reserve. These belonged to the 1st Surrey, and only three of them were attested. The Oxfordshire regiment did not produce a single recruit, neither did the Hampshire; and the reason assigned for this remarkable circumstance was that the men did not like to serve without their officers; the men asked were their officers going too, and when they found such was not the case, they determined to stop where they were. In the course of conversation the other day respecting the present Motion, Lord Norreys, who commanded a Berkshire battalion, expressed an opinion that this Act would not work, and, having been requested to do so, put his views upon paper in the following shape:—

“I do not think the Militia has prestige enough to attract desirable men as officers. I also think that the Army Reserve Act will increase the difficulty of getting subalterns; as it is most unpopular among the officers, who feel slighted at being required to command men liable for active service themselves, and not being allowed to accompany them. I consider that it has increased the feeling among them that they are but drill sergeants for the army. To improve the efficiency of the force I think it will be necessary to give it prestige; and, believing as I do that but few men will be induced to join the Army Reserve individually—though if asked by regiments to volunteer on the same terms to serve with their officers they would do so—I would suggest that instead of asking a percentage of men of each regiment to volunteer on these terms, the same percentage of regiments selected from those most efficient should be asked to volunteer on the same terms, to serve under their officers with the regular army in case of war; that these regiments should be very strictly inspected every year; that all members of the permanent staff not thoroughly efficient be draughted; that all officers be required to satisfy the inspecting officer of their thorough knowledge of their duties; and that their annual period of training be extended to fifty-six days, it being clearly understood that no Militia officer serving in the field has any claim to any army appointment when his regiment returns to a disembodied state. An esprit de corps would in my opinion be thus established that would attract desirable men as officers to the Militia, and give the force a prestige it has not got. I fear that if many men were to join the Army Reserve on the terms now offered many of the best officers and those taking the greatest pains with and interest in their companies will leave the Militia, and I am sure that it will be impossible, by increasing the pay of Militia officers, to replace the gentlemen of the respective counties, who are invariably the best officers, and who work very hard not for the pay, but for the interest of their regiments. Little is known to those who have not experienced it of the drudgery that company officers of Militia regiments go through, and of the personal attention they give to every detail affecting their men, and there is no denying that they have not sufficient encouragement.”

A gentleman, with means of knowledge, to whom he read this letter yesterday said that, as far as he knew, it expressed the opinions of the Militia officers. The system here proposed, if adopted, would not only make the Militia feeders, but actually second battalions of the regular army. He asked this same gentleman whether there was any other plan which suggested itself to his mind for giving prestige and efficiency to the Militia; and he replied that what was wanted was some sufficient inducement to the officers to work hard to learn their duty. There was no reason for instance, why honorary army rank should not be given to all Militia officers who would undertake to attach themselves to a regiment of the Line for three months and obtain a certificate of competency in which rank they should be allowed to retain on retiring after ten years' service. This honorary rank, while it would not derogate in any way from the status of the Regulars, would materially enhance the position of Militia officers in their estimation. Upon the whole, therefore, looking at the question as it affected the army, at the present number of departures and re-enlistments, and at the poor condition of the existing Reserve there was abundant ground, he contended, for the issue of a Commission. But, again, there was another branch of the service—the Volunteer Force. Upon the Volunteer Vote it had been his duty to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the fact that committees of officers representing the Militia from all parts of the kingdom had come to the conclusion that the Parliamentary Capitation Grant was insufficient to maintain the force at its present strength. The right hon. Friend, in reply, said he had consulted other officers, who seemed to be of a different opinion, and the hon. Member for Devonshire expressed his opinion that he thought it sufficient. But where so strong an opinion was maintained and expressed upon one side, and on the other, it would not be prudent to risk the falling away of so valuable a force merely for want of inquiring which opinion was right and which was wrong. The precedent of an inquiry was established in 1863, and there had been something like a pledge that the matter should be further investigated. Last year he had brought before the House his view that the sure foundation for the Militia was to be found in it upon the ancient usage of the country—namely, liability to service for home defence, and, if such a Commission were recommended were appointed, that question, he hoped, would not fail to receive attention. But he did not ask the House to go into that matter now. He had no fact, to offer his apologies for the length to which his remarks had extended. He was believing that our military organization was not in a satisfactory state, either as regarded its present condition or its power of expansion in case of need, he felt pelled to bring the subject before the House. He asked for inquiry, because inquiry ought to precede and would be necessary to justify the action which eventually might have to be taken upon this head. In the opinion of many who had studied the subject such inquiry was wanted, and, if granted, would meet with the sanction and approval of the country. There was a very strong and a growing feeling that, for the enormous expenditure of £15,000,000 annually, we had not our money's worth. Could it be alleged that inquiries such as he proposed were uncommon in this country? Why, in the debate in the French Chambers, M. Thiers, speaking upon the Army Bill, said—

Lord Elcho

"Why do you bring in the Bill at once? Why do you not, preparatory to legislating on this question, institute one of those grand inquiries which they issue in England under similar circumstances?"

He hoped the Secretary of State would recommend Her Majesty to issue one of these "grand inquiries;" and, in any event, that the right hon. Gentleman would not pledge the Government against a further consideration of the matter, but would keep in his own hands, at least while he retained Office, the power of issuing such a Commission. The time for inquiry was singularly favourable. The Government could not take action practically in the matter, for they could not elaborate any scheme with the certainty of being able to lay it themselves before the next Parliament; and if a change of Government followed the dissolution time must be lost before the new Minister for War could settle into his place. His object therefore in the present Motion was that the interval preceding the assembling for business purposes of the new Parliament should be occupied in an inquiry conducted by able and independent men, so that time which would otherwise be lost might be turned to account, and valuable information collected and placed at the disposal of whoever might be the Secretary for War. Time pressed; while England considered what was to be done other countries were at work. He therefore hoped his right hon. Friend would recommend Her Majesty to appoint the Commission he asked for, on the principle that the machine of war was made effective only by careful preparation in time of peace. It was not by resting satisfied with a system of recruiting which the Commission described as "a hand to mouth policy" that Prussia paved the way to Sadowa, or that France was preparing for a second Jena.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon our Military Organization, in so far as it relates to the establishment of a sufficient and economical Army of Reserve, and the means it offers of speedy and efficient expansion to meet the requirements of war, more especially for home defence."—(Lord Elcho.)

GENERAL PEEL said, no more important question could be introduced to the House than that brought forward in the very able speech of his noble Friend. He quite agreed that no time could be more appropriate than the present for the consideration of the matter; because we were not suffering from one of those hot or cold fits which generally regulated our military operations—now through panic, driving the country into extravagances, and then, from a false feeling of security, leading to the neglect of the commonest measures of defence. Now was the time to consider the whole question dispassionately, because the present policy of the Foreign Office—which he hoped would be the policy of the future—to a great extent secured us immunity from foreign quarrels. But when Continental Powers were arming themselves to the teeth the security arising from non-intervention was not to be trusted in alone. The question of an Army Reserve was referred to the Royal Commission of two years ago, which sat under circumstances much resembling those of to-day, for no immediate cause for action had then arisen. The Commissioners, reporting on that subject, said—

"We find that it opens up a very large question, the decision of which rests rather with statesmen and Cabinets than with a Commission such as that of which we are members."

That was his opinion also. He strongly deprecated the growing tendency to transfer responsibility from Ministers to Royal Commissions. The Report went on—

"The military history of this country, even up to the date of the last great war in which we were engaged, shows that it has been our practice during periods of peace to reduce all our military establishments to the lowest possible point which the relief of our troops serving in the colonies would admit. Our arsenals were dismantled, and nothing but the most ordinary work performed in them. In fact, it may be said that we were content to exist from hand to mouth with no forecast of the future. No preparations for a state of war were thought of, and the consequence has been that when war occurred everything had to be done in a hurry at the most lavish expense. Men were enrolled and sent half-trained into the field, matériel manufactured, transport provided, and accommodation for the sick and wounded devised and organized. Hitherto we have had time, owing to the procrastinated character of war, to extricate ourselves from the consequences of our remissness, and by much expenditure and incredible exertion we have escaped its lamentable effects. Recent events however have taught us that we must not rely in future on having time for preparation. Wars will be sudden in their commencement and short in their duration, and woe to that country which is unprepared to defend itself against any contingency that may arise or combination that may be formed against it."

Remarking that at present the army was barely sufficient for the protection of "our Indian territories and our extended colonial possessions," the Commissioners proceeded to say—

"Under these circumstances we must look more to our army. We think its present strength is barely sufficient for a period of peace, and the question is how we can most readily and speedily increase it through the means of a Reserve force, consisting of men who have already received their training in its ranks, but may have fallen back into the ordinary duties and callings of civil life?"

He was Secretary of State for War at the time that Report was presented. But previously his attention and that of his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief had been called to the necessity of a Reserve, to raise the army from a state of peace to a state of war. They not only agreed to place their own views on paper, in order to be enabled to compare them, but they asked distinguished officers to send in their views of the Army of Reserve; and they found that the belief was general of the necessity of having a Reserve which would enable them to raise the army in time of peace to what was required of it in time of war. He could not place the case of our necessities better before the House than by reading an extract from a very admirable letter addressed to him by his Royal Highness on the subject, as follows:—

"During peace it should be our object to keep up our cadres of regiments, battalions, and batteries, though the actual rank and file may be of diminished strength, provided we have the certainty that our organization is such that it is capable of easy and certain expansion. At present we have no such certainty; and, indeed, we may fairly say that our expansion means are nil. How, then, is this force to be created? I am anxious that we should have the means of bringing up every regiment, battalion, and battery to a war footing, by the formation of some Reserve force of 40,000 men. This would, as far as my estimate goes, give 1,000 or 700 men average of 2 exclusive of gin for the the field. W is how this with the lea

After sugg a Reserve discharged army, his say—

"These n give anything my calculati first instance be made to ment to give proportionate serve in the the army at pose of hon make up the and batteries

Without t military o world. He to reduce figure with us at once Confining t Line, he fo establishme and our pre to about 10 therefore l strength of the 141 be England, as of no less and conseq field only a each. He tion was de In the Mili Line they Militia est much large of course, have the p Militia to t it. In May tia were q found from nished him field state Militia wer seven regim this—The the 18th o officers and 4,022 men; on the 20th of May, they had 110 officers and 4,165 men; on the 18th, the seven regiments of the Line had 159 officers and 2,771 men; and on the 20th, 154 officers and 2,690 men. The average number of men to each Militia regiment would be 600, and they would have 16 officers, including the staff, while the regiments of the Line would, on the average, each consist of 400 men and 24 officers. What, therefore, they should endeavour to do was to obtain a transfer of men from the Militia to the Line. In the Line there was one officer to 17 men; whereas in the Militia, where neither officers nor men were in the state of efficiency of the men of the Line, there was one officer only to 87 men. Now, the plan which he proposed was, he must say, different in many respects from that which was now to be carried out. What he proposed was, that the first Army of Reserve should be attached to the Militia, whereas the second Army of Reserve should be attached to the Pensioners. He did not know whether his plan was the better of the two, but it certainly was simpler. He had implored the officers of the Militia to encourage the formation of this Army of Reserve. In taking men from the Militia to form this Army of Reserve he had contemplated filling their places, but men had been enlisted before the transfer to the Army of Reserve had been effected. He did not wish by his plan to interfere with the men as long as they were with the Militia. What he wanted was to know they were there, and to be able to lay his hand on them whenever they might be required. But the new regulation was, that the men should be drilled fifty-six days in the year with regiments of the Line. The officers did not like that, and the men thought it was an inducement for them to enlist in the army in time of peace. His object and intention had been to attach the first Reserve entirely to the Militia, and in the body so created he believed we should have found a very valuable auxiliary force. He objected to the present plan on several grounds. Suppose a man had served in the first class Reserve during his first period of service, he had then a right to go into the second class of Reserve; but to be entitled to a pension he would be obliged to enlist during the second period for a term of twenty-two years. He could not help thinking that the Militia had been treated very unfairly in this matter. In the first place he objected to this Reserve being called a Militia Reserve. It was a Militia Army Reserve; and the men who withdrew from the Militia and entered the Reserve were entitled to the same advantages as those who entered the Reserve from the Line, inasmuch as both were subjected to the same liabilities. But this was not the case, especially with regard to pension; and he could not help thinking that with the one class as with the other two years should be permitted to count as one. Those who entered from the Militia should, as well as those who entered from the Line, be exempted from service on juries, and the performance of duties of a similar character. He did not attribute the slightest blame to his right hon. Friend; but it certainly was unfortunate that these instructions should have been issued at a time when some of the Militia regiments had completed their training, and when the expiration of the training in other cases was close at hand. But the great question they had to consider was how to provide the Militia with officers. This could not be done unless some greater inducements than now existed were offered. He had before warned the House, and he now warned them again, not to allow the Army of Reserve to be attached to the Pensioners. If they did they would soon have applications made for an increase in the number of staff officers, and it would be better that the money required for that purpose should be expended in encouraging officers to join the Militia. If that were done it would not be difficult to induce them to join the Army of Reserve.

General Peel

GENERAL DUNNE contended that it was fallacious to institute a comparison, as was often done, between the army of this country and those on the Continent. In France and in Prussia, for instance, every man was liable to serve; but the system in practice there could not be carried out here, because it was not popular. Recruits were now enlisted by the Pensioners, and at the head-quarters of the regiments, but a good deal of jealousy existed between the two, the Pensioners believing, and with some reason, that recruiting through them was not received with so much favour as recruiting at head-quarters. He believed that a much larger number of men would enlist from the Militia into the Army of Reserve if they knew that they were not liable to removal from the country except in time of war. During the last war they had recruiting for the Line and for the Militia going on at the same time; and now, while moving a large body from the Militia into the Line, they would have all the men who remained in the Militia besides. He therefore thought the plan would be largely successful. There ought to be some stronger inducement held out to officers to enter the Militia. Commissions might advantageously be given to subaltern officers in the Militia, as was done during the war. Such men would be worth a dozen of those who passed through some foolish competitive examination. There was, he believed, no difficulty as to captains and field officers. Compared with the staff at the end of the last war, the present staff of the British Army was larger and was much greater than was necessary. The Militia force in Ireland might be said not to exist. It had been the policy of the Government not to call it out for the last three years. The Irish Militia was on paper, and there was a Vote every year for the staff and the training; but at the end of every Session they were obliged to provide for the application of the sum so voted to some other purpose. They neither drilled the Irish Militia nor allowed them to recruit; but he believed many of them would be ready to accept the offer made by the gallant General (General Peel) when he was Secretary of State for War. Some means ought, therefore, to be taken to recruit the Militia in Ireland. The noble Lord said they ought to transfer regiments from the Militia to the Line; but that was utterly impossible—it was absurd. They must proceed in another way—by offering inducements to the Militia. The noble Lord proposed a Commission; that, however, was not necessary on the score of information. Every military man knew perfectly well the state of the recruiting service, and that the Militia was not as efficient as it ought to be. The Volunteer force was a most useful one, and tended to keep up the military spirit in the country. But to put them on an equality with the Line was quite out of the question. He hoped the Volunteer movement would succeed; but to suppose that they would supply the army with recruits was chimerical.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he was glad to observe the attention which the House was paying to this subject. He had listened with great pleasure to the speech of his right hon. and gallant Friend (General Peel), from which they had gained so much information. The question was how they would stand if they were to pose three combined attacks were the coast at men landed, they do in army capable recommend be embodied would get who might good soldier large body the army rather be the Army spirit of adventure which, if possible one of the world. also be effective the country the short service suggested, remain for necessary to perform them good

COLONEL had been a reluctance to allow their serve; but I suppose, feeling among their first duty to induce their his own men asked to join men stepped signify their had no doubt also prepared of the Militia Reserve will be, that being a failure thought that been adopted serve would

MR. HAD doubt that Army of Britain ever, for the successful deficiency had been a year. The serve was official policy, of our colonies sidered by Parliament itself rather than by a Military Commission. It was impossible that we could go on providing 50,000 men for our colonies besides our Indian force. He was glad to hear that the last regiment was about to be withdrawn from New Zealand, and that Sir Henry Storks had expressed an opinion that the troops might be withdrawn from the Cape. The amount of men we kept in Canada was simply an object of attack for the United States. In the event of a change in our colonial military system being adopted the question of the Army of Reserve would be placed upon an entirely new footing, because the men for the regular army might then be enlisted for five years only, and might then pass into the Army of Reserve. He was thankful to the right hon. and gallant General (General Peel) for his expressions of opinion; and the House and the country would be obliged to the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) for introducing the subject.

General Dunne

MR. BATHURST said, he objected to the period of the annual service of the Militia being extended from one month to two months. It was difficult to find men of position and means who would sacrifice even one month to hard work, and it would be impossible to induce them to sacrifice two months for that purpose.

MAJOR JERVIS said, that the whole of the Reserved force had been placed under the command of one general officer; but unfortunately that officer found himself in this position, that the troops he had to command were also under the command of every Lord Lieutenant of every county in the country. It was impossible that one man should be able to command the Militia, the Yeomanry, the Volunteers, and what was more especially called the Army of Reserve, while he found himself so hampered in his command. Let them take, as an illustration, what had occurred at Windsor the other day. Some 25,000 Volunteers had to be brought to Windsor, and they were supposed to be under the control of the officer who had the command of the Reserve forces. But that officer had no more to do with them than he (Major Jervis) had. When general officers went down to take the command of brigades and divisions they did not know what to do, and 25,000 men had been brought together without the slightest attention being paid to the commissariat for the time being. Did they call that placing an officer in command of the reserve forces of the kingdom? Until they gave the officer in command the full authority to which he was entitled it was idle to talk of having appointed a general officer to take charge of the Reserve. The Reserve forces might be divided into two bodies—the one whose duty it would be to fill up the gaps in the service in the time of foreign war, the other to act in case of invasion. The two things were totally distinct. For the first duty they must have men ready to go to any part of the globe; but until they paid them as much as they would earn in any other calling it was idle to talk of having such men at all. It was a mere question of wages. Then, with regard to the other portion of the reserves, there must be a proper organization of the Militia, the Yeomanry, and the Volunteers. When a regiment had a first-rate colonel they would follow him anywhere; but when the men did not like their officers they would not follow. Consequently, if a war broke out there would be a force which, when wanted, they would not have at command. Now, he wished the Secretary of State to look the matter full in the face, and to consider how he could get the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers—which, if officered properly, would be one of the finest armies in the world—properly organized, for last Saturday had proved that at present the Volunteers were little better than an undisciplined rabble. Until they put the officer in command of the Reserve forces in the position which he ought to hold, they were only misleading the country by saying that they had a Reserve upon which they could rely.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he quite agreed with those Gentlemen who had recognized the great importance of the subject which his noble Friend had brought before the House, and he admitted that his noble Friend, entertaining the views which he did, was entitled to great credit for the steps he had taken and the able statement he had laid before the House. But, though the Notice of his noble Friend referred entirely to the formation of an Army of Reserve, he had entered into statements with regard to the cost of the British Army which it was impossible to pass over without notice. It was much to be lamented that—inadvertently he was sure, on the part of his noble Friend, but constantly on the part of speakers in that House and writers in the public Press—the cost of the British Army was stated to be upwards of £15,000,000. Now, that was not true; and it was most undesirable that exaggerated statements of that kind should become current in the country. His noble Friend had begun his speech with the broad statement that £15,000,000 was the cost of the British Army, and had concluded with the same statement. It was true that in the intervening portions of his speech his noble Friend, in deference to some disclaimers on his part, had alluded to certain deductions from that expenditure; but it was so important that no delusion should prevail on that subject that he hoped the House would allow him to state what the figures really were. No doubt, the gross amount in the first column of the Estimates was £15,400,000, but from that they must deduct, not merely £500,000 for re-payments into the Exchequer, but £1,568,000 hard cash which went to defray the expenses of the army. Then came upwards of £2,087,000 for the cost of the non-Effective force. Then there were large deductions on account of what the War Office did for the navy in various ways, the result being that from the total of £15,400,000 they must begin by deducting upwards of £4,000,000. His noble Friend very properly deducted the cost of the Army Reserves, which was another £1,500,000; so that, in point of fact, the actual cost of the effective standing army to the British taxpayer, instead of being £15,400,000, was only £9,900,000. He had endeavoured, when moving the Estimates, to do away with any misapprehension which might have existed; but after what had passed that night he had thought proper to revert to the subject. He now came to the remaining part of the speech of his noble Friend, and he wanted to know what his noble Friend's real motive was? The House must have observed that the Motion brought forward by his noble Friend that night was entirely different from the Notice which he had given some months ago. His noble Friend then gave Notice that he would move for a Royal Commission to inquire into the state of our Reserve Forces. That Notice had stood for a considerable time on the Paper; but after the Easter holidays he renewed his Motion in an altered form. His noble Friend's first Notice was the same as that which he had brought forward that night, but with this very important and significant addition—

Sir John Pakington

"And to consider, keeping these ob-view, whether it may be necessary or to enforce the ballot for the Militia; and what way this may be done so as to effect sired end, and at the same time press moon the country."

Now, he could not help thinking though his noble Friend had sup-that part of his original Notice, object he had in view was conscripsome shape or other. He could not the conviction that his noble Friend believed that our voluntary system sufficient for the defence of the and that something like a compul-tem was required. Now, he would his noble Friend and the House the present state of the defences country was such as to make it difficult to hold out to the public for a moment, that the Government or the of Commons were of opinion that voluntary system had so far broken that the defence of the country could be maintained without having recourse conscription? He believed such a to be wholly unnecessary and uncaland that the history of the country the spirit of the people had proved be so. If ever there was a moment it was eminently unnecessary, em-uncalled for, eminently impolitic to the public mind entertain such an was the present, when it was im-to deny the fact, whatever the might be, that the voluntary system more successful than it had ever been fore. He doubted whether our forces and Reserves had ever been efficient or the ranks better filled they now were under the voluntary tem. His noble Friend had dwelt upon the Prussian system, and asked whether we were in as good a position Prussia was. Did he think it desirable that we should adopt the Prussian For military purposes that system doubt most effective; and no army Europe was more perfect than that Prussia. But every citizen there bound to devote a portion of his service as a soldier. The Prussians were accustomed to that system what would be said of any Government Parliament in this country which tried introduce it? Then look at the position of Prussia, surrounded by three of the greatest military Powers in the world France, Austria, and Russia, while herself was a great nation, anxious to maintain her position and consciousness

she could do so only by means of a powerful army. Was Prussia an example to England in this particular? In his opinion, there was nothing which rendered it desirable to assimilate our system to that of Prussia. He quite agreed with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (General Peel) that the state of Europe at this moment, and for some few years past, had been such as to make it desirable that the English Government should take all reasonable precautions to insure this country against the possible contingencies of war. On the other hand, England had no aggressive policy; her sole object was to preserve her independence. Our position with regard to Reserve forces was this—First, we had that noble Volunteer force, in the formation of which no one had taken a more distinguished part than his noble Friend. He had heard with regard to the Volunteers the remarks, not complimentary, but frank and straightforward, of his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Jervis). From all he had heard, with all his admiration for the Volunteer force, he believed that the occurrences of Saturday showed that that force had not reached perfection in its discipline. Far be it from him to disparage the Volunteers; but it was clear that if they were to be again reviewed by Her Majesty, or brought together from any circumstances in bodies of more than 20,000, they should be so trained as to act with honour to themselves, and their conduct should be as creditable after the review as before. He understood his hon. and gallant Friend to say that they were left on Saturday without any commander. [Major JERVIS: I said without any commissariat.] As to commissariat, he believed the Volunteers took pretty good care of their own; and as to the commander, the officer who was at the head of the Reserve forces considered himself responsible for bringing them on the ground, and there they were under the command of a general officer of great experience. At all events, before they were collected in such large bodies again, it would be desirable that some new arrangements should be made. However, it was a noble force; and when his noble Friend said in his Resolution that he wished to have an Army of Reserve, “and the means it offers of speedy and efficient expansion to meet the requirements of war, more especially for home defence,” he would appeal to him, above all men, to say whether the whole history of this Volunteer force did not prove its power of expansion and the military character of the English people? That great force was called into existence almost by magic. At the commencement of this century we had a Volunteer army of 500,000 men; and so now, if we were threatened by invasion, the Volunteer force, which was now something under 200,000, would soon increase to 500,000. We had got the nucleus, we had got regiments, we had got officers, and the force might be expanded to almost any extent which the necessities of the country required. With regard to the ballot, we did not want new laws on that subject. True, the ballot was suspended on account of the facility with which our ranks were filled. But if necessary Her Majesty had any day the power, by Order in Council, of putting the ballot in force again. It was therefore unnecessary to have a Royal Commission or to institute any inquiry under the idea that compulsory service had become necessary in this country. The next item in our Reserve was that fine old constitutional force, the Militia, which, he could not help thinking, did not always command the respect and good feeling to which it was entitled. In his opinion this House could do nothing wiser and more prudent, with a view to increase its means of defence, than give every possible support and encouragement to the Militia. The paucity of officers was, indeed, a subject of regret. Setting aside the Irish Militia, there should be in England 3,053 Militia officers, and in Scotland 432. In 1867 there were present—in England, 1,625 officers, in Scotland 234; altogether 1,859; and there were absent 263. Thus there were shown to be 1,363 vacancies in the officers of the Militia force. These vacancies seriously impaired the efficiency of the force; and he was most anxious to take any course which could be suggested with a view to increase the number of officers. No doubt the majority of these vacancies were in the lower ranks; but still the efficiency of this fine force suffered materially. The Militia in training last year numbered 64,219 compared with 70,913 this year. The quota having been reduced, it had been necessary to make up the reduced quota before attempting to make up the full quota; only 20,000 men were wanted to make up the full quota of the English and Scotch Militia; recruiting proceeded satisfactorily, 7,000 men having been enlisted last year; and so ready were the peasants of the country to enlist that he had every hope that within a comparatively short space of time the full strength of the Militia would be arrived at. Taking the number at 70,000 for England and Scotland, or 20,000 below what it ought to be, and at 20,000 for Ireland, or 10,000 below what it ought to be, reckoning 14,000 Pensioners and 16,185 Yeomanry and Cavalry, and putting down Mr. Sidney Herbert's Army of Reserve at 8,000, our actual Reserve force amounted to 311,000, without any of those additions that would result from the plan of the right hon. and gallant Member (General Peel). It would not answer any practical purpose to enter into a controversy respecting the regulations, for if there was any difference between those of the right hon. and gallant General and those he had issued, it was rather the result of misunderstanding than of intentional divergence; and it was quite premature on the part of his noble Friend to suggest that the plan had failed, for, as far as he was able to judge, it was successful. He admitted that the regulations were promulgated later than he could have desired, the delay being occasioned by the fortunate transfer of the command of the Reserve force to General Lindsay, whose opinion he wished to have; and it was owing to this circumstance that the regulations were not issued until, in some cases, the period of training was drawing to a close. The number enrolled as yet might be small; but he was confident that in the future they might expect to enrol the proportion of one-fourth contemplated by the right hon. and gallant General. In speaking of the first class of the Army Reserve he imagined his noble Friend meant those who had the option of commuting their service on joining the Reserve. The regulations were being promulgated, and he should be glad if that portion of the plan contributed any large number to the Reserved force, but he was not sanguine it would do so. With regard to the second class, those who joined the Reserve under certain conditions after the first period of their service—he had heard of a considerable number doing so already, and he was sanguine that from that source the Reserve force would receive great accessions of strength. Under these circumstances, and after these explanations, he had to ask the House whether his noble Friend had made out a case for a Royal Commission? The ulterior object seemed to be to persuade the country of the necessity, but the ranks of the army were rendered a recently ad reasonable army would the Militia for further and if the he should

Colonel thought the with reference last presser force. lion move would have force, although at two or and had been in a burning be found the by small battalions, mand. He to bring together either in the officers who he was an more practical General Lindsay by the desire you could must say it Saturday battalion after

Mr. A.C. firm what and gallant had heard in reference last by Vol requested most earnest be seriously haps, turn only a repetition disaster—was who some of the main with their way had more or 3,000 discipline trial, when post; and habits of the great majority of the men were such that, if properly commanded, they would endure great privations rather than disgrace themselves and their uniform. He hoped the matter would be investigated and the facts ascertained. As a Volunteer, he was anxious that the truth should be stated with reference to the Volunteers; but he did not think it was necessary to call them "an undisciplined rabble," unless it was clear that they deserved such an appellation. The Volunteers were perfectly willing to be taught by military men; but there was not the slightest use in having them lectured by the men whose service had consisted in marching round barrack yards and seeing rations served out three times a day. Volunteers were merely civilians, and they knew it; but if the military authorities wished to make them efficient as Volunteers, that was not to be done by putting them through the goose step and things of that sort. Neither Volunteers nor Militiamen could be expected to do what was accomplished by men who were at drill 365 days in the year. Again, there was no use in having the Volunteers disciplined by worn-out soldiers. Young military officers, with a career before them, ought to be sent to instruct the Volunteers. As for the review of Saturday, he did not see why the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) and the men whom he commanded should have been kept in a meadow for three hours. Who had organized that review? The Volunteers had gone down to do honour to their Queen; and it was not very surprising that after nearly twenty-four hours of hunger and thirst some of them should have run after a little water. With regard to another branch of the Question before the House, he thought the heads of the army ought to consider whether it might not be well to adopt the Continental system of gentlemen cadets in the case of young gentlemen who could not go on at Chelsea.

Sir John Pakington

COLONEL WILLIAMS was understood to ask whether the Militia was up to the number stated in the reduced Vote?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied to the hon. and gallant Member for Great Marlow (Colonel Williams) in the affirmative.

MR. LIDDELL, as a member of a country corps of Volunteers, wished to express an opinion that a lesson might be learnt from the occurrence of Saturday. That occurrence was attributable to the fault of the officers. It also proved that the men attended to their officers in matters of discipline, and were prepared to do what their officers told them. This country had got a magnificent force of Volunteers, for which we were grateful; but there was still a great defect in the Volunteer organization. He believed that would not be remedied till in that House or elsewhere persons spoke out distinctly on the subject. The Volunteer force was not sufficiently officered. Any number of men were got to come forward and serve in the ranks; but there was not a sufficient number of men of education found to come forward and officer the corps. That was the difficulty under which the Volunteers laboured. He extremely regretted the disaster—he would add national disgrace—"No, no!"—of what occurred last Saturday. It was to a certain extent a disgrace. He repeated that it was all owing to the want of officers who had the respect of their corps, and he hoped that what had happened would induce the gentlemen of England to come forward and take the command of this noble body of men.

COLONEL FANE fully concurred in what had been said as to the necessity of holding out additional inducements to the officers of the Militia and Volunteers. He had the honour to command a regiment of Militia, and it went through its period of training not less creditably than other corps; but he had not one single officer whom he could rely upon to perform such a needful operation as paying a company. Unless something were done in the direction indicated by the Motion of the noble Lord, the day would come when the commanding officer, the major, and the adjutant would be the only persons left to represent a regiment of Militia.

LORD ELCHO said, he would avail himself of the privilege of a reply which the courtesy of the House conferred to refer to one or two points alluded to in the debate. It was with a good deal of pain and surprise that he heard what occurred on Saturday night described by the hon. Member, who defended the Volunteers, as a "great disaster," and by another hon. Member as a "national disgrace." Now, it only showed, when a hare was once started, how apt men were to run riot after it. He absolutely and entirely denied that what occurred on Saturday night could be, or ought to be, so characterized. He would assume that what had been said about an "undisciplined rabble" applied to the whole of the force at Windsor. That consisted of 26,000 men. The total Volunteer force amounted to over 150,000. Were they going to tar them all with the same brush for the misdeeds of only a portion? But was the misconduct general? Since the debate began he asked a gallant Colonel of Volunteers, the hon. Member for Abingdon (Colonel Lindsay), "What station did you go by?" "Windsor," was his reply. "Did you see anything wrong—any signs of insubordination?" "No," said the hon. and gallant Gentleman, "every man was out of the station by eleven o'clock." It was his misfortune to travel—not by the Great Western—to leave London last and to come back last. He went to Datchet station, and the South-Western exactly took two hours and twenty minutes to convey him there from Waterloo. After the review was over, they were inspected, and left the ground about nine o'clock, arriving within a certain distance of the bridge at ten. There he found a scene of the greatest confusion, and there the regiment which he commanded was kept from ten till two o'clock, when it was at length embarked in the railway, and arrived in London at, he thought, a quarter-past four. He could only speak as to what he saw. He saw more than one regiment standing there in perfect formation, and behaving with perfect order and discipline—very far, indeed, from being an "undisciplined rabble." In justice to his own men he ought to state that not a single man left the ranks on that occasion; they stayed there patiently from ten o'clock till two in the morning. Undoubtedly there were a certain number of men who had left their ranks—stragglers from different corps. But what was the cause of that? He did not attribute it to the men, but to the fact that a certain number of the officers were not with their regiments. That was the point. But though there was a failure here, the other station, as he had shown, was cleared at an early hour; and of those at Datchet a very large portion maintained their ranks unbroken, and kept perfect discipline. Therefore, he repudiated on the part of the Volunteer force, and he hoped the country would accept that repudiation as the truth, the idea that what occurred at Datchet pontoon bridge showed that they were an "undisciplined rabble," and not to be trusted. But what was it caused this jamb at the bridge? He had told them that he himself took two hours to come to Windsor. To do with the either to V entirely, he War Office ["No!"] who comma the War Off Department Horse Guard they comma the field, b soon as the trains came the Volunteer the train ca take up men pool, for D corps there-regiments. statement by the bridge. metropolitan corps was ac it sometimes curred—that a metropolit this addition in, that stra who had lef which he ha who were fe for hire upo trains and then the del which led t upon the bar he had alrea said, do not run away w Volunteer fo behaved as a misconduct affected only tion of the upon Saturd the services meetings of who had bee Dover, to Bri together at I thered again month—he c to show that undisciplined Gentlemen o vice, if offic be at their would they maintain in the different regiments the perfect discipline which they now saw exhibited? The feeling of the Volunteer force was very strong upon the question, and it was their earnest desire and intention to bring home to those officers who neglected their duty upon that occasion the consequences of that neglect. The noble Lord expressed his perfect satisfaction with the tone of the debate, which had convinced him still more strongly of the absolute necessity, sooner or later, of an inquiry such as his Motion advocated. The late and the present Secretary for War both objected to the proposed Commission; but, their grounds for doing so formed in reality the strongest reasons in favour of that proposal. He did not shrink from the question of personal liability to service for home defence, and had freely expressed his opinion upon it, but it formed no part of his present proposals; it was not, however, as suggested, a Prussian or French theory, but one based upon our history in all former times, and expressly referred to in the Preamble of an Act passed in the reign of George III. Great stress had been laid upon the numerical strength of the different services at present. He admitted that they were well up to the mark. But army organization meant something more than the mere enrolment of a number of men, however large; it meant the same number of men worked up and banded together by proper and efficient military departments, and this it had been the object of his Motion to insure. His conviction was that a satisfactory state of things could be brought about by instituting a searching inquiry such as he had suggested; but, as the Secretary of State for War and his predecessor had both objected to the course he proposed, he would not press for a division.

Lord Elcho

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

KNIGHTS OF WINDSOR.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. BENTINCK said, he hoped the hon. and learned Baronet (Sir Colman O'Loghlen), whose Notice of Motion stood next on the Paper, would not proceed with it, as the House was anxious to go on with the more important Business of the evening.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he was in the hands of the House, but he would undertake to be very short in what he had to say. The Motion had been for some time on the Paper, and he regretted that the matter had not been settled by the Government after the correspondence that took place with regard to it last year, and the promise of the Secretary of the Admiralty that it should be seen to. He desired that an end should be put to the system under which Knights of Windsor not members of the Church of England were required to attend Divine service in St. George's Cathedral twice every day. It was very hard that a religious question should be mixed up with rewards to indigent officers who had seen distinguished service, and that men should be required to attend religious services to which they conscientiously objected, and especially as under the regulations of the Queen's service no soldier was required to do so when military duty did not interfere. The Knights of Windsor were originally established by Edward III. with a view to assist valiant but poor soldiers, and the duties imposed on them were to attend the service of God, to pray for the prosperity of the Sovereign, and to attend high mass; but fifty years afterwards the canons of Windsor appropriated the money for their support to other purposes, and the Knights obtained no sort of redress until Henry VIII. ordered by his will that £600 a year be set apart for them; but, although he made the order, and required that masses should be said until the end of the world, His Majesty did not provide for the payment of the £600 a year. The plan, however, was carried out by Edward VI. and Queen Elizabeth. Her Majesty made provision for thirteen Knights, and ordered that they should lose their place if they married. She also required them to attend daily service in St. George's; and generally her regulations remain in force to this day. The Naval Knights, provided for by the will of Samuel Travers, were subject to the same rules; they were required to remain single, and to lead a virtuous, studious, devout life, and to be removed if they gave occasion for scandal. It happened that at present the Knights included one Roman Catholic, besides other Dissenters. The Roman Catholic Knight, however, was not particularly anxious to be relieved from attending the Church service, so it was not on his account that he introduced the matter; he asked for relief of all Dissenters on the general principle that considerations of religion should not enter into the granting of reward for distinguished services. Believing as he did that it was a hardship that Knights differing in their religious opinions from the doctrines of the Established Church should be called upon to perform these duties, he moved that an Address should be presented to Her Majesty praying that she would be graciously pleased to alter the regulations in this respect.

Mr. EYKYN seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly representing that, in the opinion of this House, it should not be obligatory on any Naval or Military Knight of Windsor, not being a member of the United Church of England and Ireland, to attend Divine Service in Saint George's Chapel, Windsor, daily or at all, and praying that Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to direct such alterations to be made in the Statutes regulating the Naval and Military Knights of Windsor as shall exempt from attending Divine Service in Saint George's Chapel, Windsor, all Naval and Military Knights of Windsor who shall not be members of the United Church of England and Ireland."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he objected not only to Catholics but to Protestants being obliged to attend Divine service. These poor old gentlemen were many of them above seventy years of age, and they received some £40 and others £100 a year, and a small house in Windsor. They were obliged to attend Divine service twice every Sunday, and every third month to attend every day, unless they could obtain leave of absence. He could not think that there was any necessity for this. He should, of course, regret their not attending; but their attendance ought in no case to be compulsory. The Knights ought to be allowed, if they pleased, to attend the parish church or any other place of worship, an indulgence which was extended to Her Majesty's subjects at Windsor, though denied to these old and meritorious officers. He moved as an Amendment to leave out the words "not being a member of the United Church of England and Ireland."

Colonel FRENCH seconded the Amendment, and in doing so declared that he looked upon it, not as a religious, but as a physical question. It was really a very serious matter, and one that was very painful to many Knights who had received wounds in the service of their country, that they should be compelled to attend in a large hall, theoretically for the benefit of their souls, but in reality only to have their suffering which constitutes the rule in ship.

Sir Colman O'Loghlen

Amendment words "not Church of England" (Labouchere.)

Colonel FRENCH said, whether the hardship or whether the interference with the Motion were for an Admiral or Governor, in fact, stated Knight to Baronet has change been made, as did were Dissenters no foundation

There were ever change certain Knights the membered though old, case infirm writing to the Motion Baronet to the bling old Knights as did the Government discontent Occasionally by proxy; service for the authority happy to in Baronet in believe them rough rates, advantage. no only because really educated Parliament which, relation Charity, sold

Mr. GAT House would to the Amendment Knights were Order of the in the case reality part nected with letters from naval and nobody had

The Roman Catholic Knight who was appointed by the right hon. Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) acquiesced in the conditions, and entertained no objection to them; and the same was the case with a Knight who was a Presbyterian. Moreover, the Knights resided within the precincts of the Palace; and St. George's was not a public, but a Royal chapel. The Crown had a dispensing power with regard to these statutes, and he thought the House would feel that the adoption of this Motion would be to interfere unduly with the exercise of the rights of the Crown, especially as no grievance had been established. Hon. Members all knew how anxious the Queen was that no undue stress should be laid on any person's conscience; and if any necessity for an alteration of the statutes existed, the matter might safely be left to Her Majesty. As a proof of the connection of this body with the ecclesiastical establishment of St. George's Chapel, he might mention that one of the suspended canonries had been applied to increasing the pay of the Knights; and that in 1861, on account of the canons having an undue share of the property, part of it was transferred to the Knights, owing, he believed, to the exertions of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel North). He trusted that under these circumstances the House would leave the question in the hands of the Crown.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN declined to withdraw the Motion. He accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere) and disclaimed any intention of infringing the Queen's Prerogative, his Motion being simply for a humble Address to Her Majesty.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Another Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "who shall not be members of the United Church of England and Ireland."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Main Question, as amended, put.

The House divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 83: Majority 44.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS BILL.

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stephen Cave, Mr. Selater-Booth.)

[BILL 82.] SELECT COMMITTEE NOMINATED.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved to nominate the Select Committee on the Electric Telegraphs Bill.

MR. AYRTON said, he regretted the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Leeman). There appeared to be no Member connected with the telegraph companies on the Committee, nor any one to watch over the public interest in regard to a free system of telegraphy. He should move some additional names to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he rose to move the Instructions of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on the Electric Telegraphs Bill to inquire,—

"1. Whether it is desirable that the transmission of messages for the public should become a legal monopoly in the Post Office:

"2. Whether it should be left to the discretion of the Postmaster General to make special agreements for the transmission of messages or news at reduced rates:

"3. What securities should be taken for insuring the secrecy of messages transmitted through the Post Office:

"4. What arrangements should be made for the working of submarine cables to foreign countries; and,

"5. To hear such Telegraph and Railway Companies and Proprietors as shall by petition, on or before the 26th instant, have prayed to be heard by themselves, their counsel or agents against such of the matters referred to the Committee as affect their particular interests?"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. BOUVERIE said, it was desirable that the functions of the Committee should not be so much narrowed; but that they should investigate whether the interests of the public would be subserved by the transfer of these telegraphs entirely to the public. That was a great question, and it was not one between the telegraph companies on the one hand, who did not wish to sell, and the Government on the other, who desired to acquire the telegraphs. A much larger question than that recognized by the Instructions had to be considered—whether it was expedient that this monopoly should be given to the Executive Government. It admitted of much being said on both sides; and although it was assumed by the Government that but one answer could be given, there were different opinions, both in that House and out of it, and a wish for further information. The presumption in this country was in favour of private enterprize, and was not in favour of any undertakings in the nature of a Government monopoly. The onus probandi, as in other analogous cases, was upon those who maintained that the Government ought to have possession of this great system; and he doubted whether the Instructions were such as to enable the truth to be brought out in the fullest manner before the Committee. There was a great difficulty in getting out the truth before a Committee, unless there were hostile interests at work in the Committee, whose business it was to exert themselves to bring out the truth by conflict. If, on the other hand, the Committee were to be left to fish out the truth for themselves, they would be unable to get it. ["Divide."] He did not propose to divide the House, but the matter was most important, and one in which the public interests were deeply concerned. He should move, instead of limiting the powers of the Committee, as was done by the last clause, to leave out the words "such of the matters referred to the Committee as affect their particular interests," and insert the words "the Preamble and Clauses of the Bill." The effect would be that the parties interested in opposing the transfer would have liberty to state their objections at large to the transfer, and to bring up all the objections that might be entertained on the part of the public, as well as of those particular interests.

Amendment proposed, in last paragraph,

To leave out the words "such of the matters referred to the Committee as affect their particular interests," in order to insert the words "the Preamble and Clauses of the Bill," — (Mr. Bouverie.)

—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the House would not assent to this Amendment. The first four paragraphs provided for information on the part of the public into those matters which it was thought should be inquired into. He consented on the second reading to move the 5th Instruction, which was less restrictive than it originally stood. The words of this Instruction were in the hands of the opponents of the Bill the whole even York (Mr. section of 1 with and re cerned. T by the re that he wa struction re opponents the interest protected, l all matters into the ge be sufficien paragraphs

Mr. Bouverie

Mr. CH the 5th In omitted we and were greatest ca were to ap into a publi counsel to a whole of tl come a mat one side an of the Sel capable of d without em them to ge latter shoul interests.

Mr. AY would have of the Bill his right be not be of a

THE CH QUER said the parties against the arguments interests.

Mr. GO what had f Member for Question to be left o put, and ag

Main Qu

MILITAR

(Mr. Serjeant

SECOND R

Order re bate on A [12th May] a second ti was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(The Earl of Mayo.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, as that was a Bill for the promotion of anarchy and bloodshed in Ireland, he begged to move that that debate be adjourned till the 10th of August.

THE EARL OF MAYO suggested that an arrangement should be made as to the time which should be fixed for discussing the measure if it was to be proceeded with.

MR. SYNAN, concurring with the remark of the noble Lord, moved that the debate should be adjourned till that day week.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he was quite of an opposite opinion to that of the hon. and gallant Member who said that was a Bill for the promotion of anarchy and bloodshed in Ireland. He thought that a change in the law on that subject was necessary, particularly as a General Election was approaching, and it was very desirable that they should have some convenient time fixed for the discussion of that measure. In his opinion the military had been too lightly used at elections in Ireland.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, this Bill was on the Paper but twice before; and on one occasion, upon the suggestion of the noble Lord, it was postponed. On the last occasion it came on at one o'clock; and if, the debate having been adjourned, it came on so late as this, it was not his fault.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he was surprised at the remark of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) that troops were never required at Irish elections; because, while the right hon. Gentleman was in Office the Government of which he had been a Member sent troops to every election in Ireland, even whether they were required or not.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE explained that he had not said that troops were never required, but that they ought not to be lightly used.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) would specify any occasion on which the troops had been lightly used, because that had certainly not been done since he (the Earl of Mayo) had the holding the Office of Chief Secretary. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman that night astonished him excessively, because the course taken with regard to the military at the last General Election was this—On one day there were about 10,000 men—policemen and military—employed in keeping the peace at the General Election in Ireland, and he believed that the last Government followed in that respect the example set by former Governments, and supplied those troops on the requisition of the magistrates for the preservation of the public peace.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE disclaimed any idea of making special reference to anything that had occurred since the noble Earl had held Office. He had only spoken generally of the system; and if his noble Friend thought this system perfect, all he could say was that he did not agree with him.

Debate adjourned further till Tuesday next.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES BILL—

[BILL 37.]

(Mr. Mac Evoy, Sir Joseph M'Kenna, Mr. Leader.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Second Reading [16th June] read.

MR. MAC EVOY said, that as the Government had refused to give him an opportunity for the discussion of this Bill, and as he saw no reasonable chance of bringing it on at a convenient time during the present Session, he felt bound to move that the Order for its second reading be discharged.

Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

NEW ZEALAND (LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ADDERLEY, Bill to make provision for the appointment of Members of the Legislative Council of New Zealand; and to remove doubts in respect of past appointments, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ADDERLEY and Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 185.]

PETIT JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.

Select Committee on Petit Juries (Ireland) Bill nominated as follows:—MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, SIR COLMAN O'LOUGHLIN, LORD CLAUD J. HAMILTON, THE O'CONOR DON, SIR FREDERICK giving a term of nine years. That was sufficient to prove that it was at least reasonable to doubt the wisdom of confining the period of education to six years. Now, he made a statement on a former occasion the greater portion of which consisted of statistics collected by the education societies of some of our largest towns, which he believed to be perfectly correct and reliable ; but the noble Lord's remark upon them was that "no sane man could give credence to the reports of those societies." The noble Lord appeared to have read the attack on the report of the Manchester Education Aid Society, but not the Report itself. It was true that it had been pointed out that while it appeared from the Report of the Society for 1866 that 59 per cent of the population of Manchester who ought to be at school were really there, no notice had been taken of the numbers of children who might have been or might hereafter be at school. This defect had been admitted, and a more exhaustive inquiry was accordingly made last year which avoided the errors of the preceding Report, and presented results on which perfect reliance might be placed. The noble Lord had represented the Committee as consisting of paid officers, anxious to make startling statements in order to obtain subscriptions ; but it really consisted of earnest and estimable friends of education well known and respected in their own district. Dr. John Watts, whose name nobody acquainted with the history of education could pronounce without respect, thus spoke of the inquiry—

"They (the Committee) came to the conclusion to take a definite district in Manchester ; to canvass that district thoroughly, so as to get at all the facts with regard to education, and to put them into a shape that would bear the closest investigation. That report, which referred to a population of 92,000, or about one-fourth of the population of the borough, he begged now to hand in. All the sheets were in his possession, and he could refer to every house throughout that 92,000 inhabitants, so that the Report would bear the strictest investigation. The canvassers (who were all ex-police inspectors or relieving officers, familiar with statistical inquiries) were simply instructed to study the headings of the sheets, and to see that all the questions were answered."

One of the two wards thus inquired into was St. Michael's, the population being 42,007, and the total number of children between three and fourteen years of age being 12,037. Now, of these 934 were or had been at school, 2,580 having attended less than a year, 2,409 less than two years, and only 370 having attended the six years which satisfied the noble Lord. In New Cross ward, the population being 50,510, and the number of children being 12,623, 9,549 were or had been at school, 2,623 of these having attended less than a year, 2,123 less than two years, and 480 six years. Of this population of 92,517 7,855 were children between three and six, of whom 51 per cent had never been to a day school ; 8,733 were between six and ten, 12 per cent of them never having been to such a school ; and 8,051 were between ten and fourteen, 8·3 per cent being in the same position. Thus, of 24,639 children between three and fourteen years of age, 76·6 per cent had been to school for a short period, and 8·3 per cent had reached fourteen years without seeing the inside of a day school. The saddest fact, however, was that, as the result of all educational efforts — Sunday schools, night schools, and literary institutes included — 24·8 per cent of the youthful population were unable to read, and 58·4 per cent unable to write. He quoted last year a statement based on the Report of some Factory Inspectors, and in reference to that statement The Times remarked that if such a state of things existed it was not only very shameful, but showed the necessity of great exertions ; but that its accuracy was open to doubt. Now, he would read the official Report on which that statement rested—

"Between the 1st of September and the 1st of December, 1866, 7,948 children and young persons, under sixteen years of age, were educationally tested viva voce by the certifying surgeons of nineteen principal cotton works in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Cheshire : and 2,178 children and young persons were equally tested in the earthenware, colliery, and iron districts of North Staffordshire. Of the 7,948, 63 per cent could read ; and of the 2,178, 26 per cent could read."

Thus in one case 37, and in the other 74 per cent were unable to read. In the large borough which he represented (Merthyr Tydvil) 814 children between 11 and 16 years of age were examined between the 1st of January and the 1st of March last, the examination being very rudimentary ; and the result was that 45 per cent could read and 36 per cent could write, while 30½ per cent could add three or four figures mentally, thus leaving 55 per cent who could not read, 64 per cent who could not write, and 69½ per cent who could not cipher. The noble Lord had obtained a Return showing the population, acreage, and rateable value of each parish, together with the accommodation provided by schools assisted by the State, and the average attendance. None of the columns, however, were cast up, and he was at a loss to understand the object of the Return consisting of a mass of unadded columns and undigested figures. He had himself obtained another Return which gave the not result of the noble Lord's Return, and to those results he would beg the attention of the House. The figures were favourable to our national system, the population of 1861 being given, while the school attendance was that for 1867. The population of England and Wales was 21,000,000, and the average attendance in schools aided by the State was 941,000, or 1 in 22 of the population. In Prussia, he might remark, it was one in 6½. To show the inequality of different parts of the kingdom, he might mention that in Wiltshire the average attendance was 1 in 16, while in Cornwall it was 1 in 34. In Middlesex it was 1 in 27, and in the metropolis 1 in 24. In Newcastle-on-Tyne it was 1 in 24, in Birmingham 1 in 23, in Sheffield 1 in 26, in Devonport 1 in 32. These large towns were the most unfavourable instances, while in Manchester the proportion was 1 in 17½, in Bradford 1 in 15, and in Salford 1 in 14. Thus, in Salford, the attendance was 1 in 14, and in Devonport 1 in 32. It was evident from these figures that at present education was made to depend, not on the needs of the population, but upon the amount of voluntary spirit that might exist in a locality. Few would contend that the education of the country ought to rest on such a basis. The defect of the present system was that there were no means of compelling any district to perform its duty. His Bill was framed with a desire to interfere as little as possible with what had been done—not to interfere at all where the district was doing its duty; but where the contrary was the case, it armed the State, after due inquiry had been made, with the power of compelling the district to perform its duties. With regard to the religious difficulty, and leaving the Roman Catholics out of the question, it might be considered that, as far as Protestant denominations were concerned, the matter was one in which the people themselves took little interest. What they wanted was good education, and they turned a deaf ear to the theological difficulties with which certain persons delighted to encumber the discussion of a tion of a r ties were selves but many of importance school tha dren. His for Calne

tained the tional edu
It was the majority o should rec education. fore, a ge education
it to the religious c be. The of 1859 l indifference national c parted so Report of conducted sion contain

"We do real doubt would decide be religious boys are so stipulate the other place
the least wis
the vast ma subject of re the Bible, e evidence is c tions from our minds th desire that gious truths they learn of

He should system of schools al parents the racter of t ligious inst
the policy new school
The next pockets of that the r impossible denied that would be Every pou would retu
by the dim and the im educated p

Mr. Bruce

world where national education flourished, local provision was made for it. This was the case in Germany, Switzerland, France, and the United States. In Scotland there was a general desire that the school rate should be extended to those districts in which it was not now leviable. In Canada an educational rating system had been voluntarily adopted. He was, however, prepared to continue, in addition to a local rate, the present aid from the State, enlarged if necessary. The expense of education per head in large schools in towns was very slight. A most experienced London clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Fowle, of Hoxton, had informed him that he maintained a most efficient school of 500 children at 22s. a head per annum; 17s. of which was supplied by Government aid and the children's pence, and only 5s. from private benevolence. In the country districts it would be a little more; but in the poorer parts of the country he saw no reason why special and larger assistance might not be given by the State. In conclusion, he hoped that this important subject would be taken up early in the next Session of Parliament, and that the Government would not shrink from proposing a sound and effective system of national education. It was not his intention to proceed with the Bill this Session, and he accordingly begged to move that the Order be discharged.

MR. DIXON said, he very much regretted that it had been necessary to withdraw the Bill, which was of a much more complete character than the measure of the Government. The great importance of the subject was being more and more recognized by those in whom the wisdom of Parliament had decided that the greatest portion of political power should be vested. The working classes were beginning to consider in what manner they should use that power in regard to education as the very first question. There was no doubt that the principle of local rating for educational purposes would receive their most cordial support. There was some diversity of opinion about the value of statistics on this subject; for there might be a large number of children at school in a given locality, while the education received might be of a very defective character. Following the example of Manchester, the people of Birmingham had instituted a searching investigation into the education enjoyed by nearly 1,000 young persons between the ages of thirteen and twenty-one who were employed by the manufacturers of that town. The results of the investigation, which was conducted by Mr. Long, under the direction of the Rev. Canon Gover, Principal of the Training College at Saltley, were startling. It was found that of these young persons, who fairly represented the average of the working classes of that town, only 56 per cent could read, only 46 per cent could write, and only 20 per cent could be described as being in possession of any amount of general information. Great pains were taken to employ impartial agents to conduct this inquiry, and the results might be relied upon. This investigation had been carried on at the instigation of the Birmingham Education Society, a society formed for the promotion of education where the instruction of the children had been neglected on account of the poverty of the parents, and 5,000 children were now being educated at Birmingham out of the funds of the society. The work was, however, so great that, although meeting after meeting had been held, it was doubtful whether the association could continue to provide the means for educating these children. The statistics of the Manchester and Birmingham Societies had proved most conclusively the lamentable state of ignorance which prevailed at present, and he deeply regretted that the Vice President of the Council—the very man who of all others should be well-informed on the subject, and whose opinion naturally was of great weight in the country—should have been so rash as to impugn them. It appeared that the noble Lord had never read the Report of the Birmingham Society. Although the noble Lord seemed to wish it to be inferred that his remarks had no reference to that Society, yet it was impossible for any impartial reader of what the noble Lord said to come to any other conclusion than that he was referring to the Society in question. The Education Society of Birmingham comprised most of the educationists of the town, headed by leading clergymen and Dissenting ministers, and supported by many of the principal inhabitants. The statistics collected by them were entitled to quite as much confidence as those of the noble Lord himself. Instead of speaking as he had done, the noble Lord ought rather to have expressed his great respect not only for the Birmingham Education Society, but also for the Manchester Aid Society, and to have admitted that the results of their labours were entitled to weight in this House. The blow which he had dealt at these Societies was not deserved, because they were offsprings of that voluntary system, which was advocated by the noble Lord. But it was well known that that system had failed in the large towns. It was because towns like Manchester and Birmingham had tried so earnestly and with such partial success to supply their educational deficiencies that men who were not originally in favour of rating or compulsory education were being driven to the conclusion that in these districts voluntarism was inadequate to the great and growing task, and must be supplemented by the rates of the town and assisted by Government aid. When a local rate was established it would be necessary to pass a measure of compulsory attendance, so that there should be no residuum left; for it would be unfair to ask the town to rate itself unless there were also given the power to make that rate effective by providing that all the children should go to school. He believed that in Birmingham and other large towns a great deal would be heard about education at the coming election, and he trusted that Parliament would not be satisfied to allow sectarian jealousies and religious bigotries to stand, as they had stood too long, in the way of the education of the children of this country.

Mr. GREENE said, he was quite as much in favour of popular education as hon. Gentlemen opposite. He certainly heard with surprise that the districts which returned leading Members to Parliament were in such a state of utter darkness with respect to elementary education. He believed that the Government Bill was in the main founded on a right principle, and that it would be necessary to have a different system for the manufacturing districts to that which they had for the agricultural districts. In the country districts, where education was attended to by the proprietors of the soil and by the clergy, it might require some supplementary aid, but it would not require to be compulsory. He held in his hands a statement referring to nine parishes in his part of the country, containing a population of 4,947, and it appeared that of the children over ten and under fifteen there were not twenty who could not read and write. There was great misrepresentation abroad as to the state of the agricultural districts; and hon. Members opposite no doubt believed that every other dark and the hon. Dixon) he I hope no facturers people as the count regard to that the religion w day for E sented, w children o the poor, principle already su ment. In cultural d lected, he rity of the were requ come from hoped the that astor he did not than from would be s It did not was suitat the dark a would be try. He things de facturing who had working that either sory educ districts, v their duty

Mr. S heard any darkness he could n test of tl addressed sion was children it not propos system of He was (Mr. Br cause it enough. enough. ditions on first, that to make a ing power children at the schools; and next, that no child below a certain age—say ten or eleven—should be allowed to go to work in any factory unless it could produce proof of its having received some amount of elementary instruction.

Mr. Dixon

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he believed the hon. Member for Bury (Mr. Greene) would find that the educational condition of the agricultural districts generally, was very different from that which appeared to prevail in his own neighbourhood. It was a very general impression that the efforts on behalf of education which were made in the agricultural districts came rather from the clergymen than the owners of the soil; and as it was well known that the resources of the clergy were somewhat crippled, their efforts must be proportionately small. He believed, at the same time, that there were no towns in the country more destitute of educational means than the large towns of Lancashire; and that a larger proportion of their people were either imperfectly educated or not educated at all than in other large towns in England. He was sorry to say this; but all that he cared for in this matter was the truth. The explanation was not difficult. The manufacturing towns of Lancashire were of very rapid growth, and they contained a vast proportion of people depending on weekly wages, and education had not kept pace with the increase of their population. If there was this educational destitution, it might naturally have been expected that there would be efforts to remove it. There had been such efforts, and for the last twenty years educational societies of great influence had existed in Manchester; each with its plan, every one doing the best it could to enlighten public opinion on this question, and engage the attention of the Legislature. Six months ago an Educational Conference of a very influential kind was held in Manchester, at which many Members of Parliament, many ministers of religion, and gentlemen from all parts of the country were present. The opinion not only of that Conference, but of the whole of the great constituency of Manchester, so far as he could ascertain it, was in favour of the Bill of the right hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Bruce). It was desired that each locality should possess the power of rating itself; and this, he understood, was the principal feature of the Bill. No doubt most communities throughout the country felt themselves heavily enough rated already; but there was a general belief in Lancashire that they would effect great good if they rated themselves for educational purposes, and that they would be recouped, because there would be lighter prison charges, and the general property of the country would be made more valuable, in consequence of the diminution of the poor rates. If there was a sacrifice to be made, the people were ready to make that sacrifice. The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council had spoken disparagingly of societies which he said obtained subscriptions from silly women. There were, no doubt, in this as in most countries silly persons; but if their silliness exhibited itself in the form of contributing towards the promotion of popular education he hoped the number of such people would increase. He was surprised that the noble Lord should attempt to discourage societies of this kind. Scarcely a great measure had been passed by that House—Free Trade, household suffrage, the removal of the newspaper stamp duties—which had not been helped forward by the assistance of voluntary societies. He hoped they would continue and increase, and he was sure that not only the noble Lord but future Vice Presidents of the Committee of Council would encourage their proceedings and acknowledge their usefulness.

MAJOR PARKER said, he would not have risen on that occasion had not the right hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Bruce) thought fit to lecture the farmers of England for their presumed neglect of duty in the matter of education, and for showing an unwillingness to accept the principle of a compulsory education rate. The farmers of England were quite prepared to bear, with every other portion of the community, their fair share of any burdens which the Legislature in its wisdom might impose upon them; and they would certainly never be found backward in supporting any movement that would be really beneficial to the poorer classes. But they would expect that, in respect to general taxation, the scales would be held evenly between the different interests of the country. It ought not to be forgotten that at that period, when the farmers were supposed to be best able to contribute to any educational funds—harvest time—70 per cent was levied on one of the most important productions of the soil.

MR. HUBBARD said, he hailed with the greatest satisfaction the declaration made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Bruce), that in the opinion of the parents of England the great object was to give their children a religious education. He entirely concurred in that opinion; and if that point were kept steadily in view the House would not be likely to run astray into the legislation which that Bill proposed. The right hon. Gentleman had explained the deficiency in the educational means that existed in this country, or, as he would rather say, the deficiency in the education accepted—because it was one thing to take a horse to the water and another to make him drink. They had been favoured with many figures and comparisons on that matter; but he believed they were not yet in possession of those statistics which would enable them correctly to estimate the educational power of this country. The inquiries instituted, not only by the Government but by the National Society, promised to remove the deficiency, and in another Session they might hope to possess this information. He was, however, willing to take it for granted that they did require greater educational means. Still the right hon. Gentleman might, he thought, be a little merciful to this country for producing no more satisfactory Returns than it did. Why, he asked, had the schools throughout England and Wales, conducted on the voluntary system, with subsidies from the Government, not made a greater progress? The introduction of the Conscience Clause had proved a sensible means of diminishing the grants given by the State for the assistance of these schools. That unfortunate invention required what was repugnant to the feelings of school founders, and the grants had in consequence fallen from £144,000 to £18,000. He could not admit that the voluntary system had had a fair trial; and what were they to substitute for that system? The right hon. Gentleman said his Bill would not supersede the existing means of education, but would supplement them by a rate. Now, a Bill for the abolition of compulsory church rates, with the principle of which he entirely agreed, would shortly become law. Why were compulsory church rates to be abolished? Because neither the mode of applying them nor the matter to which they were applied was one of universal agreement. [Mr. BRUCE: Universal interest.] Universal interest and universal agreement came to much the same thing. It was impossible that henceforth they could objects—o nation ag in the m in regard (no such ge still conten labouring them rather number, a educating what educ in which it great body tion was tē tal beings, while other a mere c knowledge that secon he maintai in this co man wishes for purely once revol not say he that educu secular fee ligion, mu subject chi control mu and he con fied in assis ducted onl the volunt mainly to hitherto be they tramp destroy the effort, and religious e overspread rating syst necessity c their child might be c it would be lute perso Could they ten children boy shall g 2d. a wee man migh farmer's te pays my r school." V and starve not do so? under a co be made o should be very glad indeed ; but he feared a limit must be put on the principle of compulsory attendance. In his opinion, the proper housing of the agricultural poor was far more important to their moral and material welfare than reading, writing, and ciphering. These without moral training might prove mischievous. In numberless small lollypop shops halfpenny papers were sold in tens of thousands to our juvenile population, in which horrors were portrayed by pictures and described in language calculated not only to destroy the happiness of those who read them, but to incite them to every kind of vice and dishonesty. No wise legislator, therefore, ought to be satisfied with encouraging mere secular instruction unaccompanied by religious teaching among the labouring classes. He did not think they would ever have an education rate ; but he would not grudge the money if the Education Department cost them twice as much as it did. They spent infinitely more upon gaols, reformatories, and police, and for the repression of vice, than upon the education which ought to keep their youthful population from becoming vicious. It was to be regretted that a spirit of ill-judged economy should have been introduced into the Education Department. He trusted that the Government would adopt a liberal policy ; that they would increase their grants ; that they would give that which was even more precious than grants—namely, a sympathizing welcome to those who endeavoured to promote the work of education ; and that, under their fostering influence, the present system of voluntary education might be found taking deeper root, and spreading its branches wider than it had hitherto done throughout the country.

Mr. Hubbard

MR. FAWCETT said, he wished to point out certain shortcomings in the Bill before them. Compulsory attendance and compulsory rates must be inseparably associated ; because, without the former, the latter would not be accepted by the country, nor would the educational deficiencies of the country be really supplied. He thought that no one could deny that there was a great educational deficiency in this country ; for, comparing the population of both nations, there was not one-third of the number of children at school in England that there were in Prussia. Prussia was not now over-educated, and it could not be doubted that if England was equal to that country in education, her people would be happier, better, and wealthier. That in some of our wealthiest districts not more than half the labouring population had even the first rudiments of education was not due to an inadequate supply of schools, so much as to the fact that they had no power to enforce the attendance of the children. In Wiltshire one out of every sixteen of the population was at school ; but in no district of England was the state of education more lamentable and deficient, and that, although there was a school in almost every village in the county, and although the clergy there showed the most extraordinary zeal in the cause of education. Speaking from his own experience of one village in particular, he could state that the boys of the labouring class left school to go into the fields when eight years old, and there was hardly a lad of that class who could read well enough to take an interest in an English newspaper. By combining compulsory rates with compulsory attendance they would be able to convince the people that the rate was only a temporary infliction, which would be removed by the diminution of the general rates, and by increased prosperity resulting from education. It might be said that the whole instinct of the nation was against compulsion in matters of education ; but it should not be forgotten that we had already adopted that principle in the case of almost every industry except the agricultural, and if his right hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Bruce) were to extend the scope of his Bill so as to make the attendance of children at school compulsory, he believed he would be supported by the great majority of the people throughout the country. When a parent neglected to give his child an education he was neglecting his first duty, and in such a case it was the duty of the State to become the child's protector.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that as he had understood that the Bill was to be withdrawn, he had come down to the House without any expectation that he would be called upon to address it. Nor would he now trespass on the time of the House, had not the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr Tydvil thought proper to attack with some acrimony a speech which he had made about three weeks ago. At that time the debate lasted many hours, and the right hon. Gentleman took part in it. Yet instead of impugning his position at that time, he took three months' consideration before he thought fit to do so. And to what did this long pre-meditated attack amount? Did he attempt to show that a single position or a single figure was erroneous? Did he dispute the basis on which he had proceeded, or the conclusion at which he had arrived? By no means. The right hon. Gentleman in carping at the estimates of educational destitution which he had then laid before the House had commented merely upon the circumstance that they had not been furnished by Mr. Lingen. This was no argument against the estimates. It was only a question of authority. He could assure him he had received them from persons on whose authority he could place at least equal reliance. Those estimates spoke for themselves. He had fully stated the ground on which he had proceeded, and showed the means by which he had arrived at the results. The right hon. Gentleman had had ample time to consider them, for they had been fully published in the Times newspaper; yet he had failed to pick a flaw in them or to detect a single fallacy. He had taken the number of children in England and Wales of school age—that was to say, between 3 and 15 years old—as amounting in 1868 to 6,849,128; the number between 3 and 12 in 1861 was 4,250,294; the number according to the Prussian standard of school age—that was to say, between 6 and 14—would be 3,562,730; and the number according to the French standard of 6 years—namely, between 7 and 13, would be only 2,667,737. But then the right hon. Gentleman had found fault with him because he had fixed the average length of the period during which a child might be expected to attend school in this country at six years. That was a point, however, which he must settle with the Commissioners, from whose Report it would be found that that was the average time for which the attendance of a child at school was to be expected, and the duration of schooling for the labouring class with which everyone ought to be satisfied. It had been said that he had spoken disparagingly of the Manchester Aid Society. It was true that he did not place much reliance upon the statistics they had given, nor did he believe the case they had got up. They, in the first place, had, in their Estimate, supposed that the children of the labouring classes should all enter school at three years old and remain at school nine years, and that anything short of this was educational destitution. Cognizant of this, they must know that the labouring class would not enter school until they were three years old. As matters stood, they seldom entered school at three years old. They never entered school until they were four years old, therefore the statistics which they gave from the Manchester Aid Society were not correct. The duration of the children's schooling was only half years. Their calculation was to which he had not alluded, moreover he had not alluded to some of the facts for example, Harpurhey, where the number of souls was 2,000—such, for example, as Chorlton, where the number was 1,000—credited with 1,000. St. Stephen's school at 1,000. In the collection of remarks which he made on the subject, with that exception, those documents had, more or less, been taken from the Member for Manchester, who said twenty years ago that educational reform had formed the basis of his remarks. The Birmingham which he alluded to, if he had alluded to the Times he would have said what he had said, nevertheless, so far as the action of the Manchester Aid Society had been stated, it was Manchester (Manchester) with one. The fact that the children of the labouring class were not all out of the school at three years old, and that anything short of this was educa-

Lord Robert Montagu

keep the society going and to obtain large subscriptions. The hon. Gentleman had compared those societies to that by which the agitation in favour of Free Trade had been conducted, and to the association by which the reform in the representation of the people had been forced upon the House and the country. If such was their character they must be regarded in the light of political bodies. They were, according to that view, no longer societies, formed with the single object of promoting education; but bodies who had been constituted in order to force some preconceived theory of education upon the House and the nation, and whose weapon was to be a wide-spread and irritating agitation. He, however, did not feel disposed to look upon them in that light; but he preferred to regard them in the light of societies established with the bond fide object of promoting education throughout the country. All he contended for was that their statistics were fallacious, and tended to make out a sad case of educational destitution, in order to found on it an effective appeal for subscriptions. He had received, since he last addressed the House on the subject, the Report of the Birmingham Society, accompanied by a letter, couched in terms which were not very courteous. His remarks on the previous occasion had had no special reference to the Birmingham Society, of which he was then ignorant; but he would, he thought, now be able to show the House that their figures were in more than one instance fallacious. There were, they said, "1,027 streets in the borough," and before going further he must observe that in order to compare fairly the figures of the Birmingham Society with those furnished by the Commissioners of Popular Education—they must be framed on the same basis. Hence it must be borne in mind that the latter took into account not only the children of the poor, but those of the middle and higher classes also, and then came to the conclusion that six years is the standard average of attendance, or that one in 7·7 of the population should be at school at the same time, in order that every one might receive some education. The Birmingham Society employed eight young men to make a house-to-house visitation, and those men visited only 754 out of the 1,027 streets, omitting to visit 273 because they happened to be streets which the middle and upper classes inhabited. How, he would ask, were statistics thus compiled to be compared with those supplied by the Commissioners, who, in arriving at a conclusion as to the proportion of the population which should be at school, counted rich and poor together, while the Birmingham Society excluded the upper and middle classes? The children of those classes raise the average of attendance very much; for the parents compel them to attend school daily, and keep them at school until much later in life. The Society also omitted the workhouse schools, which raised the average still more, for there every child was at school daily. This therefore was one fallacious basis of their Report. Again, it appeared that the visitors of the Society visited 15,847 families, of which 10,227 were in the receipt of an income on the average of 20s. 9½d.; 2,811 in receipt of an income of which the amount was not known; 1,587 being widows and deserted women, and 1,222 the number out of work. And now for the harrowing tale of educational destitution which was made up. The Report of the Society stated that of 300 families taken indiscriminately from the visitors' books containing 1,842 persons, the average earnings were 1s. 6½d. per head per week. Of 300 other families, "also taken indiscriminately from the visitors' books," eighty belonged to widows and deserted women, the earnings of each person being 16½d. per week; while of 300 additional families "taken at hazard" from those books each person earned 2s. 3½d. per week, and in each case they make a piteous statement as to the number of children who do not go to school. It was quite clear, he thought, that those 900 families must have been "taken at hazard" from the very lowest and poorest portion of the population. Those figures, therefore, proved nothing beyond that which was already known. Everyone was aware that the children of a family bordering on starvation, were made to work, in order to keep the family from sinking in ruin. Everyone knew that the children of the poorest parents cannot in the nature of things be diligent in attendance at school unless the parents receive nutriment gratuitously. There were other fallacies, or at least anomalies, which became apparent if the boys and girls in the tables which they had given were added together and accounted as children, without reference to sex. It must be borne in mind that the number of children between the ages of three to four exceed those between four and five, and so on. This is so, because children die off at various ages. Yet, what do we find in the tables of the Birmingham Society; they give the numbers of children between three and four as 3,868. Those between four and five are given as 4,066 in number; those between five and six as 4,354. The numbers then decrease down to the number 3,807 of children between nine and ten years old; they continue to decrease to 3,046 the number of children between twelve and thirteen; and then the numbers increase again. This is at least remarkable, even anomalous. The Report then states that 1,136 children between the ages of three and four were at school. And yet the average attendance of all the children in Birmingham between the ages of three and four is given as nil. Such a result could be arrived at only by omitting from the calculation all the fractions of years. For instance if a child attended school for only nine or even eleven months in the year, he would be counted as not having attended at all. If this be so, we should increase the estimate of average attendance by perhaps 40 or 50 per cent. He need not say that the average attendance was arrived at by dividing the "time in years at school," by "the total number of children." He found similarly that taking all the children in Birmingham, between the ages of eleven and twelve, they all attended school on an average of nearly four years. But the average attendance of all the children who have been at school, was nearly five years for the children between 11 and 12; $4\frac{1}{2}$ years for the children between 12 and 13; and 1.23 years for the children between 4 and 5, and the same length of time for the children between 5 and 6. It was quite clear, therefore, in his opinion, that those figures were fallacious. But, taking them even as they stood, not a very bad case was incidentally made out for Birmingham; for he found at page 22 of the Report that nearly three-fourths of all the children of that town had been at school, and that on the average all those above the age of 12 had attended $3\frac{1}{2}$ years. The Society professes to include all private schools, and even dame schools in their return, and enumerate only 92 schools with an average attendance of 18,531. Yet there are in Birmingham 66 aided Parliamentary schools, with an average attendance of 13,790. He must moreover remark that if the school ages are supposed to lie between 3 and 15 years old, and if six years' schooling is the average which is to up a harrow half the children school and though all o schooling. spect to the briefly advertised," to opposite ha House. The right hon. a fallacy w Return. spoken of a titute of eclesiastics sult the lar merated am in fact only tain in Cus worth, Belv Inn at Bree Castle, Bl Durham C dukes' pale rated, and t at as pari schools. T parishes we than 20 in than 100 in lacy also a For Liverpo aided school aided "pari are similar Thus, of a parishes no Thirdly, a accounted a Law distric rishes." S parish, with in the Retur side of the 13 destitut Passing fro right hon. if he point be some im he might sidering wh to remove t similar mea hon. Gentles districts all he proposed a school dist posed to tak

Lord Robert Montagu

did not, however, altogether abide by that arrangement, because he also proposed to constitute special districts. In rural unions alone, and not in towns, one-twentieth of the inhabitants in number or in rateable value might apply to the Privy Council to have a parish cut out of a union for the purposes of this measure. That was to say that a certain number of persons who were not even rated to the poor, or even one person, if he owned one-twentieth of the property in the union, might get his parish exempted. It puzzled him for some time to discover the reason for this provision. It seemed to him that it was to evade opposition to the Bill. If three quarters of a union were well supplied with schools, they would object to come under the Act and pay for erecting schools in the destitute quarter. Hence the destitute quarter was to be exempted, and the Act was to apply only where it was not required. Then, as to the adoption of the Act, it was proposed that they should be adopted at a meeting at which certain persons were to vote. In a county, any occupier having any holding whatsoever might vote, if he were rated to the poor, whether he was a householder or not. In towns, only owners or burgesses might vote. The right hon. Gentleman did not proceed upon the principle that a man entitled to vote for a Member of Parliament might be considered sufficiently competent to vote under his Bill. For in towns he refused to let nearly all the Parliamentary electors vote for the adoption of the Act, while in counties a great number to whom Parliament refused to entrust a vote concerning legislative matters, were allowed by the right hon. Gentleman to vote for the adoption of the Act. In each case a bare majority in numbers was to be sufficient to decide the question. Again, with respect to the election of the School Committee; in towns it was to be elected by the Town Council or by a system of double representation; for a Town Council was elected by those who were rated at more than £6, and then this Town Council was to elect the School Committee. And why, he would ask, was a different plan to be adopted in counties, in which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to have only a single representation by a bare majority of every person who was on the rate book? Then as to the compulsory adoption of the Act, one-twentieth in number or rateable value of the inhabitants of a district might apply to the Privy Council to make the Act compulsory; but there was nothing in the Bill to prevent twenty paupers, or to prevent one man of property from making an application to have the Bill forced upon the population of a whole union. Last year the right hon. Gentleman had introduced a Bill for the education of the poor, but the present was not a Bill of that character. Every expression which limited the Bill to the education of the poor had been studiously omitted from the Bill of this year. It was a measure providing simply for elementary education in England and Wales, and it might be taken advantage of by the middle classes. [Mr. BRUCE: Hear, hear!] That being the declared object of the right hon. Gentleman, he must say he differed from him as to the wisdom of the course which he was pursuing. What the right hon. Gentleman sought to accomplish was to impose on one description of property—namely, real property—the expense of educating the various strata of society, leaving a vast amount of other property throughout the country altogether unburdened. The right hon. Gentleman, moreover did not make a fair division of the burden as between the landlord and the occupier. According to Clause 73, if the rent of certain premises were £200 a year, the rateable value being £160, and the rate being £8, or 5 per cent, the landlord would have to pay £5 and the occupier £3; but this fair division would not last. For every occupier would take the rate into account in agreeing upon the rent of his holding, so that the whole expense would eventually come off the landlord. This was unfair. Again—Let him take the case of a millowner whose mill was worth £1,000 and was rated at £800. Such a man might be making £10,000 a year, and might like to build schools for the education of the children of those in his employment. He would go to the School Committee for his district with the view to carry out that object, and the result might be that every householder and landowner would have to pay for those schools, while his £10,000 a year remained untouched, with the exception of the rate on the £800. It would also happen that those districts in which education was most required were those which were least able to raise a rate for the purpose. Taking the parish of St. George's-in-the-East, for instance, he found that the population amounted to 49,000; the number requiring school accommodation to 8,166. The minimum yearly charge for that number under the Bill would be £8,166, besides £2,041 for grants on passes, taking the grants at 5s. instead of 8s. a year, making a total of £10,207 a year. Now, the gross estimated rental for 1865 was £221,000, so that, taking the minimum educational rate it would amount to 5 per cent, or 1s. in the pound; and the poor rate now was as high as 2s. 2d., so that there would be a total of 3s. 2d. in the pound, irrespective of the cost of inspectors and other officers. In Devonport the rate would be 1s. 10d., in Plymouth 1s. 5½d., in Leeds 1s. 1d., in Oldham the same. The education rate for the whole of England would be £4,000,000 a year, which at 3 per cent would represent £134,000,000 taken off real property. And what good, he would ask, was it proposed to effect by the Bill? The right hon. Gentleman did not even require that there should be a certificated master appointed under its operation. This was evident from Clause 40. It was a matter which he left to be decided entirely in accordance with the ignorance or the prejudices of the ratepayers, and it had been shown by experience that the Boards of Guardians always appoint the cheapest masters they could get. Moreover, the right hon. Gentleman did not require that there should be an examination in reading, writing, and arithmetic, but only in one or more of those branches of education. This would be seen by a reference to Clause 60. Hence the Bill would not even provide that a good education should be given, while creating a large expenditure, all of which was to be borne by real property.

MR. E. POTTER said, he would be glad to give his support to the Bill of his right hon. Friend; but he was quite satisfied that the ratepayers in the larger towns of this country would not submit to an educational rate, unless Parliament compelled the attendance at school of those for whom the rate was most specially needed. There existed an appalling amount of ignorance, which could only be removed by a compulsory system of education for the labouring classes. Such a system would enable them in manufacturing towns to get rid of the half-time system, which was, in his opinion, most ineffective, and which he had heard described as a perfect sham. Compulsory education probably meant secular education; but if this were given, religious education would surely be brought in to supplement it. He hoped his right hon. Friend would consider the various points to which his attention had been directed, and introduce next year a bolder and more extensive measure than the one under discussion.

Lord Robert Montagu

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that a fact which proved more clearly than the number of attendances at school that education in this country was not in a desirable state was, the number of persons signing the marriage register with a mark. Twenty years ago the males so signing were in the proportion of 32 per cent, the progress since made had only reduced that proportion to 21 per cent; so that one-fifth of the population were unable to write their names. Within the last twenty years great attention had been directed to what was called technical education; the reason why mechanics' institutes had entirely failed to give that species of education was because the young men attending them, instead of being qualified to learn science, had to learn to read and to write and to acquire the rudiments of education. The present condition of the country being thus unsatisfactory the question arose, what was to be done. For his part he did not think that they could attain the end in view by an extension of the present system. They must, he thought, look to a system of local management and local taxation. The difficulty was that in many places where education was wanted, the rates were so high that it was almost hopeless to look forward to the imposition of an additional rate; but, as it was to the advantage of the employer and labour that the employed should be educated, he would suggest that the Government should defray one-half of the cost of education and that the other half should be defrayed by the ordinary ratepayers. It seemed to him that the religious difficulties were very fairly and fully met by the present measure, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would take the first opportunity of again introducing his Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, he would not wish to bring the House with any opinion of his own as to the extent to which education was more or less wanted; but he thought that the constant increase of education from year to year showed plainly that there was a field yet to be occupied. The question was in what manner was the desired extension of education most likely to be accomplished. For many years there had had the voluntary system, aided by limited degree by the State, and he was one of those who believed that the present system could not co-exist with the rating system. He had a very strong opinion that if they introduced the rating system they would for a time paralyze and check education, for, while the voluntary system would fall off, the rating system would not for some time be able to supply its place. In country districts, where the population was scattered, they would have district schools at such a distance from the dwellings of the children that they would not attend. If a more liberal use had been made of the means at the disposal of the Government; and if, instead of resorting to vexatious restrictions to prevent people from coming for aid, the hand of assistance had been more freely held out, the increase of education would have been greater at the present time than it actually was. He hoped to see the present system not destroyed, but fostered, being of opinion that any rating system would knock it up many years before supplying its place.

MR. AKROYD said, he was satisfied that the present system to which the country was now accustomed, if carried out and supplemented, would give all that was required in the way of national education. He was indeed surprised that the existing system had done so much, considering how it was administered. The factory education system was about to be extended in all directions, and when that was done there would be a good education provided for all the labouring classes of the country. He should object to any proposal to educate the children of the well-to-do labourers and working men out of the rates, and he believed that these classes themselves would scorn being assisted by any such means in educating their children. He believed that a compulsory system would be totally inoperative. With respect to one class, however, he would not object to the application of compulsory provisions. There was in all large towns a population of children who were left to wander the streets uncared for. He thought that this class of children should be compelled to go to school; that they should be educated at the expense of funds supplied by rates, and that the money should be administered under local authority. There was only one other class whose education should come upon the rates, and that was the class composed of the children of out-door paupers. The children of in-door paupers were now educated at the cost of the parish; but the children of out-door paupers were not at present sent to the workhouse to be educated. The Guardians had power to send them but the permissive Act was really inoperative. He believed that when the things to which he had referred were done the rating system would have been carried as far as it need be.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had stated that the effect of the Bill would be to break up the present system. Now, the promoters of the measure believed that it would have a totally opposite effect. They knew that in our large towns especially, and to some extent in country districts, the present machinery of education did not keep pace with the demands upon it, and that it was beyond voluntary effort to provide for the education of the large populations which were growing up. The supporters of the Bill were, however, aware that these efforts had effected the greatest possible good, and they desired to supply the want which existed without interfering with the benefit which was at present accomplished by the voluntary system. They considered that this Bill would accomplish several good objects and would do no injury to any class of the community. He did not think his noble Friend (Lord Robert Montagu) had read or studied the Bill, or was aware of the great public meetings which had been held in support of it. The conditions of the Bill could scarcely be objected to. One condition was, that inasmuch as those schools would be supported by the public money—all the children in the country should have free access to them. Another condition was what was called the Conscience Clause—that was a clause which not only respected the conscientious feelings of the parents and guardians, but also those of the managers and schoolmasters. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Bruce) was right in not attempting to push the present measure any further this Session; but if there was one thing more likely than another to follow from a Reformed Parliament, in which the best of the working classes would have great influence, it would be the adoption of some national means to meet the great evil of want of education. An enormous population could not be allowed to grow up and be left to the chance action of voluntary aid. If the principle were acknowledged that the children of the poorer classes should be taught, then in no more considerate manner could that principle be carried out than by the present Bill. As its promoters were quite aware that it would be a great disadvantage even to put in force a better system at the cost of staying the action of the present system, they did not look forward to spreading over the country at once a system of rating. It was proposed that every borough should have an opportunity of rating itself and performing its part of this great national duty; but when, after careful inquiry, it appeared from the report of a responsible Government Officer, that there was educational destitution in any district—that the children were untaught—that the parents were unable or unwilling to provide them with education—that the neighbours were apathetic, and that voluntary efforts were not sufficient—it was proposed that then a rate for education should be compulsorily made. The more attention was attracted to this subject the more surely would there be a national system of education, and the disgrace would cease to attach to this country of being almost the only civilized nation which did not acknowledge it to be the duty of the State to provide for the elementary education of the people.

Mr. RAMSAY said, that the question of compulsory education had been much under consideration in Scotland, and the Reports laid before Parliament threw great light on the subject. In 1859 the Scotch Commissioners of Education sent a gentleman to make inquiries respecting the Prussian system, and it did not appear from his Report that he was at all of opinion that compulsory education at school was secured by legal enactment. He rather came to the conclusion that the efficient attendance at school was the result of the sentiment of the people. With regard to America, Mr. Fraser said that the law to secure compulsory attendance had been totally inoperative. There could be no doubt that in this country also any law of that kind would be inoperative, because the people were not accustomed to such interference on the part of the State with the duties of parents.

COLONEL SYKES said, he believed that in this country compulsory attendance would be supported by the hearty good-will of the parents. Much good would result from compelling the children who might be seen thronging many streets, utterly abandoned by their parents, to go to school. He regretted that it should have been necessary to withdraw the Bill.

Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

Mr. W. E. Forster

SEA FIS
(Mr. Blake, H)

[BILL

Order for
Mr. BLA

now read th to give a sh past condit might see passing the was so note of fish free Danes were tempt the c account, an that commo possession.

England de licences to seas. The for leave to 1556 Philip for the rig Ireland, and services to 100 vessels Scotch and the Irish co
The wants and large c long as they men prosec triously. E Morgan, in eries, the
the idea tha
to be made.

Against no merciless ef against the the Comm petitions fr
the injuries of the Irish they might pears to be Pendergast fishermen a almost exte law." No men were s to Barbadoe ordinances fishermen to craft while The same m ally in more the Nymph

South Coast, promoted by the Marine Society of London, was defeated, because the fishermen of Harwich, Gravesend, and Faversham represented that they might be injured by it. Again, in 1836, when Lord Morpeth, as Irish Secretary, brought in a Bill to give effect to the recommendations of a Commission appointed to report on the fisheries of Ireland, the Scotch Members—always most determined foes to the Irish fisheries—through the influence of the Duke of Sutherland, caused the Bill to be abandoned, to the discredit of the Whigs of that day. Under the latter days of the Irish Parliament, the fisheries flourished; but like other branches of industry fostered by a Native Legislature, they declined after the Union, but rallied when again encouraged by the State. Between 1820 and 1830, aid, however, was prematurely withdrawn from Ireland, although continued to Scotland; and nothing exhibited more strongly the flagrant system of injustice pursued towards the former when at all likely to interfere with Scottish interests than the fact that, since 1800 £1,250,000 more had been given for the promotion of the Scotch fisheries than the Irish. And at that moment Scotland was receiving nearly £8,000 a year more for her fisheries than Ireland. Giving full credit for everything expended in Ireland, including harbours, Scotland had a special Board for the management of the fisheries, and a numerous staff of inspectors, whilst the Irish fisheries formed only a small part of another department, and had a solitary Inspector for a range of sea coast at least three times greater. In spite, however, of these disadvantages, just before the famine there were over 100,000 men and boys engaged in the fisheries, and nearly 20,000 vessels and boats. At present the crews were under 36,000, and the craft did not much exceed 9,000, and year by year the numbers were going down with fearful rapidity. This decline was attributable to the impoverishment of the fishing population consequent on the famine, and their inability to procure boats and gear, or keep what they had in repair. The fish were as abundant as ever; and though the demand might be less in Ireland from decrease of population, the demand had increased in England, and the facilities of reaching distant markets increased. London consumed £5,000,000 worth of fish in the year, and the provinces at least as much more. Ireland did not now produce £400,000 worth in the year—not enough to supply London for one month, and was obliged to import £150,000 worth a year from Norway, Newfoundland, and Scotland, to supply her wants; the seaboard of Holland was not half that of Ireland, and yet 450,000 Dutch once supported themselves by fishing; those who tilled the soil in Ireland were under 1,000,000, so that if they were altogether deprived of the land, they ought to be able to gain a livelihood out of the surrounding seas. Estimating very moderately, the fisheries ought to produce £2,000,000 worth, and oysters as much more, instead of hardly £50,000 as at present. At Whitstable out of less than three square miles of sea bottom £300,000 worth a year of oysters were sometimes dredged. Three years ago he introduced a Bill with a view of putting the fisheries in a better position, and after two years' struggling and discouragement from the then Government, thanks chiefly to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Mayo) he obtained a Select Committee last year. After two months' examination of witnesses they amended the Bill, and reported in favour of his views. In the amended form he then presented the Bill to the House. Its leading provisions were removing the control from the Treasury to the Lord Lieutenant, constituting a Department independent of the Board of Works, removing certain restrictions on particular modes of fishing, and making loans for erection of curing houses, and purchase of boats and gear. But the very essence of the Bill consisted in the clauses empowering loans—they were the pivot on which everything turned, and if not granted he would, for his part, prefer to throw up the Bill, as he felt they were the chief means by which the fisheries would be saved from further decline. The former system of Government loans, the loans of the Society of Friends, and of the Society for bettering the condition of the Irish poor had done much good, and had been attended by no loss. The evidence in favour of the loans he proposed given before the Select Committee was conclusive. The Inspecting Commissioners of Coast Guards were unanimous as to the good they would do, and in the Report of the Inspecting Commissioner of Fisheries, besides strong recommendations in favour of the loan system, it was stated—

“I have heard of no instance of a fisherman having been implicated in the wild and wicked projects of Fenianism.”

When the good that was accomplished was compared to the means required, he thought no wise or paternal Government would hesitate one moment about putting into execution the suggestion offered by the Select Committee and other competent authority. Only £50,000 was required, spread over a number of years, not as a gift, but advanced on well-secured loans. How little the Emperor of the French would think of expending such a sum, even as a mere experiment, for the benefit of his people. At present France voted £250,000 a year for the promotion of her fisheries. The prosperity of Dutch fisheries was mainly owing to the encouragement given by that Government, and Sweden was then making great and most successful efforts for the promotion of the Norway fisheries. It was a great reproach to England to allow such a resource to decay as the Irish fisheries had done; and if no effort was made to arrest the decline it would be a deep disgrace, and afford good ground for the assertion that England was indifferent to the interests of Ireland. He supposed when he sat down, he would have some Scotch Members, as always occurred when he brought the subject before the House, starting up to dispute anything being done for the Irish fisheries, on the grounds of political economy. But he had the authority of two of the most eminent authorities on that science—the hon. Members for Westminster and Brighton—for saying it was consistent with its principles to put the implement of his industry into the hands of the willing labourer, and that the fisherman was just as well entitled to a loan, if he gave satisfactory security, as the landlord or the tenant for the improvement of his land, as proposed by the Land Bill of the noble Earl. The antecedents of the present Government were good with regard to the Irish fisheries. The late Lord George Bentinck in 1847 was most anxious for a Committee of Inquiry; and the present Head of the Government on the 15th of May, 1847, zealously seconded his unfortunately unsuccessful efforts to compel the Ministry to grant a Select Committee to inquire into the Irish fisheries, with a view of ascertaining the measures necessary to render them more beneficial to the people. The twenty years which have passed since the death of that lamented and warm friend of Ireland serve to prove the wisdom of his generous policy as regarded the Irish railways and fisheries. Had his enlightened views been carried out, there can be little doubt that without lose to the try would progressive source of England.

Mr. Blake

"one who and unequa counsels, a his cares," the passion up the reco
— is now the kindly distinguishe
ruary, 1847

"It may be Irish enterpri crutches, Iria
This is not Friends."—[

Almost the after his lat
a strong de

"To amel assisting to an unwilling by emigration

No better a favour of t warding suc
the noble Governmen up by him on Irish Ra

"It is a w suffer so larg fallow, or le and with def ment, when t quickly make advantage.

santry were with Great B an increase o sideration al silence any o against affor quired, for th profit on the

If the Gove time to pa advances, l unanimity o
There nev
when a Gov
nity of doin and outlay strongly fo Ireland—as towards re poverty and employmen Ireland, an

Royal and mercantile marine kept up ; as it should not be forgotten when the fishermen were flourishing under the Irish Parliament that the latter voted 10,000 men to help to man the British fleet during the American war. At all events, if Government would not pass the Bill this year, he hoped that the noble Earl would not refuse to allow it to be read a second time, as that would help it passing on a future occasion. He hoped some aid would be given this year in the way of loans out of the Irish Representative Fund—even £5,000 would go some way until legislation would be had—and that oyster instructors would be appointed. He asked the Government to do so much if they would not go to the full extent they ought this year ; and he trusted that when the Premier next stated his policy with regard to Ireland, that the development of her valuable but neglected fisheries would form part of his programme.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON, in seconding the Motion, said, there was no branch of trade in Ireland in so much decay, and which so much required assistance, as the sea fisheries. He hoped and expected that the House would sanction the principle of the Bill which had been introduced, in order to develop this branch of Irish industry. There was no decrease in the quantity of fish to be found in the seas surrounding Ireland ; but the number of fishermen had decreased, and this, to his mind, proved that there was something radically wrong in the present system, and that it was desirable to assist the poor fishermen in providing themselves with the means of taking the fish and bringing them to market. During the last ten years, the number of both men and ships engaged in the Irish deep sea fishery had diminished more than one-half, and the industry could only only be revived by a loan of public money, and by its being placed under the superintendence of competent and active inspectors. The present inspectors were officers of the Board of Works, who were engaged one day in considering the advisability of granting a loan for drainage works in Ulster, another day in deciding whether a fence should be erected in Phoenix Park, or whether a railing should be re-gilt, and on the following day had to form themselves into a Fishery Board and plunge into the difficult subject of nets and meshes, trawling, and so on. One of the most important parts of the Bill was that which placed the new inspectors under the control of the Lord Lieutenant. The decrease of supply had been greater this year than formerly, which showed that something must be done at once. He hoped that the Government would sanction the second reading of the Bill, and would take the matter into consideration during the Recess, with the view of introducing a Bill upon the subject early next Session.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Mr. Blake.)

MR. GRAVES said, he should support the Bill, and he regretted that there were not more Bills of such a practical character brought forward for Ireland. When on a visit to that country, he was struck with the indifference to this important branch of trade. He was led to believe that the Irish fisheries were greatly neglected by the Board of Works. No sheds were erected in which the fish might be cured, and no standard value was placed upon the fish as was the case in Scotland, and thus the Irish fish only commanded a very low price in foreign markets. He hoped that the Bill would pass in the course of the present Session.

GENERAL DUNNE said, he hoped the Government would allow the Bill to be read a second time. There would be no difficulty in passing the Bill this Session, for they were all pretty well agreed upon what was wanted. The present Board of Commissioners had failed to discharge their duties, and they were annually renewing, by their appointment, a state of "do nothing." Irish Members were agreed not only upon the main principles but also upon the details of the measure, and what was required for Ireland, consequently, the Bill need not be long in Committee. He urged the Government, if possible, to pass the Bill this Session. The Treasury was the great difficulty in this, as in all matters relating to Ireland. They were always ready to take money from Ireland, but they were not so ready to give Ireland even what belonged to her.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that by the 15th clause of the Bill the owner of a foreshore might lay down oyster beds at low water mark ; but if he did not any other person might do so without his consent, the consent of the Commissioners being sufficient. This was an interference with private property which he thought the House ought not to allow.

MR. BLAKE said, that by the law as it at present stood an owner might plant beds within ten miles on either side of his property.

COLONEL FRENCH said, the Crown had been defeated on the question of foreshores in Scotland. If Irish Members were united, the same could be done for Ireland. As this Bill had gone through the scrutiny of a Select Committee, he wished to know why it should not proceed. He thought that, as there were not many Irish Bills before the House, the present one might be passed this Session. There was plenty of time to carry it through Parliament. It would prove a valuable measure for Ireland. If they wished to promote the Irish fisheries, they must adopt the Bill and take their management out of the hands of the Board of Works. They only asked for their own money with which to promote local interests.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he should be the last to underrate the importance of the question with which the Bill proposed to deal. It was quite true that the Irish fisheries were in a languishing condition; and there was hardly any subject more worthy to occupy the time and attention of the House. In his opinion the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) had done great and valuable public service in bringing this question forward. He thought that the decrease in the number of persons said to be engaged in this branch of industry had been over-estimated, and he proposed to institute an inquiry during the autumn, by which the exact number of the persons so engaged might be ascertained. The decrease was no doubt out of proportion to the decrease of the population; but he doubted if the number said to have been formerly employed could be relied on as consisting of persons engaged solely in that branch of industry. He was not sanguine, however, about the possibility of passing the present Bill during this Session; for there were difficult and delicate matters of detail to be settled before any satisfactory conclusion could be arrived at. The Bill proposed to create a central authority, which should form a portion of the Irish Government. There were to be three Commissioners, who were to have jurisdiction over the river as well as the sea fisheries. This would be a great improvement upon the present system, under which no member of the Government was responsible for the acts of the fishery inspectors. He must, however, point out that there was in existence a Special Commission for the best connected sion had fore; but in the aut inadvisabl appoint a of Ireland central B the recon which wor of the inh of the kin deal with of trawlin, he did not ~~blame~~ Nine-tent were caug which ten It appear would be any lengt present e remember depressed across from At presen rule, read However cumtance the power had no de and impr would do ber laid g Bill who grant loan nets. Be ber that e posed to there wou taining th would, the out false industry if pose that Governme sons, for t gear, upo to whom t No, upon of course, satisfactor apprehend could be o ing upon t lent was the ratepayers of a county represented to the Government that money might be advanced on curing-houses, that might be listened to. With regard to the question of the oyster fishery, he felt that there was no industry which was capable of greater development in Ireland; and he might remark that the extraordinary loss and failure which had occurred in the experiments made in this direction in England had not extended to Ireland. He believed that in the bays and inlets on the West coast of Ireland there would be a much better chance of success. He had already brought the matter under the notice of the Government, and he was in hopes that steps would be taken to ascertain to what extent and by what means the culture of oysters had been successful in France, in order that that information might be made use of to promote the culture on Irish coasts. He felt that it would be impossible to legislate upon this subject during the present Session, and he wished it to be understood that there were several points in which he did not agree with the hon. Member for Waterford; but as he approved the principle of the Bill he should not oppose the second reading.

Mr. Blake

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that in England there were no Commissioners to frame by-laws for the regulation of fisheries, and he must deprecate the appointment of three fresh Commissioners in Ireland. The Sea Fisheries Commission which reported two years ago did not recommend the continuance of restrictions. He concurred in all that had just fallen from the noble Earl opposite, and was also desirous of guarding himself from being supposed to sanction the principle of loans to the fishermen for the purchase of boats and fishing gear. If such loans were once granted he could not see why the fishermen of Cornwall and other parts of our coasts would not also have a claim upon the public money, or how loans could be refused to other branches of industry in Scotland or in this country.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, the main objection of his hon. Friend who had just sat down to the granting of loans to the Irish fishermen was that if this were done for Ireland it should be done for Scotland and England. His answer was that Ireland was a more backward country than either Scotland or England. Government might very properly undertake to do things for a country which was industrially backward, which no one could expect from them in the case of a country which was in a more advanced and prosperous condition. This consideration was of all the more weight when it was remembered that the industrial backwardness of Ireland was, in a great measure, attributable to the past legislation of this country. For a long period English legislators, without distinction of party, employed themselves in crushing this and most other branches of Irish enterprise. It was therefore incumbent on us, now that we were wiser and able to look upon our past conduct with shame, to legislate in an opposite direction, and even to risk if necessary the loss of small sums of money to advance that industry which we had formerly endeavoured to retard.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

UNIVERSITY ELECTIONS (VOTING PAPERS) BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bill to amend the Law relating to the use of Voting Papers in Elections for the Universities, ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 187.]

CONSULAR MARRIAGES BILL.

On Motion of Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bill for removing doubts as to the validity of certain Marriages between British Subjects in China and elsewhere, and for amending the Law relating to the Marriage of British Subjects in Foreign Countries—ordered to be brought in by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON and Mr. Secretary GATHORNE HARDY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 188.]

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, June 25, 1868.

MINUTES.] — Sat First in Parliament — The Earl of Shrewsbury, after the Death of his Father.

PUBLIC BILLS — First Reading — Local Government Supplemental (No. 6)* (175).

Second Reading — Established Church (Ireland) (157), debate adjourned; Boundary* (170).

Committee — Voters in Disfranchised Boroughs* (153); Municipal Rate (Edinburgh)* (167); City of London Gas* (168).

Report— Voters in Disfranchised Boroughs * (153); Municipal Rate (Edinburgh) * (167).

Third Reading—Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites) * (161), and passed.

Royal Assent— Stockbrokers (Ireland) [31 & 32 Vict. c. 31]; Endowed Schools [31 & 32 Vict. c. 32]; Registration of Writs (Scotland) [31 & 32 Vict. c. 34]; Cotton Statistics [31 & 32 Vict. c. 35]; Duchy of Cornwall Amendment [31 & 32 Vict. c. 35]; Documentary Evidence [31 & 32 Vict. c. 37]; Unclaimed Prize Money (India) [31 & 32 Vict. c. 38]; Alkali Act, 1863, Perpetuation [31 & 32 Vict. c. 36]; Jurors' Affirmations (Scotland) [31 & 32 Vict. c. 39]; Partition [31 & 32 Vict. c. 40]; Metropolis Subways [31 & 32 Vict. c. 80]; Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation, &c. [31 & 32 Vict. c. 46]; Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2) [31 & 32 Vict. c. 47].

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND) BILL.

(Earl Granville.)

(NO. 157.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: My Lords, it is not the first time that I have had the honour of proposing measures of importance to your Lordships, nor is it the first time that I have required all your indulgence to enable me to perform the task. Your Lordships may have observed that after the first reading of this Bill there was a kind of race between two noble Lords who should first give a Notice of Motion for its rejection. I hardly know whether I ought to regret or feel pleasure that my noble Friend on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey) won that race. Nobody is better aware than I am of the infinite power and fertility of the objections which my noble Friend can raise to any course which is not precisely that which he has shaped; and, as I shall be the only Peer to precede him, I shall be exposed to the full force of his criticism. At the same time, I am aware that my noble Friend will lay down principles and apply those principles in a manner which must be completely repugnant to the arguments that will probably be urged by his competitor in the race, the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. I hope your Lordships will give me credit for some magnanimity if I say that I wish no greater punishment to either of the noble Lords than that which they will have to undergo—the noble and learned Lord and Her Majesty's Government, in hearing the terms which will be used in proposing the Motion for which they are about to vote; and for at least will be ution. My ism, its a to this co rages of a filled the digation; have cause reflect me upon the any forme has thus b —an impi majorities in the Ho as follow: Emancipal gress, soc progress l gradual. improved perial Par tions intr partly to governme the midst insurrectio against re thority, w character. by all the Ireland. who in f found to has found the Press of the am from not and artiza ceived wil by a very tion. The seems to l this extrac vernment armed wit on the othe passed of racter, in land. No that Irelar than Her House our fied as to ment. M Seal, in ar noble Duk Trade, ref about to be made in the House of Commons by Lord Mayo, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and a Member of the Cabinet, with regard to Ireland. The Prime Minister made the same reference in the declaration he made that that policy would be of "a truly Liberal" character. Accordingly, Lord Mayo made the promised statement. He said with regard to the Irish Reform Bill that it was not the intention of the Government to abandon that measure. He said also that the question of the Irish Railways would be referred to a Committee. With regard to the land question he promised a certain amount of legislation; but said that could not be finally settled without further inquiry, and that also he proposed to refer to a Commission. The subject of primary education was also to be referred to a Commission. With regard to the education of the upper and middle classes among the Roman Catholics, I beg leave to read the words of Lord Mayo's declaration. He said—

"It is proposed, in the first instance, that a charter should be granted in the same way that a charter was granted to the Queen's University; that the governing body, under the original constitution, should consist of a Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor, four Prelates, the President of Maynooth, six Laymen, the heads of the Colleges to be at first affiliated, and five Members to be elected, to represent the five educational faculties, all being Roman Catholics."

Then he explained how future vacancies were to be filled up, and after some arguments in favour of such a University, he went on to say—

"With regard to endowment, it will be essential, of course, if Parliament agree to the proposal, in the first instance to provide for the necessary expenses of the University—that is to say, the expenses of officers of the University, of the University Professors, and also to make some provision for a building. It is possible that if Parliament approve the scheme it may not be indisposed to endow certain University scholarships. But, with regard to the endowment of Colleges, it is impossible to make any proposal of that nature at present, and to that extent the question will be left open to further consideration,"

That was the declaration made by Lord Mayo with regard to the University. With regard to the Church of Ireland, the noble Lord entered into still longer details, deprecating the principle of levelling down; and there were certain passages which your Lordships will perhaps allow me to read. Now, I am in some difficulty here, because I was not aware until lately that Lord Mayo had published a revised edition of his speech, differing in some parts from the speech as reported in The Times and in Hansard. Thus after giving some account of the evil consequences of levelling down, Lord Mayo is reported in The Times and in Hansard to have said—

"I believe the arrangement we propose is eminently suited to the people of Ireland."

That passage is omitted in the revised speech. Again, in speaking of the Presbyterians, Lord Mayo said—

"The Presbyterians now receive a grant from this House, which is miserable in amount, and totally inadequate to their requirements."

That is the passage according to the revised speech. In The Times report a sentence is added that he had reason to believe that the Protestant Church would not at all object to an alteration of their position. With regard to the Irish Church, Lord Mayo said—

"Justice and policy may demand a greater equalization of ecclesiastical arrangements than now exists. If it is desired to make our Churches more equal in position than they are, this result should be secured by elevation and restoration, and not by confiscation."

In the report of The Times, and in Hansard, it runs thus—

"There would not, I believe, be any objection to make all Churches equal, but the result must be secured by elevation, and not by confiscation."

These are the statements that were made at that time, and I believe there is no doubt as to what were the inferences then drawn from them by the great majority of those who heard or who read them. With regard to the establishment of a Roman Catholic University, it clearly appeared from those statements that it was intended to propose the endowment of an exclusively Catholic University in Ireland, and that with respect to the endowment of the Colleges the Government would make no declaration at present, but that that point should be left for further consideration. But with reference to the Established Church, the inference drawn at the time was that Her Majesty's Government had no distinct plan, but that they had sketched out a policy—namely, that of the concurrent endowment of the Episcopalian, the Presbyterian, and the Roman Catholic Churches. Those inferences, I am aware, were contradicted, but not until about two months after the statement was made. I do not wish on this occasion to inquire in the slightest degree whether the explanations afterwards given were satisfactory, at all events to minds not well constituted for understanding that which is not clear; nor will I enter into the question whether it was right for the Government to have allowed their intentions to be misrepresented during so long a time without due explanation. All I will say is that, if the announcement of their policy had been even less definite than it was, it would, in my opinion, have been the duty of the Opposition to take some action on the matter. The Government did show some conciliatory disposition towards the other religious communities in Ireland, though their manner of doing it I could not approve. And it could not have been conceived—after the intimation they had given of their intentions on that subject—that the “truly Liberal policy” spoken of by the Prime Minister meant nothing more than that things were to remain absolutely in statu quo, only on the understanding that the number of Roman Catholic chaplains in prisons and in workhouses should not be diminished. The Opposition, believing, as I have said, in the necessity of accompanying measures of coercion with sound measures of conciliation and remedy, and having the assurance that there was springing up in Ireland a feeling almost of despair as to obtaining from the Imperial Parliament a settlement of some of the questions which its people had deeply at heart, deemed it impossible that they could appear in the eyes of England and Scotland as well as of Ireland to acquiesce in the policy or no policy of the Government. In consequence of that conclusion the Opposition have had imputed to them motives of an almost dishonourable character. My Lords, I am strongly in favour of party Government, and I believe that anybody who broke up that party Government would injure our representative institutions. At the same time, I hold that to adopt any principle in which you do not believe for the sake of a political or a party advantage is highly dishonourable. On the other hand, the promotion of great principles, the advancement of a great question when a favourable moment presents itself, is one of the most glorious operations of party Government in this country. A right rev. Friend of mine opposite lately made an eloquent speech on this subject, of the opinions expressed in which I do not in the least complain. That such opinions should be entertained by members of the Episcopal Bench is extremely natural; but I do regret that my right rev. Friend should have permitted himself to impute unworthy motives to those who differ from him, and self have ments, w had been but by c position - offensive Lords, w argument well as personall shot whic but cann

[First Night.]

the issue been in years, I the one t
Irish Chu in this feelings c it impos ness a cl complish first exp of Comm As to the marking nary adv opinion charges made ag very litt have felt of them tinguise Lordship enough t explanati and in p for a lon convinced the main Church b charge, he him is th
opinions, till this y
sion for vernment
Lord Pri
somewhat observed defending connectio to refer to he had Perhaps take a si private c with Mr.

Earl Granville

Session of last year, at a time when the Government appeared to be in great difficulties—we were not then aware of the great tenacity of life which it has since exhibited—and when it seemed likely that it would succumb to the difficulties which surrounded it. Mr. Gladstone then spoke to me on the course which any possible Liberal Government might have to take. Among other things, he said, "There is one question which any Liberal Government must be prepared to deal with; it is the Irish Church." He said, "I am aware of the difficulties of the question. I am aware that that Government will run the risk of being destroyed in the endeavour, and even the party of being broken up again on that very question; but it is a duty from which a Liberal Government cannot in honour shrink." My Lords, I believe I have told you the precise words, I am quite sure I have told you the precise substance of my right hon. Friend's remarks. They made an impression upon me at the time, and I know there are other political Friends of mine and of Mr. Gladstone who at the same time received from him the same declaration, and to them I could point if—as I believe is quite impossible—your Lordships should entertain the slightest doubt as to what I have just stated. I am justified, therefore, I think, in feeling some indignation at finding it imputed to Mr. Gladstone that he has tried to steal a mean political advantage when I am personally aware of the risk and the sacrifice that he was prepared to encounter. The Opposition then had to take a course. I am extremely curious to know what is the course which my noble Friend on the cross-Benches will suggest that the Opposition ought to have taken. I have thought much on the subject, but I really cannot come to any conclusion on the matter; but I do hope it is impossible that my noble Friend will suggest, under the circumstances I have stated, that it was the duty of the Opposition—that it would have become them—to have remained perfectly quiescent under the vague assurances of Her Majesty's Government, and to have waited until the Government thought fit to adopt any particular plan which my noble Friend might dictate to them and the country. It was impossible for any one not in the Government to propose any general Bill dealing with the complicated and difficult details connected with the disestablishment of the Irish Church. On the other hand, an abstract Resolution was bad in itself; it was still worse when you consider that the inefficiency of previous abstract Resolutions was fresh in the memory of the Irish people. We resolved to take another step, one which, while it gave the people of Ireland an earnest of the good-will of the present House of Commons, without fettering in the slightest degree the discretion of a future Parliament, enabled them to deal with the question with more ease and less embarrassment than they could otherwise could have done. The Resolutions proposed to and adopted by the other House are so famous that I need hardly read the substance of them to your Lordships. They are embodied in the Bill which I have the honour of asking your Lordships to read the second time. But one of the provisions has been framed to avoid the practical inconvenience which might arise from the suspension of ecclesiastical appointments, and there is also a limitation of the powers given by the Bill until August, 1869. Those Resolutions and this Bill were approved by the House of Commons, in opposition to Her Majesty's Government, by enormous majorities, the lowest of which was 54. Now, Lord Stanley, than whom there is no man who more clearly sees things as they are, speaking on behalf of the Government, stated that there was not one educated man in a hundred who would be bold enough to maintain that the existence of the Irish Church in its present state was satisfactory, and I rather think, though I have not his exact words before me, that he referred to it as a scandal. Now, if that opinion of Lord Stanley's be right, as I believe it is, there is not a single Member of your Lordships' House who might not with perfect conscientiousness vote for every enactment to be found in this Bill. Lord Stanley referred to a plan regarded with favour by some members of the Irish Church for re-distributing its revenues within its limits, and he said he, for one, could not believe such a proposal would be entertained by a Reformed House of Commons. Even supposing, however, that some of your Lordships should approve that plan, it would clearly be of advantage to avoid a waste of ecclesiastical revenues by preventing any fresh appointments from being made, and thus to facilitate the execution of those beneficial recommendations which the Commissioners may be expected to make. There is another class who are for totally disendowing the

[First Night.

Irish Church and re-distributing its revenues among the various religious bodies in Ireland. This reason applies to them also, while to those who believe that the only final and satisfactory settlement will be the disestablishment of the Church the reasons for supporting this Bill are still more conclusive. It would prevent the creation of fresh vested interests, and, by precluding the appointment of young men to benefices which may become vacant, it would limit, possibly by a considerable number of years, the prolongation of the existing system after disestablishment had been decided upon. There is another body in this House, I mean those of your Lordships, whether lay or spiritual, who possess ecclesiastical patronage, and who, I think, would be placed in a most invidious and disagreeable position if this Bill is not passed. They would be bound to fill up benefices as they became vacant, and to appoint to sinecures or benefices which very likely the Commissioners would recommend should be abolished. They would do so notwithstanding the strong expression of opinion on the part of the House of Commons, and in face of the probable result of the Commission of Inquiry. Now, that appears to me one of the most difficult and invidious positions in which the dispensers of patronage can be placed. There is another body who can hardly with consistency refuse their assent to the provisions of this Bill—I mean Her Majesty's Government. The noble Duke the Secretary for the Colonies (the Duke of Buckingham) will, perhaps, be good enough to correct me if I am wrong when I state that the Government have just given their assent to the suspension of appointments of an ecclesiastical nature in Jamaica, with a view to an inquiry which may result merely in the re-distribution of Church revenues, certainly in the diminution of them, and possibly in their total abolition. I apprehend from the silence of the noble Duke, and from the answer given by a Member of the Government to a Question put a day or two ago in the House of Commons, that I am correct in that statement, and this circumstance seems to me a reason why they should support this Bill.

It would, however, be disingenuous on my part were I to pretend that the practical advantages of the Bill are the only grounds on which I ask your Lordships to give this measure a second reading. I think it is most important that your

Earl Granville

Lordships of Common good-will undertake a consideration of the Church. I are very si has entirely which it w that which tinguished wrath of m and caused a right rev towards th of Ireland. the Irish (has given perfectly Queen Eliz trary mean it should religious i population and her Go out, never great maje manently faith. Lo statement i Froude, ha much thro noble and —of consu not been s lays it dow clergy, and their ancie been for th tant Churo ground of have been object was it been so s which follo —were the Let me ag who says Hanover, i whole syst Ireland ap the purpos and the pr body. An Why, my that there Anglicans, vantage of sibly reduc more than

There are only four dioceses where the percentage of members of the Established Church is above 20; there is only one where it exceeds 25, and that very slightly; and there are nine where the percentage is under 2 or a little above 3. That is sufficient to show that the object of the establishment of the Church has not been fulfilled. And now with regard to the injustice. The small minority for whom churches, ministers, and all the appurtenances of religion are provided are the rich; the enormous majority, who, with the exception of the Grant to Maynooth, have no assistance from the State with regard to their religion, are the poor. That, I think, is sufficient to justify those clergymen who have been called sacrilegious, and some of whom were treated with contempt by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) because they were not beneficed clergymen, in stating that it appeared, to their sense of justice that the Irish Church was an injustice.

With regard to the effect of this state of things on the feeling of the people of Ireland, I believe that it excites discontent, as a symbol—the last symbol—of conquest, and not only of conquest but of conquest oft repeated, and always followed by an amount of oppression towards the majority, which, as Hallam remarks, has never been equalled in the annals of European history, except, perhaps, in the case of the oppression of a small minority of Frenchmen at the time of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Is it possible that such a state of things should not be a legitimate cause of discontent? Nothing, I am sure, that I could say would add to the force of the naked facts which I have so meagrely given. I have no doubt that in the course of this debate we shall hear some eloquent speeches in defence of the Irish Church; but I very much doubt whether any one of the speakers will deny the facts which I have stated, and upon which I am content to rest my case.

My Lords, at the same time, I am anxious to refer to some of the objections which are likely to be made to the disestablishment of the Irish Church; and in doing so I shall avail myself of the assistance of my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees. My noble Friend has supplied me with objections which, as they have been published in a pamphlet, I shall have no hesitation in using. The first argument by way of objection is that disestablishment would be a grievous wrong to the Irish Church and would shake the principles on which the security of private property is based. My noble Friend is generally a moderate man in the expression of his views; but I must say that the other day he spoke on this subject with a warmth which must have surprised your Lordships, even though you are well aware of my noble Friend's attachment to the Church. My noble Friend said that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would be a sin—that it would be taking from God the things which belong to God. My Lords, these are grave words, and they ought not to be lightly spoken. We have all been brought up to believe that all things belong to God, but there are some things which are believed to especially belong to God. Can we place in the latter category the temporalities of an institution which never has accomplished the object for which it was intended, and which has generated feelings which are not very Christian between those within and those without its pale? My Lords, with much respect I must say that to describe such things as belonging to God in the sense that it would be a sin to touch them is really a profaning of the words. My Lords, Henry VIII. found the ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland in the hands of the Roman Catholic Church, which had possessed them for many more centuries than the three which we now speak of. He took a large portion of them and distributed them between himself and his friends. He gave the rest to a Church which he had established, partly by force and partly by his Prerogative, in a country which, unlike England, was entirely unprepared to receive the blessed truths of the Reformation. Queen Mary took the latter portion of those revenues back again for the Roman Catholics; Queen Elizabeth re-took them for the Established Church; Cromwell handed them over to the Puritans, and his successor took them from them. I want to know which of those appropriations of those revenues was sacred—whether they were all sacred, or whether none of them are sacred? My Lords, I am happy to feel that I can relieve myself from what I may almost style the excommunication of my noble Friend, by citing in favour of the course which I ask your Lordships to take, not only the opinion of lawyers and statesmen, but also of prelates and clergymen of the Established Church. What says Bishop Warburton?—

[First Night.]

"The alliance between the Church and the State is not irrevocable. It subsists just so long as the Church thereby established maintains its superiority of extent, which, when it loses to any considerable degree, the alliance becomes void."

The right rev. Prelates will remember that on a former occasion Bishop Butler was quoted by a noble Lord, one of the warmest friends of the Church, as having declared that tithes might be alienated at the discretion of the governing body. Again Paley states—

"If the Dissenters from the Establishment become a majority of the people, the Establishment itself ought to be altered or modified."

I am sure the right rev. Bench will attach due weight to the opinion of Dr. Arnold, and he said that whether the Irish people lapsed into barbarism again, or reached a higher state of civilization, in either case it was utterly impossible for the Irish Church Establishment to remain. In the works of Archbishop Whately are to be found these words—

"I freely acknowledge that the State has a right to take away the property of all or any of these corporations—indemnifying, of course, those individuals actually enjoying the revenues—whenever the manifest inutility or hurtfulness of the institutions renders their abolition important to the public welfare."

My Lords, those words really seem to anticipate the Resolutions contained in the Bill which I now ask your Lordships to read a second time.

My Lords, I now come to the question whether the disestablishment of the Irish Church would have the effect of shaking the principles on which the security of private property is based. I must say that to my mind such an assertion is an insult to common sense. Indeed I think your Lordships must all feel that the argument is a most fallacious one. Sir James M'Intosh remarks that the principle of private property is co-eval with society itself, whereas, with regard to corporations, civil and religious, they could be maintained when beneficial, improved when impaired, and destroyed when useless or harmful. To be in a state of security private property must be situated in the midst of a contented and happy population. I think, my Lords, that any step you can take to diminish discontent in Ireland will tend to strengthen the security of private property more than any subtle arguments founded on the connection between Church and State. I believe, my Lords, you can strengthen the security of property in Ireland to an enormous degree by taking away what, source of je people, and, to an assertio minority whi the relations The next arg that if you ment in Ir position of t country. N stand what hend my ne that the di Church wou vantages and Protestant r tablishment reach this oc presume the of disestabli and that it i there, the e the position England. I that it is im Church as a ing it logica English Chu member of t protect again compare the say—the t small body t body the E has been sai of Union w but there i about the tes being unite the two Chu trine, worst 1861 or 18 dressed the respect of t there should Irish Prelat the Commit Council, in c might be a Churches." and I believ and right r did not wi which an A order that really unite much impor with the q But I believ is one of the most tolerant Churches in the world. She is also very comprehensive. On the one side she almost touches the Roman Catholic Church, and on the other her sympathies are widely extended to our Dissenting brethren. I believe she commands the warm—I might almost say the blind—devotion of men of the highest station and education; and, at the same time, she has the respect of a large body outside her own members. My Lords, I have the honour to be acquainted with a great many members of the English Church. I have not the honour to be acquainted with many members of the Irish Church. I am told there has been a great improvement in the character of the clergy of the Irish Church, and it is not to them, but to the system which places them in an invidious position, that I attribute the failure of the Irish Church. There is another reason why the Church in this country does not fail to commend itself to the people. For many years past it has furnished bright examples of a clergy who have not been slow to adopt a course—even to the extent sometimes of placing themselves in the van—by means of which not only some of the greatest social reforms, but also some of the greatest political reforms, have been secured, thereby conferring immense benefits upon the English nation. I do not think, therefore, that the separation of these two Churches will be an injury. On the contrary, I believe it will be an advantage to the Church of England. And there is one danger, as matters stand, to which your Lordships, I think, cannot be blind. Many of your Lordships think, no doubt, that disestablishment may be delayed, and some that it can be prevented. But after the immense impetus which has been given to this question by the great majorities in the House of Commons, do you think that this is a question which can be shelved, put aside, and heard of no more? The thing is impossible. And will it be an advantage to the Church of England to be constantly mixed up with the Irish Church, and to be made with it the object of a combined attack? Will it be useful to the Church of England that persons who really entertain no enmity towards it at present—for I believe that the persons in this country who are in active hostility to the Church of England are only a small minority—should be enrolled in the number of its assailants merely in order that they may reach another Church against which they have just reason of complaint, and with this object that they should be driven to discover and expose every weak place in the armour of the Church of England? I venture to go further, and say that it is not desirable in the interest of the Church that there should be a continuation of some of the speeches which we have heard ostensibly in its defence.

Earl Granville

The next argument of my noble Friend is one that he will excuse me for saying I consider not only very weak, but very dangerous. It is this, that the people of Ireland do not care about this subject. He does not produce one single fact to support that opinion. I ask whether, from a priori reasoning, they should be likely to be satisfied. There is one supposition which it is painful almost to make—that of the possible conquest of this country; but I remember a good many years ago that a man, who was gallant to excess himself, bearing a name that was borne by hero after hero in our military and naval annals, and which has received such glorious illustration within the last few weeks, did not shrink from entertaining this supposition. He said this—

“If the Emperor Napoleon had conquered this country, would we have submitted to his constituting the Roman Catholic religion the established religion of the country?”

That illustration has been repeated time after time, till it has become almost trite and stale; but I am not aware that the answer to it has become in the slightest degree trite or stale, because I have never heard of any answer being given to it. I have never heard of any one venturing upon the supposition that any lapse of time would reconcile us here in England to submit to the domination in religious matters of a small minority, and I shall be very much surprised if any noble Lord controverts that view. And does the noble Lord think that the Irish are either so superior, or so very inferior to us, that they do not freely share the unanimity that among us would be created by such a conquest? The noble Lord may have read the declaration made by everything that is distinguished by wealth, position, and intellect among the Roman Catholics of Ireland protesting strongly against this notion, and asserting that it is contrary to the dignity of their religion and of the people of Ireland that the Church of Ireland should be maintained, and that without religious equality there cannot be generated that security, that respect for law, and that natural good-will which constitutes the true foundation of national prosperity. But the noble Lord is not satisfied with that. He uses the argument, which I have heard used before, that the people are apathetic. I think I heard that argument used against a very moderate Reform Bill proposed by Her Majesty's Government only two years ago. And what happened? We were defeated, and the Bill was withdrawn; we had tumultuous riots of a disgraceful character in the metropolis, and we had the most peaceful and orderly meetings of the working classes all over the country. What was the result? Why, that a Conservative Government last year passed a measure of Reform which, when some years before it had been proposed by Mr. Bright, had been deemed of the most revolutionary character. Will the noble Lord not be satisfied till the Irish people show some of that spirit which the Scotch people once exhibited—till they show some of that spirit which induced a great Conservative statesman, a man of iron will, to ask you to make your choice between concession and civil war: are these the sort of evidences my noble Friend requires of the feelings of the people of Ireland? The noble Lord says—"It is not the people of Ireland, it is the clerical influence brought to bear upon them, that does all this." According to his view, it is not the waters that make the waves, but the winds that blow upon them; and we are on that account wholly to disregard the heaving of the ocean. I believe that argument is false to the uttermost degree. I agree with my noble Friend in thinking that one of the main objections to the clergy of the Roman Catholic religion is the exaggerated influence which, as it appears to us, they assume, and which they certainly exercise, over their flocks in Ireland, as well as in other countries; but my Lords, do you think you will diminish that influence in the slightest degree, when, in addition to any spiritual arms they may at present make use of, you put into their hands this acute political weapon, which they can employ in their addresses every day in the week, and with special point upon the Seventh Day—the position in which the religion so dear to their hearts is placed by the side of the favoured Establishment? Is not this a stimulus to the increased exercise of their influence—is it not a stimulus to them to exercise this influence in the way most unfavourable to the Government? I have said I think this influence exagif ever ther it would be to use their i told some we this Bill 20,

[First Night.

Earl Granville

of England, in party or come politi hardly imag
men are to abstained fr
zens in poli sufficient in institution show is so which they clergymen coming for the poor I forward, wh an almost some cases, to supply th rich neighb
—who have
—are provi
possibly des arguments should be ex any to esc will frankl finishing th
—["Oh, o saying any Lord—was Lord had a to it any Coronation in the spec
the other de prudent co ment derive opposed to fully answe obligation o
Her Majesty
United Kin Friend, or a port that v sert that Ki
the advice
Sir Robert
Chancellor, Coronation
to the Em will ask wh most consti eat upon the ted the obli

when, acting upon the advice of successive Ministers, and once of a Committee of the Privy Council assembled for the special purpose, she gave her assent to Acts which secularized the property of the Church both in Canada and in the Australian colonies? I say, if you are not prepared to make these assertions, it is most objectionable to state in public, or endeavour to disseminate the opinion, that there is the slightest difficulty upon that subject. And I am bound to say, when the noble Lord went further and gave a hypothetical supposition as to the personal feeling of the Queen connected with this Coronation Oath, he took an unconstitutional course. I am sorry to say that I think it almost verges upon disrespect, after the Sovereign has by her public acts shown that she does not share in the view of the noble Lord, to talk in the tone which he has done of obligations imposed upon the Crown. There is another argument which has been relied upon—that to disestablish the Church would be to repeal the Union. Either this objection is a technical or a substantial one. I should have thought that if it were effective for that purpose mention would have been made of the Church temporalities. But there is no mention of them; the fifth section of the Act settles that question. Then, if it be a technical objection nothing can be easier than by a technical mode to obviate that objection. But I deny that an Act of Parliament should bind to all eternity. I admit that the Act of Union is of a peculiarly sacred character, and that it should not be touched without care and consideration; but when you tell me that it cannot be touched, even supposing England, Scotland, and Ireland were of one mind on the subject, I say that is simply a reductio ad absurdum. Another argument which I should not think important, except that it came from a Secretary of State, declares that if you disestablish the Irish Church you despoil the people of Ireland by taking away their almoners. This is simply inconsistent. If the Church is to be considered without respect to its spiritual character, we may as well advocate the distribution of alms by a body of civil engineers. But you allege, however, the Irish clergy are so poor that they are hardly able to support themselves. What would you say if any of those distinguished Roman Catholic Peers here present were to propose to you to place public funds in the hands of Archbishop Manning and his clergy not for purposes of giving instruction or spiritual consolation to their flocks, but for the purpose of distributing alms impartially to the people? I think, my Lords, I need go no further with this. But there is another argument which has all the freshness of novelty, and deserves to be treated with great consideration. The Prime Minister has stated that the disestablishment of this alien Church, as he calls it, which he admits is one of the principal obstacles to order, and, therefore, to Imperial rule in Ireland, would be fatal to the Protestantism of Europe. This is an affair upon which the foreign Protestants have a right to say something, and with your Lordships' permission, I believe I have heard the opinion of foreigners belonging to every Church on this subject. I have heard those of persons belonging to the Greek Church, Roman Catholics of extreme views, and of Roman Catholics who profess to value religion only as a very powerful political agent. I have also heard the opinions of Protestants on the subject, and I have never heard a single word of approbation from any one of them regarding the Church Establishment in Ireland. And I would ask what is the language of the American Protestants, of the Prussian Protestants, and of the Swiss Protestants. One and all of them tell us that their great stumbling-block is the Irish Church Establishment; they say that of all the attacks upon them by the Roman Catholics that which is most often repeated turns on the Irish Church, and they assure us that it is a taunt they have been utterly unable to meet. These foreign Protestants are as good judges as even the Prime Minister on this subject as regards foreign Protestantism, and I repeat their judgment with confidence that it will not be wanting in weight with your Lordships. The Prime Minister, too, has offered certain other arguments, perfectly original, but so very much above the level on which men with ordinary minds reason that it is quite impossible for me to take them up. But, my Lords, I should like to bring all the arguments on the subject to something like an historical test. I have mentioned the case of Scotland; now let me remind your Lordships of Lord Macaulay's famous statement of the result to Scotland and to England and to the connection between the two countries, from the fact that the Scotch were firm enough to resist the imposition of an Established Church of the minority of the people upon them, and that we were weak enough or wise enough to yield to them. That, however, is some time ago. So I will take a more modern instance, and ask what has been the result in the Australian colonies of setting up a free Church. In former times there used to be a compulsory annual Vote of £28,000 from the Civil List, one-half of which was devoted to the Protestant Church, one-third to the Roman Catholics, and the rest to the Presbyterians. What has been the result of abolishing that grant? I am told that the increase to the Protestant Church since that occurred has been in the proportion of five to two. I hold in my hand a Report from "The Church Society," established in the diocese of Sydney, presided over by the Bishop, and numbering among its members the clergy of the diocese and a large number of laymen. I notice this passage in the Report—

[First Night.

"Instituted in 1856 for the purpose of maintaining clergymen, catechists, and missionaries to the aborigines, and of building churches and parsonages throughout the diocese, it has succeeded in raising more than £84,000 for these objects, and through its instrumentality the numbers of the clergy have been very largely increased. By grants of money and payment of interest upon loans a great stimulus has been given to the erection of churches, so that 120 places of worship in connection with our Church have been opened within the last eleven years, to the greater part of which the Society has rendered some aid."

Passing over the enumeration of the many advantages conferred by the Society, I find the Report makes this statement—

"Nothing more is needed than such a united and sustained effort on the part of her members to enable the Church to carry their ministrations to the utmost bounds of the diocese."

Will you tell me with such facts as these before you that the Irish Church is unable to maintain itself? Will you re-assert that when you consider what this small and by no means wealthy population has done? My Lords, I will offer another consideration. I have lately had the advantage of seeing the late Governor of that colony (Sir John Young), himself an Irishman, and well acquainted with Irish affairs. Your Lordships will remember him as a singularly impartial man, and what does he say? He tells me that there is perfect harmony among all the sects in New South Wales, and he wishes to God a similar feeling existed in Ireland. I pass on to Canada. Some twenty-eight years ago Lord Sydenham, then Governor General of the colony

Earl Granville

Home Govern-

"The clergy great overwhelthe troubles
bellion, the nings, the per-hatred. If y-England any-vince will nea sound, loyal

In consequence in that colony rity was the but the clergy clergy rose Aberdeen's sented to y-the colony to secularizopposed, o-would be and to do to do resp-
A noble F-the Oppositthe Empirconsent to ther noble that measuand justice by which Others atte-that its es-spiritual d-the Church
Act of Un-were told try would passed. W-name of the belonging urged to st-their right element of tween this
try. And,
the name
I hope will ing, to wit-sure. My L-more strikof Canada
tion to dis-minorities?
were precis-what has that one r-that the sinful, remfate of that to drink out of the cup dedicated to the service of God in His temple, and how, by that act, one of the fairest and mightiest kingdoms of the earth ceased to exist in one day. See how those terrible prognostications have been fulfilled. I will ask whether property in this country or in Canada has fallen one shilling, one sixpence, or one farthing in value in consequence of the "unjustifiable" vote with which, by a majority of nearly 40, you passed that Bill? I believe these arguments are unreal in their nature, though they may possibly answer very well as election cries. I believe that they do very well to fill up speeches when the subject itself does not admit of very close and serried argument; but I cannot conceive any one bringing them forward in the hope that they can in any way support his views. Now, my Lords, with regard to Canada, I have a letter here from one of the Members of the Legislature, and in that letter, which is too long for me to read, though I shall be happy to show it to any noble Lord who desires to see it, the writer mentions several curious circumstances. He says that while the Churchmen in his neighbourhood were able to fall back upon the Clergy Reserve Fund they obstinately refused to do anything for themselves. They had no church, no minister, and no public performance of religious duties. When they desired to be married or christened, or to have their friends or relatives buried, they went to the Methodists, who provided what was necessary; but directly the Clergy Reserve Bill was carried they built a rectory and provided for their spiritual wants, and nothing could be more satisfactory than the state in which they now are. I have seen another letter, in which the writer says—

"The Episcopal Protestant Church in Lower Canada is in a very satisfactory state, both as regards revenue and efficiency. It has a sufficient number of clergy. They are earnest, but not fanatical; they are not unduly under the influence of their congregations, and are generally paid fixed incomes, as the contributions of their flocks and other revenues are paid, not to a parochial, but to a diocesan fund. There are a sufficient number of decent places of worship. The laity show much more zeal for their religion than the members of the Established Church in Ireland do. A man of the class that in Ireland would give five or ten pounds for his religion there gives hundreds."

That letter almost exactly tallies with the information which the Governor of New South Wales furnished—that the same success, and, doubtless, owing to the same cause, had resulted there; that not only had there been a voluntary endowment of Bishops, but there had also been introduced a very large amount of the lay element. I think that these facts are sufficient to show that the prophesied spiritual destitution of Canada has not by any means been realized. I would venture to appeal to some of the right rev. Prelates opposite who have seen the Bishop of Montreal lately, and ask them whether he does not substantially give the same account and say that nothing would induce him to go back to the previous state of things. And, my Lords, what has been the result as far as concerns the relations between the two countries? What effect has it had upon those who were known as the "loyal colonists?" Why, the "loyal colonists" or "loyal Canadians" no longer exist. They have disappeared, not because those who formerly bore the name are less loyal than they used to be, but because the great majority of those who were formerly disaffected have become equally loyal with themselves. The Canadians are now greatly attached to you, and you are enabled to intrust Volunteer Roman Catholics with arms, while in Ireland you are not only afraid to do so, but you have the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act and the presence of a large military force. Now, my Lords, I will quote some words, much more powerful than any I can use. Your Lordships must all have been horrified at the cruel political murder of Mr. M'Gee. Mr. M'Gee had himself been a revolutionist; but for many years he had been one of the staunchest adherents to the mother country and to the Crown. The last letter that he wrote was, I believe, written to a Member of the Government; and I shall, therefore, no doubt be corrected if I misquote his words. In that letter, and referring to the Catholics, he said—

"We are a contented and a loyal people. We are so because we have a just Government and religious equality. If we had not it would be otherwise."

My Lords, I have no words to add to that statement. I think it is possible that some of the arguments I have adverted to may be repeated to night. I do not think it possible that we can prevent the ultimate disestablishment of the Irish Church, and if that disestablishment does occur, I, for one, have the fullest confidence that history will give the same crushing reply to those arguments and prophecies with regard to Ireland that history has already given with regard to Canada.

[First Night.

I am far from contending that there is any constitutional reason why your Lordships should not negative the proposal for the second reading of this Bill. On the contrary, I am aware that there are many plausible arguments for such a course, and that they will be urged with all the skill and ability which eloquence and long Parliamentary experience can supply. But, my Lords, I would venture to ask whether such a course is a wise or a prudent one to adopt. The Constitution has undergone a great change. That change was described by my noble Friend, who was himself one of its authors, as "a leap in the dark." That phrase has been so generally accepted that only a few days since I found it translated into a foreign language. There is no one more sanguine as to the results of this leap than I am; but, whether sanguine or not, I would ask whether it is the part of a wise man, of a sane man, to cover the spot on which he is to alight, with broken glass, flints, and pointed rocks? Can you blind yourselves to the fact that these Gentlemen who form such large majorities in the House of Commons must have some idea of the opinions of the constituencies they represent? Can you desire that those constituencies should receive as their first impression that the House of Lords and the Church—two Conservative institutions—are mixed up with a question which, rightly or wrongly, they conceive to be a question of justice and equality, as opposed to a question of privilege? Is it wise on your part to adopt a course which will induce the people of Ireland to believe that a House composed almost exclusively of landlords and Protestant Prelates is the only obstacle to the realization of that which they have so long and so ardently looked forward to? Some of you, probably, however much you may deprecate this disestablishment, believe that, sooner or later, it must happen. I would, therefore, ask you to consider the words which Lord Palmerston, whom I believe you all respect, employed when speaking on this subject—

"The great mistake made by all Governments, not only in this country, but everywhere, is to be too late in the measures which they adopt. Government comes down with its measure when the time of proposing it with effect is gone by, and a measure which may be the result of conviction and the spontaneous offering of modified opinions, and a concession to a sense of justice, wears to the public all the appearance of a surrender to fear."

Earl Granville

These words the great uttered, and ships to as this measure ful and pro you would give a fair, sideration t best to dea will conclu you for the have exten the giant cl liberty, wh passed away

"The grand commensurate State, so gri from its wor perennial distion."

Moved, "—(The Ear

EARL GRANVILLE
pear to you of great pre the noble a sack by giv I am about wards decl quest made the priority by the usag Motion in learned Lo Lordships any want o to the nob well how n your atten account of distinguish am to the r respects, th ture, which this Motion than by hi refuse—as Bill, recom Friend (Ea the greatest tion of it e of being e plying a de Lordships Ireland wh them with Church. I any party c of this Bill, and I trust that my past public conduct will equally exempt me from the suspicion of intending to maintain the existing state of the Established Church. From the first moment of my entrance on public life it has been my opinion, that to maintain the Church of a small minority of the Irish people in its present position was contrary alike to justice and to good policy. And since that time, during more than forty years, I have never lost a fair opportunity in this or the other House of Parliament, in or out of Office, of declaring that opinion without reserve, and striving to the very utmost of my power to give practical effect to it. That opinion I have in no degree changed. On the contrary, I have been only confirmed in the view of this subject which I adopted at the commencement of my Parliamentary life by all that has since occurred, and now at its close I hold that opinion more strongly than ever. I think now, as I thought then, that to maintain the Irish Establishment in its present state is a scandal to the country; a disgrace to us in the eyes of the whole civilized world; a source of weakness and of danger to the Empire; and, what is not the least of its evils, injurious to the true interests of religion. Notwithstanding the general excellence of the ministers of the Church in Ireland, it seems to me impossible to doubt that the effect of maintaining it in its present position is not to promote peace and good-will, and the spiritual improvement of the Irish people, but on the contrary, by the fierce dissensions it occasions, and the violent animosities it creates, it tends to check the growth of Christian virtues, and to foster in their place rancour and ill-will, in the minds of both Protestants and Roman Catholics. Entertaining this opinion it is no part of my duty to attempt to answer by far the larger part of the speech of my noble Friend who has just sat down. So far as his arguments were directed to prove the justice and good policy of a great change in the Irish Church Establishment, they command my entire concurrence. The only feeling I have to express with regard to them, is one of regret that my noble Friend and those who act with him were not sooner alive to their full force, and that they had not adopted those views two years ago when they stood in a position to give effect to them. The fault I have to find with my noble Friend's speech is, not that his argument on this point was wrong, but that he failed to follow it up and to show how it applied to the support of this Bill. He laboured to prove—and I agree with him that he laboured successfully—that a change of system is necessary, but he did not go on to show that this Bill is the right mode of arriving at it. This essential part of the subject he touched upon very briefly and imperfectly; he seemed to feel that he was treading upon very delicate ground, and that if he was not careful, the thin crust would break down with him. We have been told that this Bill is intended to prepare the way for the entire disestablishment and disendowment of the Protestant Church in Ireland. Perhaps my noble Friend did not use the word disendowment; but certainly this as well as disestablishment has been proclaimed by others to be what is intended. My Lords, I will not conceal my own opinion that this would not be the best mode of redressing the crying injustice of the existing system. I believe that a much better mode of doing this might be found; still I so far concur with my noble Friend that I would rather consent to go the full length of disestablishment and disendowment than allow things to remain as they are. But even if it could be proved that there were no alternative, and if I were therefore convinced that we must come to disestablishment and disendowment, I should not the less object to this Bill as not being the right mode of arriving at that end. I should condemn it as being calculated to increase instead of to diminish the difficulty of accomplishing the settlement that is desired, and to render the measure, when passed, less beneficial than it ought to be.

My noble Friend told us that the object of the Bill was very simple and very limited; that its only effect would be to suspend, so long as it remains in operation, making appointments to any benefices or dignities in the Irish Church that may fall vacant, except such as are in private patronage; and that it would do nothing to fetter the discretion of Parliament as to any permanent arrangements. This was a very euphemistic way of telling us that the Bill, in virtually destroying the existing system, does nothing towards establishing any other in its place—that it does not take one single step towards effecting a permanent settlement of this question, or towards determining what is to be the future position of the Church, or what is to be done with the property of which it is to be deprived. But allow me to remind you that the authors of this Bill have always told us that in proceeding to disestablish and disendow the Irish Church they admit that we are bound to respect vested interests and rights fairly created under the existing law, and also to enable the members of the Protestant Church in Ireland, like other religious communities, to make the best arrangements in their power for obtaining religious services according to the forms they approve. Now it is obvious that respect for vested interests and existing rights implies a good deal more than merely continuing their existing income to the clergy who now hold preferment. It is acknowledged that the property acquired by the Church by private benefactions since the Reformation cannot possibly be taken away from it; and these benefactions amount to a very large sum. Your Lordships all know that a member of the Church, whose recent death has been greatly lamented by all his countrymen, spent no less, I believe, than £150,000 in restoring, or rather in almost re-building, St. Patrick's Cathedral. No one proposes so flagrant an injustice as that the Cathedral restored by this magnificent liberality of one of its sons should be taken from the Church. Again, we are told that within our own time, in one diocese in Ireland no less than £27,000 has been placed at the disposal of the Bishop for Church purposes by two individuals: it is admitted that the property on which this money has been laid out cannot be taken away. Further than this, it has been announced that the churches and parsonages generally are to be left in the possession of the Protestant Church. But if so large an amount of valuable property is to be left to the Church, some arrangement must be made as to who is to hold it, and how its due application to the purposes for which it is intended is to be secured. It seems to be imagined that this can be provided for much more easily than will really prove to be the case. In some speeches on the subject, which must really have been made with very little consideration, it has been asked why should not the members of the Established Church in Ireland, when it loses the character of an Establishment, manage their own property just in the same way as the Roman Catholics and the various Dissenting Churches? It is apparently forgotten that all the property of voluntary by donation or for its maintenance is general is entitled to be managed it is determined by with respect there is no reason that a public is ceases to determine long, by and to which Legislation other objects apply her advantage, that justice this power part of her allow her application of them of necessity which without the created the deal with step for remind you nothing to much to the of the Church come vacant operation, pointed, a authority parishes—ments, which or otherwise the new Bill, the will immediate; and ent with justice should have provided the duties it whether it is organization create a new worst. Ob Irish Church should be passed. From that moment the filling up of all the vacancies in its benefices and dignities will be stopped. Now if that suspension should be continued, the Church, to use an expression I have heard, would "die by inches"; it would gradually be extinguished as an organized body. I am told that there is no danger of this, because this Bill is only to continue in operation till the 1st of August of next year. My Lords, it is a positive insult to our understandings to pretend that if we once impose this suspension of appointments we shall be able again to remove it. If the permanent legislation with respect to the Irish Church, which this Bill is intended to assist, cannot be accomplished next Session, we are sure that before its close a short Bill for the renewal of the Suspensory Act would be brought before us, which it would be impossible to refuse. Each succeeding year, while permanent legislation was delayed, there would be a stronger case for renewing this temporary provision, because each succeeding year there would be greater inconvenience in allowing the whole of the increasing number of vacant appointments to be suddenly filled up. No man who has the smallest experience of how things are practically managed in Parliament, and how easily temporary arrangements are prolonged from year to year, can doubt that that is what would happen. Well, then, the Church being thus reduced to a condition in which it would gradually die out if no further legislation should take place, you cannot fail to see in how disadvantageous a position it would be placed in considering measures of permanent legislation. Remember, that in deciding upon permanent arrangements there will be many most difficult questions to be considered. To legislate with respect to the Irish Church is a task which will prove embarrassing to the most experienced statesmen and the ablest lawyers. In discussing the measures that are to be adopted we also know that the Church will have to deal with bitter and not very scrupulous enemies. What security then can we have that the consideration of these measures, and with it the suspension of all appointments may not be indefinitely prolonged? Is it then fair to call upon the friends of the Church to consent to the passing of a Bill, the effect of which will be to compel them to come hereafter to the consideration of any permanent arrangement under this great disadvantage, that if they decline to accept the settlement that may be proposed to them, precisely as it is offered, they will be left under the operation of a law by which the Church will be gradually dying away? Would anything of this kind be considered reasonable in private life? Suppose there were a large property to be divided between two claimants, would it be fair that till the terms would be settled, one of them should be debarred from the exercise of any rights whatever, and be left without anything until he would consent to such an arrangement as his adversary might be pleased to offer? My Lords, one of the most distinguished advocates of the disestablishment of the Church has recently said with great truth and great wisdom, that it is good policy in a Government when making great changes of this kind to deal graciously and generously with those whom they must affect. Such reforms must of necessity bear hardly upon many persons; but all that is possible ought to be done to soften the blow, and to make the transition from the old to the new state of things as little painful as possible. Such is the wise maxim that was laid down, but how is it acted upon? Instead of dealing generously with the Church by this Bill you will refuse to it even bare justice; in a case in which of all others it was most necessary to avoid creating needless irritation, you propose to take a course which is wantonly offensive to the friends of the Church, and must produce a sense of wrong in their minds which will prevent the settlement you may ultimately make from being accepted, or even acquiesced in, as we must wish.

Earl Grey

Such, I say, is the character of the measure we are called upon to pass, and I would ask you why are we to do so? I listened very attentively to the speech of my noble Friend. I have read the reports in the newspapers of many other speeches in support of the Bill, and I can find only one useful purpose which it is alleged that it will answer. It is said that by passing this Bill we shall prevent new vested interests from being created while some permanent arrangement is under consideration; that is to say, if we do not pass this Bill, but wait till we can legislate permanently on the subject next year, it is probable that in the interval some vacancies will occur in livings and Church dignities in Ireland, to which persons must be appointed who will thereby acquire claims which will have to be considered when a final settlement is made—that a demand to the possible amount of a few thousand pounds additional may arise upon the property of the Church. If that property were urgently wanted for some useful purposes, for which it was likely to prove insufficient, I should acknowledge the force of this argument. But far from this being the case, it is notorious that the great embarrassment of those who insist upon the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church is what they are to do with the property of which they are resolved to deprive it. The authors of the Bill cautiously avoid giving us even a hint what is to be done with the property, and we quite understand why. It was impossible for them to say to what purposes this property should be applied without creating division in the motley army by which the Church is assailed. My Lords, it is to treat us like children to ask us to believe that the ostensible object for which we are asked to pass the Bill is the real one. We all know that this is a question which rises above one of mere money; it is a question of policy and of feeling, and a petty sum of a few thousand pounds is as nothing in considering it. When the professed object of the Bill is thus palpably insufficient to account for its introduction, can you be surprised that this should generally be regarded by the public as a mere party move, especially when you remember what passed in 1866? I ventured in that year, after you had renewed the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, to ask your Lordships to take into consideration the state of Ireland which had made that severe measure necessary, and I proposed to you to deal with this question of the Church as that which most demanded your attention. It was not in the slightest degree less necessary to do so then than it is now—all the circumstances which point to the need of a change with respect to the Irish Church existed at that time in as full force as at present, and there is not a single argument in favour of the measure which my noble Friend has now brought forward which I did not press upon your consideration in 1866. I acknowledge that I urged them with inferior force, but the arguments of my noble Friend are identically the same with my own. There is one circumstance, and one circumstance only, in which a change has occurred, and I confess that I heard with extreme astonishment my noble Friend refer to the Fenians, as reasons for which I did not formerly made a noble Friend definitely will he disclaim strangely unable to made if the constriction

EARL GREY that these people to this upon this

EARL GREY what I have said, argument. Are we to the people their grievance? Yes, noble Friend he said.

to make the and dispassionate the Irish that they ances with lence and no more d in favour further, a spect a w have been change. I received w from a Government Opposition with far made after ment had of the Hall English p at these m ately" by rage. I that have afford the a measure cannot con have been cession he because I wards, and manner a must lead the Irish people to think that the violence has had something to do with obtaining for them the boon they are now promised. And I have been informed by a gentleman well acquainted with Ireland, who spoke to me of his own knowledge, that in some parts of the country the language actually held by the peasants shows that such is the impression made upon their minds. When they are told that the Protestant Church Establishment will be put an end to, their answer is, "Well, it is those poor Fenians that have done it." This is, I think, a great misfortune. It is much to be lamented that this change was not attempted in 1866 instead of in 1868; yet, my Lords, you cannot forget that when the proposal was made in 1866 it was condemned in the most decided terms by my noble Friend behind me (Earl Russell), who contended that such a measure would do far more harm than good, and would tend to inflame instead of to appease the religious animosities which so unhappily prevail in Ireland. I will not quote Hansard, but I am sure your Lordships know that this was the substance of what was said by my noble Friend. Nor did my noble Friend speak for himself alone. He spoke as Prime Minister, and declared for himself and his Colleagues the opinion of the Government. Within this very month Mr. Gladstone himself is reported to have rebuked severely an attempt to question the responsibility of the present Administration as a whole for opinions expressed on this very subject of the Irish Church by one of its Members. Mr. Gladstone said, and with great justice, "That it is one of our first duties to decline to acquit any Member of the Cabinet of responsibility for the announced and declared policy of another." In 1866, therefore, my noble Friend must be considered as having spoken not only for himself but his Colleagues in declaring the policy of the Ministry, so that I can feel no astonishment that the change in the conduct of the party by which that Bill is brought forward should be very generally ascribed to the change in their position; and that the public should believe that it is to be accounted for by their impatient desire to recover what they have lost, which has led them to avail themselves of any weapon that came most readily to their hands to help them to force the doors of Downing Street. I will not impute to them such motives—I am ready and willing to believe that they have had other and better reasons for proposing this measure, though I am unable to comprehend them. But I do say that it is a great misfortune that they have taken a course so well calculated to create suspicion in the public mind upon this point. Few greater evils could befall the nation than that it should come to be believed that those who take a principal share in conducting its affairs, look less to the public good than to their own private interest, and the gratification of their own ambition. If this sort of distrust in public men were to become general, it would be a very great misfortune. I fear the events of last year have done much to create such a feeling; and the manner in which this question of the Irish Church has now been dealt with is calculated to make it even deeper than before.

Earl Grey

But this is not the only, nor the principal ground on which I condemn the course that has been taken in bringing forward this Bill. I object to it still more as being calculated to increase the difficulties of this very difficult subject, and to prevent a conciliatory and satisfactory settlement of the question from being effected. Let me remind your Lordships that our object should be not merely to redress a grievance, and to correct an injustice as regards the Church of Ireland. As statesmen our object ought to be something more than this. Our desire should be to assuage, and gradually to extinguish, those violent religious animosities which have been the bane of Ireland. Every man who really values the welfare of this great country must feel how extremely important it is that in doing justice to the Roman Catholics, we should endeavour to avoid alienating and offending the Protestants—that we should aim at a settlement which may conciliate both Protestants and Roman Catholics. But the course that has been taken makes it far less likely than it was that this result should be obtained. A short time ago there was, I think, a fair prospect that the settlement of this question by a compromise might be accomplished. In the debate in the House of Commons on the state of Ireland in the early part of the Session, the weakness of the position of those who would maintain the Irish Church as it is, was so clearly disclosed—it became so manifest that the existing state of things would not long continue, that there could be little doubt that if the question had been allowed to rest after the advantage that had been gained until the meeting of a new Parliament, it would then have been found absolutely necessary by the Ministers of the Crown, whoever they might have been, to propose some great change upon this subject. At the same time it was perfectly clear that nothing practically useful with regard to it could be accomplished in the present Session. Even if there had been time to consider and decide upon the various arrangements that must be made before permanent legislation can be attempted, the state of Public Business, the necessity of completing the recent changes in our representation, and the fact that a General Election with an enlarged constituency was impending, would have made it quite impossible that the subject would be properly dealt with during the present Session. What, under such circumstances, was the conduct to be expected from an Opposition led by judicious and sincere lovers of their country? It seems to me that such Leaders, while distinctly declaring their opinion as to the necessity of dealing with this question, would have abstained from bringing forward any specific proposal with regard to it at the present moment, and knowing how highly desirable it is to avoid kindling the passions of religious animosity during the General Election, they would, from prudence and a sense of public duty, have allowed this question to wait for settlement by a new Parliament. Unhappily a very different course was adopted. Resolutions were moved in the House of Commons, so drawn that it was impossible that they could be accepted by the Government, while they were highly offensive to the friends of the Church, and at the same time left it quite uncertain what permanent arrangement would be proposed. And these Resolutions were followed up by bringing in that Bill which, as I have endeavoured to show you, would, if passed, settle nothing with respect to the future, and would answer no really useful purpose, and would operate most unjustly to the Church. The effect of these proceedings has been to produce—as it ought to have been foreseen that they would produce—a great party fight on a subject which, above all others, it was desirable to keep so far as possible out of the range of party excitement. They have prepared the way for making the coming elections the means of stirring up the pernicious passions of religious hatred between Roman Catholics and Protestants in every part of the United Kingdom, and where the high, and

[First Night.

My Lord, this the increased conflict between the Lesions use—which noble Friars had content would be pecuniary Church maintained treated Ministers placed on their tions the parties which sh intention applied which sh own favo forthcom the unch by many Catholic I most de should be the Rom. a very i on which before the but it is that whic for calm by appea is unders posal on making light res have incu than it al this kind any man question versy whi to the Pr be finally either by on betwee ants and by an ext all the Ch any endow of the las

Earl Grey

obtained after a long and severe struggle; but that we must ultimately come to this, unless an amicable compromise can be effected, seems to me a matter of certainty. When I compare the strength and the moral power, in the actual state of public opinion, of the two parties arrayed against each other—the one to assault, the other to defend the existing arrangement—I cannot doubt that the final issue of the struggle must be to produce in one way or another a very great change in the present system. I am equally persuaded that for the interest of the whole Nation, for the welfare of Ireland more especially, and for the sake of producing peace for the future among all the Queen's subjects, it is infinitely desirable that that question should be settled by a compromise, by doing something for all the principal Churches, rather than by totally diverting from all religious uses the property now held by the Established Church of Ireland. I hold this opinion not merely because I hold that, as a general rule, it is better that the religious instruction of the people should be in part at least provided for by some public endowment, than by what is called the voluntary system. Without attempting to enter now into the general question—for which this is not a fit opportunity—I would merely say that I have always believed, and still believe, that in an old country like ours, the voluntary system cannot adequately provide for the spiritual needs of the people; and I also believe that it is not for the true welfare of either the laity or the clergy of any Church, that the pastors should be solely dependent on the pecuniary contributions of their flocks. The experience of the United States confirms me in that opinion. I cannot forget that before the breaking out of the late civil war in America, none or scarcely any of the various Churches in the United States ever ventured to take up that strong ground against slavery which the principles of Christianity fully and fairly acted upon would have required. Why did the clergy in these States shrink from condemning as they ought the sin of maintaining slavery, but because they were entirely dependent on their flocks? But without pursuing further the general argument in favour of a system of endowments for religious instruction, as opposed to the voluntary system, I would point out to your Lordships that there are special reasons arising from the actual state of Ireland, which make it peculiarily desirable that this question should be settled by a measure based on the principle of dividing the property of the Established Church in that country among the different Churches, instead of confiscating it for any secular purposes. I have already remarked that our great object ought to be to appease the religious dissensions which prevail in Ireland, and mitigate, if we cannot remove, the feelings of rancour between different classes of the people that these dissensions have created. But in the first instance at all events—after a time we might hope that the result would be different—I fear that a simple confiscation of the property of the Church might rather increase than diminish existing animosities. Such a measure would throw the ministers of the Protestant Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches for their support entirely on voluntary contributions, and to obtain such contributions they would be driven to use their utmost exertions in order to raise and to keep up the spirit of religious enthusiasm among the people. It is probable that for this purpose no topics would be found so effective as vehement denunciations of what are called the errors and abominations of Popery; and the sense of wrong arising from the confiscation of the property of the Church, together with the belief that the Roman Catholics had mainly contributed to bring it about, would tend to inflame the zeal of ardent Protestants in their attacks on the rival Church. We know that there are even now a large number of persons both in Ireland and in this country, who are earnestly striving to convert the Irish Roman Catholics from what are regarded as their religious errors, and that large sums of money are collected for carrying on this work. Mr. Bence Jones, in his excellent pamphlet giving a layman's view of the Irish Church question, states that no less a sum than £30,000 a year is raised by subscriptions in this country for the conversion of the Irish people to Protestantism. I cannot doubt that the opinion he expresses is correct, and that the effect of the disendowment of the Established Church in Ireland would be to give a great stimulus to these subscriptions, and that far larger sums than heretofore would be raised in this country to be applied in carrying on the labour of proselytism upon a greater scale and with more eagerness than ever. I do not believe that these exertions, however sincere and earnest the persons by whom they might be carried on, would be conducive to religious peace, or to the growth of a true Christian spirit among the Irish people.

[First Night.

There is another objection to the settlement of this question by the disestablishment and disendowment of the Protestant Church in Ireland, which has great weight in my mind. I mean the effect that this would have on the security of the Church in England. We are told indeed that the Church stands in so entirely different a position in England from what it does in Ireland, that a change which may be made with respect to the latter will have no effect upon the former. That argument has been used by my noble Friend, and he pointed out that the abolition of Episcopacy in Scotland had not injured, but had on the contrary been of service to the English Church. I agree with him that this has been the result of the wise course taken with respect to the Church in Scotland at the time of the Revolution, nor do I doubt that if you were to take a similar course in Ireland and were to preserve for religious uses the property now devoted to these purposes, only altering the mode of its application, not the smallest injury would arise to our own Church. I believe that to use the words of my noble Friend that it would be strengthened by such a measure. But the case will be very different if you determine to establish the voluntary system in Ireland. If you should determine that in that part of the United Kingdom all religions shall be left to depend upon the voluntary exertions of their members, that no funds under the control of the State, whether derived from the National Treasury, or from property set apart in past ages for religious uses, shall be applied to religious purposes—and if you should thus establish the pure voluntary system in Ireland on the ground that this is what is best for the people, the example, it seems to me, will be full of danger to the Church of England. And my fears as to the effect of this example were not a little increased when my noble Friend, referring to what had taken place in the Australian colonies, described in such glowing terms the increase of strength and of power which our Church had gained there from being deprived of all pecuniary assistance from the State. Without stopping to point out some important facts with reference to the Australian colonies, which I think my noble Friend has mistaken or overlooked, I must observe that his argument since the time from it is the cumbrance I am persularizing the Ireland, yet the security while no would arise dividing the religious whole Irish sure would another in that from has been the our most and politic other the land ought the State. ral opinion even so is the present by a noble who has ex which he ment, a p ought to b lics. If opinion, i the groun he conside be carried. and know venture to myself, he will not in it would land that lic Church to be adop the advant ing some p olergy is acknowledged by the rem ticable." impractica hearts the have not boldly to now have would have if it is so, duct of th this Bill, they have sorted the one time contemplated a measure involving some grant to the Roman Catholic Church. I confess I should feel much greater respect than I do for Her Majesty's Ministers if I thought this assertion were well-founded; but, unfortunately, I have not sufficient confidence in their wisdom and statesmanship to believe that they had ever seriously contemplated adopting a large and generous policy on this subject. But however little they may have thought of doing so, I believe that if they had not been forced by party attacks to a premature decision and declaration of their policy,—if they had been allowed to apply themselves seriously to this great question at the close of the Session, unhampered by declarations of opinion extorted from them beforehand, they would have been almost irresistibly led by the force of circumstances to decide on some measure which would have included a grant to the Roman Catholic Church. After what had occurred in the early part of the Session they must have felt on the one hand the impossibility of standing still and maintaining things as they are; and they would have been met on the other hand by the equal, or rather the still greater, impossibility of discovering any other mode of dealing with the subject which they could have proposed with even a chance of success. The circumstances of the time, moreover—but for the bringing forward of this unfortunate Bill—would have offered singular advantages and facilities for attempting the settlement of this question on the principle of a compromise. Men's minds were prepared for some great change with respect to the Irish Church, and all felt its necessity. It would in this state of things have been in the power of the Government to propose an arrangement to the leaders of the different Churches, which probably might and certainly ought, to have commanded their acceptance. To the Protestant Episcopal Church they might have held out the prospect of obtaining in return for a surrender of all offensive claims to a higher social position than the Roman Catholics and of a portion of its property, security for its greatly diminished income, together with liberty to apply that income to the best advantage, and a hope of increased usefulness from being relieved from the odium and the imputation of injustice which now attach to it. To the Roman Catholics they might have offered the absolute removal of the last traces of the old Protestant ascendancy and complete social equality, with a large share of the Church property granted to them in such a manner as to give material relief to the poorest part of the population, without trenching in the slightest degree on the independence of their Church. And to the Presbyterians they might have offered an increase of the very inadequate grant they now enjoy in the Regium Donum, with an improvement in the terms on which it is held. If the Servants of the Crown had been able by confidential communications with the leaders of the several Churches to bring them to agree to some such arrangement as this, I think your Lordships will agree with me in believing that the proposal would have been hailed with the welcome of an immense majority of the most intelligent part of the nation; that a Bill for carrying it into effect, submitted to a new Parliament, not elected under feelings of religious bigotry studiously excited, would have commanded its assent; and that the Ministry which carried it, would have performed a greater public service than it has been the lot perhaps of any administration for the last 100 years to achieve. I do not mean, my Lords, to assert that the Ministers would have adopted the policy I have described or would have succeeded if they had; but I do say, that as it was at least possible, and I believe probable, that they might if they were inclined to make the attempt; no difficulty ought to have been thrown in their way. Unfortunately such a difficulty—I fear an insuperable one—has been created by bringing forward this Bill and the Resolutions on which it was founded. The effect of these proceedings has been to place Ministers in the dilemma of being compelled either to subject themselves to odium and mis-representation by avowing an intention to deal with this most difficult question of the Irish Church, before any scheme for doing so could be explained or matured, and before there had been time to enter into previous communication with those whose interests would have been affected; or else to disclaim, as they have done, any intention of a change of policy, thus making it more difficult for them hereafter to propose a satisfactory measure. This may help to bring together a new House of Commons which will pass a Vote of Want of Confidence in the present Government; but this will have been purchased by a sacrifice of the national interest, and even as a party move, I believe, in the long run, the course taken by the Opposition will prove to have been a mistake. If I do not mistake the signs of opinion which I observe, it may be found that this course has not tended to secure for those who have advised it the confidence of that large body of calm and impartial men in the nation, who seldom interfere in politics, but generally in the end give the preponderance to one or the other of contending parties. I do not believe that men of this sort will be disposed to look up to the promoters of this Bill as wise and conscientious statesmen whom they may safely follow.

Earl Grey

[First Night.]

There is only one more topic on which I must trouble your Lordships with a few words. My noble Friend (Earl Granville) at the close of his speech endeavoured, though in a very guarded manner, to impress upon you the inexpediency of rejecting a Bill which has come up from the other House sanctioned by such large majorities. My Lords, I have great respect for the House of Commons, and I know that neither this House nor the other can resist the deliberate and settled opinion of the nation; but I deny that the opinion of the nation is always to be collected from the vote of even a large majority of the House of Commons. The shifting currents of party contests sometimes give large majorities in that House in favour of measures not approved by the deliberate judgment of the nation, and I believe this to be the case with regard to the Bill now before us. It was most imperfectly discussed in the other House; many of the chief objections to it were never even stated, much less considered as they ought to have been, and it was hastily passed by a mere party vote. I am persuaded that the country already begins to see that this Bill is not the right way of proceeding even with a view to what is professed to be its ultimate object. And if we reject it, not as being determined to resist a complete change of system with regard to the Church in Ireland, but on the ground of its being a crude, partial and mischievous proposal, calculated not to promote but to impede a fair settlement of the question—if, by so doing, your Lordships mark your disapproval of the manner of dealing with this question, I believe you will establish a new claim to the confidence of the nation, and that your decision will be hardly less useful from its tending to maintain the character and authority of this House, than from its arresting measure of

Earl Grey

Amend and inser
(The Earl

THE E Lords, I your Lord House, an not to de at the as some confi is my du what the subject ar take the u delivery c (Earl Gre side as t
I enter i important magnify i Parliamen measure i the same fore I ent adverting been intro say, looki sure, that ships' tabl ful manne usually ad vity. Co sacred pa that it dea
the two o little strat
it would other Hou any preli Lordships was about doubt we,
vernment,
sit in the which we Assembly;
the news threatened House wa Establishe measure o to your L not the us confide to you were have this thought th

in the way which you might desire to avoid, it would not have put you to very much trouble to have followed precedents, and—in accordance with what I might call the Parliamentary affection between the two Houses—to have communicated the Resolutions of the House of Commons to the House of Lords. As you did not adopt that course, am I wrong in thinking you did not appreciate the importance of this question? Am I wrong in saying that your conduct has been attributed to other than patriotic motives and a desire to consult the interests of the Irish people? Would not an observance of the ordinary courtesies between the two Houses have been better calculated to prevent difficulties than the course which has been followed? What is the result? Why, that, as the noble Earl (Earl Grey) has said, this question is thrown on the House and the country without time being given for its consideration. One House seems to be legislating entirely for themselves, without any respect for the other. Could we have expected that this question would be brought before Parliament during the present Session? It may perhaps be alleged that it was of so pressing a character, and one so universally felt throughout the whole country, that we must have expected it to be brought forward. The reverse is the fact. So far from expecting this question to be raised and to emanate from the quarter it has come, we did not expect it to be raised at all, and much less did we expect that it would emanate from the quarter in which it has been initiated. If your Lordships consider what has taken place within the last two years, you will be somewhat surprised at what has recently happened. At the last General Election this question of the Irish Church was not even mentioned upon the hustings: the Reform Bill completely absorbed the attention of the public. The very mooter of this question now—I have no wish to speak disrespectfully of him, though he has thrown the Business of the entire Session into confusion by his Motion—this very Gentleman declared two years ago to a constituent that he had no idea of even considering this question of the Irish Church. For, what did Mr. Gladstone say? It appears that a member of his committee, suspecting that he was not as staunch as he formerly had been to the principles which he held with respect to the Irish Church, communicated with Mr.

Gladstone, desiring to know what were really his ideas; and Mr. Gladstone in his answer said—

“The question of the Irish Church is remote”—mind, this is only a couple of years ago—and apparently out of all bearing on the practical politics of the day. I think I have marked strongly my sense of the responsibility attaching to the opening of such a question. One thing, I may add, because I think it is a clear landmark. In any measure dealing with the Irish Church, I think—I scarcely expect ever to be called on to share in such a measure—the Act of Union must be recognized, and must have important consequences, especially with reference to the hierarchy.”

I ask any noble Lord whether he could have expected that within little more than two years from the writing of that letter, Mr. Gladstone should be the very man to raise this storm? I am willing to extend to the speeches and the policy of Ministers and statesmen a very handsome statute of limitation; but when we find statements deliberately made upon so sacred a subject, we are entitled to refer to them, even after the lapse of years. Could we have expected that Mr. Gladstone would have been the man to move in this matter after the speech which he made against the noble Earl opposite on the question of the Appropriation Clause?

EARL RUSSELL: What date?

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: The 31st of March, 1835. On that occasion Mr. Gladstone said—

“The most important consequences would attend the Motion before the House. In the first place, it would enfeeble and debase, and then altogether overthrow the principle on which the Church Establishment rested. The noble Lord invited them to invade the property of the Church in Ireland. He considered that there were abundant reasons for maintaining that Church; and if it should be removed he believed that they would not be able long to resist the repeal of the Union, and then they would become fully aware of the evil of surrendering the principle which the noble Lord called upon them to give up.”—[3 Hansard, xxvii.]

Extending, as I have said, a handsome statute of limitation to politicians on both sides of the House, could we have expected that, after such a speech, and, still more, after the letter so recently written to a Member of his own Committee, we should have this Bill presented to us at the instance of Mr. Gladstone? And I will ask your Lordships not to be misled by the clauses of this Bill. The real meaning of this Bill is found in the first Resolution passed in the House of Commons, and it means, in plain English, that the Church of Ireland is to cease to exist. However, you twist the matter—whether you desire it or whether you fear it—that is really the question before your Lordships to-night. The Bill itself is framed and brought before this House in a very insidious manner, and my noble Friend who introduced the measure in effect said of it—If any of your Lordships entertain moderate views with respect to the Irish Church, if you wish to improve, but still to preserve it, you will be quite safe in voting for the Bill, and the measure itself will be perfectly innocent, because if such are your sentiments you would wish, of course, equally with us, to suspend, till there has been further legislation, the action of the Crown with regard to appointments. As to whether such a course, if proposed bona fide, would be a proper one, I do not now pause to offer any opinion. I will only point out that Her Majesty's Government proposed the issue of a Commission with the object of getting all the information they could upon the subject of the Irish Church. But the Report of the Commission has not been waited for. And it certainly does appear upon the face of it that if the object were to insure the adoption of such reforms as may be recommended on the face of that Report, the presentation of the Report itself would form the natural prelude to any action of that nature. But a stop is put to any expectations of the kind by the language of the first Resolution. There is an end of all modifications, of all reforms, of all moderate measures, because you say in the first Resolution, "Delenda est Carthago." I beg you not to lose sight of that; you have no choice; this Bill is a mere prelude to the putting in force of the first Resolution passed by the House of Commons. And as the noble Earl on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey) very correctly pointed out, we have not the slightest hint meanwhile of the intentions of the Opposition, either now or if ever they come into Office: they do not give us the slightest indication of what is to become of the churches, the incumbents, or the people who profit by their ministrations. The whole thing is left in the dark; and your Lordships are told to vote this night for a preparatory Bill to some totally unknown measure. My Lords, however courageous may be your political aspirations, I do not believe you will venture to take such a step. Now, why is this Irish Church to be destroyed?

[First Night.

The Earl of Malmesbury

why is it to be destroyed? T—such an act—and that completely pose, is the has in view this object present Bill hand in pre understood ought to be measure of make him—ther or no, self does heart that doubt, paci land?

EARL GREY

THE EARL GREY: I do not think this Bill—this Bill—tholies? I will not q writing in your Lords said, not by and Roman Tenant Ri inaugurate meeting of of Meath?

"The one, land is the as that again up for party bigotry into lations betw the ruin of that social avert."

That is the Society. At a meeting, President, effect was

"As citizens side of the q object for a is to root out practice whi of the Church the law. Wh practices? Act is one count we ne ence of the religious char unjust pose by robbery a the legislati on its so-called Bishops; and whatever else belongs to its temporal character as an Establishment. Another set of cases is the penal laws directed against the Jesuits and other religious Orders, those odious enactments which make the greatest benefactors to religion and humanity felons, for rendering the truest services to God and to their neighbour. . . . And the Coronation Oath and the Act of Settlement, which limit the possession of the Crown to Protestants, and make the conversion to genuine Christianity a forfeiture of title."

According to that declaration, therefore, Cardinal Cullen would by no means be satisfied with the disestablishment of the Irish Church, but insists that the Crown shall be thrown open to the professor of any religion whatever. At a meeting of Roman Catholic priests, held at Limerick, on the 23d of December, 1867, four Resolutions were adopted, of which the fourth ran as follows:—

"That the very nature of the remedies required to make Ireland rich and contented renders it impossible for a British Parliament to adopt and apply them; and, besides that, home aspirations and the plea for Irish intervention from abroad can never be met unless by restoring Ireland her nationality, re-establishing the Sovereign and the Lords and Commons of Ireland."

In vain do I look for any hope of realizing those dreams sketched for us by the noble Earl. If we could entertain any such hope we might be encouraged to pass those measures which the Resolutions come to by the other House foreshadow. I have been deeply impressed by a letter written on this subject by a right rev. Prelate, whose position as regards Ireland and the Roman Catholic Church is of such importance that every word he says must be weighed with the greatest attention. It is true Dr. Manning, to whom I refer, has not risen to the highest ranks of his Church, but his prestige is so high, the regard in which he is held is so great, and his zeal as a propagandist so unquestionable, that he becomes a most dangerous opponent in controversy, while at the same time his conscientiousness enforces our respect. Now, let us see whether he encourages us to hope that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would pacify the Roman Catholics of Ireland. In his letter to the noble Earl on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey) he tells us in the first place that all the penal statutes and everything that would mortify Irish Roman Catholics must be abolished; he then proceeds to say that the main question, which nothing else can over-ride, is the land question. Now, my Lords, let me ask you to listen to what a Roman Catholic priest of the greatest authority says of the land question—

"And now, my Lord, I will not shrink from venturing even upon the land question, because it is the chief and paramount condition on which the peace of Ireland depends. In comparison with this question all others are light. . . . I will begin, then, by affirming that there is a natural and divine law, anterior and superior to all human and civil law, by which every people has a right to live on the fruits of the soil on which they are born, and in which they are buried. This is a right older and higher than any personal right. It is the intrinsic right of the whole people and society, out of which all private rights to the soil and its fruits are created, and by which those created rights must always be controlled. A starving man commits no theft if he saves his life by eating of his neighbour's bread so much as is necessary for the support of his existence. The civil law yields before the higher jurisdiction of the divine, as the positive divine law yields before the natural law of God."

Dr. Manning denies and is bound by his religion to deny the Bible to the labourer, but he has substituted for that Book one of the most inflammatory pamphlets I have ever known to be published. I ask any of your Lordships whether, if this passage which I have quoted were read to an uneducated man, that man would not think his Bishop was authorizing him to steal whatever he conceived he needed? Dr. Manning goes on—

"The poor are joint owners of the usufruct. The land being a fixed quantity, and the people an extending quantity, it is inevitable that the pre-occupation of the whole area of the country by a small number of landlords must have the effect of excluding or disinheriting the greater part of the people from all possession of the soil."

Why, my Lords, this is nothing but pure communism written by the leader of our Roman Catholic populations; and I ask your Lordships whether after this you can hope to pacify Ireland by the violent measures recommended by such priests, and produce those good fruits which alone can justify the passing of such a Bill?

Now, my Lords, one of the charges made against the Church of Ireland is that it does not fulfil its mission; these, I think, were the words of my noble Friend. But I have a statement here by the Roman Catholic Bishops of Cashel and Clonfert, strongly recommending that Catholic Universities should be established. They say—

"How many a Catholic lost his faith in Trinity College, let the long array of names familiar to the public testify—of sizers, and scholars, and fellows, of high dignitaries, too, even of Bishops—some living, some dead, all witnesses to the danger of such a place to Catholics, for they were born and baptized in the bosom of the Catholic Church, and they lost their faith in Trinity College. If some Catholics have passed through Trinity College without having lost it, quasi per ignem, others have made shipwreck of the faith by openly passing over to Protestantism, and others again have had their faith so undermined as on their deathbed to refuse the ministrations of religion."

[First Night.

So the Roman Catholics, at all events, bear witness to the fact that the union of Protestants and members of their own Church in Trinity College has brought about many conversions to Protestantism. Then the Irish Church is complained of because it does not proselytise, and that the number of Protestants does not increase; but here is a letter to my noble Friend near me (the Earl of Derby), signed by an incumbent of eight years, and the writer says—

"When a young man I was appointed to a curacy in a midland county. The population was rural, and consisted almost entirely of small farmers, with from twenty acres to fifty acres each, and these they generally managed to cultivate by the hands of their own families. The property belonged to an English proprietor, who had cleared the estate of all the old tenancies, and divided it in this manner. About one-fourth of the population was Protestant and the rest were Roman Catholics. The Holy Scriptures had found an entrance into almost every house, and the results were remarkable. Every Sunday morning in the Communion Service, as I concluded the Nicene Creed, one or more Roman Catholics, each accompanied by two Protestants, left their pews and came to me at the Communion-table, and asked to be received into the Protestant Church of Ireland. Each of these Roman Catholics had been carefully examined by myself some time before, and I now received them publicly, according to a form prescribed by my Bishop. The effect of this going on Sunday after Sunday was very striking, and continued for six months without the exception of a single Sunday. During those six months I received 110 persons, being an average of more than four persons each Sunday."

The writer proceeds to say that the greatest terror existed among the Roman Catholic population lest their conversion should be known, because many converts had been shockingly persecuted. These cases, all of which occurred in his own parish, he fully describes with names and dates.

Something was said by the noble Earl (Earl Granville) regarding the fears your Lordships might entertain if the Irish Church were disestablished; but I cannot help thinking that as he proceeded in his speech my noble Friend's arguments were rather directed against Establishments of all kinds. He gave us an account of the prosperity and Christian feeling existing among the members of the Churches in America, to use the gentleman's words. I cannot but think that a very great number of people of this country wish to see as you now State Church a gentleman to and he speaks of religion in America, but the ideas on the church, with several producing a morning Catholics of Dissent are succeeded two hours two. I saw the day, I promenaded mixed together on a gentleman as was wanting try than I did not but I met noble Friend like to put It is not impossible because I the Irish word — Church as leg without on this he the sentiment attack. Commons tion of i Establish of its b Gladstone not liable case. But he is associated Colleague them are rarely, an all State mistake. a declaration Mr. Bright ships, from your acquaintance with human nature, must know that when a strong will and a vacillating will come side by side, the latter is absorbed by the former, and the strong becomes stronger than before. The right hon. Gentleman may have no intention of the sort at present; but, looking at his own position, and bearing in mind the character of his Colleagues we may, before many years are past, see him coming forward and vindicate his consistency, employing similar arguments against the English Establishment that he now uses against that of Ireland.

The Earl of Malmesbury

Now, my Lords, we have heard a good deal said about the respect which is to be paid to vested interests, and, as far as I can understand, those vested interests relate to the Archbishops, Bishops, and clergy of the Church. But, my Lords, I want to know what is to become—not of the vested interests of Bishops and Archbishops—but of the vested interests of the poor? The poor of this country have a right to their churches, and the clergy cannot refuse to attend them in their last moments, or to visit them in time of sickness. That right has been theirs since Saxon and Norman times; for there has always been a State Church, though the form of religion may have changed. What is to become of the poor in Ireland if this measure is carried? Why, my Lords, one thing above all astonishes me, and that is, that this Bill should be supported by so large a number of Dissenters and Nonconformists in this country. I should like them to re-consider their opinion on this matter, because I cannot conceive anything more blind on their part than that they should contend for the destruction of the English Establishment. Where we look upon the Roman Catholic religion with mistrust and suspicion, their feeling is one of positive repugnance. The gulf between them and the Roman Catholics is far greater than the one between the Roman Catholics and the members of the Established Church. The destruction of the Established Church involves the destruction of the rampart which that Establishment now presents between them and Roman Catholicism. When that rampart has disappeared it will be impossible for them to contend with the superiority of the Roman Catholic organization. They must disappear; they will be swept away, and, in a religious sense, perish and lose their entire independence. This desire for the destruction of the Established Church is not, I know, held by all Dissenters. There are some Dissenters as much opposed to the spoliation of the State Church as we are; but I look with regret and great astonishment at the favour with which many of them view this change. If your Lordships will permit me, I will remind you of the opinions held by men as great as any now sitting in either House of Parliament. Sir Robert Peel, speaking in 1833, not of the disestablishment of the Church, but of the abstraction of a portion of its revenues by the Appropriation Clause, said—

“If long possession and the prescription of more than three centuries were not powerful enough to protect the property of the Church from spoliation, there would be little safety for private property of any description, and still less for that description of public property which was in the hands of lay corporations.”—[8 Hansard, xv. 370.]

The Duke of Wellington spoke as follows on the 18th of March, 1844:—

“With respect to the Church of Ireland, I beg of your Lordships to recollect that the Protestant Church in Ireland has existed in that country for a period of nearly 300 years; that it was maintained in that country during a century of contests, rebellions, and massacres; that during a contest for the possession of the Crown the Protestants of that country encountered that contest and kept possession of their Church; that during another century it was maintained through much opposition, and under difficulties of all descriptions; that at the period of the Union the Parliament, who had the power either to consent to the Union or to refuse their consent, stipulated that the Protestant Church in Ireland should be maintained, and maintained on the same footing as the Protestant Church of England in this country. My Lords, the Parliament of Ireland had, under the auspices of the King of this country, the power of either making or not making that compact. Your Lordships entered into that compact with the Parliament of Ireland, and I entreat you never to lose sight of the fact; I entreat you not to suffer yourselves to be prevailed on to make any alteration in, or to depart in the slightest degree from, the terms of that compact, so long as you intend to maintain the Union between this country and Ireland. It is the foundation upon which the Union rests—it is a compact which you entered into with the Parliament of Ireland, and from which you cannot depart without being guilty of a breach of faith.”—[8 Hansard, lxxiii. 1171.]

Dr. Slevin, Professor of Canon Law at Maynooth, said in 1826—

“I consider that the present possessors of Church property in Ireland, of whatever description they may be, have a just title to it. They have been bonâ fide possessors of it for all the time required by any law for prescriptions, even according to the pretensions of the Church of Rome, which requires 100 years.”

[First Night.

That is the opinion of the Roman Catholic Professor of Canon Law at Maynooth. Mr. Plunket, in advocating Roman Catholic claims on the 6th of May, 1824, said—

"The hon. Member (Mr. Hume) evidently thought that Parliament were at liberty to deal with the property of the Church exactly in the same way as if it were a tax or any other property of the State; and this opinion he grounded upon a supposition of public necessity. Now, that the property of the Church might not be interfered with as well as the property of the State in a case of public necessity he would not assert; but he it observed that upon the same principle the private property of every man in the kingdom was equally liable. He knew very well that both the property of the Church and the property of individuals must yield to the exigencies of the State; to those the property of the hon. Gentleman himself, as well as of every other Member who heard him, must give way; but he would maintain that the property of the Church was as sacred as any other. . . . With respect to the Protestant Establishment of the country, he considered it necessary for the security of all sects, and he thought that there should not only be an Established Church, but that it should be richly endowed, and its dignitaries be enabled to take their stations with the nobles of the land. But, speaking of it in a political point of view, he had no hesitation to state that the existence of the Protestant Establishment was the great bond of union between the two countries, and if ever that unfortunate moment should arrive when they would rashly lay their hands on the property of the Church to rob it of its rights, that moment they would seal the doom and terminate the connexion between the two countries."—[2 Hansard, xl. 571-2 & 574.]

My Lords, I have quoted these passages from the speeches of men who occupied a distinguished position in both Houses of Parliament, and it certainly does seem to me that I do not weaken them when I repeat them, for the warning they give appears as it were a voice from another world. These are the deliberate judgments of men of vast ability and experience—all of whom served their country, one of whom saved it—all of whom loved it, and watched over its interests with a passionate devotion. If ever you regarded with gratitude and veneration their great services, I entreat you now calmly to consider and give weight to their opinion, and then I am satisfied you will follow the course to which I invite you, and will reject the proposition which has been made for reading this Bill a second time.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, I will commence with the same promise which was given by my noble Friend who has just sat down—to be brief—and as the best way of keeping to that promise, I will not attempt to do so. I have been the p noble Fri

The Earl of Malmesbury

House. I ing my re
the cross-I been the p tion to thi about the ought to very activ towards c
Church I regard fo leads me satisfaction
He contri turn; for of bitter made the tion of ac House the sition of t happened in the pe who com they hinc diot. Bu brought have a li under wh propositio while he not havin referred appears t his great we have own lips, in activit that this convenien himself p

"That the Irish C minority is and that w injustice it property o of Commis divide the proportion tween the and the P
He woul
come of t
the hand to differ as of a h
Bill shou until the

pointments in the Irish Church. I will not follow my noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) for the same reason. In fact, he knows as little of Ireland as he does of any foreign country. He has, indeed, read us the account of a gentleman who he says has signed his name; but the same gentleman has sent his accounts to everybody else, and we all know that it is thirty-four years since his proselytizing success occurred. My Lords, knowing that many Peers are most anxious to address you on this subject, I long hesitated before I ventured to trespass on your attention; but having been long officially connected with Ireland, and having the warmest interest in that country, I am desirous of explaining the vote I shall give and taking my share of the responsibility which attaches to my noble Friend (Earl Granville) and those who have brought forward this Bill. I wish, also, to protest against being thought either sacrilegious or adverse to the interests of religion because I presume to discuss or desire to alter the social status and political power of the Established Church in Ireland. I wish, also, to express my strong disbelief that this Church has so utterly failed to root itself in the hearts and consciences of its members that its inestimable benefits are not sufficiently appreciated to make it independent of what is called Establishment—of State aid and countenance. I think that the State—that is Parliament—has a right, clear and undoubted, to sever the connection between the Church and State whenever it deems it to be for the public good to do so; and I believe it to be for the good of Ireland and for the good of England that the Established Church, so far as Ireland is concerned, should cease to be connected with the State. I say this, because my noble Friend seems to think the Bill now before your Lordships is not a bond fide Bill—that it does not carry its real purpose on the face of it, and that its real meaning is disestablishment. I do not agree with the noble Earl. I understand it to be a Bill for the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and nothing else. That is, at all events, what I mean. Looking at it in this light, it only remains to ask, Does the Irish Established Church fulfil the objects for which it exists? Does it satisfy the hopes and intentions of its supporters? Is it a cause of peace and union, and the means of propagating the truth; or is it a source of constant complaint and ill-blood to a large portion of

Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland? I say it does cause bad blood, and I say it has completely failed as a Missionary Church. I say it is the direct source of continual discontent to the Native population. I would ask still more—whether this Church is kept and maintained by reverence and affection, or by force? I ask your Lordships whether, supposing Ireland at this moment to be a tabula rasa, and the question had to be settled by the Lords Spiritual and temporal, would you plant such a Church in Ireland? What does all your knowledge and experience teach you? That it has utterly failed as a Missionary Church—that it is notoriously, necessarily impotent. It is a constant source of grievance to millions of your fellow-subjects whom it is our interest to conciliate, and whom we have no right to offend. It is also the occasion of contempt against us to foreign nations, who regard it as a practical commentary on all our lectures of morality, moderation, and the rights of the people, and in reply to all our arguments for toleration invariably point to the Irish Church, and tell us to pluck the beam out of our own eye before we presume to pull out the mote in our brother's eye. I say it is impotent as a Missionary Church, not on account of its doctrine, but on account of its social status and political power—Protestant ascendancy meaning in Ireland Catholic subjugation and inferiority; and when it is called nothing but a “sentimental” grievance, let us ask ourselves how long we ourselves should be willing to submit to such a grievance imposed upon us by those whose only right to do so was that some of their religious opinions were different from some of ours? We should also bear in mind that it is absolutely a point of honour with the Roman Catholics of Ireland not to leave their Church, because to do so would be to leave a Church that has been stamped with the stigma of inequality and inferiority in favour of one which the State has invested with adequate revenues and with a position of superiority. I was long enough in Ireland to know what missionary work really was, and I know it was scarcely attempted by the Established Church, but was carried on by means of money from England, and therefore was entirely the result of voluntary effort. Well, if there be any truth in this—if we cannot boldly and conscientiously stand up in the face of the world and defend the Established Church as an institution, why should we not have the courage to pass a final sentence of condemnation? My noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) says there is a Royal Commission still sitting, and that great reforms will be introduced. But, my Lords, they will come too late—it is too late now to adopt a middle course. The time has gone by for such a policy. The friends of the Irish Church were not wise in time; they did not see that concessions made in time might have produced a different policy, and that a house without a foundation was not likely to stand an assault. But now a crisis has come in Ireland—I do not speak of the Fenian conspiracy or the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; but I mean that general conviction which has taken hold of the minds of men that things are not right, that justice is not done; and, notwithstanding indications of material prosperity, discontent is greater and more general. I say, therefore, that until the evils which exist in Ireland be remedied, the right arm of England is paralyzed, and we cannot hold our true position among nations. Well, if it be admitted, and it cannot be denied, that the Irish Church constitutes one of those evils, why not make a vigorous effort to do away with it? I should myself be most happy if I thought it possible to do justice to Ireland without disestablishing the Church; but I declare I see no other means of arriving at that religious equality which is necessary for Ireland, and indispensable to the character of this country, both at home and abroad. My Lords, I can only say that I have been much with foreigners, many of them ardent admirers of our institutions, of our liberties, of the vigour of our character, and the general rectitude of our rule; but none of them have ever been able to reconcile the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland with that love of justice and toleration which manifests itself in Englishmen in other respects. Many a time, in answer to their inquiries I have felt deeply humiliated at my inability to defend the Irish Establishment. My Lords, I will take the liberty of reading a very short extract from a widely circulated journal; and I ask your Lordships to listen to it because it shows in a striking manner the anomalies of the Irish Church. It is said to be from the pen of an illustrious foreign resident in this country:—

“As we have already stated, the Established Church of Ireland numbers 12 Bishops, 622 vicars, and 1,500 parsons, amounts to a number of all those who to what r 603,357. The State Church without a shilling does, the few souls, we will Church claim one clergyman per head, which is 8 Anglicans in them in the possession 100. a budget of annually for of churches Anglicans in this costly nature of assistance but they for lation of the charge; the into 9 per cent grants a certificate to insignificant. The inequality it is borne clergy are cost, are the the descendants island.”

The Earl of Clarendon

Nothing can be said to need not to the mind of critics. My care what less I can the first part second part because the nations are all pride on the means the success. We understand risk, and of humanly faithfully that no entered in That is an nations of Irish Church cause people moderation oppression (the Earl the disestablishment will immerse Ireland. Ireland is too much of that country to think that it will at once produce contentment, loyalty, and prosperity "as by the stroke of the enchanter's wand." Old wounds, my Lords, do not heal so quickly as that. But let us do what is just and expedient; let us satisfy our consciences, and if we do we shall disestablish the Irish Church. The Royal Commission may recommend great reductions in dignitaries and Bishops, and a different distribution of revenues; but that will not allay the grievance of which the Irish people complain. The same argument applies to this proposal to disestablish the Irish Church which applied last year to the Government measure of Reform. The late Government introduced a moderate measure for the reduction of the franchise; a measure which I say advisedly would three years ago have produced general satisfaction, and would have lasted for ten or twenty years. But the Government which turned them out for attempting an increase of the constituency, which was denounced as revolutionary, were at that very time passing through that unconscious curriculum which enabled them, I will not say to go out with honours, but to open the gates to the great democracy. Well, my Lords, I hope that the same principles will be acted upon now—that your Lordships will feel that "bit by bit" reform with the Irish Church will not do, and that you will also apply that true Conservative doctrine of not making wry faces at what is inevitable. I say that this measure is inevitable, because right opinion and sound policy is in its favour. Notwithstanding the efforts of the Prime Minister to get up a religious cry—notwithstanding his statement after dinner that the Liberal party was divided in a policy hostile to religion, property, and law—notwithstanding all this the Irish Established Church will be disestablished. My Lords, the only reason that I heard to the contrary—the only reason that my noble Friend who has just sat down put forward is, that if you disestablished the Irish Church the English Church will be involved in the same fate. I utterly deny the truth and validity of such reasoning, because, in the first place, I believe in my conscience it will bring safety, and not danger, to the Church. But even if it were true, that would be no reason for persevering in a wrong course. If you proclaim your fears, whether real or imaginary, that if you act justly towards Ireland it may be the means of injuring the English Church, I cannot fancy any better argument for a repeal of the Union. As I have said before, I am perfectly convinced that the reason to which I have alluded is no reason whatever with regard to the English Church, because the case of the two Churches is entirely dissimilar—they do not occupy similar positions—they are in a different category. The position of the Irish Church was so well described by my noble Friend behind me that I will pass it over. But this I will say, that if the position of the two Churches were alike then the same measure would apply to both. But they are wholly dissimilar. The Church of England depends on the good-will of the majority of the nation; her clergy minister to the spiritual wants of the people in a manner that is acceptable to them; and be assured that it is that good-will and acceptable ministration, not the pomp and circumstances of Establishment, which enable her to hold her own. I have not lived so long in Ireland without having learnt to appreciate the signal virtues of the Irish clergy—more especially of the working clergy. I know there are exceptions; but still the conduct of the Protestant clergy of Ireland as a body is most exemplary; to the extent of their small means they are very charitable; they are not distrusted by their Catholic neighbours; and their removal from the parishes in which they labour would give cause for much regret. But is such an event likely to happen? Why, it would be shocking to think that there could be a doubt of a future provision for them, when we remember that nine-tenths of the soil of Ireland belong to Protestants, whereas only one-sixth of the population are of that religion. My noble Friend opposite says that such a change as this measure contemplates is alarming, on account of its bearing upon the Constitution and the Coronation Oaths. But during the last forty years, whenever any reforms of this nature have been proposed, we have heard so much of these Protestant Oaths that I confess that sort of appeal moves me very little. Many of your Lordships will remember the threats and the wails which proceeded from the same quarter when the Duke of Wellington told his party that he preferred the grant of Catholic Emancipation to the civil war which he thought was otherwise inevitable. Again, when the Church Temporalities Bill was brought in, there was a great meeting of all the Bishops and clergy of Ireland, who agreed to a petition saying that they viewed the Bill with the utmost alarm as being calculated to undermine and ruin the Church, and as a direct violation of the Act of Union. My noble Friend who had charge of the Bill would not listen to such threats. What can we think of their belief in the truth and efficacy of their own faith and doctrine when we find Protestants solemnly declaring that their religion would be undermined and would cease to exist on account of a change which left in Ireland ten Protestant Bishops for a Protestant population not so large as that contained within the single diocese of London? And what reasons have we now to listen to such fears as these? We are told that the two Churches are so indissolubly linked that the fate of the one is bound up with that of the other, so that we cannot deal with the Irish Church as reason and justice require, because thereby we should affect the Church in England, where reason and justice do not require such a measure. According to this opinion, the two Churches are like Siamese twins, owning but one life between them; and though it is known that one of the twins is paralyzed, we must not treat it for fear of injuring the other, which is healthy and vigorous. I hope we shall not be deterred from dealing with the Irish Church by such arguments as these. We cannot be blind to the fact that the Church of England is in considerable danger; but that danger arises not from without but from within; not from external legislation, but from internal dissensions and from that danger which proverbially threatens "a house divided against itself." It is High Church, Low Church, and Broad Church, with their bitter animosities, their unseemly brawls, and the trouble they give to quiet, thoughtful men seeking for authority and for peace but finding none—these are the things which really and truly imperil the Church; and compared with them, the danger which it fears from disestablishment in Ireland is small indeed. Instead of danger or harm I believe the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland will be a strength and benefit to the Church in England.

Before sitting down I cannot help following up what was said by my noble Friend at the close of his speech. This Bill is merely the corollary of that liberal Resolution which was passed after long and exhaustive debates in the House of Commons. I believe, as my noble Friend says, that some such Bill as this will be

The Earl of Clarendon

recommend Report say be thrown jority even passed the I humbly decision think it is of a Gener will be un
ceded it, between t should exi on the hu
to speak, against th
if you reje man to w this Hous
abridged;
independe lagging be Your Lov
final, thou ference to we must rowly, we bear in mi
it will mo obligation new Hous responsible niggardly Reform Bi lution was of our fello time endo however, s that Bill, that thing and that t means to mistaken.
we must with many be persiste cause they jar with r
It behoves our positio
the House
Parliament
Commons given pro of Common the wishe of Englan henceforwa in desiring to public

bound not to disregard that public opinion. Such a result cannot be secured by Act of Parliament, but it may be attained by a moral determination on our part, individually and collectively, to look at great questions in a somewhat more liberal spirit than that in which we have been wont to look at them, so as to do away with the constant doubt and suspicion which now exists out-of-doors as to what the Lords will do upon the great questions of the day. There is as much ability, there is as much knowledge, there is more experience in this House than in the House of Commons; and there is no reason whatever why we should not stand well with our fellow-countrymen and retain the position we once held by consulting their feelings and their wishes. I trust your Lordships will not deem me presumptuous for making these remarks. I make them with the conviction that both sides of this House must equally desire to stand well with the country. I look upon the disestablishment of the Irish Church, however it may be delayed, as inevitable. Your Lordships' vote against this Bill may be viewed with indifference, because there will be a conviction in men's minds that you will be compelled to reverse your decision; but if it is not viewed with indifference, it will, I fear, be because it will be regarded as a proof that your Lordships refuse to do an act of justice and fair dealing to Ireland.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I propose to detain you but for a short time; but I cannot bring myself to give a silent vote on a question which I deem to be pregnant with such serious consequences to the Church and to the country as that which is now before us. My Lords, I think it is very difficult to exaggerate the importance of the matter under discussion. I feel, in common with many others, that principles which we hold most dear, and which, in connection with our institutions, we believe to be of essential and vital importance, are imperilled by the measure before us. You may deal with the question of religious Establishments and the union of Church and State; I can only say that, believing that union to be of the most vital moment, I, with many who think with me, feel it my duty to contend to the last for its maintenance. It has been asserted that this question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church does not, and ought not, to affect the English branch of the United Church of England and Ireland. My Lords, I conceive it to be my duty to maintain the contrary of that proposition, and for this reason—It is not that I do not acknowledge that the position and the circumstances of the English Church are very different from those of the Irish Church; but I cannot but recollect that the great principle on which the assault is made upon the Irish Church equally affects all existing Establishments, and that is the principle of religious equality. I ask, after this particular Establishment has been destroyed, can the English Establishment, can the Scottish Establishment, stand before that principle, if it be carried out consistently? I do not attribute to all the supporters of this Bill a desire to overthrow all religious Establishments; but I find in their ranks such a latent connection with those in this country who are well known as the strenuous advocates of the overthrow of all Establishments that I cannot but see great danger in the distance for our own Church. To my mind it would be a less evil to continue, with certain modifications, the existence of the Irish Establishment than to sanction a principle that would tend to subvert all Establishments. In early days I was myself a consistent supporter of Catholic Emancipation. That was at a time when the advocacy of such opinions was a certain barrier to one's temporal advancement; but I believed the protestation then made that that great measure would involve no danger for the Protestant Establishment. But, my Lords, I have lived to be undeceived; I have lived to see that no concessions of that character can possibly satisfy those to whom they are made. Justice to Ireland has been loudly insisted on. My Lords, I am strongly convinced that the great majority of the Irish peasantry will rue the day on which the Irish Church Establishment is subverted. I have visited Ireland ten times in the course of my life; and although I do not pretend to know as much of it as many of your Lordships, this I am quite persuaded—that, looking back to the period of the Irish famine and the Irish fever, the Protestant clergy were the great benefactors of the Irish peasantry. The people remember that fact with gratitude, and they will lament the day on which those benefactors are, to a certain extent, deprived of the means of subsistence. I should like to read to your Lordships part of a letter giving the opinions of a distinguished statesman in America. It is to this effect. He says that by sacrificing

(First Night.

the Irish Church a strong inducement is offered to the Fenian Brotherhood to redouble their efforts at agitation and to persevere in the commission of terrible crimes; so as to force concession after concession, till there is nothing more to give on the one hand, and Ireland not worth retaining on the other. The disendowment of the Irish Church would prove an incentive to fresh depredations. My Lords, it is quite certain that this proposal will give no real satisfaction to such persons. What do they tell us? They say they want Ireland for the Irish; the land must be given up to them; the Union must be repealed; short of all this they will accept nothing as a real boon. I hold in my hand an extract from a New York organ of the Fenian Brotherhood, called The Irish People, which states that—

"The object of the Fenian Brotherhood is to procure our country's total separation from England, and to set her up before the world as a nation among the nations, free and independent. . . . It is almost superfluous to say that nothing short of that national independence and total separation will content us. . . . Every concession granted by the English Government strengthens the Fenians. . . . Therefore we counsel the acceptance of concessions, and therefore we recognize every concession as a victory."

The same article adds that the effect of this measure, if carried, will be this—he uses a familiar phrase—"Out go the parsons, neck and crop, the landlords to follow at an early day." I recollect that, many years ago, in a Legislative Assembly in a neighbouring country, it was said, "Ici nous sommes ni Catholiques ni Chrétiens." Now, I believe that the acknowledgment of Christianity by the State is the only true safeguard for the national prosperity, and when the time shall come that either in this or in the other House of Parliament it shall be said "Here we are neither Catholic nor Christian," it will be an evil day for the country.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I fear that my strength—more especially at this late hour—will render me very little capable of treating this question in a manner worthy of its gravity and importance; but there are occasions on which strong feelings and earnest convictions overpower the sense of physical weakness; and I trust this may be so far the case with me now that I shall be enabled to express to your Lordships some portion at least of the aversion and apprehension with which I regard this most dangerous measure. When I say "this most dangerous measure," I now lie. I take the matter. that ultimately tended to liminary, tion will House of blishment in Ireland—fraught with danger and my own vote in a doubtfully altogether 300 years null and tant Sovereigns, and individuals are prepared and main religion, to which we of the land and which the Article and Ireland condition countries establishing your commonwealth and endowment your own which we were sole—if you present a country in of the country will have instruction are prepared at the disposal who, I appears to which he and holy and that his own dictation common sense which it, which my most reverend (the Archbishop) I do not had given belief that it does not represent the opinion of the country now—if you are prepared, upon the opinion of that dying House of Commons, to take this important step—a House of Commons, moreover, which was elected by a constituency to whom this question was never submitted, and so far as it was brought forward at the General Election had every reason to believe that, if the question should be raised, it would encounter the determined opposition of the Government which it was returned to support—if, my Lords, you are prepared to do all this, then I have not a word to say, and you will pass this Bill as a necessary preliminary. On my part, however, I must enter my protest—my solemn protest—against the doctrine that we are entitled to deal as it is proposed to deal with this Church property in Ireland, any more than we are justified in dealing with the property of any personal corporation in the kingdom. I go further, perhaps, in this respect, than some of those even who are prepared to vote against this Bill, and for the maintenance of the Church in Ireland; but I, for my part, deny the moral competency of Parliament to pass a measure such as that indicated by the Resolutions of the House of Commons. When I spoke just now of a prescription of more than 300 years, I did very little justice to the argument I am bringing before you, because the prescription of more than 300 years would point to the Reformation as the first period in which the Church obtained a right to its possessions. Now, the right of the Church of this country—the Church, whatever it might have been—the right of the Church to the possessions of the Church dates from a period antecedent not only to the Reformation, but antecedent to the existence and creation of Parliament. It was stated in a debate a few years ago by a right hon. Friend of mine (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), now a Secretary of State, that there is actually at this moment a living in the diocese of Meath which was the property of the Church in the sixth century—that is 600 years before the conquest of Ireland by England, and before the subjection of Ireland to the power of the Papacy. My Lords, the Reformation did not create Church property. The Reformation was partly political and partly religious. It was a protest against Roman Catholic doctrine, and against the usurpation of the See of Rome. It was the termination of a long struggle, for which the minds of the people had been long prepared, and it laid down certain conditions for those who were to share in the pecuniary benefits of Church property, which conditions were complied with to a great extent by the great majority of the Bishops and clergy of that day. There were transfers from individuals, but there was never a question of transferring Church property to the State, or of secularizing it. There was, indeed, one exception—the confiscation of the property of the monasteries. It was a deep and dark blot upon what would otherwise have been a glorious page of the history of this country. There is no doubt those monasteries required reform—that there were many abuses—that their property might have been applied more advantageously to the service of the Church of which they were members than according to the system which existed; but that was no ground for an act of which I am happy to say there has, up to the present moment, been no similar example—the confiscation of ecclesiastical property and the distribution of that property among the rapacious nobles and courtiers of the time. Yet we look back to that period, and, acknowledging the infamy of the transaction by which this property first came into the possession of those noble families, we do not at the present moment dispute the validity of their titles. We acknowledge that, however faulty the original acquirement, long prescription affords a title to those who by unjustifiable means became possessed of it. Now, why is it that you do not apply similar principles to a Church which has been much longer in possession of its property, and which has a much older and stronger title—one untainted, too, by an act of injustice—than that of the donations of monastic property to those families? But what I am surprised at is that this principle should be adopted and this measure sanctioned by the Roman Catholic Members of your Lordship's House. I think it is a maxim which has always been strictly adhered to by all Roman Catholics that nullum tempus occurrit Ecclesiæ; that, however long the Church's right may be in abeyance, it never can be utterly abolished; that it is always capable of being revived, even after the lapse of 300 years. But we seem inclined to read that maxim as a certain person is reported to read Scripture—namely, backwards. Not nullum tempus occurrit Ecclesiæ—no time

The Archbishop of Canterbury

[First Night.]

shall injure the rights of the Church—but nullum tempus occurrit Ecclesie—no length of prescription shall give a right to the Church. Individuals at the end of fifty or sixty years have an indefeasible right to their property; the Church has held its property 300, 500, or 600 years; yet, because it is the Church, you claim the right to take away its property. I trust that such a principle may not be adopted by your Lordships; and as long as it is in my power I shall protest against it, in the conviction that I am speaking in the cause of justice and right, and of the maintenance of property. A noble Lord (Earl Russell), when I mentioned this question about monastic property answered, "Oh, yes, that is all very well; but there is a personal representative in the one case and no personal representative in the other." Now, I confess I cannot draw such a distinction. There is no personal representation by inheritance or entail; but in the case of every clergyman who succeeds to a benefice there is a personal representative of the original corporation. The endowments of the Church were not conferred upon the individual clergyman for his own use or benefit. They were conferred upon the clergyman as a corporation sole, as a trustee, bound to hand down to his successor that property which he enjoyed in consideration of the duties he performed; and that individual corporation sole was a member of a large aggregate corporation, which corporation was responsible for the due maintenance and application of the property of the Church. The right hon. Gentleman who has the credit—or discredit—of this Bill objected, I recollect, in the strongest terms to the principle of a salaried or stipendiary clergy. I agree with him, and I think the great merit of the constitution of the Church of England is that its clergy are neither salaried nor stipendiary. They are men in possession of a freehold for life, and they are trustees of that freehold for their successors. They receive that property, and they are bound to maintain it. They are free in all respects from the inconveniences, on the one hand, of the voluntary system, which subjects the clergyman to the caprice of his parishioners; and, on the other, they are perfectly free from being overborne by the influence of the Crown, or the Minister. They enjoy their freehold for life, and their right to it is as complete and entire as that of any of your Lordships to the property you possess. When you speak of there being and, there me to act- to expect ing the pa propose to rights of their lives more doubt- sation to value of disposal; and no al- nefit the (namely, t to the la spiritual tendence you are must say sonal rep- porations What do bodies p- erty? I panies p- Ireland. succession but perso rive, I be to the dec ward, if dual repre do what these and great Lor the purpo ally forme are posses then, with do not fu have no i heritors— devote it it seems t of the pri But, it is endowmer take them first place I say, in not give that if it take it aw for signal conferred Friend wh of Marlbc Duke, Bles were give will any human being contend that, while leaving the present possessors to enjoy them for their life, Parliament which granted may resume the gifts, and at its pleasure despoil those two noble Dukes of their inheritance? But I say Parliament did not grant the property which is now held by the Church in Ireland. As I have already said, there is at least one benefice which has gone through all the changes that Ireland has passed through—which has gone to the independent Church of Ireland in the first place, then to the Papal Church which was imposed upon it by the unjustifiable act of England, and lastly, has been transferred to the Established Church of the country. Parliament had certainly nothing to do with that benefice. It is notorious, moreover, that six-sevenths of the glebe lands were conferred from confiscated estates by the legal grants of Protestant Sovereigns; and it would not be difficult to show that the immense preponderance of the property now held by the Church in Ireland has been granted since the Reformation. It has been granted by Protestant Sovereigns, or given or bequeathed by pious and munificent Protestants, and, more especially since 1833, it has been the produce of the taxation of the clergy. Now, do you mean to take away property which never belonged to the Roman Catholic Church, and to take it away upon the ground of injustice to the Roman Catholics? Do you mean to violate all those solemn obligations? Do you mean to run counter to all the principles which led to the great Revolution of 1688? I do not require to be told that the Revolution of 1688 was mainly caused by the unjustifiable violation of the laws of the country by James II.; but upon what ground were those violations committed? They were all of them in obedience to Roman Catholic councillors for the purpose of introducing the Roman Catholic religion into this country, and for the purpose, as far as could be done, of putting down Protestantism. It was the resentment of this country at the attempt to set up the Roman Catholic religion, from which it had suffered so grievously before, that led to great discontent and to the Revolution which introduced William III. to the Throne of England. I have heard it said, "How wisely William III. acted with regard to Scotland; why did he not act in the same manner with regard to Ireland?" I answer that William III.

The Earl of Derby

was not an idiot. He was a very shrewd, a very sagacious, and a very far-seeing Sovereign; and I cannot help thinking that in respect of the different phases of Protestantism he acted much more from political than from religious considerations. He found that in Scotland the Presbyterians were the steady opponents of the fallen family, while the Episcopalians were the supporters of that family. Consequently he did not interfere with the religion of the Presbyterians, who were favourable to himself; but had he adopted in Ireland the policy which it is said would have been similar to that which was pursued in Scotland, what would he have done? William the Deliverer came into this country to free it from the chains of the Roman Catholic religion and the Papal See; but if he had done what it is now said he ought to have done, he would have re-introduced the Popish religion as the established religion of Ireland, and thus have overthrown the very principles which he had been brought over to this country to vindicate and uphold. It really is not necessary to answer the question; by its ridiculous absurdity it answers itself. Again, Queen Anne, dealing with an independent country, entered into an arrangement by which the Presbyterian was for ever to be the established religion of Scotland. Many of my noble Friends here who hold property in Scotland are Episcopalians; but I do not believe they object to being obliged to contribute to a Church of which they are not members. But what is the case in Ireland? The Protestant religion is the religion of the minority, no doubt; but it is the religion established in that country by an independent Parliament—Protestant, no doubt, but for the return of Members to which Roman Catholics had a right to vote. That Parliament at the time of the Union between the two countries entered into a stipulation by which the Churches of both should thenceforth be one united Church, and that the Protestant religion should be maintained as the religion of Ireland. Considering that arrangement was declared to be a fundamental condition of the Act of Union, I do not think it is too much to say that to do away with it would be to imperil the Union, and that such a step ought not to be taken by the Imperial Parliament without the strongest motives and without the deepest conviction of its necessity. My Lords, what is it that the Roman Catholics desire in Ireland? I am told it is equality. I want to know in what respect is it they have not equality? I want to know whether with regard to property, to civil rights, to admission to public offices, with regard to everything in social and political positions, they are not on a footing of equality with all Her Majesty's other subjects? Nay more, I ask whether the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland is not more free and independent, more free from all Government control, than she is in any other country of Europe, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic? I only hope that in some cases she does not abuse the liberty she has in Ireland of conducting her own affairs, subject only to the observance of the law of the country. My Lords, there is only one thing the Roman Catholics in Ireland do not possess, and that is the property belonging to their neighbours. That is their only cause of complaint. Mind you, there is as much security for property possessed by the Catholic Church in Ireland as for the property of the Church of England in Ireland, or for the property of any private individual. But, my Lords, it is a most dangerous principle to lay down that equality in possessions is necessary for social and political equality. What right is sacred—what right is secure—if we listen to the person who complains that because he is not equal in possessions to his neighbour—because his property is not as large, not as extensive—therefore he has neither equal social rights nor equal political power? That principle goes to the root of all property. It cannot be maintained; its consequences cannot have entered into the mind of those who use this argument in favour of what they call perfect equality. When you take that position and use that argument in the case of the Irish Church, I want to know how you can escape applying it to the Church of England or any other Church? Mind, I am not saying that the case of the Church in Ireland and that of the Church in England are similar, or that the two Establishments stand on precisely the same footing; but I say that, when you come to the argument of equality founded on the possession of property, the Church of England and the Church of Scotland are involved in the consequences of that argument just as much as the Church of Ireland. My Lords, for the six-and-forty years during which I have had the honour of a seat in Parliament, I have been, as your Lord of all claim relieved f cheerfully the full their adm for various since then that direc amount of my Prote disposed t There is r to make aggression ever give seat in y movement sive. Wh united two oiples on we must ordinary common hold to t of their o other body ments are of. Yet opposite v this occas temporary Commons. cumstance those of disestablis Ireland, or my Lords, who intro am one o equality the princip ported by endowmen be later, b apply to t is now lai to be ado right hon his presen told a at head in a he could r was free insult the it with t escape fro ment by h future ma the conseq

[First Night.

The Earl of Derby

as light follows darkness. Let me first call your Lordships' attention to a passage which represents the views and opinions of the Nonconformist party. Here is a passage from a recent number of the Nonconformist—

"The Irish Church question will not be finally disposed of before the public mind will be prepared to entertain proposals in reference to the Scottish Kirk and the Church of England. As it has been with our Establishments, so probably will it be with the others. Their time is fixed. Mr. Gladstone is but now treading on the verge of a wide region of change. He knows not whither his convictions will ultimately impel him. He may be regarded as raised up and qualified by Divine Providence for great and beneficial purposes."

If the right hon. Gentleman has been "raised up and qualified by Divine Providence" for the extinction of all endowments, he must now be walking on the verge of a precipice of the existence of which he professes to be entirely unaware. I will not trouble your Lordships with many quotations; but, as bearing on the justice and safety of the measure now proposed, perhaps I may be allowed to read one passage from Lord Plunket, than whom no person was a stronger advocate of Roman Catholic claims, and than whom no one entertained a stronger conviction that the granting of those claims was entirely consistent with the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland. Lord Plunket used this language—

"An honest Roman Catholic cannot choose whether there shall be a Protestant Establishment or not. That is not the question which an honest man asks himself. What an honest Roman Catholic says, is—'I find the Protestant Church Establishment a part of the State for these 300 years; it has imbedded itself in the Constitution, and is so amalgamated with it that it cannot be overturned without overturning the State itself, and the valuable privileges, rights, and liberties which we enjoy, and which we expect our families and posterity to enjoy, under it. The English Church Establishment is intimately connected and bound up with the Established Church in Ireland; and neither the English Establishment, nor the State authorities in England and Ireland, will ever permit the Church of Ireland to be injured, or the Protestant ascendancy, in the proper sense of the word, to be destroyed.'" —[2 Hansard, iv.]

I need not quote opinions to the same effect which were given by many Roman Catholic gentlemen, by Mr. O'Connell himself, by Mr. Blake, a well-known Roman Catholic, and by others at that time. I will not refer to the declarations made by the Bishops in 1826, although these were the conditions upon which the Roman Catholics were admitted to those Parliamentary privileges which I for one fully rejoiced to see them obtain; but I will read a short passage from the expressed opinions of a highly respectable Roman Catholic Judge very lately removed from among us, the late Mr. Justice Shee, who spoke in this manner—

"The Church by law established is the Church of a community everywhere considerable in respect of property, rank, and intelligence. It is strong in the prescription of three centuries and in the support which it derives from the supposed identity of its interests with those of the Church of England. Nothing short of a convulsion, tearing up both Establishments by the roots, could accomplish its overthrow."

My Lords, I have said—and I but repeat what others have already stated—that this measure was introduced in a manner and at a time leading to the natural conclusion that it was prompted rather by party objects and a desire to gratify personal ambition than by a conviction of any immediate necessity for the change. Allow me to remind your Lordships of the circumstances under which this measure was introduced. In 1866 the late Government felt it to be their duty, upon being defeated on a leading principle of their Reform Bill, to throw up their offices, and to insist upon the acceptance of their resignations. I was called upon at that time to undertake the responsible duty of forming a Ministry. I could not for a moment do those noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen the injustice of believing that their resignation was merely a sham resignation, intended to be followed by a declaration upon my part that a Conservative Government could not be formed. I do not impute that to them; I believe that their resignation was perfectly sincere, and without any such arrière pensée as I have described. But it must not be forgotten that I came into Office with a standing majority against me of 60 or 70; and I should have been a madman if I had accepted Office without a full conviction—though, of course, I did not deem it respectful or decent to make any conditions with my Sovereign—that if I found the majority hostile I should have the right of appealing to the country and ascertaining whether they were willing to support me in carrying on the Public Business, or whether they preferred my predecessors, or the formation of any other Ministry. It so happened, however, that in 1867 we were enabled to carry a most important measure—the English Reform Bill—but unaccompanied by the Scotch and Irish Bills, the necessary complements of that measure, or the other Bills which it was absolutely necessary to introduce. Moreover, under the conditions of the Reform Bill itself, it was impossible that the new Parliament could be summoned before the end of 1869 or the beginning of 1870. The Government therefore had not the option of appealing to the country—which would, after all, have been an appeal to the old constituencies, and not to the new; and it was taking advantage of that supposed helpless condition of the Government that those in Opposition took the opportunity of introducing suddenly, and without any Notice, a proposition which till that time they had strenuously opposed, and forced it upon the Government and the House to the great inconvenience of Public Business and to the exclusion of important questions which it was most desirable to deal with. The point thus chosen was one upon which the constituencies had no opportunity of expressing their opinion; for in the votes which they had given at the General Election in favour of the Government of Lord Palmerston they had every reason to believe that the Members of that Government were pledged as deeply as men could be to resist any measure of the kind now before the House. It is a long time ago certainly—at the time when Lord Palmerston, according to the language which has been used by some of our opponents, was a “stupid, bigoted, blind, benighted Tory”—it was in 1828, immediately previous to the passing of the Catholic Relief Bill, that the noble Lord in a striking speech declared his sentiments upon this subject. And observe in what manner Lord Palmerston treated this very question of the possible danger to the Protestant Establishment in Ireland from the admission of the Roman Catholics. He says—

[First Night.]

“The changes which the Catholics are supposed to aim at are changes which could only be effected by the concurrence of the whole of the Legislature, and see what various improbabilities, not to say impossibilities, must combine before these fears could be realized. I will suppose that a Government hard pressed to carry some measure of their own, or to resist some measure of their opponents, were to purchase the support of the Catholic band by promising to introduce some change injurious to or subversive of the Protestant religion. In the first place, the consent of the Sovereign on the Throne,”— whom Lord Palmerston was by no means

The Earl of Derby

inclined to seem disposed “who by law but I will that which English Catholic Protestant I the very few weak Admirer, I will obtaining “tottering neither in would be to such a proposal their opponents profligate beliefs. Every would fly I would raise indignation places with bensions in chimerical.”

These were in 1829, and Lordships which Lordships opinions gave the version of Ireland.

the attention Russell) estate; but day laid importance of every General E a clear vi subjects.

very short made by

“That the Establishment early attention [3 Hansard

That was this question auspices of immediate at a time

(Earl Russell

Government

Gladstone

bate, Sir

Government

the Govern

ject. You allow me

George G

distinctly as ditions to

Earl—the policy was announced which Her Majesty's Government intended to pursue with respect to the Irish Church Establishment—

“I think it right at once to state that Her Majesty's Government deem it their duty not to give their assent to the Resolution proposed. . . . The real issue is not whether any part of the Establishment can be reformed, but whether it shall continue to have any existence whatever as an Established Church. That being the case”—observe Sir George Grey does not speak merely for himself—“Her Majesty's Government have no hesitation in saying that they are not prepared to undertake the responsibility of proposing to Parliament a Bill calculated to effect that object. They believe that this object cannot be obtained except by means which must inflict great injury upon Ireland and involve the country in the risk of very great dangers. The object can only be effected by exciting the bitterest animosities in that country, by producing a conflict of opinion—and I do not say that matters would stop even there—which must throw back the improvement of Ireland to a great extent, and must retard to an indefinite time the arrival of the period that we are sometimes inclined to hope for, when Irishmen, irrespective of creed and politics, will combine together with unanimity and energy, to promote the moral, social, and material well-being of their country.”—[3 Hansard, clxxviii. 396, 398.]

But that is not all, for Sir George Grey goes on to say—

“We have the Irish Protestant Church established as an existing institution in Ireland. It is not of recent creation, it rests upon the prescription of centuries, and, to use the expression of a distinguished Roman Catholic layman, it is rooted in our institutions. The firm belief of the Government is that it could not be subverted without revolution, with all the horrors that attend revolution. . . . As a matter of feeling, no doubt there is a grievance. I am not surprised at discontent existing from the cause I have mentioned, and I should be glad to redress it. But it is impossible to do so without producing evils of far greater magnitude than those which now exist, and without involving the country in dissensions which would be totally destructive of peace and of progress. For these reasons, believing that the object avowed by those who have brought forward the Resolution is one which could not be attained without great mischief, being of opinion that no practical grievance exists, and that in attempting to redress the theoretical grievance a great shock would be given to our laws and institutions, I can have no hesitation on the part of the Government in opposing the Motion.”—[3 Hansard, clxxviii. 400, 402.]

That was on the 28th of March, 1865, immediately before the General Election, and was the manifestation to the country by the Government of the day of the line of policy which they intended to pursue if elected.

EARL RUSSELL: Will you read what Mr. Gladstone said?

THE EARL OF DERBY: Oh, certainly I will read it. Would you like me to read the whole of it? Independent Members are particularly fond of calling upon the Government, more especially just previous to a General Election, to pledge themselves. Mr. Dillwyn did so, and Mr. Gladstone answering him interprets his Motion as declaring that—

“Within a very short period—if not in the dying days of this Parliament—the Executive Government of the country ought to grapple with these anomalies and inequalities which subsist in the ecclesiastical state of Ireland, and to propose a measure for the purpose of settling them. Is that so?”—[3 Hansard, clxxviii. 482.]

Mr. Gladstone then goes on to argue; he does not deny that the Irish Church is in an unsatisfactory state, but in common with his Colleagues he repudiates the obligation to propose remedial measures. He then asks Mr. Dillwyn to place himself in the position of a Minister, and says—

“But where are the materials with which my hon. Friend would proceed to work? I suppose him to be in the position of the Government, and to have introduced his Bill. What support does he think he would receive? Would the Presbyterians of Scotland readily support a measure which transferred the endowments of Ireland to the Roman Catholic clergy? Does he think the Nonconformists of England would support him? Were he on the Treasury Bench what support does he think such a project would receive with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) at his post? But it may be said there is another mode of proceeding; you may transfer these endowments from religious to secular purposes. I am bound to say that in my belief the mind of the country is against such a project, and I think my hon. Friend would find this a more difficult proposal still.”—[Ibid.]

I have acceded to the request of the noble Earl who wished for extracts from Mr. Gladstone's speech. Your Lordships have heard what he said when he declined to pledge the Government in the last days of a dying Parliament, and in what way he showed how repugnant to the Nonconformists would be any proposal to hand over the emoluments of the Irish Church to the Roman Catholics; and as for the suggestion that the property should be secularized, Mr. Gladstone, it appears, thought that the most objectionable of all. These points formed the basis of the advice he gave to his hon. Friend, and in them we have Mr. Gladstone's opinions in 1865. I must remind you then that when the General Election took place in that year not only was not the question of the Irish Establishment brought to the test of the hastings; but the constituencies had every reason to believe that, if ever it should be raised, it would meet with the strongest opposition from the Government of Lord Palmerston. Lord Palmerston unfortunately died, and events have brought about the conversion of the right hon. Gentleman; I do not wish to say anything disrespectful of him, for, though his conversion may have been sudden, I have no doubt it was sincere. I have made these quotations, not to show inconsistency, but that the constituencies of the country had no reason to believe such measures as those now advocated would be passed by the Government of that day.

[First Night.]

With respect to the manner in which these Resolutions have been brought forward, I agree with my noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) that it would have been more courteous if the House of Commons had communicated to your Lordships the Resolutions they had passed before proceeding with the Bill which they have now sent up to us without any remark or offering any reasons in support of it. The Resolutions, however, are now public property, and when we come to look into them, it is certainly extraordinary that from first to last the word "disendowment" is not mentioned; we read only of "disestablishment." ["Hear!"] Do the noble Duke and the noble Earl opposite who gave that cheer wish to intimate that disendowment is not contemplated? But disendowment is one thing and disestablishment another. There may be disestablishment without disendowment, and disendowment without disestablishment; but I am certain that noble Lords opposite will not resort to such a quibble as that because the word "disendowment" does not appear in the Resolution disestablishment only is meant, while they at the same moment press on the Government a measure which contemplates both disestablishment and disendowment. Regarding disestablishment I confess I cannot see in what way it is contemplated—whether suddenly or gradually—and if gradually, in what condition the Church in Ireland will be left during the process? The real Leader of the Liberal party, however, (Mr. Bright), addressing a meeting the other day in Liverpool, told his hearers that the Church in North Wales was in a considerable minority with reference to the population, and that the people there might consider it a hardship that they were in the same position as the Roman Catholics of Ireland; and his only excuse for not taking immediate had better promised Wales it and he establish

The Earl of Derby

"What Episcopal they call a the Bishop if they call Dublin a thoughtful mine on come together and would require call in the fund—the who is at which Mr and distribute poor to me

Therefore Irish Church the laws checked ecclesiastical laws of to the ab Bishops 500 fail! they are would be down ruled without carry an effect. I such Con Parliamen Privy Co

My Lord establishme admit is upon. I nation O servation Granville that the is not r linament; this Oath of this ex persons v has her o She has nisters w that She acts whic gagement jesty has

"Will you to the utmost of your power maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant reformed religion established by law, and will you maintain and preserve inviolably the settlement of the United Church of England and Ireland, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, as by law established within England and Ireland, and the territories thereunto belonging?"

This Her Majesty has solemnly sworn to do; and, my Lords, these words constitute either a solemn and personal obligation on the Sovereign or else they are unmeaning and even blasphemous. You cannot relieve the Sovereign from that obligation. Her Parliament may pass a measure which in that case She has practically no longer the power of objecting to; but that fact does not relieve the Sovereign from the obligation, the right, and the duty of representing to any Ministry which She may call to her counsels the position in which She would be placed if, acting on their advice, She were to take a step in direct violation of her solemn declaration and Oath that She will maintain inviolate the United Church of Ireland and England. That Oath would be violated if Her Majesty were advised to disestablish; it would not be violated by regulating the Church—it would be violated by disuniting the Church the union of which She has sworn to maintain.

What, then, is the real object aimed at by the promoters of this measure? Who are they whom it is sought to gratify; still more, who is to be satisfied by this measure? Now, my Lords, I confess that, notwithstanding the statement of my noble Friend, I do not believe that the Protestant Church is any grievance whatever to the people of Ireland. I do not deny that by disestablishing and disendowing the Protestant Church you will gratify the Roman Catholic hierarchy—you will gratify them—but you will not satisfy them. You may give them greater opportunity for exercising that preponderating authority which enables them to keep the priests and people in a complete state of servitude—I had almost said, of absolute slavery. I believe that many of the Roman Catholic priests feel that the existence of a Protestant Establishment side by side with their own Church is a security for civil liberty, and protects the Roman Catholic laity against aggression on the part of the hierarchy which would be otherwise intolerable. I am quite certain that there is a growing desire among the lower classes of the Roman Catholics to consider not what they are to gain, but what they are to lose by a measure of this kind. They have now among them in every parish an educated gentleman, of moderate income, the whole of which is spent among his immediate neighbours, and the greater part of it in works of kindness and charity. He is the man to whom they go in times of difficulty—he is the man to whom the labourer takes his money for safe keeping, and whom even the Roman Catholic parishioner frequently consults instead of his own priests. They feel, moreover, that they are at the present moment living in amity and friendship with their Protestant fellow-countrymen; they have no cause of complaint against them; they feel that upon the Protestant clergy they depend for a great portion of their livelihood and for many acts of kindness. Bishop Moriarty himself bears testimony to the character of the Irish clergy. I am perfectly willing to confess that in old days—but those days have happily long since gone by—nothing could be more disreputable, nothing more scandalous, nothing less likely to promote reformation of any kind than the character of the great body of the Irish clergy. That was the case from the days of Spenser to those of Dean Swift, and even later; but during the whole of the present century it has been impossible to find a body of men more pious, better educated, and better informed than the Irish clergy; as I have said, Bishop Moriarty, the Roman Catholic Bishop, bears testimony in the most handsome manner to the pureness of their lives and and to their gentlemanly bearing, and particularly to the charity with which they treat persons of all denominations. And, my Lords, let me ask what is the chief evil under which Ireland labours? Is it not non residence? And yet you now propose to remove a body of gentlemen who are always resident—often the only resident gentleman who is to be found in many of the parishes of Ireland. Do you think that such a proposal will promote peace and contentment among the inhabitants of Ireland? Will they not feel that you are removing from among them their best friends?

My Lords, I think it has been urged that the Established Church in Ireland has signally failed as a Missionary Church; but your Lordships should remember that the situation of a minister of the Irish Church in a Roman Catholic district is a very hard one. If he confines himself to the diligent superintendence of his own flock, he is told that the great work of the Reformation is making no progress—that he makes no converts, and that the whole of his labour is therefore a failure. If, on the other hand, he acts energetically—if he endeavours to proselytize and spread the doctrines of his Church among his Roman Catholic neighbours—he is denounced as an ecclesiastical firebrand; no term is too opprobrious, no obloquy too great to be bestowed upon him. These are the Scylla and Charybdis between which the Protestant clergyman has to steer. If he confines himself to the duties of his Church he is said to be doing no good. If he is energetic in his conduct the emphatic term of “souper” is bestowed upon him; and, as in the case of the relief administered by the English clergy during the time of the famine, all his communications, actions, and kindnesses to Roman Catholics will be attributed to a desire to proselytize. I say again that the Roman Catholic population of Ireland will, in my belief, lose rather than gain by the removal of the Protestant clergyman—a removal which will in any case be far from contributing to the peace and tranquillity of Ireland. For what will be the result? In place of the clergy you propose to remove—men of whom you complain if they confine themselves to their own flocks—you will have an irruption of agents from the Missionary Societies. These persons, whose zeal is not always tempered by discretion, will suddenly spring into activity, and at once occupy the vacant ground. From the moment that that happens you may have an increase in the number of nominal Protestants, but it will be accompanied by such a storm of animosity as has not been witnessed for many years past. It will give rise to religious feuds and animosity in places where nothing of the kind prevails at the present moment. That, and not universal peace and contentment, will be the result of carrying this measure into effect. One word, my Lords, with regard to the alleged grievance of the Irish Church. And here I shall again quote from what is considered to be the Roman Catholic organ—namely, the Tabulet. That journal says—

[First Night.

“The wound of Ireland is, that whereas the great majority of the population of Ireland are Roman Catholics, a very large proportion of the soil of that country belongs to the Protestants, and the Protestants form the majority of those who enjoy of a high if the Legislature every agent of the Protestant Church deprive the people of the State not be allowed by land held

Now let us be prepared to that the peasantry is recovering themselves will take the cause, and peace time—a declaration encouraging Catholic take the connection, and the ruin of the country. It would be your hat and to do the part ought to be as to which inevitable which, would, ruinous

I have length time only a few the position in respect has been monuments by considerable assent to will consider Lordship to yield deliberation of own people be a veto to alter tion as simply unjustly justly b

The Earl of Derby

before we know what is the opinion of the country, we were at once to adopt the course proposed to us by the Lower House. Your Lordships are perfectly well able to judge for yourselves what course will be most consistent with your principles, your position, and your dignity as an independent branch of the Legislature; and I do not think that your Lordships will be affected by the declaration that by rejecting this measure you will be seeking a cause of quarrel with the other House. If any party is to be made liable for bringing this House into collision with the other House, I must hold it to be that party which, immediately before a General Election, brings questions like this under the notice of Parliament, and calls upon you to pass a measure to which they know you will not consent, merely on the ground that the House of Commons has passed it, and that it is your duty to defer to their opinion. My Lords, there is a portion of the Press, more especially a journal which claims to itself supremacy amongst the journals of this country—a journal which sometimes acts the part of the candid friend, and sometimes in a tone of concealed menace warns the House of Lords as to the course they are to pursue—not, indeed, that it signifies much what course they take except for their own interests—but they must take care not to adopt a course which shall run counter to the declared feeling of the people of this country. But, my Lords, that feeling has not yet been tested or declared: we do not know that it is the feeling—we do not believe it is the feeling—of the people of this country. But we do believe that we are called upon by the promoters of this Bill to do violence to the principles which we hold most dear; to agree to that which in our belief will be injurious to the Protestant religion—a religion which we are determined to uphold; to agree to that which in our opinion is an invasion of the rights of property, and which must ultimately extend to all other kinds of property; which is based upon principles which, being once applied to Ireland, cannot fail in time to be applied to England also; which will create confusion and discontent for a long period, and which will be sure to create angry feeling among different classes on a subject which of all others is most calculated to give rise to those feelings. For my own part, I am told that the course I am taking in resisting this measure is not a popular one.

My Lords, I do not pretend—no one, I suppose, does pretend—to be entirely indifferent to the feelings of my fellow-countrymen; but I have never yet courted popularity for the sake of popularity. As long as I am a Member of this House—which is an independent branch of the Legislature—I shall, without caring whom I offend or whom I please, express the honest conviction of my mind; and your Lordships, in dealing with this question, will, I doubt not, be actuated by the same feelings. Your Lordships will, I am sure, adopt whatever you believe to be right in principle, safe in policy, and wise in performance, undeterred by menace on the one hand, and by persuasions on the other. But if you were not to pursue that independent course, and were simply to register the opinions of the House of Commons, it would be better not to be than to exist under such a slavery. I am satisfied that your Lordships will deal with this question according to your consciences and your judgment; and I believe that in so dealing with it, and in rejecting the hasty measure to which you are invited by the House of Commons to give your assent, you will give fresh cause to a grateful country to thank God that they have a House of Lords, and to thank God that by the firmness of that House of Lords incalculable evils have been warded off from the people of this nation.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I never felt so much in need of the indulgence of your Lordships as in rising to follow the noble Earl, and attempting to answer some of the arguments he has used with an authority and force to which I know I cannot aspire. My Lords, when the noble Earl rose, I thought we should have had some answer to the speech—which I believe was unanswerable—made by my noble Friend who moved the second reading of the Bill (Earl Granville). That speech was certainly not answered by the noble Earl the Lord Privy Seal, nor was it answered by the noble Earl who has just sat down. My noble Friend who moved the second reading recommended the Bill as a measure of justice to Ireland; but the noble Earl who has just sat down (the Earl of Derby) carefully avoided dealing with that argument. He did not even refer to the word “justice”—he referred mainly to the Reformation instead. The main argument of the noble Earl was that this Bill was an interference with property. But there is a great difference in the nature of property ; and the argument of the noble Earl condemns not only the course now proposed to be taken, but that which has been taken over and over again in this country. The noble Earl referred to the fact that the family of my noble Friend near me (Earl Russell) possesses many of the former abbey lands. Now we all know that the changes made in the time of Henry VIII. were made with more or less violence ; but suppose all the lands then belonging to the great abbeys had remained Church property and had been tied up in mortmain, what would now have been the position of affairs ? If anything could have inclined the sober English to revolution, it would have been the perpetuation of such a state of things as was almost recommended by the noble Earl. The noble Earl spoke with great acrimony with reference to the policy of this measure. He said we were going to rob the corporations of their property. Now, I never thought that the property of corporations rested on the same footing as private property. If anything would produce a feeling of insecurity it would be to say that the property of corporations and private property stood on the same footing. I adhere to the distinction which has been drawn between private and corporate property ; the former being that to which there are lineal successors, and the latter having no such lineal successors. It is said that the clergy have a vested interest in Church property of the same kind as private property ; but if there be no distinction, how did the noble Earl deal with the Irish Church when he took away so many Bishops and made an arrangement with regard to tithes by which 25 per cent of the tithes were deducted from the property of the Church in Ireland ? If tithes are private property, it was a robbery of the corporations sole—to use the noble Earl's phrase—so to deal with them. I hardly thought that argument could have been brought forward by the noble Earl. The noble Earl used another argument. He said that the property of the Church of Ireland did not rest on Parliamentary titles. But the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack used a very different argument last year. My Lords, my view is this—the whole nation are the heirs of property such as that of the Irish Church. You can compensate the present holders of Church property, or you may respect their vested interest ; but Parliament has a perfect right to deal with the property of the Church. subject to near me, Gentlemen in the order to of other Now, a worth ; noble Earl improper I admit one of t before P another the polit itself. I of the s about th of demo gible do hered to the Gov He said, take the had had position necessar construc to do wi the very THE I a Reform THE hardly little di of 1858 he even for one I have n but whe me with taunt is noble Ea dealt ver the Iris was per but, my since th Granvill to the F tion of my nobl Grey) th suspende the Fen and in t brought of Irelan istence of disaffection as the reason for bringing it forward. My noble Friend who introduced this Bill was therefore perfectly justified in referring so far to the Fenian conspiracy as an argument for considering this Bill.

The Earl of Kimberley

EARL GREY: My noble Friend who introduced this Bill declared that in 1866 there was no outbreak or acts of violence on the part of the Fenians; and I expressly stated that there was a conspiracy.

EARL GRANVILLE: I must request the noble Earl to confine himself to an explanation of his own speech, and not explain my speech, which he has totally misrepresented.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The noble Earl draws a distinction between outrages having been committed and outrages not having been committed. But I say the existence of the Fenian conspiracy was as well known then as it is now. And observe, my Lords, how dangerous the argument would be to say that when you know of the existence of disaffection that is not sufficient. Will my noble Friend allow me to ask him at what time those questions ought to be considered? Are we to be told that the people of Ireland are apathetic, and that therefore there is no need of legislation, or that if they are not apathetic they are in a state of conspiracy? Are we to be told that disaffection is not enough, and that we must wait for tumults and rebellion? My Lords, my own view is this—not that we should consider any subject of this kind without regard to consequences, but that when it is manifest that dissatisfaction exists that is a reason why all fair men should consider whether there is not some radical vice in the state of things in Ireland, and if there be, should apply a remedy as soon as possible. Parliament has shown—the present Government have shown quite as much as the former Government—that they can repress disaffection and maintain law in Ireland; but I say that, having done this, Parliament and Government are bound to see whether there are not grievances of which the Irish justly complain, and, if there are, to show an eagerness to consider them—and especially at a time when the civil liberties of the country have been suspended. But to return to the argument of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby). The noble Earl referred to the policy of William III., and told us that that Monarch could not pursue the same policy in Ireland as he did in Scotland, because the people of England would not allow him. But let me point out to the House what an inconsiderate thing it is to adhere to a policy the greater part of which has been abandoned. The noble Earl joined in measures for the emancipation of the Roman Catholics; but is it logical or wise to preserve one part of a policy and to abandon the rest of it? You think that our ancestors, who perhaps were as wise as ourselves, would not approve our policy. Our ancestors were, I dare say, very good Protestants—I am afraid they would be called “good Protestants” in some parts of the North of Ireland. They thought it their duty to extirpate the Roman Catholics of Ireland; they endeavoured to do so by penal laws and by excluding the Roman Catholics from civil and political rights. No doubt they succeeded to some extent in diminishing the number of Roman Catholics in that country; and if they had been as cruel as the Inquisitors in Spain, or the persecutors of the Albigenses in France, they might have extirpated the Roman Catholics altogether. But what have we done? We have admitted the Roman Catholics to equal political power with ourselves; and is it reasonable, then, to pursue a policy which gives us the advantages neither of the policy of exclusion pursued by our ancestors, nor our own policy of religious freedom? I believe our ancestors would condemn such a policy quite as much as I condemn it. The noble Earl repeated the argument which had been used before—that the interests of the Church of England were bound up with those of the Church of Ireland. But that argument was so well disposed of by my noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) that it is scarcely necessary to refer to it. I will ask your Lordships, however, is it a wise thing to make the cause of Protestantism in Ireland identical with that which a large portion of the people of Ireland regard as an injustice? The noble Earl then touched on an argument which he justly said was one of great delicacy, and he referred again to the question of the Coronation Oath of the Sovereign. He said, “Beware lest you recommend a measure which is in direct violation of the Oath of the Sovereign.” Now, I ask the House whether this is not a dilemma which the noble Earl should not have raised? What is it but a dangerous dilemma which places the Sovereign in a position in which She may have to submit to a violation of her duty or of her Coronation Oath? That is dangerous ground, which ought not to be lightly entered on. My Lords, the constitutional doctrine is that the Sovereign is left to transact these matters with her responsible Advisers, and Parliament looks for a policy to the responsible Advisers alone. Further than that it is not wise for us to go. If we want a warning, have we not had it in our past history? Cannot the noble Earl remember that one of the most unfortunate circumstances that ever happened in our history was when the scruples of George III. prevented Mr. Pitt and Lord Castlereagh, as they notoriously did, from carrying out the whole of the policy they intended at the time of the Union? That is a precedent the most unhappy that could be quoted—a precedent which, whether by the advice of the noble Earl or any other, I hope no Sovereign of England will ever follow. Before I sit down I wish to refer shortly to the speech of the noble Earl on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey), because he touched on a branch of the subject on which I have expressed opinions not altogether different from his own. And here I may remark that I do not think noble Lords opposite are to be congratulated on the support given them by my noble Friend. Certainly anything more utterly opposed than the views of my noble Friend and those of the noble Earl opposite it is difficult to conceive. My position is not precisely that of my noble Friend, but it is, unhappily for me, nearer to him than that of the noble Earl opposite; and because I approach nearer to him he will no doubt entertain a stronger feeling against me. He it was who first set the question of the Irish Church in motion in the country; and now, when he finds a great party prepared to bring it to a crisis, he calls them a "motley crew;" and the noble Earl, because he finds some difference of opinion among those who upon the whole rather agree, goes at once and joins himself to those from whom he entirely differs. The noble Earl's view is, that the best system of dealing with the Churches in Ireland is by a system of concurrent endowment. Last year, when my noble Friend (Earl Russell) brought this subject under the attention of the House, I ventured to express an opinion that there were considerable advantages which might be derived from the concurrent endowment of the religious denominations in Ireland.

The Earl of Kimberley

I retain the be considered but no suppo
unless wi parties an in this c Friend b however i me assure are a larg deeply on plan is no point out has been Lordships different v
question.
man Cath say that—

"Notwith
tholic Cher property at deprived"—

But here ment from the Roma view of th ships do.
property Roman C were unj
the Refor
noble Fri
dwelt up
In Cæna
Rome on day Th anathema depriving its proper ceeds in likely to Chairman
as the fe stronger t deeply the
That is th
lio Church it is not Church. declared—

"That, i the Catho
it the prop justly depriv re-affirm the assembled in adhering to tions, distin endowment and revenue lishment, no

That is scant encouragement to those who propose the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church. Again, the Presbyterians have met and have passed the strongest resolutions setting forth their extreme abhorrence of any endowment of the Roman Catholic Church. The last quotation I shall read is equally strong to the same effect from some of the representatives of the Established Church; for a deputation which waited upon the Prime Minister from the Central Protestant Defence Association in Dublin submitted to him the following resolution:—

“That we strenuously oppose any attempt to endow the Roman Catholic Church or the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland, whether out of the so-called revenues of the Established Church or otherwise, and will use our utmost endeavours to defeat any proposition which may be made for the purpose of so endowing the Roman Catholic Church or priesthood, either directly or indirectly.”

So the Presbyterians, Roman Catholics, and members of the Established Church, equally repudiate any such endowment. Well, then, we are driven to the alternative which my noble Friend (Earl Grey) mentioned when he said that he should prefer disestablishment to the maintenance of the existing religious inequality in Ireland. That is exactly the position which I take, and to which I think we are driven. I believe that religious inequality is the source of great evils, and may lead to still greater evils. The noble Earl said, “Why should you single out Ireland to be the one country in Europe where the voluntary principle is exclusively to prevail, and where there is to be no connection between Church and State?” I reply, “Why should you single out Ireland to be the one country in Europe in which the flagrant injustice prevails of the Church of the small minority—of one-eighth of the population—being maintained against the wishes of four-fifths of the population; a Church which, instead of being enthroned in the hearts of the nation, is looked upon as a landmark of subjection and disregard of the national sentiment?” That is a position of singularity in which it is most undesirable that the Irish Church should stand. For these reasons, I venture to support the Bill proposed by my noble Friend (Earl Granville); and I cannot do better in conclusion than quote the words of my noble Friend (Earl Grey) who moved its rejection. In 1866, speaking of the principles by which our legislation for Ireland ought to be guided, my noble Friend said—

“The first is, that we should legislate, as far as possible, according to the wishes of the Irish people; and the second is, that on the important question of the Irish Church, we ought to do full and impartial justice to the Irish people, in the same spirit as, if the circumstances of the two countries were reversed, we should desire the Irish people should do to us.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxii. 378.]

These, my Lords, are the principles upon which I ask you to act in accepting this Bill. So long ago as the time of Queen Elizabeth, it was said by Spenser in his well-known essay upon Ireland, that no proposals meant for her good could be brought to a good end. I say, act upon principles of justice towards Ireland, dismiss old feelings and prejudices, and you may yet put an end to that fatal spell which has so long estranged from you the hearts of the Irish people.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, I cannot agree with either of the noble Earls, formerly Lords Lieutenant of Ireland, who have spoken this evening, in regretting that the noble Earl on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey) was the person to move the rejection of this Bill. I think it is of the greatest importance that a question such as this should be lifted out of the region of party politics; and, in my opinion the noble Earl has done good service in drawing the attention of the country to the importance of discussing this question quite independently of such party considerations. The noble Earl opposite me (Earl Granville) referred to some words which fell from me on a former occasion, and which I regret that he misunderstood as insinuating improper motives on the part of the originator of this Bill “elsewhere.” Far be it from me to impute such motives to one for whose ability and character it is impossible not to entertain the highest admiration. What I did mean to say was that the circumstances under which this great question has been brought before the country have been such as to raise in the minds of many a feeling that it has been made more of a party question than is desirable, seeing it involves so many great and sacred interests. I trust that in discussing this question I shall approach it with an earnest desire to act in a spirit, not only of justice but, of conciliation towards those who are supposed to be oppressed by the existence of the Established Church in Ireland. I think I may say, in the name of my right rev. Brethren, that every concession which it is right to make we are quite ready to make; but we are not convinced that the particular measure which lies before us is likely to benefit either Ireland or the Empire. In the course of this debate we have heard very little about the Bill. Indeed, I doubt whether, short as it is, the Bill has been carefully read, except by a few persons here present. The Bill is a very short one, but it is not so unimportant as the noble Earl who moved its adoption seemed to think. It does not appear to me to be, as has been said, a mere corollary of the Resolutions passed in the other House of Parliament. The noble Earl on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey) pointed out that, whether intentionally or not, it is so devised as to kill the Irish Church by a lingering death. Now, it is generally declared that the Bill is founded upon the precedent of the Act of 1833. I altogether deny that statement. What was done in 1833? At that time Parliament deliberately considered what changes should be made in the Irish Church, and they embodied those changes in an Act specifying certain sees which were not to be filled up, and declaring that the occupants of certain other sees were to perform all the spiritual duties of the lapsed bishoprics. There was no suspension of spiritual functions in the Irish Church. Everything was regularly provided for. But what is proposed here is that after August, 1868—and probably for an indefinite period—there shall be no appointment whatever in the Irish Church; and I maintain that no provision is made for carrying on the spiritual concerns of any diocese which may fall vacant in the meantime. No doubt I shall be told of the clause which in case of vacancies embodies certain provisions in the Act of 1833. But who is the person to act in case of a vacancy? Not a Bishop at all. He is the dean, the vicar general or the archdeacon; and by the Act of 1833 he is not called upon to carry on the spiritual work of the diocese but to refer certain things to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and do certain things which are in no way a carrying on of spiritual work in the diocese. What I maintain is, that, whereas the Act of 1833 provided for the complete performance of spiritual duties in the diocese, the measure now before your Lordships is so constructed, whether per incuriam or from malice prepense, that it entirely stops, and that for an indefinite time, the action of the Church vacant. In the period of Dublin most rev. diocese will be administered if a vacant administrator great Protestant will be that group Bill in its totally different Bill I even suspensory Bill be laid before and it will suspensory Bills to any office that office which management. So proposed connected with ample, so matter was important but whereas offices and patronage, be made to one which for the at whether your endowments importance suspension in the country proposed College of more kind Maynooth lished Churchman is to Maynooth, said in request—that the pointed at pecuniary after be only is the Catholics lawyers. lawyers with these cases suspensory they are to interests are of Parliament to be continued

(First Night.)

The Bishop of London

them. This shows us that there must be some mistake somewhere as to the mode in which this Bill has been drawn up, and it confirms the impression which the noble Earl on the cross-Benches expressed, that it is a hurried piece of legislation of which few can tell the result if it should be carried. But now with regard to the general principle on which alone this Bill, even if altered and its defects removed, can be justified—namely, that it is desirable to disestablish the Irish Church—there is a great difficulty in knowing what is meant by disestablishment. But, besides that, it surely is not a thing to be adopted without having some plan before us. How in the world is a body like this House to give its assent to a mere name, without understanding what is intended by it? What the noble Earl on the cross-Benches called on your Lordships to require was that the scheme should be produced; and when produced I am sure there is no Member of the right rev. Bench who will not be glad to give it his full consideration in the hope that some satisfactory solution of the very difficult questions connected with the Irish Church may be arrived at. But, my Lords, to disestablish and disendow the Irish Church does not, I confess, appear to me, so far as I can form any notion of the process, a measure which is likely to do good to Ireland. The noble Earl referred to the case of Canada, and mentioned in glowing terms the great success that had attended the Canadian Church after it had undergone that process; but I do not know that the Canadian Church has ever been disestablished. According to my understanding of that case it was this—that whereas the clergy in Canada were in possession of certain lands, by a Bill brought into Parliament those lands were commuted for a money payment of some eighteen years' purchase; and it was generally understood that a very good bargain had been made by the Canadian clergy, who were quite willing to accept the arrangement, and who found themselves in pretty nearly as comfortable a position as they occupied before the change. There was a transmutation of their lands for a large sum of money vested in the Church Society, which paid them good interest for it. Thus far as regards the disendowment of the Canadian Church. Then as to its disestablishment. I know that the present Bishop of Montreal was appointed by the Crown; and I believe until very recently every Bishop was appointed by the Crown. I know that a recent Act of the Canadian Legislature enables the Church to carry on its affairs; but I do not know that there is not still an appeal from its Courts to the Privy Council at home. I do not believe anyone can say for certain that that power of appeal is destroyed in the Canadian Church. Therefore, this disendowment and disestablishment of the Canadian Church is certainly very unlike the position which many of those who have been most anxious to press forward this question—I do not say their Leader—have contemplated as the future position of the Irish Church. As to the Church in Australia, its Bishops are still appointed by the Crown. Are we to understand that after the Irish Church is disestablished and disendowed the Crown is still to go on appointing its Bishops? If so, I do not think the Roman Catholics will find themselves to be in a very different position from that which they now occupy. In fact, there is such a confusion of thought as to the proposition that it is impossible for anyone to tell what it means; and your Lordships are almost asked to assent to a scheme without having it explained to you what it intends. And, my Lords, I must doubt whether the Irish people are really anxious for this measure, whatever it may be. Where is the proof that they are anxious for it? The Irish people are to be considered in two aspects. I suppose there is no doubt there is a large body of agitators in every country, and that in Ireland there are more of them than exist elsewhere. Those agitators in Ireland are to be divided into two classes—some of them are political, some ecclesiastical agitators; but the body of industrious, honest, and moderate men who are the mainstay of every country, whether they be Catholics or Protestants—where is the proof that they are in favour of this measure? I know that a document has been published declaiming against the Protestant Establishment; and I know that when a manifesto like this is put forward it becomes a question of honour, and it is difficult for persons to desert their co-religionists by refusing to put their names to the document; still, I believe that the great body of the moderate Roman Catholics of Ireland are not in favour of this proposal. I believe most fully, with the noble Earl, that there are no persons who benefit more by the existence of the Established Church in Ireland than the moderate Roman Catholic body. Your

(First Night.)

Lordships are aware that a great change has occurred lately, not only in Ireland but in the whole of Europe, with regard to the position and the sentiments of the Roman Catholic body; that in every country perhaps of Europe there is a growing progress of the Ultramontane party—that so influential are they even in this country that they were able, not long since, to silence the Home and Foreign Review, a work conducted by some of the ablest and most liberal Roman Catholics in the country. And where the Roman Catholics are left entirely under the dominion of the Ultramontane party, there they cease to retain their liberties. The existence of a power like the Established Church in Ireland is by no means unfavourable to their liberty. But, my Lords, I do not know why the feelings of the Protestants of Ireland are to be left out of view in considering whether this measure is desirable or not. Your Lordships may have seen a book written by one of the Masters in Chancery in Ireland, and read the testimony he bears to the way in which the Protestants of that country form the marrow, the sinews, and, indeed, the life of its industry. Is it then to be thought that if this measure is looked upon by them as a slight and an injury we are to pay no heed to their feelings? I believe that what Ireland wants is peace and quietness, and the carrying forward of that admirable policy which has been going on ever since the late Earl Grey was Prime Minister of this country—the policy of gradually bringing up together those who have hitherto been estranged in a combined system of education, which the persons you desire to gratify are determined to destroy—a combined system of education both for the poorer and the upper classes. Who are the opponents of the national system of education in Ireland but this Ultramontane party, who alone seem to be satisfied with this measure? Who are the great enemies of the Queen's Colleges, and of the combined system of education in them, but that very party? So that those measures which seem to me the best remedial measures for Ireland will be inevitably stopped by the triumph of that party. As to the future of Ireland, my hope for it is that Parliament, calmly considering all the difficulties of the case, hearing the Report of the Commissioners, which is likely to be laid before us in the course of the next month, should make such changes as are dictated by a desire—the Este continuing scale, to d now, but there being Church—the the same s hear the t Earl of Ch and the hi his Viceroy clergy of I indeed, in Church wa make conv over civil more fitted a clergyma words. If man of Ch whole of I charitable Protestant spirit, my sort of per of concilia smallness engineers sent out fr condition sake of th Ireland th will not l Remove i almost no rishes to you like ir you will atroy thei changes w tory spirit, seeing Irel perity wh interruptio some thirt you rashly without a you wish which is with the E likely to p As to relig equality be body and a with a fore the power and placin Church in of a disen

The Bishop of London

possibly assume. It is vain therefore to say that you are simply going to remove the Established Church and bring about religious equality. What you are going to do if you do not take care is this—to hand over Ireland altogether to the Roman Catholic Church, leaving the Protestant Church to do its work as best it can, principally supported by contributions from societies in England. In the course of a short time in three-fourths of Ireland the Protestant religion, I do not say will disappear for it will not do that, but it will be maintained by great effort; whereas you will have the rival and dominant Church in the most exaggerated form of its doctrines, most difficult for you to manage, always working on to the further questions of the land and of the repeal of the Union.

On the Motion of Lord LYTTLTON,

Further debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at half past Twelve o'clock, A.M., till half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, June 25, 1868.

MINUTES.] — NEW MEMBER SWORN — William Unwin Heygate, esquire, for Stamford.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Class v. vi.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental (No. 2); Clerks of the Peace, &c., (Ireland).

First Reading—Contagious Diseases Act (1865) Amendment* [193]; Clerks of the Peace, &c., (Ireland)* [194]; Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental (No. 2)* [195].

Second Reading—Railway Companies (Ireland) Advances* [177]; New Zealand (Legislative Council)* [185]; University Elections (Voting Papers)* [187]; Consular Marriages* [188].

Committee—Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections (re-comm.) [63]—R.P.; Courts of Law Fees, &c., (Scotland)* [158]; Renewable Leasehold Conversion (Ireland) Act Extension (re-comm.)* [182].

Report—Registration* [187-190]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 3)* [191-191]; Curragh of Kildare* [134-192]; Courts of Law Fees, &c., (Scotland)* [158]; Renewable Leasehold Conversion (Ireland) Act Extension (re-comm.)* [182].

Considered as amended—Entail Amendment (Scotland)* [140].

Third Reading—Representation of the People (Ireland)* [71]; Petroleum Act Amendment* [171]; Railways (Ireland) Acts Amendment* [128], and passed.

BRISTOL ELECTION.—REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

That John William Miles, esquire, is not duly elected a Citizen to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Bristol.

That the last Election for the said City is a void Election.

And the said Determinations were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

House further informed, that the Committee had agreed to the following Resolutions:—

That the said John William Miles was, by his Agents, guilty of bribery at the last Election for the City of Bristol, but such bribery was committed without the knowledge or consent of the said J. W. Miles.

That it was proved to the Committee that treating prevailed to some extent at the said Election; but it was not proved that such treating took place with the knowledge of the said John William Miles.

That the Committee have no reason to believe that Corrupt Practices extensively prevailed at the said Election, regard being had to the number of Registered Electors for the said City of Bristol.

Report to lie upon the Table.

Minutes of Evidence taken before the Committee to be laid before this House.—(Mr. Howes.)

METROPOLIS—NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Judges of the Designs for the New Courts of Justice were unanimous in recommending the design of Mr. Street as the best for external elevation; and, if not, whether he will give the names of the Judges who supported the recommendation; whether the votes of Messrs. Shaw and Pownall were taken on the question, and whether they or either of them concurred in the decision come to; whether the Lord Chancellor, as Head of the Courts of Justice Building Committee, has not announced that the object of the competition was to test generally the relative merits of the architects, so that Mr. Street's design was consequently adopted as the best architectural composition; and, whether the Secretary to the Treasury will exhibit Mr. Street's successful design in the Library, in order that the House may test the decision of the Judges?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he regretted that he was not in a position to answer the first two Questions of the hon. Gentleman, not being aware whether the Judges were unanimous, or whether the votes of Messrs. Shaw and Pownall, the professional Judges employed, were taken or not. All the information in the possession of the Treasury would be laid upon the table in a day or two. He saw no possible advantage in placing Mr. Street's design in the Library. It had been publicly exhibited for many weeks, if not months, in juxtaposition with the other designs for the Courts of Justice.

Mr. LAYARD said, he wished to know, Whether the designs had been exhibited to the public at large or to privileged persons?

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he believed that the public had the opportunity of gaining admission to the exhibition of the designs.

Mr. BENTINCK: Would the hon. Gentleman take any steps to ascertain whether the Judges were unanimous?

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he could not admit that it was any part of his duty to answer that Question.

Mr. M. CHAMBERS said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, If the intention of the Government to appoint Mr. Street (whose design was approved by the Judges for elevation only) sole Architect of the New Law Courts was communicated to the Royal Commission, and whether the Royal Commission has expressed any opinion on the appointment?

Lord JOHN MANNERS said, that the intention to appoint Mr. Street was communicated to the Royal Commission without delay. The Commissioners had since held no meeting, and they had therefore expressed no opinion on the subject.

GENERAL CARRIERS' ACT. QUESTION.

Mr. CARTER said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, Whether Her Majesty's Government in withdrawing from the Railways' Regulation Bill the Clauses they had inserted in it for amending, in certain respects, the General Carriers' Act, were satisfied that the provisions of that Act, passed nearly forty years since, are suitable to the requirements of the present day; or whether the Government still remain of opinion that the Carriers' Act requires amendment, and ought to be revised by Parliament?

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE said, in reply, that the Board of Trade had given great consideration to the question, and had come to the conclusion that the Carriers Act, passed in 1830, was unsuited to the existing state of things, especially in regard to railways; hence had the Act so much displacement with be quite that such during the that a S pointed as purpose of Carriers' them more requirement

UNITED

Mr. B. the Secre the present between that of th of a new. the Gover for the Co place all ing as to tions of ration of on the 20 arrangements wrong the to Americ with the

Mr. S. that the jesty's Go States ha state of time the there. pending; would not any state to the sec man, he tion of t contracts to place footing as tions of se

COOLIE

Mr. W. beg to a Foreign Governme junction Powers, to

Mr. Selater-Booth

ment to stop the Slave Trade carried on between Macao and Cuba and Peru, under the name of Coolie Emigration?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, the abuses attending on the practice of Coolie emigration from Macao are grave and notorious. We have from time to time brought the matter under the notice of the Portuguese Government, and we have invited Portugal to co-operate with France, England, and other Powers in endeavouring to come to some satisfactory arrangement with the Chinese Government on the question of Coolie emigration generally. To that communication we have as yet received no answer from the Portuguese Government. With reference to the parallel drawn by the hon. Member between the Coolie emigration and the slave trade, I may remind him that in the case of the slave trade, wherever it is carried on, we have the right to interfere by treaty either with Portugal or with any other Power that may be concerned. In the case of the Coolie emigration, we have no right of interference whatever, except that right which every Government has to give such friendly advice to any other Government as it thinks fit. But beyond that we have no power.

ARMY—SUPERANNUATION ALLOWANCES.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the hardship inflicted upon Officers of the Army, Ordnance, Navy, and Marines in respect of Civil Services performed by them, by Clause 16, c. 24, 4 & 5 Will. IV., which regulates the superannuation allowances granted to those Officers; and, if so, will he give the subject his best consideration?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, his attention had been very recently called to the operation of the clause in question, and it was the opinion of many persons well-qualified to judge that that operation involved some hardship upon meritorious officers. The clause had been continually interpreted in one sense only, and that interpretation could not be altered except by an Act of Parliament. It would be a very serious question to re-open the whole question of superannuation allowances; and he was not prepared at present to bring in a Bill to effect the object of his hon. and gallant Friend; but, having heard of the dissatisfaction which had arisen under this clause, he would undertake to watch its operation closely, and to give the subject his best consideration.

MONEY ORDERS AND STAMPED RECEIPTS.—QUESTION.

MR. CARNEGIE said, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Miller), he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, By what authority the Board of Inland Revenue permits the Postmaster General to accept receipts for sums contained in Money Orders of £2 and upwards without payment by the recipient of the Stamp Duty of One Penny, in contravention of the Act 16 & 17 Vict., c. 59; and, whether the same privilege would be accorded to a Company conducting money order business, and charging the public a lower rate for commission than is charged by the Post Office?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the authority under which the Postmaster General was relieved from the obligation in question was a letter from the Treasury of the 20th of October, 1853. The whole subject was fully considered then, and it was decided there was no ground whatever for requiring the use of stamped receipts. A company conducting a money order business would not be at all in the same position as the Postmaster General; and it must be remembered that a minimum commission of 3d. was paid upon a Post Office money order, and this paid the Stamp Duty and left yet a large margin for commission.

ARMY—CASE OF CAPTAIN BROOKE. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, that no one deprecated more than he did the putting of Questions in that House on questions that had come before the Horse Guards; but he must beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, If he can state to the House, whether, in the opinion of his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, any reflection rests upon Captain Brooke's honour, as an officer and gentleman, in consequence of the dispute which has taken place between him and Captain Peel (late of 11th Hussars), and his subsequent arrest and reprimand? He wished further to ask, Whether the right hon. Gentleman can state for what Captain Brooke was reprimanded?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I think, Sir, the House, and I think my hon. and gallant Friend behind me, will feel that this Question is put in an unusual form. I cannot refrain from saying I observe with some regret the great frequency with which military questions of this kind are made the subject of Questions and Motions in this House; because I cannot help fearing that the tendency of that great frequency is to impair and endanger military discipline. The dispute which arose between Captain Brooke and Captain Peel had relation entirely to a question of a private nature. The consequence of that dispute was, that Captain Brooke was led to use language of such great impropriety that when the subject was brought before the Commander-in-Chief his Royal Highness thought it necessary to make it the subject of a reprimand. I may add that, with a knowledge of the circumstances, I do not think that his Royal Highness could have taken a milder course than he did take, and further than that I do not think I am called upon to go.

CUSTOMS—EXAMINING OFFICERS. QUESTION.

MR. BUTLER said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Petition presented to the Lords of the Treasury by the Acting Examining Officers in Her Majesty's Customs, praying to be heard before the Committee of Inquiry, will be granted?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he was unable to answer the Question of the hon. Member precisely, and could only say generally that the petition had been received and considered, and would again come under consideration in due course. He could not say that as yet any decision had been come to respecting it, nor could he say that the Commission would be able to examine the officers personally; but the subject at all events was under consideration.

THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF SERVIA. QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is a cordial understanding between the Protecting Powers and the Porte that the National Assembly of Servia should be left at perfect liberty, on the occasion of the present catastrophe, to take such measures for providing for the succession to the Go-

Sir John Pakington

vernment
ance with

Lord S best Answer is, that it jeasty's Go in any wa
the Servia so long, o international have ente to believe have every can judge reached m come to s
the other

RULE OF

MR. H ask the Trade, W
to the "I upon the issue of w quence of with the ject), will bers?

MR. ST of the F cently rec rence in proposed ence to t
The Pape
and I hop
by the en

VALUAT

THE O'
to ask M
If the Go declaration troduce a Ireland
Revenue arbitrary licences i tedly unec

THE CL QUER sa of any for ment to i had state one shoul but he w distinct pr

sent to the Revenue Department in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman, nor were any instructions of that nature required; because, as he had formerly stated in answer to a Question, persons who complained had a remedy in their own hands. They were able to go to the Office and demand a re-valuation; and if they did so and proved that they had paid too high a duty the excess would be returned to them.

SCOTLAND—JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, If the Royal Commission about to be issued regarding the Judicial System of Scotland is to be a full and searching inquiry into the constitution, relative position, practice, and procedure of all the Civil Courts Superior and Inferior; and, if, in his opinion, the passing of the Court of Session Bill now before the House will tend to delay legislative action on the Report of that Commission?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, that a Royal Commission was to be issued for the purpose of instituting an inquiry into the entire judicial system of Scotland; and he could also state that the passing of the Court of Session Bill would not tend to delay the Report of the Commission.

METROPOLIS—PARK LANE.

QUESTIONS.

MR. GODDARD said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether there is any probability of the long-pending arrangements with reference to improving the approaches to Park Lane from Piccadilly being shortly carried out, and which the large and increasing traffic through that narrow thoroughfare, as well as the improvements already effected in the upper portions of it, renders so very desirable on behalf of the public interests?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he must refer the hon. Member to what happened two years ago, when the Metropolitan Board of Works promoted a Bill, for opening Hamilton Place, which was referred to a Committee, by whom it was rejected, and a year ago when another Bill on the subject and two other Metropolitan Improvement Bills were referred to a Select Committee, presided over by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, which recommended that a new improvement rate should be coupled with the continuance of the Coal duties. The late Government were considering the proposal when the change of government occurred; the Session was then so far advanced that the present Government could not take the opinion of Parliament upon the financial part of the question, and they were, therefore, obliged to drop the Bill. This year a Select Committee, to which the Bill for widening Park Lane was referred, rejected it, and recommended that Hamilton Place should be opened, and that the houses on its east side should be pulled down, in order to enable a roadway of sufficient width to be made. What course the Metropolitan Board of Works would be prepared to take in consequence of that recommendation of the Select Committee he could not say; but it would, he thought, be their duty to take the matter into their consideration.

SIR WILLIAM GALLWEY said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, although he had not given Notice of the Question, Whether, in any alterations that may be made, they will be so contrived as to avoid taking down half of Hamilton Place? He would suggest that an improvement might be made by removing a house and stables in Piccadilly, and running a new Street in a straight line from Piccadilly into Park Lane at Stanhope Gate.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the hon. Baronet has not given me Notice of his Question; but, so far at least as regards a part of it, I should imagine that it ought to be directed to one of the representatives of the Metropolitan Board of Works.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE PEEL STATUE.—RESOLUTION.

LORD ELCHO said, he rose to make a Motion which had stood in his name for a long time. When Parliament met last February, the first thing that greeted hon. Members on their way to the House was a strange apparition in a dirty sheet, standing close to the railings by the carriage entrance in New Palace Yard. That apparition they ascertained upon inquiry to be the Peel Statue, and he ventured to give Notice—for a great many persons thought the site which had been selected for the statue a very bad one—that he would bring the matter before the House. The statue seemed to have been frightened by that Notice, for it one night suddenly disappeared, and remained away for some time. After the lapse of a fortnight, however, it came back again covered as before in a sheet, which was subsequently removed, and it now stood open to the public view, he could not say an object of beauty. The whole subject of the erection of statues throughout the country was one which, in his opinion, was well worthy of consideration. How were statues generally got up? Some distinguished Member of Parliament died, or retired from public life, and his friends and admirers deemed him to be sufficiently distinguished to have a statue of him erected. They formed a committee, collected subscriptions, and selected an artist to carry out that object, and, of course, the size of the statue depended very much on the amount of the subscriptions. The statue completed, they endeavoured to procure the best site in the metropolis in which to place it; and the whole proceeding was conducted in the absence of all system laid down by the Government or any other authority. Some years ago, for instance, there was in Trafalgar Square a statue of Dr. Jenner, which public opinion declared not to be well-matched with other statues in its vicinity, and it was, in consequence, removed to Kensington Gardens. Again, there were the statues of Sir Charles Napier and Sir Henry Havelock, the former of which, persons competent to judge, very generally disapproved; while in the neighbourhood of the United Service Club the admirers of Lord Clyde erected a statue, which represented that distinguished soldier standing on a sort of capstan with an impossible Victory, and a still more impossible lion by his side, and in its vicinity another statue with which it in no way matched. Again, there was the statue erected to the Duke of Wellington at Hyde Park Corner, than which he knew of nothing more monstrous, and which he had ventured to call the apotheosis of bad art in this country. Since he had seen the Peel Statue, however, he felt disposed to admit that there might be something even worse. But that which he rose chiefly to impress upon the House was the absolute want of system which prevailed in this country in connection with our public character, ill-chosen rather than When Lord position of pedestal of he thought in the matter with regard matters. stance, or passing the the nature streets and an interest death on thelogy between Rome dead in which in modern observed any ancient voured to niously w temple of threatened ways cut however in reference moved, he reformed of the el a sort of for the might be with the Academy had though the gested the and works to avoid made, it was not in opposition First Cor analogous of India the Secret American mile, and wanted, a statue was He was the manufacturer in this country his admirer him, a sort then cloth similar to lay figure appearance of the person to be represented. A cast of the whole was then taken, and a head was then modelled and put on the old clothes. No one could maintain that Peel's statue was an ornament to the metropolis; and who it was that placed it in its present position, or what was now to be done with it, he could not pretend to say. It had been suggested that it should be buried, and another suggestion was that it should be put under the "Buxton extinguisher," which was close by. He was a subscriber to the statue, though he had never been consulted about it; and he would venture to suggest that it should be put into the smelting pot, and that another and different statue should be cast, and then they might hope to have a better statue of Sir Robert Peel. The question of a statue to Cromwell had been raised, but it would be a mercy for Cromwell to be without one if it were to be of the kind in question. As regarded the statues in Westminster Hall, he thought it would be much better without them. He had thought of asking for a Return of the statues outside the building in which they were assembled, for they were so numerous that it was almost impossible to identify them. He hoped the House would remove from the precincts of Parliament this disgraceful statue of that great man, Sir Robert Peel, and he concluded by moving "That, in the opinion of this House, the Peel Statue ought to be removed from its present site in New Palace Yard."

Lord Elcho

MR. BERESFORD HOPE seconded the Motion of his noble Friend with great pleasure, and for three reasons. The first was because it led up the general question of a more efficient Ministry of Arts. The second was his regard for the memory of the amiable and accomplished artist, so lately dead, who had unfortunately produced this statue. The third reason was his veneration for the great name of Peel, which was exposed to perpetual ridicule in connection with that unhappy effigy. He did not believe that it was possible to find greater general lack of art, or more overpowering mediocrity and heaviness than in that figure, stuck up in the corner of Palace Yard, as if it were an Inspector of Police taking the numbers of the cabs and seeing that the Members were not run over. He agreed with his noble Friend that it might be a desirable experiment to strengthen the hands of the Architectural Department by a Consultative Council; but at the same time he must, by way of caution, observe that due care would have to be taken for the infusion of new blood, and the gradual change of its personnel, otherwise it would become a focus of jobbery and prejudice, while it would only conduce to the stereotyping for long epochs of some passing phase of art, if the Councillors who had been named at the mature ages of forty or fifty years were to hang on as effete septuagenarians. But there was a further reform equally needed, which he had already advocated, and which he would continue to urge until he had won for it the attention which it deserved. The Science and Art Department must be separated from the Department of Elementary Education with which it is now so ill-mated, and must be combined with the cognate Commissionership of Works, and then the new office of Works, Science, and Art should be raised to the position of a first-class Ministry, whose tenant should be capable of sitting in the House of Lords. The last consideration was very important; for the other House is a body which has leisure to attend to such questions, and yet perpetually finds itself pulled up from never having within itself any Official charged with this responsibility. There would then be an Under Secretary, who would probably belong to the House of which the Minister himself was not a Member; so that both Lords and Commons would possess a Member of the Government charged with the official care of questions which were every day increasing in importance. In this case the Metropolitan Board might also be relieved of somewhat of its overgrown power, and the Imperial Government resume, as it ought to do, its general supervision of the improvement of the Imperial capital. In conclusion, he was surprised that his noble Friend had not pointed his case with a reference to Leicester Square, out of which the Court of Exchequer had a few days before ousted the Metropolitan Board, by a decision which affirmed that the garden, with its wooden-legged statue and all the accumulated abominations was private property.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the Peel Statue ought to be removed from its present site in New Palace Yard,"—(Lord Elcho),

—instead thereof.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was not one of those who pretended to any particular understanding of matters of art, and therefore his few words would be directed to the facts of the case and to the arguments of his noble Friend (Lord Elcho). The way in which the statue originated was this—when Sir Robert Peel died his friends naturally met and subscribed to pay him that tribute of respect which no man ever better deserved, and a Committee was appointed to carry into effect the wishes of the subscribers. Of that Committee his right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Colonel Wilson Patten) was now the only survivor. The other members were the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Hardinge, Lord Canning, Sir James Graham, Mr. Sidney Herbert, and Lord Ashburton. He (Mr. Cardwell) had the honour to be the honorary secretary. The Committee unanimously selected Baron Marochetti as the sculptor; his model was publicly exhibited at the Crystal Palace, and he made a statue in conformity with it; but when it was completed it was the opinion of Sir Charles Barry that it was too large to be placed in the immediate neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament, which was the only suitable locality. Baron Marochetti most handsomely offered at his own expense, to make a new statue, and accordingly executed the one which was now in Palace Yard; but he did not live to see it placed on the site first selected, though he approved of the site. The Committee asked the late Commissioner of Works to give them a site, and he gave them the one on which the statue was first erected with the sanction of Baron Marochetti. When, however the railings, the pillars and lamps were erected, the Committee were of opinion that the site was not a suitable one. The present Committee, consisting of the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Stanhope, Lord Hardinge, Mr. Gladstone, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster consulted Mr. Barry as to the most suitable site, and he selected the one on which the statue now stood, and the Chief Commissioner very handsomely gave it to the Committee. The argument was that there should be some control in these matters; but would they have more responsibility by having a Minister in that House or by having some Council such as that which had been suggested by his noble Friend? If they were to have such a Council they would have a number of amateurs who would give very good or very bad opinions; and no doubt everybody would object to what everybody else had done, but there would be responsible authority.

Mr. Cardwell

LORD ELCHO explained that he wished to alter the responsibility; he wished that the Head of the Department should have a Council.

MR. CARDWELL said, he thought that a Minister who chose his advisers was much more responsible than who had a Council sitting by him of sort of quasi authority, and whose authority was only partial, imperfect and undefined. He thought that the course was to leave the matter in the hands of the responsible Minister, and to establish an amateur committee to advise him.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE agreed with the miserable system on which the works were managed in the metropolis between the Metropolitan Board of Works on the one hand and the Government on the other. The statement of the First Commissioner of Works was that there was no sympathy between the two Departments, and consequently great work was carried on properly at the same time, the expenditure was enormous. According to the estimates on Public Buildings they were to spend £4,000,000; and surely a system of management ought to be adopted which would be satisfactory to the House of Commons and the country. Let them take a moment at the ornaments round the House—they were perfectly absurd. Ruskin had written a book called Seven Lamps of Architecture, and that neighbourhood they had selected of architecture, and the whole plan which had been adopted was very different from that of Sir Charles Barry. But he would not make any lengthened remarks on the subject now, as he had given Notice. He should in the course of next week draw attention to a Report which had been laid on the table in reference to the Public Buildings Departments. He would then take the opportunity of going into the whole question.

MR. LAYARD said, that he would confine himself to the matter before the House. He quite agreed with what had been said by his noble Friend (Lord Elcho), but when, some time ago, in Committee on the Supply, he made a few remarks about the Peel Statue, he was quite ignorant that Baron Marochetti was the sculptor. He had been on terms of intimacy with the artist, and being acquainted with his good qualities, both social and artistic, it was very great pain that he felt called upon to protest against the statue. This was a question of even more importance than the memory of the sculptor. The statue was, in his opinion, entirely unworthy of the site it occupied and of the person to whom it had been put up. It was ill-formed and clumsy, and possessed no artistic qualities whatever. He thought that the site first chosen was not a bad one; but then the architect put up railings and lamps and destroyed the effect of the statue, and thus the statue was made to be subordinate to the lamps and the iron railings. As to the new site, everyone would admit that they should not place a statue upon sloping ground, which gave the impression that the whole thing was sliding down. He did not agree that a Council was necessary for matters of this kind. The sculptor should know the site upon which his work was to be placed, so that he might study it with the view of producing a good effect. The statue of Lord Clyde was first placed behind the parade ground; but the position was so absurd that the Chief Commissioner was obliged to remove it to its present site. He begged to suggest the desirability of laying down a rule that, previously to the erection of any statue, a model both of the sculpture and pedestal should be placed on the site which it was intended to occupy, so that the opinions and criticisms of the public might be obtained before a final determination was arrived at. The French were about to build another great triumphal arch, and they had gone to the expense of many thousands of pounds in erecting a complete model of the edifice, and it having been fully criticized, they could now go to work with some knowledge as to what they were going to do. He trusted the statue would be removed.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to observe that his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) had omitted to state that the Wellington Statue at Hyde Park Corner had been placed there in direct defiance of a vote of the House of Commons. What took place was this: the Statue Committee obtained the consent of the Crown to place the statue upon the arch; but an address was voted to the Crown that it should not be placed there. The Committee, however, waited upon Earl Russell, then First Minister, and said that their object was to place the statue on the arch so that the public might have an opportunity of seeing how it would look, and they pledged themselves to remove it if it did not meet with general approbation. The First Minister assented to the arrangement, and, having got the statue there, the Committee said the House of Commons or the Government might themselves move it if they thought fit. He quite agreed that there should be some responsible authority in reference to the erection of statues in the metropolis.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT thought the Peel Statue ought to be removed, and that it was a disgrace to the memory of his late Friend Baron Marochetti. In his opinion it would be well if the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works would also remove all the statues from Westminster Hall, instead of adding to their number. He hoped that whatever experiments might in future be made, Westminster Hall would be held sacred.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought his hon. Friend who had just sat down forgot that a short time ago the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) brought forward the question of the statues in Westminster Hall, and the House decided by an overwhelming majority that the statues should remain there. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had suggested that in matters relating to public edifices and works of art the First Commissioner of Works should be assisted by a Council similar to the Council of India, which he would remind the House consisted of a number of gentlemen who were well paid, and who were debarred from sitting in that House. Probably, however, his noble Friend would wish that the members of his proposed Council should sit in the House; but the only result of that would be that their deliberations would be adjourned from the office to the House of Commons. Not many years ago the office he now held was associated with the Presidency of the Board of Health, and assisted by that kind of council which some were now anxious to associate with the First Commissioner of Works. The result was that when he succeeded to Office in 1852 he found a complete dead-lock. His predecessor, the Duke of Somerset, had taken measures to exclude every member of the Board of Health from his own office, so that no personal communication could occur between the President and the Board of Health. The House found it necessary to revolutionize that Department, and the Board of Health was now placed upon a more sensible footing. If a Council of the nature now proposed were established the result would probably be very much the same. Then, as to advice on æsthetic subjects given by such a body, the House would recollect what happened on the subject of railway bridges. There was one to be taken across the Thames at Battersea Park, near the Suspension Bridge. Many leaders in the world of art—gentlemen who would, probably, form the council to assist the First Commissioner of Works—took the alarm and remonstrated against this monstrous proposal. They presented a protest, but no attention was paid to their æsthetic remonstrances, and the bridge was built. With respect to the suggestions of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) and the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) he would remark that one of the wisest things the Legislature ever did was to release the Metropolitan Board from all ties to the office of Works, and if they now attempted to make the Metropolitan Board, whose revenues were provided by taxation upon the people of the metropolis, subservient to the Commissioner of Works, or any other Government office, there would be no end to the confusion and complaint that would ensue, and no metropolitan improvement would ever be carried out. When it was argued that there ought to be some strong Government authority to overbear the local authority in such cases as the delay in widening Park Lane, he would remind the House that such interposition would be at variance with the first principles of constitutional government, and that if a despotic authority were established it could only be by means of funds taken from the expenditure of the country. Unless the House were prepared to place the cost of metropolitan improvements on the Votes of that House, it would be unfair to overbear the free decisions of the local bodies. With regard to the removal of the Peel Statue the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) had stated so clearly and succinctly the facts of the case that he was willing to leave the matter in the hands of the House. The noble Lord had not said what he would do with the statue. [Lord ELCHO : Melt it.] The noble Lord was a subscriber to the fund, and he might make this or any other communication to the right hon. Member for Oxford. As to the removal of statues in general, he could not defend, nor was it any business of his

Lord John Manners

to defend the metropolis; it had been ple-very strong fore the lation of think in turn round statue was thought accede to Gentleman position

Mr. C
what the Gentleman Oxford
what he the subject a committee right hon.
the statue
Baron M speech he tion by the sioner of understand advice to alone, but was desirtion remain-advised greatest to remove by a "statue"
what no been the they had Sir Robert dreadful to stand was not the appo-
Art. For councils the "Gr

"With
All stat
He would Peterboro taken as those pre-and whom in that H (Lord El removal of Marochet opinion of that when in his de

House of Commons was insensible to art—as he believed nine-tenths of the Members were—let them at least be sensible of what was due to the memory of a great statesman. Of this statue he said, in the words used by a right hon. Gentleman on another subject, Pull it down, and let it cumber the ground no longer.

MR. GREGORY asked whether they were to allow such a caricature of the lineaments of Sir Robert Peel to stand for all future generations because it was erected by private subscription, and because the Government could not answer the question as to what was to be done with it? He would say let the noble Lord hand it back to the subscribers. It was not their fault, but their misfortune that it was a bad statue. At the latter part of his life Baron Marochetti's works were inferior to his earlier productions. If the First Commissioner of Works would not give way, he trusted that the House would divide. But he hoped that the Government would not make it a political question and whip up their followers in a matter of this kind. He hoped the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) would defer to the manifest wish of the House and consent to the removal of an eyesore.

MR. J. HARDY said, he held that no statue ought to be erected until a model of the same size had been put up, so that a judgment might be formed as to the effect of it. The Peel Statue was most objectionably placed upon a slope, a position which no statue ought to occupy. He would suggest its removal to a place where it could not be seen.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 71; Noes 182: Majority 111.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the Peel Statue ought to be removed from its present site in New Palace Yard.

METROPOLIS — ST. MARY SOMERSET, UPPER THAMES STREET.

QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he rose to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they will obtain, by purchase or otherwise, the materials of the Tower of St. Mary Somerset Church, Upper Thames Street, now advertised for sale by tender, with a view to the re-erection of the Tower in some fitting locality? He wished to know whether the Government would follow the precedent they had themselves so well set in the case of the screen of Burlington House? The value of the materials of the Tower was, he believed, very small, while the cost of their re-erection in some other locality would not, he was informed, be more than £800 or £1,000. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would take steps to secure that a work which was designed under the superintendence of Sir Christopher Wren would not be altogether lost to the country. He should also like to know whether it might not be possible to re-erect the Tower in the burial-ground near its present site, or some other spot near its present locality?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that after the decision just arrived at by the House the Government would be careful in accepting works of art even as a gift. The cost of what was suggested by the hon. Member would be fully £1,500, and he did not think the Government would be justified in proposing to the House a Vote for the erection of the Tower at some future time on some site now unknown. The case of Burlington House stood in a different position to that then before the House, for Burlington House was Government property, and could be dealt with by them. If the Tower could be retained in its present locality that might be a very desirable arrangement; but the question was one which should be settled between the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the City authorities.

MR. DISRAELI'S SPEECH AT MERCHANT TAYLORS' HALL.—QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF, in rising to put a Question to the Prime Minister in reference to some passages in his speech last week, at Merchant Taylors' Hall, said, the right hon. Gentleman was reported to have used on that occasion the following words:—

"When we acceded to Office the name of England was a name of suspicion and distrust in every foreign Court and Cabinet. There was no possibility of that cordial action with any of the great Powers which is the only security for peace; and in consequence of that want of cordiality wars were frequently occurring. But since we entered upon Office and public affairs were administered by my noble Friend, who is deprived by a special diplomatic duty of the gratification of being here this evening, I say that all this has changed; that there never existed between England and foreign Powers a feeling of greater cordiality and confidence than now prevails; that while we have shrunk from bustling and arrogant intermeddling, we have never taken refuge in selfish isolation, and the result has been that there never was a Government in this country which has been more frequently appealed to for its friendly offices than the one which now exists."

These were, surely, very wild words for a British Prime Minister to use, and although much might be forgiven to a man, especially to the right hon. Gentleman speaking after dinner, it must be recollected that he was not offending for the first time; for in the spring of 1858 the right hon. Gentleman made a speech at Slough which created at the time very great interest and excitement, and which was very freely commented upon in this House. In that speech the right hon. Gentleman used language which, when compared with that which fell from him the other day, could hardly be excused as the mere inspiration of circumstances, for it seemed to be a sort of common form which he kept by him for these occurrences when a Conservative Government happened to accede to Office. At Slough, in 1858, the right hon. Gentleman was reported to have said—

"But when I tell you, and I tell you seriously, that the question of peace and war when we acceded to Office was not a question of weeks or days, but of hours, I am sure you will remember that peace has been preserved while the honour of the country has been vindicated."

Now, who, he would ask, was the person who was Foreign Minister in the Administration which went out of Office in the beginning of 1858? Who was that "troubler of Israel" whose designs, whose machinations, whose un-wisdom were such that cordial co-operation between the great Powers of Europe was rendered wholly impossible? That man, if his memory served him right, was Lord Clarendon, the very person of whom Lord Derby was reported as having, in his Ministerial statement on taking Office in 1866, spoken as follows:—

"And, my Lords, desirous more especially at this critical moment for the public interest that the thread of foreign negotiations should not be abruptly broken, I was anxious that those hands which had so long exercised the power of dealing with foreign affairs should still continue to do so, and therefore the first person to whom I made an offer of Office was my noble Friend the late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Clarendon). My Lords, I made that offer in all sincerity, believing that between my noble Friend and myself there existed no material difference of opinion on that it was country that should be re-

Now, he the right rose to re about to p thing was to cast at Clarendon been but Office who acceded t fact that ber of th like two years m. had trans Clarendon Lord was his respon Cabinets Russell w any impo undertook he would tertained which w Lord wh conduct sat down he was a noble Lo and to w heart giv that wish Treasury speeches the inter in Engl right ho interest hailed hi tard. B the case very few closely t stand th hon. Gen constantl abroad seriously time ago tinent—who atte right ho the conc Unfortun immediat and jurists on the Continent not one in a 100 really understood the exact political situation of England at the present moment. It could, however, he thought, be stated in a sentence. The Parliament of England, wearied with the labours which it had gone through since the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832, had fallen asleep, and fancied in its dreams that the right hon. Gentleman was riding on its breast like a nightmare. The hon. Gentleman concluded by asking the Premier, Whether he had used at Merchant Taylors' Hall the language which he had quoted?

Mr. Grant Duff

MR. DISRAELI: I think the House will agree with me that it will be convenient not to recur on this occasion to observations which were made ten years ago at a meeting in the county of Buckingham. If we enter into that question, and into discussions as to the political situation at the time, I fear we should have an adjourned debate on foreign affairs in this House, which would not, it seems to me, be desirable, especially as I am informed there is some chance of there being an adjourned debate in the other House of Parliament on a different subject. I think further that the House will agree that if the hon. Gentleman had confined himself to the Question which he had placed on the Paper, and to which I was ready to give an Answer, the time of the House, which is now valuable, might have been spared. Though, I may add, I do not grudge the hon. Gentleman the change which he thought fit to make in his mode of attack, and though I was quite ready to listen to his observations, which I conclude from his criticisms to-night are meant to be models of observations which are not eccentric, it still appears to me that we have hardly been repaid by the exhibition to which we have just listened, for the deviation of the hon. Gentleman from that more modest course of merely putting a Question which he at first proposed to himself to pursue. Really, what the hon. Gentleman wishes to know is whether I made some observations at a banquet in the City, at which I had the honour of being a guest, and whether I am prepared to vindicate them, especially with reference to the noble Lord, who, he told us, has at various times filled eminent posts in the service of Her Majesty, and who has more than once held the office of Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs? So far as I could catch the larger part of the passage read by the hon. Gentleman, and so far as I can judge from that which he printed for the public service in the Notices of Motion, the report appears to me to be substantially correct. I will not criticize expressions, which probably I may not have used, but as far as regards what would be attached to what I said the report appears to me to be substantially correct. In making these observations I spoke, as it was quite evident, of a system of policy that had prevailed for a considerable time, not only for a year, but for many years, and therefore the hon. Gentleman felt, as he was making his observations just now, that the application of my remarks to Lord Clarendon, who really had succeeded to the management of our foreign affairs only for a few months, must be of a slight and limited character. The hon. Gentleman has gone out of his way to connect the career of Lord Clarendon with seven years at least of management of our foreign affairs, respecting which I have expressed my opinion, and I do not think he did a friendly act to Lord Clarendon in so doing. I do not think he at all substantiated his case. Lord Clarendon was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster during two years of that time, and we know very well that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster does not take an active part in the management of our foreign relations. As for Lord Clarendon's visit to Paris, I do not want to enter into the causes of that visit. It is quite consistent with there being a state of foreign affairs of a very unsatisfactory kind, and which were not managed with adroitness and wisdom by those peculiarly responsible for them, that they should have recourse to the experience of Lord Clarendon to extricate them from their difficulties. As I am asked, I must state without any equivocation whatever that I believe this is substantially a correct version of what I said at the meeting in the City, and I believe that it expresses the literal truth. I believe that for five, six, or seven years, dating from the period when a Nobleman, once a distinguished Member of this House, took the management of foreign affairs in 1859, they were conducted, to use one of his own famous expressions, as they seldom have been, since the accession of the House of Hanover. It was obvious that Lord Clarendon who succeeded to Office for only a few months, could not be responsible for a system which had unfortunately prevailed for many years. Lord Clarendon inherited difficulties and he bequeathed them to his successors.

MR. LAYARD said, that having had the honour of representing the Foreign Office in that House for five years, he trusted the House would allow him to endeavour to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman a straightforward answer to the Question. ["Oh!"] It was not his business to call the attention of the House to the right hon. Gentleman's speech, but it was quite right that his hon. Friend should do so. The statements of the right hon. Gentleman were capable of proof or they were not; but they would not be proved by mere outcry and clamour from the other side of the House. He was concerned in the grave accusation made, and he thought the other side of the House might allow him to say a few words upon the subject. He did not attach much importance to the vapourings of the right hon. Gentleman; they were the subject of much merriment to many persons; but they were the cause of deep sorrow to those who desired to maintain the character of British statesmen whatever their politics might be. The right hon. Gentleman could not get out of what he said by "chaff," of which he was a master. He said—

“ When we acceded to Office the name of England was a name of suspicion and distrust in every foreign Court and Cabinet. There was no possibility of that cordial action with any of the great Powers which is the only security for peace ; and in consequence of that want of cordiality wars were frequently occurring.

With regard to Lord Clarendon, the right hon. Gentleman rode off with the excuse that Lord Clarendon had been only a few months Minister of Foreign Affairs; but the right hon. Gentleman kept out of view the fact that Lord Clarendon, holding at that time the office of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, was constantly consulted upon foreign affairs, and had been sent upon the most important missions. He not only went to Paris, but he represented this country at the Conference upon the Danish question; and on various other occasions he was employed, if one might say so, on matters connected with our foreign policy. The right hon. Gentleman evaded the allusion of the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) to his speech of 1858, in which he stated that peace or war was a question, not of months and days, but of hours and minutes, to the fact that the Minister who had so nearly involved this country in war was Lord Clarendon, and to the fact that, notwithstanding his knowledge of this, Lord Derby invited

Mr. Disraeli

Lord Cla Governm reign Af Gentleme
the ware during E when he that Hou great ma half-a-do with whe
ality" w not want answers-and the l
to them.
Office th civil war summed t mean to for that.
which af Austrian quent w then Gov House ar sistent e porters violate th to involve
It was p
Gentleme
but did I we migh
the Unite Alabama was defe Did the casation on? Wi did not about pea
The hon. seemed t but he (3 point. I no one were to Lord's o consequ party the Commons of speech man him brought f House to A noble that Hou who by h it, and w

boldly admit the fact, wished to force on war. One of the main causes of the war between Denmark and Prussia and Austria was because the Danish Government were led to believe by their Minister in London that if they went to war they would be supported by the Conservatives, who would have a majority in that House. ["Oh, oh!"] He stated that as a fact, and no one acquainted with the subject would venture to deny it. He knew of no other wars except those he had mentioned occurring on the Continent or elsewhere during the time when Lord Russell was Foreign Minister. The House was aware, that while sitting on the Opposition side of the House, he had himself abstained from taking part in discussions on foreign affairs, as he was not desirous of showing any feeling against the noble Lord the present Foreign Minister, but, on the contrary, had always felt glad when he was able to support the noble Lord. He had never made a speech against the noble Lord, though he had disagreed with him on many points; but when it was said that the late Government were the cause of this and that war, and were never able to maintain cordial feelings with foreign Powers, he had a right to inquire in what respect there had been a change. The Danish war was the inevitable result of events. The great principle involved was German unity, the Danish question being a pretence for the time. But after the war ceased a time of quiet came about, as generally happened in such a case. Since the present Foreign Minister had been in Office no question likely to lead to war had arisen. ["Oh, oh!" and cries of "Luxemburg!"] What credit had the noble Lord in settling the question of Luxemburg? The noble Lord had admitted that he had great difficulty in agreeing to mediation. Had it not been for pressure from without the noble Lord would not have mediated; and it was only at the last moment, when the Emperor of the French was about to apply to Holland to exercise a mediation, that the noble Lord at last consented. What happened afterwards? The noble Lord and the Earl of Derby stated that when entering into the guarantee it was not their intention to keep it; for that was the meaning of what was said by them respecting the efficiency of the guarantee. If any German statesman were asked what construction was to be put on the words used by those two noble Lords, he would declare that that announcement destroyed all faith in the mediation of this country. With Turkey the noble Lord opposite had followed the policy which Lords Russell and Clarendon pursued; and, indeed, that was the only policy which could have been adopted. As to the Spanish claims, in regard to the Mermaid and the Tornado, they were not settled to the present day. The noble Lord had told the House that the English claimants had right on their side, but that he would wait until some British subjects had done wrong to Spain and then he would set one wrong against the other. As regarded the Alabama dispute, matters still remained in the same state as when Earl Russell's Government went out of Office. He thought that the country would not accept the Answer which the right hon. Gentleman had given that evening, and he called on the right hon. Gentleman to state what were the wars in Europe, or elsewhere, which had been brought about by want of cordiality between this country and other Powers?

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he thought that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down proved the truth of the saying that "Those who complain without cause always complain without temper." He could not compliment the hon. Gentleman on the diplomatic language of his speech. The hon. Gentleman found fault with the expression in the Prime Minister's speech that on the present Government acceding to Office "the name of England was the name of suspicion and distrust in every foreign Court." Was not that the truth? It was by a "meddling and muddling policy" and by going certain lengths in respect to Poland and Denmark and then withdrawing, that suspicion and distrust were excited on the Continent and great evils were produced in this country. Lord Russell, in a memorable despatch, had laid down the principle with respect to other nations that whenever the people of a country thought that they had a sufficient grievance they had a right to rise in arms against their rulers, and after such a declaration was it surprising that Fenian and other disturbances should have broken out?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I had expected that after the remarks of my hon. Friend near me either the right hon. Gentleman opposite, appealing to the indulgence of the House, which is usually accorded under such circumstances, or some other Member of Her Majesty's Government, would have risen in his place and have replied to the observations which have been made from these Benches. I am, of course, assuming that the Members of Her Majesty's Government do not entirely shrink from accepting the responsibility which attaches to the language used by their Chief. However that may be, I cannot rise on this occasion without expressing my deep regret that occasion should have been given to the hon. Gentleman behind me (Mr. Grant Duff), in the exercise of his discretion as a private Member of this House, and without any concert with me, to challenge the speech which was delivered by the right hon. Gentleman at the Merchant Taylors' Hall. I must confess that whatever appetite for controversy I may possess is usually abundantly satisfied by the occasions for controversy that arise within the walls of this House; and therefore it is to me a matter of the most sincere regret that the First Minister of the Crown should have used language in another place that has led to this discussion. But the hon. Gentleman behind me having brought forward the subject, I must take the opportunity of respectfully but firmly protesting, not merely against the particular passage to which reference has been made, but against the whole strain of this oration, and of many other orations which the right hon. Gentleman, departing in this respect from the practice of his predecessors, has made it his custom to deliver, sometimes to his constituents in Buckingham, sometimes to a sympathizing audience at the Merchant Taylors' Hall, sometimes at demonstrations of Conservative working men, and sometimes to the deputations of the supporters of the Established Church in Ireland, led on by the chief Orangemen of Ireland. In these speeches the right hon. Gentleman has systematically adopted a tone, in the first place, of inflated and exaggerated eulogy of himself and of his policy; and, in the second place, of censure and of condemnation so sweeping and so violent towards those from whom he differs as he rarely ventures to adopt in this House. Having thus entered my protest against the tone adopted by the right hon. Gentleman in his speeches, I will now endeavour to state the facts which appear to me to bear strongly upon the particular passage to which the hon. Member behind me has drawn the attention of the House. The right hon. Gentleman said in that passage that when he acceded to Office the name of England was a name of suspicion and distrust in every foreign Court and Cabinet; and then he proceeded to make other assertions of the same kind with which I will not trouble the House. On his assertions being put out to him, he applied to the Gentleman behind me, that Lord office as before the power, and it was to especially, cessor of his observations obvious that for nine months in Office, it he was r own. But Earl Russell, the right where, moment, but hon. Gentleman, I challenge the tion with which, after was rejected proved the rejected man. I tion on a Merchant sweeping opponents to a speak to an audience and his father man unfortunate. It stated by that this part of the part of his shown that hon. Gentleman formula in tion upon which in and that of the right contradicted. In 1868 that the name of a foreign Colonel. Mem same year. Lord Clare assistance England "trust in ev I ask, had

Mr. Gladstone

Clarendon rendered the name of England "a name of suspicion and of distrust in every foreign Court and Cabinet?" The right hon. Gentleman endeavours to shift out of the words; but the hon. Member who has just sat down does not resort to any such subterfuge; he boldly takes the bull by the horns, and lays the blame upon Lord Clarendon.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: No; I said that the blame lay upon Earl Russell.

MR. GLADSTONE: But you told us that it was quite true that the name of England in every foreign Court was a name of distrust and suspicion.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: Yes; I said it was brought about by Earl Russell's policy.

MR. GLADSTONE: And the state of things he brought about was continued by Lord Clarendon, who identified himself completely with the policy of Earl Russell. And yet this was the Foreign Minister whom Lord Derby was so anxious to enlist among his ranks upon the formation of his Government. Again, in 1858, the right hon. Gentleman attributed the fact that war was about to break forth in Europe to the fault of the foreign policy of the Government which preceded that of Lord Derby. But Lord Derby in that instance also gave similar testimony, for he had said, in 1855—

"I stated to Her Majesty that I conceived it would have been an immense advantage to any Government to have among its members one who is perfectly conversant with the whole diplomacy of the last two years, and with the feelings and proceedings of various Courts of Europe."

[That is to say, the feelings of suspicion and distrust.] "I took the liberty to add, with regard to my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, (the Earl of Clarendon) that I entertained the highest opinion of the ability, the industry, and the zeal with which he had discharged the duties of his Office. . . . The only part of the course I have pursued to which I look back with the least doubt or incertitude is with respect to the propriety of my abstaining from making any communication either to the noble Earl directly, or to the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) near him." [3 Hansard, cxxxvi. 1347-8.]

In 1855 Lord Derby emphatically recognizes the services of Lord Clarendon, and asks him to join his Government; while in 1858 the right hon. Gentleman, referring to the accession of the Conservative Government, declared that war had become a question not of weeks or days, but of hours. In 1866 Lord Derby passes a similar eulogium upon Lord Clarendon; and in 1868 the right hon. Gentleman says that when Lord Derby's Government came into power the name of England was viewed with suspicion and distrust in every foreign Court. I must again protest against the language of the right hon. Gentleman; and it is only because I wish to spare the time of the House that I abstain from entering into a particular review of the speeches and the declarations of the right hon. Gentleman, which much of their matter would go far to justify me in doing. I do not complain of these speeches because I do not think they are injurious to us in a party point of view. On the contrary, I think they are weapons perfectly harmless for any such purpose; and if they have the effect for a moment of exhilarating the spirits of those who pay visits to the right hon. Gentleman, and of causing an agreeable interchange of sympathy and compliments between him and them, I really cannot grudge either him or them any amount of such gratification as they can derive from them, especially when the statements of the right hon. Gentleman have been so fully contradicted by Lord Derby. An attempt has been made by the right hon. Gentleman to shift the gist of his attack from Lord Clarendon to Earl Russell; but before I sit down I must remind the House of one thing that had almost escaped my memory. Late in the days of the late Government, the right hon. Gentleman made a special and heavy attack, not upon Earl Russell, but upon Lord Clarendon. But it was impossible for him then, as it is now, to injure that distinguished statesman—strong as he is in the admiration and affection of this country and the esteem of foreign Powers—so long as we can place against these Phillipics an emphatic and point-blank contradiction from the mouth of Lord Derby, the Prime Minister under whom he served.

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I am sure the House will feel that it is with the greatest reluctance that, holding my present Office, I take a part in this discussion. But I must say that if a general debate is to be raised on the foreign policy of this country it should be raised in a form more convenient than that which the hon. Member for the Elgin burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) has adopted on the present occasion. In a matter of this kind I do not complain of the want of Notice, because a Minister ought always to be prepared to defend his policy; but at the same time I must be permitted to express my opinion that a desultory discussion brought on in this way and dealing with half a dozen topics at a time is not a discussion that can result in any practical good. Now, the remarks of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, whatever they may be held to import, were not in any way a charge against either the capacity or the character of Lord Clarendon. The foreign policy of the Liberal party during their seven years' tenure of Office was in the main the policy of Lord Russell. For my own part I will abstain from criticizing that policy, although I think a great deal might be said against it, especially with reference to Poland and Denmark. In regard to the American Civil War, on the other hand, I give Lord Russell credit for having endeavoured to maintain a position of neutrality for this country. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Layard) says, what I will do him the justice to say is correct, that during the term of my administration of foreign affairs he has abstained as a rule from party criticism on subjects of foreign policy, and has seldom called the acts of that Department into question; but I must say I think he has made ample amends to-night for his customary silence. The charges he has brought forward are, to say the least, as sweeping as any which have been attributed to my right hon. Friend; and I think I can show that they are as unfounded as they are sweeping. First of all, the hon. Gentleman referred to the question of the Spanish claims, and said, "What have you done with them; have you settled any one of them?" Now there are but three Spanish claims of any importance which have turned up since I have been at the Foreign Office. First of all there was the case of the Queen Victoria, which was settled by diplomatic action on the spot. Then there is the case of the Mermaid. Now I will not stop to comment on the interpretation put upon certain words which I used in the debate on that subject, for the important fact to be borne in mind is that within six weeks after that discussion in this House the Spanish Government determined, as I all along believed and hoped they would do, to refer the matter to arbitration, and accordingly it has been so referred, and the arbitration is now going on. Then there is the case of the Tornado. What was done in regard to that? I do not wish to prejudice the position of any of the parties who are now before the legal tribunals, but I think that everyone who reads the voluminous Parliamentary Papers on the subject must admit that that is not a case which would have justified us in pressing for more from the Spanish Government than the strict letter of the law to which the parties were entitled. Then the hon. Gentleman has referred to the Alabama question, has stated that it remains in the position in which it was in 1866. Now I admit that the claims of the American Government are not settled, and, indeed, I sit in this House not long ago what was the actual position of the question; but it is simply the reverse of fact to say that Alabama claims now stand in the same position as they did two years ago. I am not going to enter into detail as to events which happened before I accepted the Seal of the Foreign Office; I admit the circumstances were different. In 1866 the Government had given a reply to the proposal to arbitrate. The position which the question at present occupies is as follows:—We have accepted frankly and freely the principle of arbitration, there is now only one remaining point of difference between the two Governments. The American Government desire to couple that arbitration with one condition which I think is not very material to the real issue to be tried, but which we consider as inadmissible. At all events I believe the matter is placed in such a position that there is no probability of an international quarrel, or an acrimonious dispute arising out of it. Then the hon. Gentleman entered into another wide question of Luxemburg. He said, "It is nonsense for you to pretend that you maintained the peace of Europe." We never made any such pretension, because I do not believe that any one individual or any single Government can, under any circumstances, claim to have preserved the peace of Europe. But I contend that at a critical moment, and under circumstances of great difficulty, we did all that it was possible for us to do, with regard to the interest and the security of England, in order to preserve the peace of Europe, and that with the assistance of other Governments we succeeded in attaining our object. Of course, if France and Prussia had determined to go to war, we could not have prevented them because no one can suppose that we intended to take an active part in the conflict, and it could only have been a threat of such interference that we could have succeeded in compelling them to keep the peace. What happened in this—both France and Prussia were committed to a position from which it was difficult for them to recede, and under the circumstances they naturally looked for the friendly assistance of a third State in order to be extricated from it without loss of honour. What the hon. Member says as to the reluctance which I felt in giving the guarantee is perfectly true; I think any Minister in the same position would have felt it, and that anyone who did not feel it would have shown a reckless indifference to the interests of the country. I gave the guarantee unwillingly and as the only means left, as I believed and still believe, of preventing—I will not say a war, but at least, a rupture between the parties. To say, however, that it was given under any external pressure is entirely a misapprehension. I must say that the hon. Gentleman's survey of foreign politics, though rapid, was exceedingly comprehensive. But there now remains only one question for me to touch upon—namely, that of the East. The hon. Member seems to think that I recommended when out of Office a different policy from that which I have adopted since I have held my present position. Now that is not the case. I believe the Greek nation have a great future, and I shall be very glad to see them attain it; but I think we should not be justified in breaking through long-standing and recognized international agreements out of sympathy with any nation or any race of men. If I have seemed to show favour to the Porte at the expense of Greece I am not conscious of it; and if I have ever seemed to be so, it has not been from a desire to favour one side as against the other, but from a desire to adhere as strictly and rigidly as I could to the engagements into which England has entered, and to the principle of an impartial neutrality.

Lord Stanley

SUNDAY LABOUR IN THE POST OFFICE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. M'LAREN said, that the Lords of the Treasury in 1850, on the recommendation of the Commissioners appointed by their Lordships to consider the question of Sunday labour in the Post Office, communicated to the Postmaster General the following regulation for his guidance:—

“That, in retaining a Sunday delivery of letters in a rural district, the Postmaster General be guided by the prevalent feeling of the locality; and that where the prevalent feeling of the district is opposed to such delivery, the Postmaster General, after satisfying himself of the fact, take the requisite steps for suspending it.”

He complained that the Postmaster General had in effect violated this regulation by insisting upon a majority of six-sevenths of the householders being obtained in each case against the Sunday delivery. In his opinion a majority of two-thirds would be quite sufficient. He trusted that the Treasury would make inquiry as to this non-observance of their own regulations, and ascertain whether it was the fault of the subordinate local officers or of the high authorities in London.

MR. SCLATER-BOTH said, he would inquire whether the Treasury regulations had been in any degree departed from. The matter could not be authoritatively decided except by the officials responsible for carrying out the regulations of the service. He doubted whether a majority of two-thirds of the householders ought to prevent the delivery of Sunday letters; because they might be persons who never received letters, and they would debar those who might have important correspondence to conduct from receiving a due share of the facilities offered by this very efficiently managed service. Such a rule would cause great inconvenience, and would lead to a strong expression of discontent against the suspension of Sunday letters at all. The rule that six-sevenths of the householders should unite in a memorial against Sunday delivery had, he believed, worked well; but he would inquire whether the present regulation was in conformity with the spirit of the direction laid down by the Treasury, and also as to the mode in which it was carried out.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £21,386, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for Nonconforming, Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland.

MR. HADFIELD said, that the House had by a Bill and Resolution suspended all new appointments, whether to the Established Church, Maynooth, or the Regium Donum, and this proceeding placed him in rather a peculiar position. In 1834 the of faith to take away the grant, which, instead of being left dependent on annual Votes, ought to have been placed on the Consolidated Fund. He protested against the principle of leaving it to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), or to any individual, however high his authority or ability, to say in his mercy what amount of compensation ought to be given to the clergy of the Established Church or of the Presbyterian Church. He contended that the Presbyterians had as much right to compensation if the Regium Donum was abolished as the clergymen of the Established Church would have if that Church were to be disestablished.

MR. M'LAREN protested against the principle that the grant was one which entitled parties on its withdrawal to compensation. The whole system connected with this grant was a rotten one, and he believed that no party would be more benefited by the abolition of the grant than the Presbyterians ministers themselves. Within the last month a meeting of the whole body of Presbyterian ministers in Ireland was held, and a motion was made to strike at the grant, and it was lost only by a majority of about 30 in a very large assembly; and he had no doubt they would find next year that there would be a majority of that body itself against the grant. As to Ireland being too poor for the voluntary system, he could only say that even in the poorest parts of Scotland the voluntary system flourished in the highest degree. The Free Church had raised on the voluntary principle last year upwards of £390,000—just nine times the pittance which the Presbyterians in Ireland came to beg from that House, to be paid by taxes out of the pockets of those who already paid for the support of their own ministers.

MR. VANCE said, that the House, instead of grudging this miserable pittance, ought to feel ashamed that the sum granted was so small. £150 ought to be the least stipend granted to any minister.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the principle upon which the Regium Donum was voted was a sound one. They had a curious illustration of the manner in which the provision for the Irish Presbyterian Church and the endowment of the Established Church in Ireland was assailed. The Motion of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) was supported by the hon. Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen), who was the Leader in the House of the Roman Catholic section, and perhaps also a leader of the Liberation Society. There was an unnatural alliance between those who represented opinions in favour of extreme voluntaryism and the Roman Catholic section, who were opposed to the whole body of Protestants in this country. That alliance had proved fatal to foreign countries, and would prove fatal to this if the people were not made aware of the aims and ends of the allies.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK observed, that the voluntary system worked admirably in Ireland; but, under all the circumstances, it would perhaps be better now to agree to the Vote, on the understanding that the matter would be fully discussed next Session.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £3,701, to complete the sum for the Treasury Chest.

(3.) £19,656, to complete the sum for Bounties on Slaves and Tonnage Bounties, &c.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to ask a few questions respecting the Vote so far as it concerned liberated Africans. He found that in 1864 six slaves were liberated, and in 1865 none, and yet he found that in 1864, the sum granted for prize money was £7,061; and even in the years when no negroes at all had been captured, prize money was granted. He wanted to know how that happened? He thought the prize system was a bad system, and led to much inconvenience.

COLONEL SYKES wished to know what had become of the negroes who were captured on the East Coast of Africa?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he had given a full explanation of this subject a short time since, and was not prepared to enter into the question again without Notice. He might, however, remind the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Alderman Lusk) that the prize money was principally derived from the sale of the slave ships captured by Her Majesty's ships. The cost of these captured slaves was a decreasing cost. The Vote originally was very large. It was not merely for captured negroes, but also for captured slave ships. The slaves captured on the East Coast of Africa were disposed of in an economical way by being sent to islands in those seas. The great item was the Vote for the mainten-ances of the establishments necessary to keep up in connection with our captures.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £200, to complete the sum for Coolie Emigration to French Colonies.

(5.) £4,360, to complete the sum for Mixed Commissions (Slave Trade).

(6.) £126,178, to complete the sum for Consular Establishments Abroad.

Mr. CHILDERS said, that since 1866-7 the Vote had increased at the rate of about £20,000 a year. A considerable number of the establishments might, with great propriety, be suppressed. Some of the consuls, to his knowledge, in Spain and elsewhere, had literally nothing whatever to do. He last year mentioned the case of Seville, and he could mention it again as a place where the English consul had nothing to do. By not filling up many of the appointments when they became vacant, the expenditure might be reduced by between £30,000 and £40,000 a year.

LORD STANLEY said, he doubted whether the Vote had really increased to the extent mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. He would also remark that the fact of there being a certain amount of security in these consular appointments induced gentlemen to accept them on comparatively low pay. He thought that when they had sent a man out upon a salary to a post which he had a right to consider a permanent post, they could not very well withdraw him from his employment. Such a course would inflict great injury upon the public service; but he could assure the hon. Gentleman that in every case where he had to appoint a consul he considered first whether there was anything for him to do, and, secondly, whether the salary was excessive for the work required of him. It should also be borne in mind that a sovereign did not represent so much now as it did twenty-five years ago. The cost of living and of house-rent had increased greatly all over the world of late years.

COLONEL SYKES said, he saw a Vote of £600 for house-rent, &c., for the consul at Massowah. Was there any reason why this Vote should be continued, seeing that the consul had been re-called years ago?

LORD STANLEY said, there was no intention to send a new consul to Abyssinia. Consul Cameron had been re-called; but the hon. Member was aware that he had been detained in Abyssinia by causes not within his own control.

Mr. Solater-Booth

COLONEL sul Camer
Russell w
Ma. B right that be careful in mind t matic age were app of our en increased, Vote for also. His was often services o tlemen in salary.

Ma. S there was salary and he had b
ago. A understoo house-roo

LORD of re-call the Forei Consul C
A somew whether C or not.
ful impr well-advis best of hi very seri
the Comm hardly.

Vote a

(7.) £ vice (on House
Resolut
Commis

ELECTIO
PRACTI

(Mr. Chan
Gathorn

Order
Motion
"That M Chair."

Bill con

Clause
Elections.

MR. CRAUFURD moved, on behalf of the hon. Member for Berwick-on-Tweed (Mr. Alexander Mitchell), in Clause 5, page 2, line 30, to leave out the words "Court of Common Pleas," in order to insert "House of Commons." He thought before transferring their jurisdiction in such cases the House ought to be satisfied that the new tribunal proposed would be superior to the present one. The opinion of the Select Committee might be quoted against his Amendment; but it ought to be recollected that that Committee took no evidence on the subject, and that the first proposal to transfer the jurisdiction to the Queen's Bench had been withdrawn. It was not to be expected that at particular times—for instance, immediately after a General Election—two gentlemen would be sufficient to determine upon all the cases that would present themselves. He saw no case for parting with this jurisdiction. The decisions of Committees of the House were generally fair and impartial; and if anyone asked for proof of the satisfactory action of the present mode of trial, he would point to the decision of the Election Committee that very day in the case of the Bristol Election Petition. He believed that an Election Committee, the Members of which had gone through the ordeal of an election, and who understood all the artifices used to prevent agency from being found out, were more likely to discover cases of bribery than the tribunal proposed to be established by the Bill. It was said that by the proposals of this Bill expense would be saved, but he saw no proof of this. If there were defects in the present system let them be removed. They should direct legislation so that a man guilty of bribery should be considered as guilty, not merely of a legal, but of a moral offence. He called upon the House not to part with a jurisdiction which they had possessed so long, and which had worked so well.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 30, to leave out the words "Court of Common Pleas," in order to insert the words "House of Commons."—(Mr. Craufurd.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the speech of the hon. Member was addressed to the whole principle of the Bill; for it was again raising the question that had been raised upon the second reading; and on going into Committee. The Bill was set down for to-night with a view of proceeding with the details. If the House was disposed to stop the Bill it could do so, but it was advisable that they should come to a decision whether they should discuss the clauses or debate the principle of the Bill at that late period.

MR. SANDFORD said, he thought that the House, in affirming the principle of the Bill, declared not that it was prepared to part with its jurisdiction, but that it would feel itself justified in laying down more stringent regulations on the subject of Corrupt Practices at Elections. He was glad that the question was raised whether the House was prepared to part with its jurisdiction in reference to Election Petitions. The general feeling among the independent Members was in favour of the jurisdiction of the House being retained. He must say that he thought the argument of the Judges, that too much work would be imposed upon them, and that their office would be lowered if they were mixed up with elections, was unanswerable. It was said that the expense would be diminished by trying these questions on the spot; but he believed that it would cost more to take counsel down than it would to bring witnesses up. Moreover, it was intended to continue the system of Commissions for general inquiries, so that the Judges would be limited to particular inquiries. It would be derogatory to the dignity of that House part with its jurisdiction to try Election Petitions, and to hand such inquiries over to Judges who were the nominees of the Crown. Was it right that it should be left to nominees of the Crown to determine who were and who were not the representatives of the people in that House? It was unconstitutional, and if they wished to find anything like it they must go back to the days of the Star Chamber. There was, moreover, no necessity for adopting it; for he believed that the proceedings of the House on Election Petitions had generally been fair and just. The only thing wanting to their decisions was uniformity, and this could be obtained by having Judges or lawyers, in whom they ought to place confidence, to sit as assessors to Committees. The Bill proposed that the Judges should decide, without the assistance of a jury, questions both of law and fact. The present moment also was an unhappy one for adopting such a change, before they knew how the new constituency would work.

MR. P. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, that all other representative assemblies retained in their own hands the power of verifying the election of their own Members, and on what ground was that House called upon to part with that power? He had observed, during twelve years, that the impartiality of Election Committees had not been questioned. If he were to be tried for his life he should be perfectly satisfied to trust his case in the hands of a Committee of that House. With regard to the case which had been decided that day, he should not have been at all surprised if the decision had been the other way, as the case in favour of the Petition was not very strong; yet still the Committee had considered it their duty to decide in favour of the Petitioners. He had not the confidence which some professed in the superhuman attributes of Judges; and he believed that, by changing one tribunal for another, you would not secure infallibility. At present the Judges were beyond suspicion, but he did not think they would long remain unsuspected if they were called upon to decide matters of fact in reference to elections. He was prepared to sit, if necessary, to the end of September in order to pass an effectual measure to put down bribery and corruption; but before visiting a man with the proposed disqualification, he would have him really convicted of bribery. In the Bristol case there had been no conviction of moral bribery, but only of an act made illegal by our preposterous laws—the paying of a lost day's pay—which was an old-established practice in other places besides Bristol. He admitted it was a vicious practice, but would any one say it was an offence against morality? He would punish the corrupt candidate as much as possible, but not the man who had no intention of breaking the law. The other day when he was going down to vote at a county election, to save him from inconvenience an hon. Member offered him a night's hospitality, and he believed that might have been treated as a case of corruption. He wished for certainty, which could not be obtained without a good definition of bribery; and he thought the present tribunal, at all events with a legal Chairman, was better than that proposed. But if a case was to be tried locally by a Judge, then he would give him a jury to decide questions of fact.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the greater part of the speech of the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. P. Wykeham Martin) was applicable to subsequent clauses, and had nothing to do with the present clause, which did not deal with punishment. He assured the hon. Member that there was not the smallest symptom of b dent he explain Bristol wholly had been lost his and it wholly thing fro victed of nothing whose ag ruption.

sons who ingly gui from this the quest
it must b adduced old objec jection t authority decision own par wholly t jection;
did not power in should b vicious wh tribunal had no facts had followed truth we power l lowed B der a at gated by urged in that the arrive at evidence to remin had been
by the S it was Chief Ju the view wished, letter wa
One of t
Lord Ch
Governm required alleged would o their ord long peri

Mr. P. Wykeham Martin

Committee carefully distinguished between the case of two Members claiming a seat and an inquiry into the subject of general corruption; for in the latter case it was proposed to continue the practice of sending Commissioners to the spot to investigate the subject. When they sent down Commissioners to the country to inquire into the existence of general corruption they did not send them down to act as Judges and to try cases, but only to collect evidence and make certain inquiries with a view to ulterior proceedings. He believed that the objections of many of the Judges were founded on the same misapprehension, and therefore he thought the letter of the Lord Chief Justice ought not to weigh very much with the Committee. It had also been stated that the proposed tribunal would be inefficient, as the two Judges appointed by the Bill would be unable to try all the Petitions after a General Election. Now, he did not think it was ever intended that Judges should be specially created for the sole purpose of trying Election Petitions. On the contrary, he had always imagined the intention to be that two of the existing Judges should be selected for the purpose, and he believed there would be no difficulty in securing the services of the senior Judges. It had been said that it would be a degradation to a Judge to try questions of fact as well as questions of law; but this objection was easily disposed of, as every one connected with legal proceedings must be aware that the Equity Judges were constantly trying questions of fact without ever supposing that they were thereby degraded. The questions which the Judges would have to try would be comparatively simple, and he could not see that they would soil their ermine by trying election cases more than they did in trying any other cases. It had further been urged that the proposed tribunal would be ineffective; but could anyone declare that the present tribunal was effective? The great defect in the existing tribunal was that it sat in London. It was well known to lawyers of experience that the trial of a case in the town where the facts had arisen was of the utmost consequence in getting at the truth. When a witness was examined in his own town with the people standing before and around him, who all knew what he had been doing, it was almost impossible, from the instant murmur or gesture that arose, for the witness to tell an untruth. The case was often very different when the witness was examined in London, and the Committee were quite right in saying that a local inquiry in election matters was of the greatest importance in getting at the truth. It was said that a local inquiry would add to the expense, instead of diminishing it, because the fees paid to counsel who went into the country would be larger than the expense of bringing the witnesses to London. This was a question of fact, and not of opinion. As to the fees which it was said would have to be paid to counsel, the hon. Member ought to know that nothing was more exaggerated than the supposed amount of fees often said to be paid to counsel. Any one who had ever looked over an attorney's bill must know how small a proportion counsels' fees usually bore to the rest of the bill. With regard to the expense of bringing witnesses to London he had unfortunately had some experience in Election Petitions, and he could state that the great expense arose from bringing witnesses to London and keeping them there. They expected for some reason or other to be maintained in a lavish manner, and to be kept in a state of constant good humour and amusement. He did not imagine, as the hon. Member seemed to suppose, that the first counsel of the day would be brought down in these cases, because the services of other counsel could be obtained at a much cheaper rate. The main principle of the Bill was the change of tribunal. Three-fourths of the clauses referred to that subject, and if the Committee thought there ought to be no change of tribunal they might as well give up the Bill. The House had considered this question more than once; and would, he thought, do well to accept the principle of the Bill, and give up a power which added nothing either to its real influence or its dignity.

MR. DENMAN said, the discussion convinced him that it would have been better to have listened to his suggestion on a former occasion and have postponed all the clauses relative to the new tribunal, in order that those clauses might go before the Committee again. They would then have been in a better position to deal with the question of tribunal. His proposal need not have proved fatal to the Bill. The words now in question were of no vital moment, because they might as well enact for the present that an Election Petition should be presented to the House of Commons as to the Court of Common Pleas. If the words "House of Commons" were substituted for Court of Common Pleas, the next step would be the consideration of the Amendments of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). Though he had some Amendments on the Paper, he had placed them there with no intention of delaying the passing of the measure; all he wanted was to improve the measure, and make it such as would command the approval of the House. It was now admitted that the two Honorary Judges would not be sufficient for the trial of Election Petitions after a General Election. But here arose the point on which he joined issue with the Government. The Bill proposed that the Government should have the power of taking out two more Judges besides the Honorary Justices, and these two Judges were to be engaged for the nonce and for the job, and taken away from the trial of murders and other circuit business to hold Election Inquiries on the spot. Everyone must regard this as a proposal of a very monstrous nature, and it was to prevent such an interference with the business of the Courts and of the country by the nomination of two of the Judges by the Minister of the day, that he proposed to substitute the appointment of those who when there was a great deal of Assize business were thought well qualified to sit and assist the Judges. He did not care whether they were appointed by the Speaker and the two Honorary Judges, or by the latter alone; but they should be well-qualified barristers, say of twelve years' standing, who might assist in holding the inquiries that might be necessary after a General Election. The other Amendments he proposed were to provide that the tribunal should contain the element of a jury as well as that of a Judge. He asserted that it was most objectionable that an inquiry of this kind should be held before a single-seated Judge. Although there were tribunals of the Court of Chancery, where a single Judge tried questions of law and fact, there was no instance of a single-seated Judge having a very extensive and important criminal jurisdiction. The Bankruptcy Commissioners exercised, indeed, a somewhat analogous power; but could there be anything more ridiculous and unsatisfactory than the way in which that jurisdiction had worked? He believed that something in the nature of a jury would be requisite; and when there was a very extensive power of getting such jury among the Members of that House, they ought not to sacrifice the power of getting it from a body. There should be one person responsible for the law, and a body to go to the fact of guilty or not guilty.

Mr. Denman

Mr. VANCE said, he looked upon the Bill as the Bill of a Select Committee rather than of the Government, and he did not hesitate to say that the Bill, if passed, would defeat its own object. It would put an end to Petitions. There was no borough which could stand the trial of an inquiry instituted before a local tribunal, and the consequence would be that the electors unwilling to kill the goose which laid the golden eggs would hesitate to support the return for a borough where they might hope to represent at a future period. Another disadvantage connected with a local tribunal would be the services of a competent barrister would not be likely to be secured. Then, the Judge, from the fact of his sitting on the spot, must be open to suspicion.

Mr. J. STUART MILL said that the course of the rather severe reform which had been made upon the subject seemed to have been forgotten that there might be its defects, it provided one of the most important remedies for the evils of election law and corruption—a local investigation. His own opinion was that the worst plan was that which involved such an investigation as was proposed, better than the best plan without it. If there were a local investigation, the jurisdiction must be altered; and the question was whether a tribunal should be constituted composed of one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, or of a Judge sitting with a jury suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. Mr. Bouverie, Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), said that he was not prepared to impress on the House that any tribunal would be only fit to be a tribunal of appeal, and that it would be necessary to have besides a tribunal of investigation. The best plan, therefore, to adopt, was that of which he had given notice, and which he had drawn up with the assistance of Mr. Serjeant Pulling, provided that the Revising Barrister, an officer conversant with elections, and having considerable acquaintance with the law, should be the person to hold the inquiry in the first instance. The investigation should take place before the return of the writ, and there should be a scrutiny. He must endeavour to put an end to the expenditure; and he thought that the object of the preliminary investigation should borne by the public, either out of the borough rate or be charged on the Consolidated Fund. If the Amendment were pressed to a division he should vote for the provision in the Bill as against the Amendment.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the plan of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. J. Stuart Mill) would require 400 Revising Barristers, and he thought the appeal to the Court of Common Pleas was objectionable. Local inquiry was admitted to be very desirable, and at the same time there was an objection to get rid of the jurisdiction of that House in the trial of Election Petitions. There could be no question, especially after the speech of the Solicitor General, that local inquiry diminished expense. ["No, no!"] He spoke from some experience, for when he first came into Parliament, it was after an inquiry conducted in his own borough, the parties immediately engaged in which were solicitors on the spot. But he thought that House should not be the first Legislature in the world to give up its jurisdiction in reference to disputed elections. They ought to ensure local inquiry on the one hand, and the retention of jurisdiction on the other. At a time when a review of the whole of our Courts of Justice was imminent, it was most inopportune to create two new Judges. He would therefore suggest that on the presentation of an Election Petition, a barrister should be appointed by some impartial authority to go down to the spot to which the Petition referred, and there take evidence. The barrister should then act before the Election Committee of that House as assessor, being in a position to afford them information as to the manner in which the evidence had been given. No additional evidence should be taken by the Election Committee, unless it was substantiated before them that for special reasons such evidence was desirable. The Committee would retain the entire power of deciding whether the election was or was not an undue election. His scheme was not yet completed, and he should therefore support the Amendment to retain the jurisdiction, with the view of bringing up a clause at a future time to carry out his view.

MR. HIBBERT said, that the plan just suggested of a double inquiry would double the expense. What the House desired was that there should be a Court constituted which would give satisfaction, not only to the House, but to the public. He did not think that the inquiry before an Election Committee afforded entire satisfaction, and he would, therefore, give his support in a considerable degree to the proposal in the Bill. He conceived that it would be desirable to have Election Petitions tried by Judges of the land, as they were removed from the region of party; but, instead of having two Judges appointed for the special purpose, it would be better to make controverted elections a matter of criminal inquiry, and to let them be tried by Judges taken from the whole Bench. That would be much better than appointing special Judges for this purpose. The mere fact of the Judge going down to the spot to investigate the case would have a great tendency to check corruption, as the Inquiry would be held under the eyes of the borough. He could not support the Amendment by which it was proposed to retain the jurisdiction of the House upon this matter.

MR. PAULL said, he could not agree with those hon. Members who advocated local inquiry, which would have the effect of reviving the animosities attendant upon the election, instead of allowing them to die out. Moreover, the appearance of one of Her Majesty's Judges in a borough for the purpose of conducting an inquiry of this nature would tend to prolong the saturnalia which hon. Members strongly condemned as one of the vices of the present system. Although inquiries into bribery might be of the highest importance in one sense, yet the questions which were raised upon such an inquiry could hardly be classed with the social questions which usually came before the Judges. They would be taken from their important duties to decide matters of minor importance, and such inquiries, conducted without the assistance of a jury, would tend to bring the Judges into disrespect. It would be said perhaps that a Judge was influenced in consequence of his having recently been a barrister upon that particular circuit, or of his having recently given up a seat in the House in order to take his place upon the Bench. These matters should induce them to pause before they cast this duty upon Judges.

MR. LOWE said, that last year the House of Commons delegated this most difficult question to seventeen of its Members, who entered into the inquiry free from all political bias, with the determination of seeing whether something could not be done to put down this crying evil, and those seventeen Members came to a unanimous Resolution which was in substance in favour of the principles embodied in the Government Bill. Under these circumstances, it would not be handsome nor even fair to the Government who had adopted their plan, if the Members of that Committee did not come forward and state the reasons which had induced them to come to the conclusions at which they had arrived. The shortest way of laying the matter before the House was for him to state what questions came before the Committee, and the decision at which they had arrived respecting them. He might state, in the first place, that every point that had been mentioned in that debate was well and fully canvassed by the Committee before they came to the unanimous resolution of placing the matter in the hands of one of the Judges. The Committee did not feel much embarrassed with reference to the question of taking away the jurisdiction of the House, because they felt that the House had already parted with it. It was true that the House retained the power of appointing from among its own Members a Court to try these Petitions, but having done that its power was exhausted. The Court thus appointed was as independent of that House as if its Members were sitting in Quarter Sessions. The Committee thought under these circumstances that the question of transferring the jurisdiction of the House was settled, and that all they had to consider was, whether the existing tribunal was the best and the most efficient that could be obtained? When they came to look at these Courts they found them thus constituted—they found—and he said so with no desire to speak slightly of the decisions of these tribunals—that they were composed of persons who, from the very necessity of their situation, were political partizans, and were consequently liable to be suspected of political bias; and, indeed, it was not out of the question that they might be affected by an honest political bias. Another objection to the existing tribunals was that they could not be appointed until after the House had assembled, and therefore they could not meet to investigate the cases until months after the offences had been committed. They felt that the inquiry to be efficient must be speedy, so that there should be no time to tamper with the witnesses to see how the inquiry could be evaded or to square the petitioners. They felt, besides, the immense benefits that would arise from local inquiry. It appeared to the Committee that if the existing tribunals were to be retained given up, their mind the House shadow of by giving realization decision the Comu having a with any these inq unfit to body, the to look on be found- conditions with the controllin of preven by irrele enormous stake, the tribunal Committee the quest the rest of ther the should be diction of highest The Com commend not prepe risters. plan of (Mr. Chi ter would of conse cance, al evidence points, t Committee was possi side upon evidence same we and wate different stupid bl the fire in great req spoken b views. I wishing but he di be adopt throw out system. was that increased, that there should be no selection, and that no one should know beforehand who would try a case. He would like to treat Judges in this matter as we treated jurors, who came out of and sunk back into the body of the community, thereby avoiding speculations as to their bias, politics, and private life which would be indulged in if jurors were always the same. Unfortunately this was not the course adopted in the Bill, owing mainly, perhaps, to the letter of the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench. This was a minor matter; but it would be better if the number of Judges could be increased. When there was a desperate duty to discharge the Duke of Wellington always took for it the regiment that was most available; he would not by selection make any distinction; and no doubt in that way he sustained the morale and confidence of every part of the army by showing that he had equal confidence in all regiments. On that principle he took objection to the measure of the Government. To conclude, a really efficient inquiry must be local and speedy, and must not wait for the meeting of Parliament. It could be obtained only by delegating the duty to Courts of Justice; and, therefore, he hoped the House would approve the decision of the Committee, which was most conscientiously arrived at with the single desire of doing what was best.

Mr. Lowe

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, that the statement of his right hon. Friend had not shaken the opinion which he had formed when this Bill was first laid on the table of the House, and which all his subsequent reflection had confirmed. If the choice lay between the Bill, the plan of the Committee, and the present system, his own judgment would be in favour of adhering to the present system. He thought it was an error to say that the House—when it regulated by Act of Parliament the mode in which it would, by its Committees, decide upon Election Petitions—had already parted with its jurisdiction in the same sense, and with the same consequences, as it was now asked to do. When the Whole House decided on Petitions, it was party rallying against party, and it was impossible that an inquiry should be conducted judicially; but it was otherwise when a small number of Members, properly selected, were sworn to do their duty, with the eye of the House and the public resting upon them, within the walls, and, as it were, in the atmosphere of the House. The House still retained cognizance of what went on, and took constant interest in it, so that it could detect and check any tendency to corruption. In that way the House retained the control it ought to have over everything affecting its constitution, and he was decidedly of opinion that that authority should be retained, in whatever mode an inquiry might be conducted. Nor did he agree as to even the alleged incidental inconveniences of the present system, nor as to the tendency of the new remedy to correct the evils stated. Was it part of the plan that every Petition should be presented within a fortnight? To shorten the time for presenting a Petition would in many cases be as likely to have the effect of playing as much into the hands of corruption as it would be to have that of preventing the malpractices referred to. If the time were not shortened the people concerned would still manage things in their own way, much as they did at present. He did not hesitate to express his opinion that the plan proposed would diminish the number of cases in which corruption would be exposed and punished. It might be that an inquiry by a Committee was conducted more loosely than an inquiry by a Judge—but, if a Committee was not strict in applying technical rules, its very laxity tended to the discovery of truth in these matters. He was apprehensive that if a Judge was sent down to try these cases, according to the strict rules of procedure, the advantage would be altogether on the side of those who stood in the position of defendants. He apprehended it would be found that in many cases corruption might escape even in a more flagrant manner than it did under the present system. No doubt, in some cases, local inquiry would be most valuable and important, but not necessarily in every case; and he should like to see power given and machinery supplied to the Committees of the House to enable them to conduct such local inquiry when they deemed it necessary. As to the proposal of the Government respecting the appointment of two Judges, he ventured to say that of all the proposals which human ingenuity could possibly have thought of, it was the very worst. These two Judges would, in point of fact, be called upon to determine all matters relating to the constitution of the House, and of course they would not be removable unless they were guilty of grave misconduct. Judges, like other men, had their politics; but, at present, cases in which political bias might be supposed to affect their minds were rare, although in those cases they frequently gave their judgments according to their politics. Indeed, this happened in almost all ecclesiastical cases. Still even in cases of this kind the public reposed confidence in the Judges, being aware of their high character, and the admirable manner in which they generally discharged their duties. But if two particular Judges whose politics would be well known were to be chosen to investigate Election Petitions, he ventured to predict that there would be an universal outcry in the country. A special jurisdiction was always an evil, and here it would be found in its worst and most exaggerated form. Then, two Judges could not get through the work with the necessary despatch; and if the whole Bench were employed, as was proposed by the Committee, they would be withdrawn from their ordinary duties in a manner most inconvenient to the public service. Therefore, if this proposal were adopted, it would soon become necessary to supplement it by the appointment of those barristers to whom his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) so much objected. In conclusion, he protested against a hurried change of this kind in a moribund Parliament. He believed that it was impossible by any machinery that could be invented, in the way of trial or punishment, to prevent corruption until there rose up in the constituencies a spirit opposed to corruption.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he agreed with what his hon. Friend (Sir Roundell Palmer) had said as to the real remedy for corrupt practices; but he wished to point out that the present scheme of a local inquiry, surrounded by judicial forms, had been adopted with the view of changing the spirit of the constituencies by striking at the root of corruption. Local inquiry afforded the best chance of effecting the object they all wished to secure.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that having been a member of the Select Committee which sat last year, he was unable to agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne that the decision of that Committee was arrived at unanimously. The Committee was unanimous only to this extent—that if the jurisdiction were transferred from the House it ought to be conferred on the highest existing judicial tribunal in the country, and not on a body of Commissioners or barristers. He himself had voted in conjunction with the hon.

Sir Roundell Palmer

Member Hugess
the Hou Election to be se upon by that, as direct ar should t pecting Court an try them under co
the juris House k
as to Ire should l land alo

Visco acknow but the the belie tribunal
ment. T be in a without it was p
one wou support

Mr. T ment wh vide!"
had said three fro Members move the

Mr. I the adje sisted in riper me had bee both sid decision spair of House w
the hon.
and who but if he tions he refuse to

Mr. T opposite he (Mr.
those m Bridgwa
pect the classed Bill like his argu
to pass

prizes to the legal profession, and they would consequently have their House besieged by the profession more than it was at present. Practical men of business who sat in that House saw that the front Bench on both sides was flattered by one body of lawyers and bullied by another. He said that the Bill must be a bad one, because it offered two more prizes to lawyers, who obtained promotion by their speaking powers.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That the words 'Court of Common Pleas' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 178; Noes 158: Majority 20.

AYES.

Adderley, rt. hn. C. B.	Evans, T. W.
Akroyd, E.	Fane, Lieut.-Col. H. H.
Antrobus, E.	Fawcett, H.
Archdall, Captain M.	Fellowes, E.
Arkwright, R.	Fergusson, Sir J.
Bagge, Sir W.	Foljambe, F. J. S.
Barrington, Viscount	Forde, Colonel
Bass, M. T.	Galway, Viscount
Beach, Sir M. H.	Goddard, A. L.
Beach, W. W. B.	Goldney, G.
Belmont, H. F.	Gordon, rt. hon. E. S.
Beaumont, W. B.	Gore, W. R. O.
Biddulph, M.	Gorst, J. E.
Bingham, Lord	Gower, hon. F. L.
Bourne, Colonel	Grant, A.
Bowen, J. B.	Graves, S. R.
Brett, Sir W. B.	Greenall, G.
Bruce, Major C.	Greene, E.
Bruce, rt. hon. H. A.	Grenfell, H. R.
Buller, Sir A. W.	Griffith, C. D.
Burrell, Sir P.	Gurney, rt. hon. R.
Cartwright, Colonel	Gwyn, H.
Cave, rt. hon. S.	Hamilton, Lord C.
Cavendish, Lord E.	Hardcastle, J. A.
Cavendish, Lord F. C.	Hardy, rt. hon. G.
Cavendish, Lord G.	Hardy, J.
Clay, J.	Hay, Sir J. C. D.
Clive, G.	Hayter, A. D.
Cobbold, J. C.	Henderson, J.
Cole, hon. H.	Herbert, rt. hn. Gen. P.
Cole, hon. J. L.	Ilervey, Lord A. H. O.
Collier, Sir R. P.	Hesketh, Sir T. G.
Cooper, E. H.	Heygate, W. U.
Cox, W. T.	Hibbert, J. T.
Crawford, R. W.	Hildyard, T. B. T.
Dent, J. D.	Hogg, Lieut.-Col. J. M.
Dickson, Major A. G.	Hood, Sir A. A.
Dimsdale, R.	Hope, A. J. B. B.
Disraeli, rt. hon. B.	Horsfall, T. B.
Du Cane, C.	Howard, hon. C. W. G.
Duff, M. E. G.	Huddleston, J. W.
Du Pre, C. G.	Hunt, rt. hon. G. W.
Dyke, W. H.	Hurst, R. H.
Eaton, H. W.	Ingham, R.
Edwards, Sir H.	Karslake, Sir J. B.
Egerton, hon. A. F.	Kavanagh, A.
Egerton, E. C.	Kendall, N.
Enfield, Viscount	Keown, W.

Knightley, Sir R.	Repton, G. W. J.
Labouchere, H.	Robertson, P. F.
Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.	Royston, Viscount
Legh, Major C.	Russell, A.
Lennox, Lord H. G.	Russell, Sir C.
Liddell, hon. H. G.	Schreiber, C.
Lindsay, hon. Colonel C.	Solater-Booth, G.
Lindsay, Colonel R. L.	Scourfield, J. H.
Lowe, rt. hon. R.	Severne, J. E.
Lowther, W.	Seymour, G. H.
M'Lagan, P.	Simeon, Sir J.
M'Laren, D.	Smith, A.
Mainwaring, T.	Smith, J.
Manners, Lord G. J.	Somerset, Colonel
Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.	Somerset, E. A.
Majoribanks, Sir D. C.	Stanley, hon. F.
Mayo, Earl of	Stanley, Lord
Melly, G.	Stirling-Maxwell, Sir W.
Mill, J. S.	Stone, W. H.
Moffatt, G.	Stopford, S. G.
Monk, C. J.	Stronge, Sir J. M.
Montagu, rt. hn. Lord R.	Stuart, Lt.-Col. W.
Montgomery, Sir G.	Sykes, Colonel W. H.
Morgan, hon. Major	Taylor, P. A.
Morgan, O.	Thompson, M. W.
Morrison, W.	Torrens, R.
Mowbray, rt. hn. J. R.	Tracy, hn. C. R. D. H.
Nicol, J. D.	Trevor, Lord A. E. H.
North, Colonel	Turner, C.
Northcote, rt. hon. Sir	Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
S. H.	Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.
Otway, A. J.	Walsh, hon. A.
Packe, Colonel	Warren, rt. hon. R. R.
Pakington, rt. hn. Sir J.	Waterhouse, S.
Parker, Major W.	Weguelin, T. M.
Patten, rt. hon. Col. W.	Welby, W. E.
Pim, J.	Whitbread, S.
Pollard-Urquhart, W.	Woodd, B. T.
Potter, E.	Wynn, C. W. W.
Powell, F. S.
Price, W. P.
Pritchard, J.
Pugh, D.
Rebow, J. G.

TELLERS.

Noel, hon. G. J.
Whitmore, H.

NOES.

Acland, T. D.	Chambers, M.
Adam, W. P.	Cheetham, J.
Allen, W. S.	Childers, H. C. E.
Amberley, Viscount	Cholmeley, Sir M. J.
Anstruther, Sir R.	Cogan, rt. hn. W. H. F.
Aytoun, R. S.	Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
Bagwell, J.	Coleridge, J. D.
Baines, E.	Colthurst, Sir G. C.
Barclay, A. C.	Cowen, J.
Barnes, T.	Cowper, hn. H. F.
Barnett, H.	Cowper, rt. hon. W. F.
Barttelot, Colonel	Crossley, Sir F.
Berkeley, hon. H. F.	Dalglish, R.
Biddulph, Col. R. M.	Davenport, W. B.
Blennerhassett, Sir R.	Denman, hon. G.
Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.	Dering, Sir E. C.
Bowyer, Sir G.	Dillwyn, L. L.
Bright, J. (Manchester)	Dunne, rt. hn. General
Bruce, Lord C.	Dyott, Colonel R.
Bruen, H.	Edwards, C.
Buller, Sir E. M.	Edwards, H.
Buxton, C.	Ellice, E.
Candlish, J.	Erskine, Vice-Ad. J. E.
Cardwell, rt. hon. E.	Esmonde, J.
Carter, S.	Ewing, H. E. Crum-
Castlerosse, Viscount	Eykyn, R.
Cave, T.	Fane, Colonel J. W.

Fildes, J.	Mills, J. R.
FitzPatrick, rt. hn. J. W.	Milton, Viscount
Floyer, J.	Monsell, rt. hn. W.
Fordyce, W. D.	More, R. J.
Forster, C.	Morris, G.
Foster, W. O.	Murphy, N. D.
Gaselee, Serjeant S.	Neate, C.
Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.	O'Brien, Sir P.
Gladstone, W. H.	O'Loughlen, Sir C. M.
Goldsmid, Sir F. H.	Onslow, G.
Goldsmid, J.	Padmore, R.
Gore, J. R. O.	Paget, T. T.
Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.	Palmer, Sir R.
Graham, W.	Parry, T.
Gray, Sir J.	Paull, H.
Gregory, W. H.	Pease, J. W.
Grey, rt. hon. Sir G.	Pelham, Lord
Grey, hon. T. de	Pemberton, E. L.
Grosvenor, Capt. R. W.	Philips, R. N.
Grove, T. F.	Potter, T. B.
Guinness, Sir A. E.	Ramsay, J.
Hankey, T.	Rearden, D. J.
Hammer, Sir J.	St. Aubyn, J.
Harris, J. D.	Salomons, Mr. Ald.
Hay, Lord J.	Samuda, J. D'A.
Headlam, rt. hn. T. E.	Samuelson, B.
Heneage, E.	Sandford, G. M. W.
Henley, rt. hon. J. W.	Saunderson, E.
Henley, Lord	Seymour, A.
Henniker-Major, hon. J. M.	Sherriff, A. C.
Hodgkinson, G.	Speira, A. A.
Howes, E.	Stacpoole, W.
Hughes, W. B.	Stuart, Col. Crichton-
Hutt, rt. hn. Sir W.	Surtees, C. F.
Johnstone, Sir J.	Sykes, C.
Kinglake, A. W.	Synan, E. J.
Kinglake, J. A.	Talbot, C. R. M.
Kingscote, Colonel	Tbyrne, Lord H. F.
Kinnaird, hon. A. F.	Vance, J.
Lacon, Sir E.	Vanderbyl, P.
Lamont, J.	Verney, Sir H.
Langton, W. G.	Vernon, H. F.
Leader, N. P.	Waldegrave-Loalle, hon. G.
Leatham, E. A.	White, J.
Leatham, W. H.	Winterbotham, H. S. P.
Lee, W.	Wise, H. C.
Leeman, G.	Woods, H.
Locke, J.	Wyld, J.
Lopes, H. C.	Young, R.
Lorne, Marquess of
Lusk, A.
Lytelton, hon. O. G.
Martin, P. W.
Milbank, F. A.

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. BOUVERIE said, he rose to express his willingness to proceed with the discussion of the Amendments which stood on the Paper in his name. At that late hour, however, he doubted whether it would be convenient to do so.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Bouverie.)

MR. D' to report
tlemen w

MR. S given wa evening self to a before it.
in himsel House; t cussion w good res once be

SIR I hoped th
Kilmarn and allow

SIR R the right
the Mot progress

MR. I tion were pression
It would not since ruption.

MR. had the their ple said by t he shou threats bribery be done absurd necessar fairly dic to proce with adv

MR. been rep
the Hou to the B that it a vernmen selves n carry ou tions to ing cam party.
ciate his

MR. Motion persever at the oppositio night.
felt conv
the utmo

would warn hon. Members that it was a measure which would dangerously touch the tenure of their seats.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 68 ; Noes 201 : Majority 133.

MR. ESMONDE moved that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope this course will not be pursued. On several occasions hon. Gentlemen opposite have expressed the greatest anxiety that this Bill should be proceeded with. By no one has that anxiety been expressed more strongly than by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). Well, Sir, having just passed what have been called the Supplementary Reform Bills, we have taken the earliest opportunity to proceed with this Bill. But what do we find? That the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire votes to report Progress, so as to obstruct the passing of this measure. No doubt hon. Gentlemen have expressed in speeches and by votes their objections to particular portions of this Bill; but those objections afford no reason why we should report Progress. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) said he did not care about the country.

MR. DENMAN: I beg your pardon, I said nothing of the kind; what I said was I did not care about the impression that was produced.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am in the recollection of the House. The words which I caught were that the hon. Gentleman did not care about the country.

MR. DENMAN: That I did not care what the country would say.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I accept the statement of what the hon. and learned Gentleman intended to say; but, for my part, I confess I am anxious about the impression produced in the country. I am anxious that the country should understand who it is desires to obstruct the Bill, and who it is desires that it should proceed. I do hope that, having had several hours' discussion and a division substantially affirming the principle of the Bill, we shall now be allowed to pass the clauses of the Bill, and not be met by alternate Motions for reporting Progress and the Chairman leaving the Chair.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Ex-

VOL. CXII. [THIRD SERIES.]

chequer, on the part of the Government, is anxious to promote the progress of the Bill, I must say I never heard a speech more indiscreetly framed with reference to that object than the speech which he has just delivered; and in the defence which I shall endeavour to make against the charge he has so unexpectedly brought against me my principal aim will be that what I may say shall be as unlike as possible to what he has just said. Now I must tell the right hon. Gentleman that for thirty-six years this is the first time I have ever heard it stated in this House, even by any private, inexperienced, and independent Member, much less by a Minister of the Crown, that the vote for reporting Progress on a single Motion at one o'clock in the morning upon a Bill of great difficulty was a factious proceeding, which the Minister was justified in denouncing and exhibiting to the country as an obstruction of the Bill. Were I to approach the question in the spirit which the right hon. Gentleman has approached it, I should examine the proceedings of the Government, and should go night by night over the arrangement of the Business, and should make minute inquiries as to the signs which that arrangement shows of the anxiety of the Government to proceed with this Bill. But I refrain from such a course because I know well that when the right hon. Gentleman launched his unwise and unjustifiable charges, if I, with a not less plausible excuse, were to reiterate them the effect out-of-doors would be greatly to discredit Parliament in the face of the country. I will tell the right hon. Gentleman that which he has very little title to ask from me—the reason for my vote. We have just rejected, though not by a large majority, the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd). My right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) has a medium scheme, between that for retaining and that for parting with the jurisdiction of this House, which was completely excluded from consideration in the late debate. My right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock is a Gentleman who has held the Office which you, Sir, so ably fill. He has sat in this House for many years, and he is certainly entitled as well as any Member in this House to be heard upon any question connected with its proceedings. He desires to have the opportunity of explaining fully to the House the particulars of his plan, for which I may say I have no violent prepossession, and to do this at a time when the House is not exhausted by lengthened statements. And what I contend is that to divide with my right hon. Friend upon a single Motion with a view to obtain for him the opportunity which he asks does not in any respect justify the extraordinary charges which have been made. The right hon. Gentleman ought to know much more of this House and of its proceedings before he ventures to make such charges; and if there are those who object to that statement, I want to know what title their experience or close observations of the proceedings of this House gives them to utter opinions in so singular a manner. This, I venture to say to the right hon. Gentleman—let him show me one single case where any man occupying his high position—I will go as far as to use the word presumed—[“Oh!”]—yes, has presumed—[“Oh, oh!”]—has taken on himself, if you like it better, to charge a Member of this House with faction and obstruction, because of a single vote to report Progress at one o’clock in the morning, in order to have a new question fully and fairly discussed. Let him show me one single case of such a charge made by a Minister of the Crown, and I will retract and apologize to him. But the right hon. Gentleman will find no such case; and in its absence I will venture to say that it does not become him to create a precedent so adverse to the liberty and independence of Members of the House. My sentiments with regard to the Motion just made are the same as those of the right hon. Gentleman. I am not in favour of alternate Motions such as the right hon. Gentleman has so unreasonably supposed are part of a scheme for obstructing the progress of this Bill. I challenge any hon. Gentleman opposite, and particularly the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to point out any case where a similar charge of obstruction has been put forward by a Minister of the Crown. I cannot consent to have my liberty in any degree diminished or impaired by the right hon. Gentleman or by anybody who desires to pursue a similar course.

Mr. PAULL said, it was not astonishing that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) should exhibit extraordinary anxiety to clear himself from the charge of factional proceedings, seeing that, after what had occurred, both the House and the country must be disposed to entertain a very strong opinion. hon. Ge to get u be very stateme that it one o’cl gress w

Mr. Gladstone

Mr.

Chance understat tion, or plied w gress.

end to propose ever sin tired, s to defe hour a was fav Member

THE QUER understat the rig whether the Hon Commo been at disposed Member That be ble that pose his that dec on the c to prev really tr whatever

Mr. extreme right ho neck (M It has b been ad doors, a opinions pledge aious o just hea that wh ported b ment, th in a full of us th in the sp ber for Before a Bill we cussed ; and fairness and the forms of the House are on our side. The Bill does not embody the original plan of the Government, but only an alternative one, substituted on the receipt of the letter from the Lord Chief Justice. If we insert the clause in the Bill we are shut out from discussing the plan of my right hon. Friend, who is in fair play entitled to an opportunity for its discussion ; and in granting it we shall only be doing justice to our view as Members anxious to suppress corrupt practices.

MR. DISRAELI: There seems to be a desire on the part of many Members of the Committee to discuss the plan of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). Looking at the great quantity of Business that remains, and also at the period of the Session, perhaps the best thing we can do is to report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE complained that the Bill had purposely been kept back until a late period of the evening.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

MR. FAWCETT said, he wished to know when the Committee would be resumed, and whether the Bill could be taken at a Morning Sitting ?

MR. DISRAELI: I have put the Bill down for Monday ; but, candidly, looking at the Business on the Paper, I see little prospect of its being brought on. I think it, however, most convenient to put it down for that day. With regard to Morning Sittings for this Bill, no doubt there is a time when Morning Sittings will considerably help us ; but until we have settled the general principles of the Bill I prefer that discussion should be confined to Evening Sittings.

Committee report Progress : to sit again upon Monday next.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LANDS
(IRELAND) SUPPLEMENTAL (NO. 2.) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under "The Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Act, 1863," and the Acts amending the same, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH and The Earl of MAYO.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 195.]

CLERKS OF THE PEACE, &C. (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Earl of MAYO, Bill to make provision for the payment of Salaries to Clerks of the Peace and Clerks of the Crown in certain Boroughs in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by The Earl of MAYO and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 194.]

House adjourned at a quarter
before Two o'clock.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

VOLUME CXCH.

THIRD VOLUME OF THE SESSION 1867-8.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

In Bills, Read 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, or 1^a, 2^a, 3^a, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches, 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amendt., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—R. P., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—l., Lords.—c., Commons.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

A BINGER Lord
Salmon Fisheries (Scotland), 2R. 1629

Abyssinian Expedition

Batta to Army, Question, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote June 18, 1756

Despatches, The, Question, The Earl of Ellenborough; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury May 22, 893; Questions, Mr. Stansfeld, Captain Vivian, Mr. Layard; Answers, Sir Stafford Northcote May 22, 716; Question, Mr. Layard; Answers, Mr. Disraeli, Sir Stafford Northcote June 15, 1564

Napier, Sir Robert, and Ex-Governor Eyre, Question, Captain Archdall May 22, 715

Return of the Army, Observations, The Earl of Ellenborough; Reply, The Earl of Malmesbury; short debate thereon June 19, 1810

Telegraphic Communication, Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote May 22, 718

Vote of Thanks to the Army, Observations, The Earl of Malmesbury May 26, 897; Observations, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Gladstone May 26, 925; Observations, The Earl of Malmesbury June 8, 1221

VOL. CXCH. [THIRD SERIES.]

ACLAND, Mr. T. D., Devonshire, N.

Agriculture, Motion for a Committee, 579
Army Reserve, Motion for a Commission, 1968
Public Schools, Re-comm. 1648; cl. 1, Amendt. 1649, 1650; cl. 3, 1653, 1656; cl. 6, 1927, 1929, 1930, 1931; cl. 12, 1933; cl. 15, 1939; cl. 16, 1941

ADDERLEY, Right Hon. C. B. (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies), Staffordshire, N.

Boundary, Comm. cl. 4, 1408
Canada—Alleged Flogging in a Prison, 1698
Cape of Good Hope—Basuto Land, 114
Ceylon—Unauthorized Publication of Despatch, 1015
Colonial Bishops, 111
Darling, Sir C., 1398
Eyre, Ex-Governor, and his Expenses, 1477
Hudson's Bay Company, 17
Lake Superior and the Pacific, &c., Motion for a Commission, 1343
Mauritius—Condition of, 713;—Fever in, 1856
New South Wales—Treason Felony Act, 1754
Nova Scotia—British North American Confederation, Motion for an Address, 1877
Queensland—Polynesian Labourers, 816
Sierra Leone—Assistant Judge of, 656
Victoria—Despatches from, 925

Adulteration of Food or Drink Act Amendment Bill

(Mr. Dixon, Sir Joseph McKenna, Mr. Goldney)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Dixon) June 9, 1851

Bill ordered

Read 1st June 10

(Bill 161)

Read 2nd June 23

Alkali
Alkali

i. Present Moved Dut
shor
Read 3
c. Read 1
Moved.
Step
bate.
Comm
Consid
Read 3
Royal

Advocate, The Lord (Right Hon. E.
S. Gordon), Thetford

Ceylon—Crops in, 1755

Court of Session (Scotland), 2R. 1516, 1534

Jamaica—Established Church in, 1922, 1923

Land Writs Registration (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 1, 1526; cl. 23, 1529

Representation of the People (Scotland),
Comm. 460; cl. 3, 474, 481, 484, 840;

Amend. 841, 843, 850, 852; cl. 4, 855;

cl. 5, Amend. 856; cl. 8, 882; Amend.

893; cl. 9, Amend. 959, 979; Amend. 981;

cl. 10, 983, 991, 992; cl. 12, 1006; cl. 15,

1008; cl. 25, 1009; cl. 51, ib.; cl. 23,

Amend. 1233; add. cl. 1234, 1235, 1236,

1237, 1238, 1239; cl. E, 1240; cl. O, 1241,

1242; Schedule A, 1251, 1255; Consid.

add. cl. 1446, 1447

Scotland—Questions, &c.

Judicial System, 2137

Legislation for, 245

Poor Law, 1631

AMBERL
Bound Bound Electio
Elec
Libel, C

ANSON,
Army—
Flo
Gu
Pay
Eyre, I

African Slave Trade — "The Aberdeen Act"

Observations, Mr. Layard; Reply, Lord Stanley
May 22, 718

ANSTRUT
Scotlan

AGNEW, Sir A., Wigtonshire

Representation of the People (Scotland), 18;

Comm. cl. 7, Amend. 857

Scotland—Poor Law, 1631

Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendments. 1880

Supply—Houses of Parliament, 306

ARCHDA
Army—Establi
Napier,

Agricultural Labour, &c.

Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Mr. Gathorne
Hardy June 11, 1897

AREYLL,
Establi
Foresh
1834 Repres
1915
Salmon

Agriculture—Special Department for

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the functions of various Government Offices so far as they affect questions relating to Agriculture, with a view to provide for the due consideration of such questions by one Department responsible to Parliament" (Mr. Acland) May 19, 579; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

ARMSTR
Libel, C
Repres
add.

Army
Army E
Major
May 1

AIRLIE, Earl of

Salmon Fisheries (Scotland), 2R. 1629

Scotland—Poor Rate, Motion for a Paper, 919

Artillery
Major
June Shot,
John

ARNOLD, Mr. E., Halifax

Elementary Education, 2R. 2009

Army—cont.

Brooke, Captain, Case of, Questions, Mr. Stacpoole, Captain Vivian; Answers, Sir John Pakington June 22, 1855; Question, Captain Archdall; Answer Sir John Pakington June 25, 2134
Cavalry Uniforms, Question, Sir George Stucley; Answer, Sir John Pakington June 4, 1111
Defective Ammunition, Question, Mr. Herbert; Answer, Sir John Pakington May 21, 654
Engineer Department, Clerks, Question, General Dunne; Answer, Sir John Pakington; short debate thereon June 4, 1124
Floating Obstruction Committee, Question, Major Anson; Answer, Sir John Pakington June 8, 1222
Fortifications—Dockyards and Naval Arsenals, Question, Mr. O'Beirne; Answer, Sir John Pakington May 12, 112
Malt Liquor for the Troops in India, Questions, Mr. M. T. Bass, Mr. Greene; Answers, Sir Stafford Northcote May 11, 15
Military Uniform, Question, Mr. O'Reilly; Answer, Sir John Pakington May 22, 712 Militia Quartermasters, Question, Colonel Stuart Knox; Answer, Sir John Pakington June 11, 1395; Question, Colonel Kingscote; Answer, Sir John Pakington June 18, 1756
Musketry Instructors, Payment of, Questions, Major Anson, Lord Elcho; Answers, Sir J. Pakington May 25, 817
Non-Purchase Corps Retirement, Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Sir John Pakington June 22, 1855
Officers in Command of Depôts, Question, Colonel French; Answer, Sir J. Pakington June 5, 1180
Superannuation Allowances—Army, Ordnance, Navy, and Marines, Question, Colonel North; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth June 25, 2133
Transport of Troops to India, Question, Sir George Stucley; Answer, Sir John Pakington June 4, 1111
Volunteer Review at Windsor, Question, Lord Truro; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury June 15, 1557; Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, Mr. Disraeli June 15, 1566
War Department—Army Estimates, Question, The Marquess of Hartington; Answer, Sir John Pakington June 5, 1182—Subordinate Officers, Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, Sir John Pakington May 28, 950

Army Reserve

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon our Military Organization, in so far as it relates to the establishment of a sufficient and economical Army of Reserve, and the means it offers of speedy and efficient expansion to meet the requirements of war, more especially for home defence" (Lord Elcho) June 23, 1942; after long debate, Motion withdrawn
 Question, Major Walker; Answer, Sir John Pakington May 19, 512

Army — Sale and Purchase of Commissions

Moved, "That the Purchase and Sale of Military Commissions be discontinued after a date fixed for that purpose" (Mr. Trevelyan) May 19, 514
 Amendt. to leave out from "That" and add "in the opinion of this House, the ground of complaint against the operation of the Purchase System in the Army would be greatly diminished, and the efficiency of the Service improved, by the abolition of Purchase above the rank of Captain in the Cavalry and the Infantry of the Line" (Captain Vivian); Question, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Amendt. and Motion withdrawn

Army Chaplains Bill [H.L.]

(The Earl of Longford)

- l. Presented; read 1^a * May 25 (No. 116)
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a" (The Earl of Longford) June 9, 1298; after short debate, Bill read 2^a
 Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee" (The Earl of Longford) June 11, 1385; after short debate, further Debate adjourned
 Adjourned Debate on Motion, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee" (The Earl of Longford) June 12, 1465; after debate, agreed to; Committee (No. 146)

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Bill

(The Lord Chelmsford)

- l. Read 1^a * May 11 (No. 93)
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a" (The Lord Chelmsford) May 26, 899; after short debate, Bill read 2^a
 Moved, "That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee" (Lord Portman); Motion agreed to; Bill referred to a Select Committee
 And, on May 29, Committee nominated; List of the Committee, 916
 Personal Explanation (Lord Portman) May 28, 946

Assignees of Marine Policies Bill

(Mr. Candlish, Sir C. O'Loghlen, Mr. Norwood)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 28 [Bill 147]
 Read 2^o * June 24

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir J. B. Karslake), Andover

Bankruptcy Act Amendment, 2R. 1908
 County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), Comm: 170
 Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 689
 Judicial Patronage, 343
 Libel, Comm. 597; cl. 1, 607; cl. 3, 608
 Lottery Act, 390
 Married Women's Property, 2R. 1367
 Publications, Registration of, 1511
 Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. 1861
 Supply—Prosecutions, 495

Australia—Postal Communication with Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth June 12, 1472

Austria, Commercial Treaty with—The Tariff

Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, Lord Stanley May 21, 1852

AYRTON, Mr. A. S., Tower Hamlets

Coal Mines, 1082
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 870; cl. 5, 690, 692
Electric Telegraphs, 1281; 2R. 1333, 1584, 1805, 1808; Nomination of Committee, 1978, 1980
Government of India Act Amendment, 2R. 1598; Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 1885, 1888, 1889, 1891
Governor General of India, 2R. 1601
Libel, Comm. cl. 3, 614
Metropolitan Police, 926
Mines, Accidents in, 1505
Municipal Corporations (Metropolis), 2R. 1739
Petroleum, Comm. 1619
Public Schools, Re-comm. 1641; cl. 3, Amendt. 1650, 1656; cl. 5, Amendt. 1931; cl. 14, 1937; cl. 16, 1939, 1940
Publications, Registration of, 1509
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. add. cl. 1802
Supply—Burlington House, 397, 400
Metropolitan Police, 503
University of Glasgow, 401
Thames Embankment, &c. Amendment, 2R. 1219

AYTON, Mr. R. Sinclair, Kirkcaldy

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Instruction, 1185, 1196
Lake Superior and the Pacific, &c., Motion for a Commission, 1343
Nova Scotia—British North American Confederation, Motion for an Address, 1637
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 4, 854; cl. 10, 985; add. cl. 1286

BAGWELL, Mr. J., Clonsmel

Military at Elections (Ireland), 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 175
Mines, Accidents in, 1506
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. 1574; cl. 10, 1586; add. cl. 1779, 1802; Consid. 1895

BAILLIE, Rt. Hon. H. J., Inverness-shire

Libel, Comm. cl. 3, 617
Peel Statue, The, Res. 2145
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. 1580
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 4, 854; cl. 8, 866; cl. 11, 995; Amendt. 1004, 1005
Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. 1862

BAINES, Mr. E., Leeds

Education—Revised Code, 952
Registration, 2R. 1609

Bank of Bombay Bill

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir James Fergusson)
c. Ordered; read 1^o June 17 [Bill 178]
Read 2^o June 22

Bankrupt
(Mr.)

c. Ordered Moved,
Moffe

BARING, India—
1109

BARRON, Burials Ireland
A Unl
Parlian
Represent
cl. 16

BARROW, Represent
add.

BARRY, Establish Libel, C Military Represent
cl. 11
1770 Adjoi

BASS, M Army—Bounda
mitte
Bounda

BATHSON, Gladsto Elect

BATH, M
Poor R

BATHURST Army B
Post O

BAXTER, Nova S federal Post Of Represent Comm
cl. 7, 883, 8
988

Scotland
Supply—
United

BARLEY, Represent
Comm
Riots at

BRACH, Sir M. E. Hicks, (Secretary to the Poor Law Commissioners), Gloucestershire, E.

Compound Householder, The, 246
Local Rating, Motion for a Committee, 1492, 1498
Militiamen, Families of, 1475
Poor Relief Assessment Returns, 1470

BEACH, Mr. W. W. B., Hampshire, N.
Turnpike Trusts, 2R. 1720

BEAUMONT, Mr. Wentworth B., Northumberland, S.
Boundaries of Boroughs, Comm. 433

BEECROFT, Mr. G. S., Leeds
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 892

BELPER, Lord
Regulation of Railways, Report, cl. 14, 415

BENTINCK, Mr. G. Cavendish, Whitehaven
Courts of Justice, New, 2180, 2181
Disraeli's, Mr., Speech at Merchant Taylors' Hall, 2156
Knights of Windsor, Motion for an Address, 1978
Metropolis — Burlington House Colonnade, 1835
St. Mary Somerset Church, 2149
Municipal Corporations (Metropolis), 2R. Amendt. 1735
Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 6, 1927
Supply—Burlington House, 397, 399
Courts of Justice, New, 290
National Gallery Enlargement, 393, 1172
Palmerston Monument, 403
Parliament, Houses of, 305, 311
Public Buildings, 294
Science and Art, 1170, 1172

BERESFORD, Capt. D. W. Pack, Carlow Co.
Ireland—Ranger of the Curragh, 1754

BERKELEY, Hon. F. H. F., Bristol
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. add. cl. Motion for Adjournment, 1801, 1802

BLAKE, Mr. J. A., Waterford City
Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. 1868
Sea Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 2012, 2018, 2020

Board of Trade—Rule of the Road at Sea
Question, Mr. Holland; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave June 25, 2136

BONHAM-CARTER, Mr. J., Winchester
Boundary, Comm. 278
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 681
Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1809

Boundaries of Boroughs—see Representation of the People Act, 1867

Boundary Bill

(Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson)

c. Committee—R.P. May 14, 248 [Bill 78]
Committee—R.P. June 8, 1257
Committee June 11, 1404; after long debate, Bill reported [Bill 165]
Considered * June 18
Read 3^o * June 22
l. Read 1^o * (The Lord Privy Seal) June 23
Read 2^o * June 25 (No. 170)

BOURNE, Colonel J., Evesham
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. add. cl. 1245

BOUVERIE, Rt. Hon. E. P., Kilmarnock, &c.
Courts of Justice, New, 1397
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 682, 686, 692; Motion for Adjournment, 2191, 2196
Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1807; Nomination of Comm. Amendt. 1978
Land Writs Registration (Scotland), Comm. cl. 23, 1529
Ministerial Statement, 634
Parliament—Business of the House, 1759
Registration, Leave, 1403
Registration of Voters Act, 371, 379, 380
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 3, Amendt. 473, 484, 486, 634, 840; cl. 5, 856; cl. 8, 872, 890; cl. 9, Amendt. 978, 980, 981, 982; cl. 10, 992; cl. 11, 995; cl. 6, 1010; add. cl. 1236
Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 1010
Consular Establishments Abroad, 2172
Whitsuntide Recess, 926

BOWEN, Mr. J. B., Pembrokeshire
Ireland—Royal Residence in, Motion for an Address, 358

BOWYER, Sir G., Dundalk
Boundary, Comm. 285
Burials (Ireland), Comm. 1381
Courts of Justice, New, 1050
Egypt—The Viceroy and the Société d'Agricole, 1394
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 659
Established Church (Ireland), Leave, 316; Comm. 1195
Lottery Act, 389
Ministerial Statement, 641
Navy Estimates—Wages, 91
Public Accounts, Res. 119
Registration, 2R. 1612
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. add. cl., 1773, 1780
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. 468, 469
Riots at Ashton, Staleybridge, &c. 830
Supply—Learned Societies, Grants to, 1182
National Gallery Enlargement, 393, 394
Parliament, Houses of, 303, 310
Royal Parks, &c. 300

- BRADY, Mr. J., Leitrim Co.
Ireland—Royal Residence in, Motion for an Address, 358
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. cl. 18, 1593; add. cl. 1779; Motion for Adjournment, 1801, 1802, 1804, 1805; Consid. 1892
- BRITT, Sir H. B., see Solicitor General, The
- BRIGHT, Mr. Jacob, Manchester
Elementary Education, 2R. 1993
Married Women's Property, 2R. 1360
Supply—University of Glasgow, 402
- BRIGHT, Mr. John, Birmingham
Barrett, The Convict, 852
Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Commission, 427, 428, 431
Boundary, Comm. 263, 281; Preamble, 1273, 1275; cl. 4, 1409, 1418
Electric Telegraphs, 1231
Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 744
Ministerial Statement, 626
Nova Scotia—British North American Confederation, Motion for an Address, 1658, 1694 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 3, 477, 485; cl. 8, 875; cl. 9, 966, 971, 972, 980; Schedule A, 1252, 1254, 1256
- Bristol Election
Petition of Electors of the City of Bristol referred to the General Committee of Elections May 12, 175
Select Committee nominated; List of the Committee June 17, 1740 Report of the Committee; Minutes of Evidence to be laid before this House (Mr. Howes) June 25, 2130
- BROMLEY, Mr. W. DAVENPORT- Warwickshire, N.
Boundary, Comm. cl. 4, 1425
Peel Statue, The, Res. 2146
Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 16, 1940
- Broughty Ferry Provisional Order Confirmation Bill (The Lord Clinton)
2. Committee *; Report May 11 (No. 86)
Read 3^d May 12
Royal Assent May 29
- BROWNE, Lord J. T., Mayo Co.
Burials (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 1361
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 1584; cl. 18, 1590, 1592; add. cl. 1779, 1780, 1797
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 3, 476, 478
- BRUCE, Rt. Hon. H. A., Morthyr Tydeil
Boundary, Comm. cl. 4, 1425, 1440
Education—Revised Code, 952
Elementary Education, 2R. 1983, 1995
Mines, Accidents in, 1498
Supply—Education, Public, 1139, 1143, 1160, 1161
Science and Art, 1176
- BRUCE, E
Burials
Represe
1578,
Supply—
- BRUCE, J
Nas
Represe
cl. 4, 1
- BUCKINGH
for 1
Army O
Cotton
New Fo for a Newfoun
Coast
- Burial &
Questio
Gathe
- Burials
- c. Order
Mr. S Mona agree
- BUTLER,
Custom
- BUXTON,
Navy E
- BUXTON,
Libel, C
- CAIRNS, J
- CAMBRIDGE
man Abyssin
- CAMPBELL
Nova Sc
- CAMPERD
Univer
- Canada—
Questio
June
- CANDLISH
Boundar
Burials
Marchan
Poor Re
Postal—

CANDLISH, Mr. J.—cont.

- Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. cl. 18, 1594
- Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 858; Schedule A, 1254
- Supply—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, 2168
- Science and Art, 1171
- Supply—Government Prisons, 1106; Amendt. 1107, 1108
- Supply—Public Buildings, Amendt. 294

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of

- Army Chaplains, Comm. 1385
- Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 2089
- Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 338

Cape of Good Hope—Basuto Land

- Question, Mr. Cardwell; Answer, Mr. Adderley May 12, 114

Capital Punishment within Prisons Bill
(The Duke of Richmond)

- 1. Read 3^a May 11, 14 (No. 83)
- Amendt. "To provide that all prisoners who might be within the walls of the prison at the time when an execution took place, should be present when the punishment was inflicted" (The Lord Ravensworth); after short debate, Amendt. negatived; Bill passed Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 24]

CARDWELL, Right Hon. E., Oxford City

- Boundary, Comm. 281
- Cape of Good Hope—Basuto Land, 114
- East Worcestershire Election, 1120
- Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 2196
- Lake Superior and the Pacific, &c., Motion for a Commission, 1850
- Nova Scotia—British North American Confederation, Motion for an Address, 1688
- Parliament, Dissolution of, 1076
- Peel Statue, The, 2142, 2144
- Representation of the People (Ireland), Consid. add. cl. 1905
- Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 885; cl. 9, 970

CARLISLE, Bishop of

- Army Chaplains, 2R. 1300
- Consecration of Churchyards Act Amendment, 2R. 508

CARNARVON, Earl of

- Army Chaplains, Comm. 1392
- Courts of Justice, New, 1845
- Newfoundland—Grants of Land on French Coast, 700
- Nova Scotia, 1749
- Parliament—Construction of the House, Re-appointment of Commission, 510
- Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 9, 1623, 1627
- University Tests, 1017
- Vagrants—Guildford Union, Motion for Correspondence, 95, 100, 102

CARNEGIE, Hon. C., Forfarshire

- Agriculture, Motion for a Commission, 587
- Court of Session (Scotland), 2R. 1521
- Money Orders and Stamped Receipts, 2134
- Representation of the People (Scotland), Consid. add. cl. 1445

Carriers' Act, General

- Question, Mr. Carter; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave June 25, 2131

CARTER, Mr. S., Coventry

- General Carriers' Act, 2131

Cattle Plague

- Foreign Cattle Market*, Question, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 11, 1895

- Importation of Foreign Cattle*, Question, Mr. Russell Gurney; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu May 11, 18; Question, Mr. Corrance; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu May 12, 115; Questions, Sir Robert Collier; Answers, Lord Robert Montagu May 18, 424; Question, Mr. Horsfall; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu June 18, 1758

- Zurich Veterinary College*, Question, Sir J. Clarke Jervoise; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu June 18, 1755; Question, Sir J. Clarke Jervoise; Answer, Lord Stanley June 22, 1852

CAVE, Rt. Hon. S. (Paymaster of the Forces and Vice President of the Board of Trade), New Shoreham

- Alkali Act (1863) Perpetuation, 2R. 1296
- Cattle, Importation of, 115
- County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), Comm. 164
- Electric Telegraphs, 1564
- "Garonne," Loss of the, 1042
- General Carriers' Act, 2131
- Merchant Shipping Acts, 513, 1853
- Regulation of Railways, 2R. 1294
- Rule of the Road at Sea, 2136
- Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. 1859, 1863, 1869
- Weights and Measures (Metric System), 2R. 204

CAVE, Mr. T., Barnstaple

- Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, Motion for Adjournment, 2188
- Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1318

CAVENDISH, Lord F. C., Yorkshire, W.R.—N.

- Elementary Education, 2R. 2008

CECIL, Lord E. H. B. G., Essex, S.

- Main Drainage—Inhabitants of Barking, 954, 1853

Ceylon

Crops in, Question, Mr. Watkin; Answer, Mr. Adderley June 18, 1755
Unauthorised Publication of a Despatch, Question, Mr. Watkin; Answer, Mr. Adderley May 20, 1041

CHAMBERS, Mr. M., Devonport

Army—Clerks in the Engineer Department, 1125
Courts of Justice, New, 238, 368, 1049, 2181
Navy Estimates—Wages, 85
Publications, Registration of, 1514
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. cl. 18, 1592
Supply—Public Buildings, 294
Royal Parks, &c. 298, 300
University of London Buildings, 395

CHAMBERS, Mr. T., Marylebone

Libel, Comm. 594; cl. 1, 605, 606; cl. 2, 611

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (LORD CAIRNS)

Army Chaplains, Comm. 1387, 1392
Bankruptcy, Withdrawal of Bills, 5
County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), 2R. 1553, 1554
Courts of Justice, New, 106, 1859, 1846, 1848
Established Church (Ireland), 1749
Foresore and Bed of the Sea, 1851
Regulation of Railways, Comm. cl. 5, Amendt. 7; cl. 19, 18; add. cl. 420, 421
Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites), 2R. 285; Comm. cl. 2, 1742
Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 337
Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy Act Amendment, Report, add. cl. 1630
Sea Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 233, 239, 241; Re-comm. 917

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Right Hon. G. W. Hunt), Northamptonshire, N.

Coinage—Half-Crowns, 1850
Courts of Justice, New, 344
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 686, 2193, 2196
Electric Telegraphs, 654, 1231; 2R. 1801, 1567, 1806, 1807, 1809; Nomination of Committee, Instruction, 1978, 1979, 1980
Foreign Cattle Market, 1895
Ireland—Railways, 1752
Metropolis—Clerkenwell Explosion, 1923
Parliament—Dissolution, The, 1129, 1130, 1224

Public Petitions—Breach of Privilege, 1751
Public Accounts, Res. 128
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 884; cl. O, 1242, 1243
Revenue Officers Disabilities Removal, Comm. 1536, 1538
Stamp Duty on the Transfer of Debenture Stock, 1227
Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 1010
County Courts, 502
Courts of Justice, New, 291
Government Prisons, 1106, 1107
Metropolitan Police, 504

CHANCERY

Mis
1 Pro
Scot
Sup Thames
1912 Valuat

CHURCH

Bounda
CHURCH
Artisan 907
County
1554 Religio

CHURCH

South

CHILDREN

Army—Austral
County
170
Court o
Diploma
Election
Elect
Electric
natio Govern
1599
Land V
cl. 23
Navy E
92
Parliam
1923
Public
Represent 447
Stamp
Stock
Supply—
Con
Con
Fla
Gov
11
Mis
Pro
Scot

Church

Colonial
Answ
Royal C
Quest
The
May Ritual
Mr. thorn Establis
Reply

City of London Gas Bill—Formerly } Metropolis Gas Bill(Mr. Morrison, Mr. Locke, Mr. Gorst)*

- c. Re-comm. *—R.P. May 18 [Bill 115]
 Re-comm. *; Report May 19
 Considered * May 20
 Read 3^d * May 21
 l. Read 1st * (The Lord Stanley of Alderley)
 May 22 (No. 109)
 Read 2^d * June 8
 Committee * June 25 (No. 168)

CLANCARTY, Earl of

Regulation of Railways, Report, cl. 14, 412,
 415; cl. 15, Amendt. 418; add. cl. 421;
 3R. 708

CLANRICARDE, Marquess of

Regulation of Railways, Comm. cl. 15, 9;
cl. 19, Amendt. 12, 13; Report, add. cl. 417
 Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy, Comm. 1556;
 3R. 1748
 Sea Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 237,
 239, 242; Re-comm. 916
 South Eastern and London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Companies, 2R.
 Amendt. 1448, 1462

CLARENDON, Earl of

Established Church (Ireland), 1R. 1741; 2R.
 2079
 Schools, Public, Address for Papers, 1546

CLAY, Mr. J., Kingston-on-Hull

Revenue Officers Disabilities Removal, Comm.
 1637
 Land Writs Registration (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 23, 1529
 Parliament—Dissolution of, 1081
 Supply—Foreign Office, New, 313
 Parliament, Houses of, 305
 Prosecutions, 500

Clerkenwell Prison, The Attack on—The Convict Barrett

Question, Mr. Bright; Answer, Mr. Gathorne
 Hardy May 25, 832

Clerks of the Peace, &c. (Ireland) Bill

(The Earl of Mayo, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- a. Ordered; read 1st * June 25 [Bill 194]

CLEVELAND, Duke of

Poor Relief, 3R. add. cl. 1912
 Regulation of Railways, Report, add. cl. 419
 Vagrancy—Guildford Union, Motion for Correspondence, 104

CLINTON, Lord (Under Secretary of State for India)

Scotland—County and Burgh Police, Motion
 for a Committee, 3
 Thames Embankment, &c. 2R. 1917

CLIVE, Mr. G., Hereford City

Turnpike Trusts, 2R. 1722

VOL. CXCLII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Coal Mines—The Committee on

Question, Mr. Greene; Answer, Mr. Ayrton; short debate thereon May 29, 1081

COCHRANE, Mr. A. D. R. W. Baillie, Honiton

Abyssinia—Batta to the Army, 1756
 Courts of Justice, New, 368, 1045
 Disraeli's, Mr., Speech at Merchant Taylors'
 Hall, 2158, 2161
 Navy—Greenwich Hospital, 719, 1185
 Peel Statue, The, 2144
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
 449; cl. 3, 486; cl. 12, 1006
 Supply—Houses of Parliament, 305

COGAN, Right Hon. W. H. F., Kildare Co.

Curragh of Kildare, 2R. 1620
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1195
 Parliament, Dissolution of, 1074, 1075
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Consid.
add. cl. 1902

Coinage—Half-Crowns

Question, Sir Frederick Heygate; Answer,
 The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 22, 1849

COLE, Hon. J. Lowry, Enniskillen

Burials (Ireland), Comm. add. cl. 1384

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire

Court of Session (Scotland), 2R. 1520
 Government of India Act Amendment, 1567;
 Comm. cl. 1, 1889
 Governor General of India, 2R. 1602
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 3, 849; cl. 4, Amendt. 852, 854, 855;
cl. 5, Amendt. 856; cl. 8, 893; cl. 9, 977, 978, 979; cl. 10, 988; cl. 12, 1006, 1007;
cl. 51, 1009; cl. 41, 1233; add. cl. 1237;
 Schedule A, 1251, 1254
 Supply—Register House (Edinburgh), Report, 1176

COLERIDGE, Mr. J. D., Exeter

Libel, Comm. 600
 Oxford and Cambridge Universities, 2R. 209
 Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. 1862

COLLIER, Sir R. P., Plymouth

Boundaries of Boroughs, Comm. 438
 Boundary, Comm. 285
 Cattle, Importation of Foreign, 424
 Darling, Sir C., 1397
 Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
 Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 662; cl. 5, 2192
 Libel, Comm. cl. 3, 608, 617
 Registration of Voters Act, 382

Colliery Accidents

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into Colliery Accidents" (Mr. Greene) May 26, 939; after short debate, House counted out

Colliery Prosecution—Dismissal of Inspectors' Summons

Question, Mr. Locke; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy June 15, 1858

COLVILLE, Lord

Regulation of Railways, Report, &c. 14,412, 415

Commissionaires, Corps of—Employment in Civil Departments

Question, Sir Charles Russell; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth May 14, 248

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Bill (The Earl Russell)

1. Report * June 12 (Nos. 55-144)

Consecration of Churchyards Act (1857) Amendment Bill

(The Lord Bishop of Oxford)

1. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a" (The Lord Bishop of Oxford) May 18, 507; after short debate, Bill read 2^a (No. 18)

Committee; Report May 26, 507 (No. 124)

Read 3^a * May 28

a. Read 1^o * June 4 [Bill 152]

Read 2^o * June 8

Committee *; Report June 10

Considered * June 11

Read 3^o * June 12

Royal Assent July 13 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 47]

Consolidated Fund (£17,000,000) Bill

a. Ordered; read 1^o * May 18

Read 2^o * May 19

Committee *; Report May 20

Read 3^o * May 21

1. Read 1^o * May 22

Read 2^o *; Committee negatived May 26

Read 3^o * May 26

Royal Assent May 26 [31 Vict. c. 16]

Consular Marriages Bill

(Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

a. Ordered; read 1^o * June 24 [Bill 166]

Read 2^o * June 25

Contagious Diseases Act, 1866

Question, Viscount Lifford; Answer, The Duke of Marlborough; short debate thereon May 15, 324; Question, Sir J. Clarke Jervoise; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy May 18, 425

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the Contagious Diseases Act, 1866;" Motion agreed to; List of the Committee May 19, 511

Contagious Diseases Act (1866) Amendment Bill

(Sir John Pakington, Lord Henry Lennan)

a. Ordered; read 1^o * June 25 [Bill 193]

Oboite Emigration

Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, Lord Stanley June 25, 2132

CORRANC

Cattle,

Local 4

Local 4

1498

Turnpi

CONRY,

of

Navy 1

Navy—

F. 4

" G

Gre

Iron

Cotton f

(Mr. Ba

a. Commi

Consid

Read 3

1. Read 1

Moved,

Mar

After

(" no

On Qu

Not-

Cont

Bill re

Commi

Report

Read 3

Royal

County

Moved,

to in

Syste

May

agrea

County

(re-co

(Mr. N

a. Order f

Speal

161

Amend

" this

resolv

Gorst

the w

Quest

Commit

Conside

Read 3^o

1. Read 1^o

Moved,

Gram

bate,

County 1

Select C

mittee

County General Assessment (Scotland) Bill (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir James Fergusson)

c. Read 2^o * May 29 [Bill 84]
Committee * Report June 15 [Bill 172]
Re-comm *; Report June 22

Court of Justiciary (Scotland) Bill (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Attorney General)

c. Read 2^o * June 12 [Bill 46]
Committee *; Report June 15 [Bill 174]

Court of Session (Scotland) Bill (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Attorney General)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (The Lord Advocate) June 12, 1516; after short debate, Bill read 2^o [Bill 45]
Committee *; Report June 15 [Bill 173]

Courts of Chancery and Exchequer (Ireland) Fee Funds Bill (Mr. Solater-Booth, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 28 [Bill 146]
Read 2^o * June 8
Committee *—R.P. June 11
Committee *; Report June 12
Considered * June 18
Read 3^o * June 22
L. Read 1^o * (The Lord Clinton) June 23 (No. 171)

Courts of Justice, The New

Observations, Lord Denman; Reply, The Lord Chancellor May 12, 105; Observations, Mr. Alderman Lawrence; short debate thereon May 14, 287; Observations, Mr. Denman; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer; short debate thereon May 15, 362; Question, Mr. Pease; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth May 21, 653; Observations, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Reply, Mr. Cowper; short debate thereon May 29, 1045

National Gallery, Question, Viscount Hardinge; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury May 12, 93; Questions, Mr. Goldsmid, Mr. Bouverie; Answers, Mr. Solater-Booth June 11, 1396; Question, Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth June 15, 1563; Question, The Marquess of Salisbury; Answer, The Lord Chancellor; short debate thereon June 19, 1834; Questions, Mr. Bentinck, Mr. Layard, Mr. M. Chambers; Answers, Mr. Solater-Booth, Lord John Manners June 25, 2130

Courts of Law (Scotland) [Fees, &c.] Bill (Mr. Dodson, The Lord Advocate, Sir Graham Montgomery)

c. Resolution reported; Bill ordered * May 29
Read 1^o * June 8 [Bill 159]
Read 2^o * June 15
Committee *; Report June 25

COWPER, Right Hon. W. F., Hertford
Courts of Justice, New, 367, 1049
Supply—Burlington House, 398
Public Offices Site, 391
University of London Buildings, 395

CRANWORTH, Lord
Courts of Justice, New, 1844
Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites), 2R. 228;
Comm. cl. 2, 1742

CRAUFURD, Mr. E. H. J., Ayr, &c.
Boundaries of Boroughs, Comm. 1011
Court of Session (Scotland), 2R. 1524
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 2173
Land Writs Registration (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1526
Libel, Comm. cl. 1, 606, 607; cl. 3, 617
Publications, Registration of, 1515
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 3, Amendt. 840, 841; cl. 4, Amendt. 854, 856; cl. 5, 857; cl. 9, 981; cl. 10, 982, 983; Amendt. 986, 991; cl. 11, 995; cl. 12, 1009; cl. 15, Amendt. ib.; cl. 6, Motion for Adjournment, 1010; cl. 41, 1234; add. cl. 1235, 1236, 1237, 1246; Schedule A, 1252; Consid. add. cl. 1445, 1446
Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendt. 1863
Supply—Register House (Edinburgh), Report, 1176
University of Glasgow, 403

CRAWFORD, Mr. R. W., London
Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1814, 1826
Postal Service, 816, 1476
Supply—Public Buildings, 294

Criminal Law

Clerkenwell Explosion, Compensations, Question, Mr. Neate; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 23, 1923
Clerkenwell Prison, The Attack on—The Convict Barrett, Question, Mr. Bright; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy May 25, 932
(See Supply)

CROSSLEY, Sir F., Yorkshire, W.R.—N.
Boundary, Comm. 273; Preamble, 1289;
Schedule, 1443

Curragh of Kildare Bill (The Earl of Mayo, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 21 [Bill 134]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (The Earl of Mayo) June 15, 1620
After short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Lord Otho Fitzgerald); Motion withdrawn
Bill read 2^o, and committed to a Select Committee of Eleven Members, Six to be nominated by the House and Five by the Committee of Selection Committee nominated; List of the Committee, 1620
Report * June 25 [Bill 192]

Customs

Examining Officers, Question, Mr. Butler;
Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth June 25, 2135
Extra Clerks, Question, Mr. H. B. Sheridan;
Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth May 22, 718 Outdoor Officers of, Question, Mr. Locke; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth May 19, 518
(See Ireland)

Customs and Income Tax Bill

c. Read 2^o May 11 [Bill 108]
Committee *; Report May 13
Read 3^o May 14
L. Read 1^o May 15 (No. 100)
Read 2^o May 18
Read 3^o May 19
Royal Assent May 20 [31 Vict. c. 26]

DALGLISH, Mr. R., Glasgow

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 3, 480, 513; cl. 5, 857; cl. 8, 883, 894;
cl. 9, 903, 978; Schedule A, 1252; Consid.
add. cl. 1446
Supply—University of Glasgow, 401

DALHOUSIE, Earl of

Scotland—County and Burgh Police, Motion
for a Committee, 5

DAWSON, Mr. R. Peel, Londonderry Co.

Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 18, 1595
Supply—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, 2167

DE GREY AND RIPON, Earl

Army Chaplains, 2R. 1299; Comm. 1467
Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 339, 340

DENISON, Right Hon. J. E., see SPEAKER, The

DENMAN, Lord

Courts of Justice, New, 105

DENMAN, Hon. G., Tiverton

Courts of Justice, New, 362
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 657; Motion for Ad-journalment, 658, 667, 680, 682; cl. 5, 9178, 2192, 2193
Married Women's Property, 2R. 1373
Registration, 2R. 1616
Supply—Burlington House, 399

DERBY, Earl of

Alkali Act Continuance, 2R. 509
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, 2R. 913
Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 2091, 2106,
2116
Whitsuntide Recess—State of Public Affairs, 1032

DEVON, Earl of (President of the Poor Law Board)

Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 5, Amendt. 947; cl. 22, 949; cl. 9, 1622, 1623, 1628; Report, 1743,
1744; 3R. add. cl. 1911
Poor, Relief of the, Address for a Commission, 1464
Scotland—Motion for a Paper, 920
Vagrancy—Guildford Union, Motion for Correspondence, 97

DEVONSHIRE

Regula
cl. 1
Ame
Univer

DICKSON

County
168

DILLWYD

Libel, (Militia)
Public
Supply
Nor Sch
She Uni

Diploma

Moved,
some Dipl
by P some will conti
May
N. T.

DISRAEL

the Abyssin
Bounds
Bounds
ambl Bounds
Ame Corrupt
Derby
Ecclesi
Edinbu
of, 12
Electio
Elect 892, Establi
801,
Eyre, E
1835, Gladsto
Elect
Ireland-
Cull
Rail
Uni
Uni
Ireland-
Addr Minister
Musio, I
Parliam
Dis
Gene
Prog
Parliam
1870,
Parliam

DISRAELI, Right Hon. B.—cont.

Registration—Small Tenements Act, 1228
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
 1581; cl. 10, 1586, 1597, 1762; add. cl.
 1801, 1802, 1804; Consid. add. cl. 1902, 1904
 Representation of the People (Scotland), 18, 19, 346; Comm. 451; cl. 3, Motion for Adjournment, 484, 513, 619; cl. 8, 867, 889,
 890, 892, 893, 894, 895, 955; cl. 9, 960,
 972; cl. 11, 997; cl. 20, 1009; cl. 6, 1010;
add. cl. 1246, 1249, 1567
 Revenue Officers Disabilities Removal, 1565
 Speech at Merchant Taylors' Hall, 2153
 Supply—Miscellaneous Expenses, 1174
 University of Glasgow, 402
 Whitsuntide Recess, 927
 Windsor, Volunteer Review at, 1566

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court Bill

(Mr. C. Forster, Mr. Headlam, Mr. Karlake)

- c.* Committee* ; Report May 18 [Bill 50]
 Re-comm.* ; Report May 22 [Bill 119]
 Read 3^o* May 25
l. Read 1^a* (The Lord Westbury) May 26
 (No. 123)

DIXON, Mr. G., Birmingham

Adulteration of Food or Drink Act Amendment, Leave, 1351
 Elementary Education, 2R. 1989, 1992

Documentary Evidence Bill [H.L.]
(The Lord Clinton)

- l.* Read 1^a* May 11 (No. 92)
 Read 2^a* May 22
 Committee* May 26 (No. 88)
 Report* May 28
 Read 3^a* May 29
l. Royal Assent June 25 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 37]

DODSON, Mr. J. G. (Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means), Sussex, E.

Boundary, Comm. Preamble, 1275
 Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
 Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 658, 682
 Libel, Comm. cl. 3, 614
 Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market, 1180
 Navy Estimates—Wages, 83
 Registration, 2R. 1617
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 26, 1597; add. cl. 1771, 1777, 1801, 1802
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 858, 860, 875, 884, 885; cl. 9, 959, 971, 981; cl. 11, 1005; add. cl. 1245, 1247,
 1250
 Supply—Foreign Office, New, 313
 National Gallery Enlargement, 393

Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental (No. 2) Bill
(Mr. Selater-Booth, The Earl of Mayo)

- c.* Ordered; read 1^o* June 25 [Bill 195]

Drainage Provisional Order Confirmation Bill (Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

- c.* Ordered; read 1^o* June 11 [Bill 169]
 Read 2^o* June 12
 Committee* ; Report June 15
 Read 3^o* June 16
l. Read 1^a* (The Lord Clinton) June 18
 (No. 158)

Duchy of Cornwall Amendment Bill [H.L.]
(The Lord Portman)

- l.* Presented; read 1^a* May 11 (No. 94)
 Read 2^a* May 14
 Committee* ; Report May 19 (No. 107)
 Read 3^a* May 22
c. Read 1^o* May 22 [Bill 136]
 Read 2^o* May 28
 Committee* ; Report May 29
 Re-comm.* ; Report June 11
 Considered* June 12
 Read 3^o* June 15
 Royal Assent June 25 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 35]

DUFF, Mr. M. E. Grant, Elgin, &c.

Disraeli's, Mr., Speech at Merchant Taylors'
 Hall, 2150
 India—Educational Service in Bombay, 426
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 883; cl. 10, 990; add. cl. 1250
 Stone, Police Sergeant, Case of, 1482

DUNNE, Major-Gen. F. P., Queen's Co.

Army—Clerks in the Engineer Department, 1124
 Army Reserve, Motion for a Commission, 1958
 Ireland—Post Office, 1562
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
 1576; cl. 3, 1584; cl. 13, 1588; cl. 20, 1596
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
 466
 Sea Fisheries, 287; Lords' Amendts. 1861, 1868
 Supply—Science and Art, 1166

Durham County Courts

Question, Mr. Henderson; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth May 25, 816

East Worcestershire Election—Mr. Gladstone's Letter

Question, Sir Thomas Bateson; Answer, Mr.
 Gladstone June 4, 1110; Observations, Mr.
 Gladstone; Reply, Mr. Disraeli; debate thereon, 1112

EBURY, Lord

Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 385

Ecclesiastical Buildings and Glebes (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir Graham Montgomery)

- c.* Committee* ; Report June 4 [Bill 58]

Ecclesiastical Commissioners Bill

(Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Moncreaf, Sir James Fergusson)

c. Ordered; read 1st June 11 [Bill 108]
Read 2nd June 18

Ecclesiastical Titles Bill

(Mr. MacEvoy, Sir Joseph McKenna, Mr. Leader)

Question, Mr. Schreiber; Answer, Mr. MacEvoy
June 5, 1181

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2nd" (Mr. MacEvoy) June 18, 1898

After short debate, Moved, "That the debate be now adjourned" (Colonel William Stuart);

A. 142, N. 85; M. 57; Debate adjourned

Question, Mr. MacEvoy; Answer, Mr. Disraeli
June 22, 1898

Bill withdrawn June 23, 1898

Edinburgh, Duke of—Attempted Assassination

Question, Mr. Verner; Answer, Mr. Disraeli
June 8, 1869

Education

Revised Code, The, Questions, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Baines; Answers, Lord Robert Montagu
May 28, 952

Scientific Instruction in Foreign Countries, Questions, Mr. Samuelson, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answers, Lord Robert Montagu
June 18, 1860

Education Bill [H.L.] (The Lord President)

1. After short debate, Committee discharged
May 18, 405 (No. 53)

EDWARDS, Sir H., Beverley

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
499

Supply—Government Prisons, 1107

EGERTON OF TATTON, Lord

Cotton Statistics, Comm. 919

EGERTON, Hon. A. F., Lancashire, S.

Boundaries of Boroughs, Comm. 431

EGERTON, Mr. E. C. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Macclesfield Boundary, Comm. Schedule, 1443

Egypt

Claims on the Viceroy, Question, Mr. Freville-Surtees; Answer, Lord Stanley May 26, 924

Law Courts, Question, Mr. Layard; Answer, Lord Stanley June 15, 1859

Quarantine at Suez, Question, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, Lord Stanley June 9, 1334; Question, Sir J. Clarke Jervoise; Answer, Lord Stanley June 11, 1395

Slave Trade in, Question, The Duke of St. Albans; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury
May 15, 330

The Viceroy and the Société D'Agricole, Question, Sir George Bowyer; Answer, Lord Stanley June 11, 1394

ELCHO, L.

Army—

Mush

Subo

95

Volu

Army R

1979

Army—

Res. (

Coal Mi

Establis

Parliam

Pool Sta

Represe

cl. 8, 1

Election

at E

(Mr. Chan

Gatho

c. Commit

After la

Questio

May

Commit

Electric

(Mr. Cha

c. Questio

collot

Questio

The

1231

Moved,

Chan

Amendi

"the chasi

ferret

Qua

long

Questio

Booti

Adjourn

After s

be no

Amer

and to a

And, or

of the

Moved,

Comm

inqu

trans

shoul

Office

discre speech

mean secur

secre

Post

made foreign

Telegr

print

Electric Telegraphs Bill—cont.

26th instant, have prayed to be heard by themselves, their counsel or agents against such of the matters referred to the Committee as affect their particular interests?" (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) June 23, 1878

Amendt. in last paragraph, to leave out "such of the matters referred to the Committee as affect their particular interests," and insert "the Preamble and Clauses of the Bill" (Mr. Bouverie); after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and agreed to; main Question put, and agreed to

Elementary Education Bill

(Mr. Henry Austin Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Algernon Egerton)

c. Moved, "That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged" (Mr. Bruce) June 23, 1883

After long debate, Order discharged; Bill withdrawn [Bill 64]

ELLENBOROUGH, Earl of

Abyssinian Expedition—Despatches, The, 693
Return of the Army, 1810, 1813

ELLICE, Mr. E., St. Andrews, &c.

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 3, 475, 850; cl. 8, 891; Motion for Adjournment, 893; cl. 9, 978; cl. 15, Amendt. 1008; add. cl. 1235; Schedule A, 1251

ELY, Bishop of

University Tests, 1021

Endowed Schools Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord President)

l. Presented; read 1st May 12 (No. 98)

Read 2nd May 18

Committee*; Report May 19

Read 3rd May 25

c. Read 1st May 28 [Bill 143]

Read 2nd June 4

Committee*; Report June 8

Read 3rd June 9

Royal Assent June 25 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 62]

ENFIELD, Viscount, Middlesex

Latymer's Charity, Edmonton, 952
Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 14, 1989

Entail Amendment (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

c. Read 2nd May 20 [Bill 86]

Committee*; Report May 28 [Bill 140]

Re-comm.*; Report June 22

Considered* June 25

ERSKINE, Vice-Admiral J. E., Stirlingshire

"Garonne," Loss of the, 1042
Nova Scotia—British North American Confederation, Motion for an Address, 1004

ESMONDE, Mr. J., Waterford Co.

Army—Rifled Ordnance—Studded Shot, 951
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 2192; Motion for Adjournment, 2193

Libel, Comm. cl. 3, 612

Representation of the People (Ireland), Consid. 1898; add. cl. 1901

Established Church (Ireland)

Her Majesty's Reply to the Address of May 7
May 12, 118

Established Church (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Gladstone, Sir George Grey, Mr. Lawson)

c. Moved, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent, for a limited time, new appointments in the Church of Ireland, and to restrain, for the same period, in certain respects, the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland" (Mr. Gladstone) May 13, 232; Objected to, on point of Form (Mr. Newdegate); and not proceeded with

Question, Colonel Stuart Knox; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 14, 247

Motion again made May 14, 314

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Colonel Stuart Knox); after short debate, Question negatived; after further short debate, main Question put; Bill ordered Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Verner), 322; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 1^o" (Mr. Gladstone) May 14, 322; after short debate, Bill read 1^o [Bill 117]

Personal Explanation, Colonel Stuart Knox
May 15, 341

Question, Mr. Gladstone; Answer, Mr. Disraeli
May 19, 511

Question, Mr. MacEvoy; Answer, Mr. Gladstone
May 21, 657

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Mr. Gladstone) May 22, 720

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy); Question, "That 'now,' &c.," after long debate, Question put; A. 812, N. 258; M. 54; Division List, Ayes and Noes, 899; main Question put; Bill read 2^o

Question, Mr. Gladstone; Answer, Mr. Disraeli
May 29, 1043

Question, Lord Claud John Hamilton; Answer, Mr. Gladstone
June 5, 1164

Committee June 5, 1185

Order for Committee read

Moved, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to provide in the said Bill, that the tenure of every office connected with the College of Maynooth be subject to like conditions with those to which official tenures connected with the Established Church in Ireland will be subject after the passing of this Act, and that no money shall be payable under the Act 8 and 9 Vic. c. 25, to the Trustees of the College of Maynooth for or for the use of any senior student or other student to be admitted after the passing of this Act" (Mr. Sinclair Aytoun), 1188

[cont.]

Established Church (Ireland) Bill—cont.

Amendt. to leave out from "Bill, that" and add "every person who shall be appointed to any office in the College of Maynooth, after the passing of this Act, shall hold the said office subject to the pleasure of Parliament" (Colonel Greville-Nugent); after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.;" A. 109, N. 185; M. 76

Question proposed, "That the words 'every person who shall be appointed to any office in the College of Maynooth, after the passing of this Act, shall hold the said office subject to the pleasure of Parliament,' be added," 1192

Amendt. proposed to the said proposed Amendt. by inserting after the word "Maynooth" the words, "And likewise every Presbyterian Minister hereafter to be appointed to receive a share of the Regium Donum" (Sir George Grey), 1197; Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to

Question, "That the words 'every person who shall be appointed to any office in the College of Maynooth, and likewise every Presbyterian Minister hereafter to be appointed to receive a share of the Regium Donum, after the passing of this Act, shall hold the said office subject to the pleasure of Parliament,' be added to the words 'Bill, that' in the original Question," put, and agreed to; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to

Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair"

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Mr. Newdegate); after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and agreed to; main Question put, and agreed to

Committee; Report June 5, 1911

Considered as amended June 12, 1899

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Mr. Gladstone) June 16, 1897; after short debate, Bill read 3^o

2. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 1^a" (The Earl of Clarendon) June 18, 1741; after short debate, Bill read 1^a (No. 157)

Notice of Motion, The Lord Chancellor June 18, 1749

Question, Lord Panrhyn; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury June 23, 1809

Petition of Clergymen of the Church of England presented, Lord Lyttelton June 23, 1917; short debate thereon

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Earl Granville) June 24, 2023

Amendt. to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months") (The Earl Grey); after long debate, Debate adjourned

EVERSLEY, Viscount

New Forest—Deer Removal, &c. Act, Motion for a Committee, 694

EWART, Weight
176,

EWING, Court
Land
cl. 1, Repres
add.
Repres
cl. 3,

EXCHEQUER
c. Presen
Read 2
Comm
Read 3
l. Read 1
Read 2
Read 3
Royal

EXCHEQUER
CH

EYKIN, Knight
1975

Eyre, J
Act of Kno.
Que
Add Jamaic
Stua
Spea
Jerv
there Lam
Mr.
Re-A Ans
June

Fairs B
(Mr. Dill)
o. Order
Read 2
Comm
Read 3
l. Read 1

FANE, C
Army
1970

FAWCETT
Agricul
Electio
Elect
2197
Elemen
Ireland
Public

FAWORTT, Mr. H.—cont.

Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 2, 1764; add. cl. 1777, 1790
Representation of the People (Scotland),
Consid. add. cl. 1445
Supply—Prosecutions, Amendt. 496, 499

Fenianism

Alleged Bribe to a Fenian, Question, Sir Frederick Heygate; Answer, The Earl of Mayo June 8, 1229
Clerkenwell Prison, The Attack on—The Convict Barrett, Question, Mr. Bright; Answer,
Mr. Gathorne Hardy May 25, 832

FERGUSON, Sir J. (Under Secretary of State for the Home Department),
Ayrshire

Land Writs Registration (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 1, 1528
Municipal Corporations (Metropolis), 2R. 1739
Petroleum, Comm. 1619
Representation of the People (Scotland),
Comm. cl. 3, 478, 482, 492; cl. 4, 856;
cl. 5, 857; cl. 8, 885; cl. 9, 979; cl. 10,
983; cl. 12, 1008; add. cl. 1243; Schedule A,
1251, 1252; Consid. add. cl. 1446
Supply—Government Prisons, 1106, 1107;
Report, 1176
Turnpike Trusts, 2R. 1722

Fine Arts Copyright Consolidation and Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Westbury)

1. Presented; read 1st June 12 (No. 145)

FLOYER, Mr. J., Dorsetshire

Local Charges on Real Property, Res. 154
Supply—Burlington House, 398
Government Prisons, 1105

FORDYCE, Mr. W. D., Aberdeenshire

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
466; cl. 12, 1007

Foreign Office Clerks acting as Agents

Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, Lord
Stanley June 15, 1562

Foreshore and Bed of the Sea—The Board of Trade

Observations, The Duke of Argyll; Reply,
The Duke of Richmond; short debate thereon
June 19, 1814

FORSTER, Mr. C., Walsall

Parliament—Public Petitions—Breach of Privilege, 1750

FORSTER, Mr. W. E., Bradford

Austria—Commercial Treaty with, 652, 653
Boundary, Comm. 278
Coolie Emigration, 2132
Elementary Education, 2R. 2010
Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 783
Jamaica—Established Church in, 1922, 1923
Libel, Comm. cl. 1, 606; cl. 3, 614, 616

VOL. CXCL. [THIRD SERIES.] [cont.]

FORSTER, Mr. W. E.—cont.

Parliament, Dissolution of, 1053, 1071
Public Schools, Re-comm. 1646; cl. 3, 1653,
1655 Scientific Instruction in Foreign Countries, 1560
Supply—Education, Public, 1150, 1161

FORTESCUE, Earl

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, 2R. 915
Friendly Societies, Comm. 507
Monetary Conference (Paris), Address for Papers, 107
Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 9, 1626; Report, 1744
Regulation of Railways, Report, cl. 14, 415
South Coast Railways, 2R. 1454
Vagrancy—Guildford Union—Motion for Correspondence, 101

FORTESCUE, Right Hon. Chichester S., Louth Co.

Lake Superior and the Pacific, &c., Motion for a Commission, 1347, 1349
Military at Elections, 2R. 1981, 1982
Registration, Leave, 1404
Representation of the People (Ireland), 1567;
Comm. 1575; cl. 3, 1588; cl. 2, Amendt.
1764; add. cl. 1768, 1771, 1789, 1790, 1804

FRENCH, Rt. Hon. Colonel F., Roscommon Co.

Army—Officers in command of Depôts, 1180
Ireland—Auditor of Grand Jury Accounts, 1469
Knights of Windsor, Motion for an Address, 1975
Parliament—Point of Order, 15
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
1580; cl. 18, 1590, 1597; add. cl. 1777, 1791
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 863, 874; cl. 10, 990
Sea Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 2019
Stone, Police Sergeant, Case of, 1483
Supply—Burlington House, 398
Parliament, Houses of, 300
Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland), 400

FRESHFIELD, Mr. C. K., Dover

County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), Comm.
166

Friendly Societies Bill [H.L.]

(The Earl of Lichfield)

1. Committee May 19, 506 (No. 48)
After short debate, Bill withdrawn

GALLWEY, Sir W. P., Thirsk

Metropolis—Park Lane, 2138

GALWAY, Viscount, Retford (East)

Boundary, Comm. cl. 4, 1435
Married Women's Property, 2R. 1373
Petroleum, Comm. 1619
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 18, 1589, 1591

"Garonne," Loss of the Question, Admiral Erskine; Answer, Mr. S.
Cave May 29, 1942

GLADI
Lan ci Nav
Par

GASLER, Mr. Serjeant S., Portsmouth

Boundaries of Boroughs, Comm. 439
Boundary, Comm. 275; Preamble, 1261
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 661; cl. 5, 2192,
2197
Libel, Comm. cl. 1, 608; cl. 3, 613
Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 14, 1938; cl. 16,
Amendt. 1939, 1941
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
add. cl. 1770, 1771
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 9, 974; cl. 10, 990; cl. 11, 1003; add. cl.
1247
Supply—Consular Establishments Abroad,
2172
Embassy Houses Abroad, 313
Foreign Office, New, 313
Prosecutions, 497; Motion for Adjournment, 501

Par
Pub
Pub
Reg
Reg
C
C
Reg d c i Sup

GLOU
Arr

GIBSON, Right Hon. T. M., Ashton-under-Lyne

Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market, 1177,
1178, 1179, 1180; Res. 1468, 1469
Parliament—Business of the House, 1759
Dissolution of, 1063
Publications, Registration of, 1512
Riots at Ashton, Staleybridge, &c. 825
Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. 1857, 1863
Weights and Measures (Metric System), 2R. 293

GODD
Me

GOLD
Bot
Ma Me
d
Pub
Reg
a
Sup

GILPIN, Mr. C., Northampton

Boundary, Comm. cl. 4, 1440
Eyre, Ex-Governor, Prosecution of, 887, 898
Postal—West India Mails, 815
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 5, 489

Tur

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E., Lonca-shire, S.

Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Committee, 429
Boundary, Comm. 248, 279, 284; Preamble, 1261
Colonial Bishops, 111
Courts of Justice, New, 370
Derby Day—Adjournment, 925
Diwaall's, Mr., Speech at Merchant Taylors'
Hall, 2158, 2161
East Worcestershire Election, 1110, 1112, 1118,
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 677; cl. 5, 2193
Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1330
Established Church (Ireland), Reply to Address, 114
Established Church (Ireland), Leave, 332, 347,
314, 315, 316, 317, 320; 1R. 323, 341, 511;
2R. 720, 741, 796, 1043, 1185; Comm.
1189, 1193, 1211; Consid. 1531
Ireland—Irish Church, The, 657
Ireland—Royal Residence in, Motion for an Address, 361

GOLD
Bot
Lib
Reg Sea

GOLD
Cou
Lib
Pos
Rep
cl Rep
cl Wel

GORD
?

GORE,
Burl

(cont.)

GORST, Mr. J. E., Cambridge Bo.

Boundary, Comm. Preamble, 1257, 1261
County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), Comm.
Amendt. 166
Nova Scotia—British North American Confederation, Motion for an Address, 1692
Petroleum, Comm. 1619
Registration of Voters, 1868, 1223
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
Schedule A, 1253, 1254
Weights and Measures (Metric System), 2R.
198

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J., London

Agriculture, Motion for a Committee, 586
Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1320; Nomination of
Committee, 1980
Parliament, Dissolution of, 1060
Public Schools, Re-comm. 1639; cl. 3, 1656;
cl. 14, 1934
Thames Embankment, &c. Amendment, 2R.
1214

Government of India Act Amendment Bill (Sir S. Northcote, Sir J. Fergusson)

c. Question, Sir Edward Colebrooke; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote June 15, 1567
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Sir Stafford Northcote) June 15, 1598; after short debate, Bill read 2^o [Bill 91]
Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr.
Speaker do now leave the Chair" June 22,
1870; after short debate, Committee—R.P.

Governor General of India Bill

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir James Fergusson)
c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Sir Stafford Northcote) June 15, 1601; after short debate, Bill read 2^a [Bill 92]

GOWER, Lord R. S. Leveson-, Sutherland- *shire

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 11, 994

GRAHAM, Mr. W., Glasgow

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 9, 956; Amendt. 959; cl. 6, 1010, 1231

GRANVILLE, Earl

Cotton Statistics, Comm. 918
County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), 2R.
1553
Education, Withdrawal of Bill, 407
Established Church (Ireland), 1920; 2R. 2023,
2056, 2072, 2117
Foreshore and Bed of the Sea, 1831
Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 22, 948; cl. 9, 1627
Regulation of Railways, Report, cl. 14, 416
Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy, Comm. 1554,
1555; Report, 1630; 3R. 1747

GRAVES, Mr. S. R., Liverpool

County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), Comm.
add. cl. 171
Electric Telegraphs, 654; 2R. 1314
Navy Estimates—Wages, 83

GRAVES, Mr. S. R.—cont.

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
add. cl. 1246
Sea Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 2018
Weights and Measures (Metric System), 2R.
179

GRAY, Sir J., Kilkenny Bo.

Ireland—Roman Catholic University, 1472, 1474 Representation of the People (Ireland), add. cl.
1803; Consid. 1897; add. cl. 1900
Supply—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, 2168
University of Glasgow, 402

GREENE, Mr. E., Bury St. Edmunds

Army—Malt Liquor for the Troops in India, 16
Coal Mines, 1081, 1082, 1083
Colliery Accidents, Motion for a Commission, 939
Elementary Education, 2R. 1991
Local Rating, Motion for a Committee, 1492
Mines, Accidents in, 1505

GREGORY, Mr. W. H., Galway Co.

Ireland—Railways, 1752
Peel Statue, The, Res. 2149
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
1577; cl. 18, Amendt. 1588, 1591; add. cl.
1775, 1796; Motion for Adjournment, 1902
Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. Amendt. 1866, 1869
Supply—Science and Art, 1164; Amendt. 1171

GRENFELL, Mr. H. R., Stoke-upon-Trent

Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions,
Res. 553
Eyre, Ex-Governor, 1850

GREVILLE-NUGENT, Colonel F. S., Long-
*ford Co.

Established Church (Ireland), Leave, 321;
Comm. Amendt. 1187, 1193; add. cl. 1211
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
1580; cl. 18, 1595; cl. 10, 1767
Supply—Foreign Office, New, Motion for Adjournment, 313

GREY, Earl

Army Chaplains, Comm. 1887
Established Church (Ireland), 1R. 1741; 2R.
Amendt. 2048, 2056, 2117
Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 22, Amendt. 948; cl. 9, 1625
Regulation of Railways, Comm. cl. 15, 9;
cl. 17, Amendt. 11; cl. 19, 13; Report,
cl. 14, Amendt. 414, 415; add. cl. 419
Sea Fisheries, Comm. cl. 5, 239
South Coast Railway, 2R. 1460

GREY, Right Hon. Sir G., Morpeth

Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Committee, 429
Boundary, Comm. 262, 283, 284
East Worcestershire Election, 1122, 1123
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 679, 682; cl. 5, 2187
Established Church (Ireland), Amendt. 1196

[cont.]

[cont.]

GRE HAM (INDEX)

192.

GRAY, Right hon. Sir G.—cont.

Ireland—Roman Catholic University, 714, 715
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 18, 1898
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 9, 973, 982
Stone, Police Sergeant, Case of, 1483

HA
G
L
P
B
S

GRIFFITH, Mr. C. Darby, Devizes

Abyssinia—Return of the Army, 1813
Boundary, Comm. 282, 286
Boundary Commissioners, Assistant, 1335
Burials (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 1332
Diplomatic Service, Res. 938
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1187
Ireland—Cardinal Cullen, 16, 17
Metropolis—Burlington House, 1184
Parliament—Business of the House, 1761
Forms of the House, 719; Res. 1077, 1078, 1079, 1080
Public Schools, Re-comm. 1648; cl. 8, 1654;
cl. 5, 1935; cl. 16, 1940
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
458; add. cl. 1248
Sea Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 2018
Serbia—National Assembly of, 2135
Suez, Quarantine at, 1334
Supply—Prosecutions, 501

HA
B
S

HA
M

HA

A
A
B
B

GROVE, Mr. T. F., Wiltshire, S.
Metropolitan Police, 1854

B

B

B

Co

De

Ec

El

GUINNESS, Sir A., Dublin City

Representation of the People (Ireland), Consid.
add. cl. 1901

• Es

GURNEY, Rt. Hon. Russell, Southampton

Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Committee, 430
Boundary, Comm. 271, 285; cl. 4, 1417, 1440;
add. cl. 1441; Schedule, 1443
Cattle—Importation of Foreign, 18

Ilk

Im

Inf

Jur

Kn

L

Loc

Ma

J

Ma

Me

Mir

Mir

Par

Reg

Reg

Reg

Rey

cl

cl

Rio

10

Rita

Stor

Sup

HADFIELD, Mr. G., Sheffield

Ireland—Regium Donum, 845
Supply—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, Amendt.
2166, 2168

HALIFAX, Viscount

Cotton Statistics, 2R. Amendt. 710

HAMILTON, Viscount, Donegal Co.

Metropolis—Park Lane Improvements, 244

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord C. (Vice Chamberlain of the Household), Tyrone Co.

Sea Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 2017

HAMILTON, Lord C. J., Londonderry City

Established Church (Ireland), 1184
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 18, 1898

C

I

I

I

Turn

HARDY, Mr. J., Dartmouth
 Ministerial Statement, 637
 Peel Statue, The, Res. 2149
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 874 ; cl. 9, 971

HARROWBY, Earl of
 Courts of Justice, New, 1844
 Poor Relief, 3R. add. cl. 1910, 1913
 Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 338

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of, Lancashire, N.
 Army—War Department, 1182

HARVEY, Mr. R. J. H., Thetford
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 866

HAY, Lord J., Ripon
 United States—Iron-clads, 655

HAY, Lord W. M., Taunton
 Government of India Act Amendment, Comm.
 1870, 1891 ; Amendt. 1892

HAY, Rear Admiral Sir J. C. D. (Lord of *the Admiralty), *Stamford
 Navy Estimates—Wages, 76, 85, 86, 90
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 11, 1005

HAYTER, Mr. A. D., Wells
 Army Reserve, Motion for a Commission, 1963
 Judicial Patronage, 343, 345
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 10, 1767
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 862 ; add. cl. 1245

HEADLAM, Right Hon. T. E., Newcastle- upon-Tyne
 Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
 Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 689
 Married Women's Property, 2R. 1358
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 3, 493

HEATHCOTE, Sir W., Oxford University
 Oxford and Cambridge Universities, 2R. 228

HENDERSON, Mr. J., Durham City
 Durham County Courts, 816

HENLEY, Lord, Northampton
 Registration Lists, 1477
 Supply—Education, Public, 1141
 Turnpike Trusts, 2R. 1720

HENLEY, Right Hon. J. W., Oxfordshire
 Burials (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 1382
 Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
 Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 692
 Elementary Education, 2R. 2008
 Libel, Comm. cl. 3, 616
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
 1572 ; add. cl. 1786
 Turnpike Trusts, 2R. 1726

HERBERT, Right Hon. Major General Percy E. (Treasurer of the Household), Shropshire, S.
 Army—Defective Ammunition, 654
 Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions, Res.
 555, 564
 Navy Estimates—Wages, 84, 86, 88

HERBERT, Mr. H. A., Kerry Co.
 Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions, Res.
 547

HEYGATE, Sir F. W., Londonderry Co.
 Coinage—Half-Crowns, 1849
 Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 753 ; 3R.
 1697
 Ireland—Bribe, Alleged, to a Fenian, 1229
 Party Processions Act, 814, 1229
 Ireland—Royal Residence in, Motion for an Address, 356
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
 1574 ; Consid. add. cl. 1903, 1907
 Supply—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, 2168

HIBBERT, Mr. J. T., Oldham
 Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Committee, 428
 Boundary, Comm. 258 ; cl. 4, Amendt. 1405, 1439
 Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
 Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 691, 2181
 Ministerial Statement, 639
 Parliament, Dissolution of, 1057
 Registration, 2R. 1615
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 18, 1594
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 3, 848
 Supply—Police Courts, 503
 Prosecutions, 500

HODGKINSON, Mr. G., Newark-upon-Trent
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 3, 847

HOGG, Colonel J. M., Bath
 Metropolis—Park Lane Improvements, 244
 Municipal Corporations (Metropolis), 2R. 1738

HOLLAND, Mr. E., Evesham
 Rule of the Road at Sea, 2136

HOPE, Mr. A. J. B. Beresford, Cambridge University
 Courts of Justice, New, 367
 Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
 Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 674
 India—Church Services, 1475
 Metropolis—Burlington House, 1183
 Peel Statue, The, Res. 2141
 Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 6, 1929 ; cl. 14,
 1935
 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
 467 ; cl. 7, 858 ; cl. 8, 860, 896 ; cl. 9, 964 ;
cl. 10, 1241
 Supply—Science and Art, 1163
 * Weights and Measures (Metric System), 2R.
 Amendt. 186

HOR IND { INDEX }

192.

HORSFALL, Mr. T. B., Liverpool	India—con
Boundary, Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1439	Bombay
Cattle, Admission of Foreign, 1758	Grant
County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), Comm. 170	May 1
Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1806	Bombay
Petroleum, Comm. 1619	the, Q
Railways, Royal Commission on, 116	Staffo
	Church
	Mr. B
	North East Is Quest
	North Faciliti
	Quest
	North
	Fort W
	Answer
	Postal
	Mr. T
	June
	disi 1
	Mr. 2
HORSMAN, Right Hon. E., Stroud
Boundary, Comm. 286
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 9, 973 ; cl. 11, 996
HOTHAM, Lord, Yorkshire, E.R.
Boundary, Comm. 277
HOUGHTON, Lord
Newfoundland — Grants of Land on French Coast, 696, 707
University Tests, 1016
HOWARD, Right Hon. Lord E. G. F., Arundel	Industri
Lottery Act, 387	men
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. 450 ; add. cl. 1250
Riots at Ashton, &c. 1086	l. Present
HOWES, Mr. E., Norfolk, E.	Industri
Boundary, Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1441
	l. Commi.
	Read 3 ^d
	Royal 4
HUBBARD, Mr. J. G., Buckingham	Industri
Elementary Education, 2R. 1994	Establi
Immoral Publications and Plays, 1658
Local Rating, Motion for a Committee, 1494
Oxford and Cambridge Universities, 2R. 230
Weights and Measures (Metric System), 2R. 201
Hudson Bay Company's Territories	Investm
Question, Sir Charles Lanyon ; Answer, Mr. Adderley May 11, 17	men
	(Mr
	c. Bill wit
HUNT, Right Hon. G. W., see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER	Investm
	Bill
	c. Order
HURST, Mr. R. H., Horsham	Ireland
Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 8, 1656	Alleged Fred
	May Arbour
	Polls
	May Cardin
	Ans
	May Currag
	Paok
	June
	Custom
	Depa
	awer,
	Custom
	Ans Unand Color
	June
India
Ancient Monuments, Question, Mr. Layard ; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote May 12, 114
Army—Transport of Troops to India, Question, Sir George Stueley ; Answer, Sir John Pakington June 4, 1111
Bombay Bank, Bengal Agency, Questions, Mr. Smollett, Mr. Dyce Nicol ; Answers, Sir Stafford Northcote June 12, 1471 Count.

Ireland—cont.

Mountjoy Convict Prison, Question, Mr. Pim; Answer, The Earl of Mayo June 12, 1470
Party Processions Act, Question, Sir Frederick Heygate; Answer, The Earl of Mayo May 25, 814; Question, Lord Edwin Hill-Trevor; Answer, Sir Frederick Heygate June 8, 1228
Pawnbroking, Law of, Question, Mr. Pim; Answer, The Earl of Mayo June 18, 1758
Post Office—Officers' Salaries, Question, General Dunne; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth June 15, 1582
Queenstown, Bible Dept at, Question, Mr. Long; Answer, The Earl of Mayo May 21, 655
Railways, Question, Mr. Monsell; Answer, Mr. Disraeli May 22, 712 — Report of the Commissioners on, Question, Mr. Gregory; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 18, 1752
Regium Donum, The, Question, Mr. Hadfield; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth May 15, 345
Religion of Convicts, Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, The Earl of Mayo May 18, 428
Roman Catholic University, Question, Sir Colman O'Loughlin; Answer, The Earl of Mayo May 12, 112; Question, Sir George Grey; Answer, The Earl of Mayo May 22, 714; Question, Mr. Murphy; Answer, The Earl of Mayo May 26, 955; Question, Sir John Gray; Answer, The Earl of Mayo June 12, 1472
Royal Residence in, Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 15, To leave out from "That" and add "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly representing to Her Majesty that it would conduce to the advantage of the Crown and the good Government of Ireland, and tend to allay jealousy and discontent in that country, if Her Majesty had a permanent residence in Ireland, and that this House, feeling deeply its importance, will cordially co-operate with Her Majesty in any steps She may be graciously pleased to take to carry out so desirable an object" (Sir Colman O'Loughlin), 856; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn University Education, Trinity College, Dublin, Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Mr. Disraeli May 29, 1041
University of Dublin, Returns, Question, Sir Henry Winston-Barron; Answer, Mr. Disraeli May 29, 1044
Tenure of Land, Question, Sir Colman O'Loughlin; Answer, The Earl of Mayo June 22, 1850
Valuation, Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 25, 2136

JACKSON, Mr. W., Derbyshire, N.
Colliery Accidents, Motion for a Commission, 941, 944

Jamaica, Ecclesiastical Establishment of Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, Mr. Adderley June 28, 1922

Jamaica—see Eyre

Japan, Outrage on our Ambassador Question, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Lord Stanley May 26, 922

JERVIS, Colonel H. J. W., Harwich
Army Reserve, Motion for a Commission, 1961, 1962
Eyre, Ex-Governor, Prosecution of, 717, 718, 838, 838

JERVOISE, Sir J. Clarke, Hampshire, S.
Cattle Plague, 1755, 1852
Egypt—Quarantine, 1895 Infectious Diseases, 425
Small-pox Hospital, 1561
Supply—Miscellaneous Expenses, Amendt. 1174

Judgments Extension Bill
 (Mr. Craufurd, Mr. Huddleston, Mr. Moncreiff, Mr. Dunlop)
 a. Nomination of Committee; Moved, "That Mr. Craufurd be one Member of the Select Committee on the Judgments Extension Bill" May 11, 92 Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Colonel French), put, and negatived; original Question put, and agreed to Moved, "That Mr. Huddleston be one other Member of the said Committee" Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Sir George Bowyer), put, and negatived; original Question put, and agreed to
 Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Moncreiff, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Lawson, Colonel French, Sir Charles Lanyon, Mr. Graves, and Mr. Murphy, nominated other Members of the said Committee
 Re-comm. " ; Report June 15 [Bill 163]
 Considered " June 16
 Read 3^o " June 17
 1. Read 1^o " (The Lord Chelmsford) June 18 (No. 160)

Judicial Patronage—Court of Common Pleas
 Question, Mr. Hayter; Answer, The Attorney General May 15, 843

Jurors' Affirmations (Scotland) Bill
 (Mr. Craufurd, Mr. Dunlop)
 a. Read 2^o " May 13 [Bill 110]
 Committee " ; Report May 15
 Read 3^o " May 18
 1. Read 1^o " (The Lord Cranworth) May 19
 Read 2^o " June 18 (No. 104)
 Committee " ; Report June 19
 Read 3^o " June 25
 Royal Assent June 25 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 39]

KARSLAKE, Mr. E. K., Colchester
Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 768
Married Women's Property, 2R. 1355
Nova Scotia—British North American Confederation, Motion for an Address, 1694
Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 3, 1654, 1657; cl. 5, 1924; cl. 6, 1930; cl. 14, Amendt. 1938, 1939; cl. 15, 1940
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 10, 990

KARSLAKE, Sir J. B., Attorney General,
The

KENDALL, Mr. N., Cornwall, E.

Ministerial Statement, 640

Registration, 2R. 1614

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 3, 477

KENNEDY, Mr. T., Louth Co.

Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
add. cl. 1804

KESTIVEN, Lord

Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 5, 947

KIMBERLEY, Earl of

Alkali Act Continuance, 2R. 510

Consecration of Churchyards Act Amendment,
Comm. cl. 1, 898

Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 2114, 2116,
2117

Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 5, 947; cl. 22, 948;
cl. 9, 1625; 3R. add. cl. 1912

Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy, 3R. 1748

Sea Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 940; Re-
comm, 917

University Tests, 1012

Vagrancy—Guildford Union, Motion for Correspondence, 102

KING, Hon. P. J. Locke, Surrey, E.

Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Committee, Amendt. 478, 480

KINGSCOTE, Colonel R. N. F., Gloucester-
shire, W.

Army—Militia Quartermasters, 1756

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., Perth

Diplomatic Service, Res. 939

Government of India Act Amendment, Comm.
1885

India—Church Services, 1474

Lake Superior and the Pacific, &c. Motion for a Commission, 1341

Mines, Accidents in, 1504

Public Schools, Re-comm. 1648

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 3, 484; add. cl. 1244; Schedule A, 1252

Supply—Law Charges, Motion for Adjournment, 494, 495

KNATCHBULL-HUGHSEN, Mr. E. H., Sand- wich

County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), Comm.
161; cl. 4, Amendt. 171

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 686; Amendt. 691, 692

Libel, Comm. cl. 3, 612

Turnpike Trusts, 956; 2R. 1699, 1728

KNIGHT, Mr. F. W., Worcestershire, W.

Turnpike Trusts, 2R. Amendt. 1717

KNIGHT,
Electio
Elec
Parlian
Repres
Amo

Knights Moved,
to E in th oblig of W Unit
Chap
that to di
State Knig atten
Chap
Knig
bers
Irela
1873 Amend
the U
(Mr.
tion,

be m
and
"Th
Main Q
M. 4

KNOX, C
Establis
Byre, E

KNOX, H
Army—Establis
248; 816, 3
1196, Byre, E
839 Military journ

LABOUR
Bounda
Diploma
Foreign Judicial Knights
Amoo
Metrop
Public 1656;
Registra
Stone, P
Supply—
Publi
Roya
Supply—
312, 3.

JAMES, Mr. S., Wick, &c.

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
471; cl. 8, 883; cl. 10, 984, 989; cl. 11,
Amendt. 992

Lake Superior and the Pacific, &c.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon the capability for settlement and the best means of settling Her Majesty's Territory lying between Lake Superior and the Pacific, especially as to the provision for Telegraphic and other Communication through Her Majesty's Dominions from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean" (Sir Harry Verney) June 9,
1866; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

AMOUR, Mr. J., Bute-shire

Eyre, Ex-Governor, Case of, 1334, 1335, 1361
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 10, 990

and Writs Registration (Scotland) Bill

*The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary G. Hardy,
Mr. Walpole*

Committee *; Report May 11 [Bills 56-111]
Re-comm.—R.F. June 12, 1825

and Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) Amendment Bill

Mr. Solator-Booth, Mr. Attorney General, Lord John Manners

Ordered; read 1^o June 17 [Bill 176]
Read 2^o June 22

ANSTON, Mr. W. H. P. Gore-, Somersetshire, W.

Supply—Houses of Parliament, 306

ANYON, Sir C., Belfast

Courts of Justice, New, 370
Hudson's Bay Company, 17

arson and Embezzlement Bill

(Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Coleridge)

Ordered; read 1^o June 8 [Bill 157]
Read 2^o June 24

atymmer's Charity, Edmonton

Question, Viscount Enfield; Answer, Lord
Robert Montagu May 28, 952

LAWRENCE, Mr. Alderman W., London

Courts of Justice, New, 287
Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1807
Local Rating, Motion for a Commission, 1494
Metropolis—Thames Embankment, 341
Stone, Police Sergeant, Case of, 1483
Supply—Public Buildings, 295
Royal Parks, 207
University of London Buildings, 305

VOL. XCII. [THIRD SERIES.]

LAWSON, Right Hon. J. A., Portarlington

Burials (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 1382
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 860
Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 738, 747, 748, 749
Libel, Comm. 602
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
1579; cl. 3, Amendt. 1581, 1584; cl. 13,
1588; cl. 20, Amendt. 1596; add. cl. 1808
Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. 1861

LAYARD, Mr. A. H., Southwark

Abyssinian Expedition, 716
The Despatches, 1564, 1565
African Slave Trade—The Aberdeen Act, 718
Courts of Justice, New, 2131
Disraeli's, Mr., Speech at Merchant Taylors'
Hall, 2155
Egypt—Law Courts, 1559
India—Ancient Monuments, 114
Patent Office, Library and Museum of the, 244
Peel Statue, The, 2144
Supply—Burlington House, 898
National Gallery Enlargement, 392
Palmerston Monument, 404
Parliament, Houses of, 303, 311
University of London Buildings, 305
Wellington Monument, 403

LEATHAM, Mr. W. H., Wakefield

Mines, Accidents in, 1508

Lectures on Religion

Question, Mr. Rearden; Answer, Mr. Gathorne
Hardy May 15, 346

LEEMAN, Mr. G., York City

Electric Telegraphs, 2R. Amendt. 1806, 1819, 1831, 1808
Registration, 2R. 1614

Lee River Conservancy Bill

(Mr. Stephen Cave, Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Hunt)

c. Report of Select Committee May 28 [No. 306]
Report * May 28 [Bills 98-144].
Re-comm. *; Report June 4
Considered * June 8
Read 3^o June 9
l. Read 1^o (The Duke of Richmond) June 10
Read 2^o June 19 (No. 140)

LEFVRE, Mr. G. J. Shaw, Reading

Foreign Cattle Market, 1395
Married Women's Property, 2R. 1355, 1374
Neutrality Commission, 1854
Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. 1860, 1867
Sea Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 2021
Supply—Education, Public, 1153

LEFROY, Mr. A., Dublin University

Burials (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 1391;
add. cl. 1383
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1208

LENNOX, Lord H. G. C. G. (Secretary to the Admiralty), Chichester

Navy Estimates—Wages, 79, 81

Lewis, Mr. Harvey, Marylebone

Boundary, Comm. 278

Metropolitan Police, 953, 1222

Municipal Corporations (Metropolis), 2R. 1737

Thames Embankment, &c. Amendment, 3R. 1214

Libel Bill (Sir Colman O'Loughlin, Mr. Baines)

c. Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (Sir Colman O'Loughlin) May 20, 592

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Mr. Newdegate); after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.;" A. 108, N. 38; M. 70; main Question agreed to; Committee—R.P., 604 [Bill 3]

Lichfield, Earl of

Friendly Societies, Comm. 507

Liddell, Hon. H. G., Northumberland, S.

Army Reserve, Motion for a Commission, 1969

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 691

Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1329

Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 755, 761

Local Charges on Real Property, Res. 147

Local Rating, Motion for a Commission, 1497

Public Schools, Re-comm. 1634; cl. 5, 1925; cl. 6, 1932

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 3, 437; cl. 9, 971, 972

Lifford, Viscount

Contagious Diseases Act, 324, 326, 330

Sea Fisheries, Comm. cl. 5, 238

Lindsay, Colonel R. J. Loyd, Berkshire

Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions, Res. 558

Ministerial Statement, 643

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 9, 970

Local Charges on Real Property

Moved, "That, inasmuch as the Local Charges on Real Property have of late years much increased and are annually increasing, it is neither just nor politic that all these burdens should be levied exclusively from this description of property" (Sir Massey Lopes) May 12, 136; after debate, Motion withdrawn

Local Government Supplemental (No. 2)

Bill (Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

c. Ordered; read 1st May 19 [Bill 120]Read 2nd May 21Committee^c; Report May 22Read 3rd May 25l. Read 1st (The Lord Clinton) May 26Read 2nd June 19Committee^c; Report June 23 (No. 119)Local Government Supplemental

Bill (Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Gathorne Hardy)

c. Ordered; read 1st May 18 [1]Read 2nd, and referred to a Select June 11Report^c June 25 [1]Local Government Supplemental

Bill (Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Gathorne Hardy)

c. Ordered; read 1st June 8 [1]Read 2nd June 11Committee^c; Report June 15Read 3rd June 19l. Read 1st (The Lord Clinton) JuneLocal Government Supplement

Bill (Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Gathorne Hardy)

c. Ordered; read 1st June 8 [1]Read 2nd June 11Committee^c; Report June 15Committee^c; Report June 18Considered^c June 18Read 3rd June 18l. Read 1st (The Lord Clinton) JuneLocal Government Supplement

Bill (Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Gathorne Hardy)

c. Ordered; read 1st June 15 [1]Read 2nd June 18Committee^c; Report June 22Read 3rd June 23l. Read 1st (The Lord Clinton) JuneLocal Officers' Superannuation

Bill

(Sir Colman O'Loughlin, Sir John Gray)

c. Ordered; read 1st May 25 [1]Local Rating

Amendt. on Committee of Supply J leave out from "That," and add Committee be appointed to consider incidence and principle of Local Rating and report thereon" (Mr. Corry) after short debate, Question, "words, &c.," put, and agreed to

Locke, Mr. J., Southwark

Colliery Prosecution, 1558

Customs Officers, 513

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 689

Municipal Corporations (Metropolis)

Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 6, 1934

Registration, 2R. 1612

Representation of the People (Scotland) cl. 12, 1007

Supply—Education, Public, 1155

Government Prisons, 1103

Parliament, Houses of, 310

Science and Art, 1170

LONDON, Bishop of

Army Chaplains, 2R. 1300 ; Comm. 1390
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, 2R. 910
Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 2122
Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 333
University Tests, 1025

LONG, Mr. R. P., Wiltshire, N.

Ireland—Bible Depôt at Queenstown, 655

LONGFORD, Earl of (Under Secretary of State for War)

Army Chaplains, 2R. 1298, 1300
Established Church (Ireland), 1918

LOPES, Sir M., Westbury

Local Charges on Real Property, Res. 136, 161
Local Rating, Motion for a Committee, 1495

LOPES, Mr. H. C., Launceston

Married Women's Property, 2R. Amendt. 1352

Lottery Act

Question, Lord Edward Howard ; Answer, The Attorney General ; short debate thereon May 15, 387

LOWE, Right Hon. R., Calne

Boundary, Comm. 282
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 2182
Married Women's Property, 2R. 1364
Parliament, Dissolution, The, 1129
Public Schools, Re-comm. 1642 ; cl. 2, 1650 ; cl. 3, Amendt. 1652, 1653 ; cl. 16, 1939 Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. O, 1242, 1243

LOWTHER, Mr. J., York City

Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 3, Amendt. 1651, 1653 ; Amendt. 1656 ; cl. 6, Amendt. 1926, 1929
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. cl. 18, 1595 ; add. cl. 1788
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 6, 857 ; cl. 8, Amendt. 858, 859, 860, 875, 879 ; cl. 9, 962

LOWTHER, Mr. W., Westmoreland

Diplomatic Service, Res. 931

Lunatic Asylums (Ireland) Bill

(The Earl of Mayo, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Ordered ; read 1^o June 22 [Bill 184]

LUSK, Mr. Alderman A., Finsbury

Alkali Act (1863) Amendment, 2R. 1297
Courts of Justice, New, 290
Diplomatic Service, Res. 939
Navy Estimates—Wages, Motion for Adjournment, 92
Supply—Chapter House, Westminster, 396
Common Law Courts (Ireland), 1103
County Courts, 502
Education, Public, 1155
Foreign Office, New, 313

LUSK, Mr. Alderman A.—cont.

Furniture, Public Departments, 295
Government Prisons, 1106
Land Registry Office, 1104
Learned Societies, Grants to, 1132
Metropolitan Police, 503
Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, 2170
Parliament, Houses of, 306
Petrie's, Dr., Antiquarian Collection, 1133
Prosecutions, 501
Public Buildings, 293, 294
Public Buildings (Ireland), 404
Public Offices Site, 392
Royal Parks, &c. 297, 299
Science and Art, 1167
Slaves, Bounties on, 2170
Superannuation, 1173
Supply—Cultivation of Flax (Ireland), Amendt. 1175
Miscellaneous Expenses, 1174 ; Report, Amendt. 1608

LYTTELTON, Lord

Established Church (Ireland), 1917, 1919, 1921
Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 9, 1627 ; Report, 1744 ; 3R. add. cl. 1912
Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 335
Schools, Public, Address for Papers, 1551

LYVEDEN, Lord

Abyssinia—Return of the Army, 1814
Nova Scotia, 1749

MACEVOR, Mr. E., Meath Co.

Ecclesiastical Titles, 1181 ; 2R. 1696, 1856 ; Withdrawal of Bill, 1982
Ireland—Irish Church, The, 657

McKENNA, Sir J. N., Youghal

Ecclesiastical Titles, 2R. 1697

MACKINNON, Captain L. B., Rye

Navy—F. G. Captains' Reserved List, 1222
"Glatton" and "Hotspur," 651
Iron-clad Fleet, 19

McLAGAN, Mr. P., Linlithgowshire

Agriculture, Motion for a Committee, 587
Petroleum, Comm. Amendt. 1619

McLAREN, Mr. D., Edinburgh

Court of Session (Scotland), 2R. 1521
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 676
Land Writs Registration (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1526 ; cl. 23, Amendt. 1528
Local Charges on Real Property, Res. 145
Lottery Act, 390
Post Office, Sunday Labour in, 2165
Registration of Voters Act, 385
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. cl. 18, 1591
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. 459 ; Amendt. 464, 472 ; cl. 3, 848 ; cl. 4, 853 ; Amendt. 855 ; cl. 8, 892 ; cl. 9, 978 ; cl. 10, 985, 990 ; cl. 11, 1004, 1005 ; cl. 25, Amendt. 1009 ; add. cl. 1235, 1236, 1237, 1238, 1247 ; Consid. add. cl. 1445, 1446
Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendt., 1803

[cont.]

[cont.]

McLAREN, Mr. D.—cont.	MARLI
Supply—Education, Public, 1148	t
Flax, Cultivation of (Ireland), 1175	Arm
Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, 2169	Artis
Public Buildings, 293	Cont
Supply—Register Office (Edinburgh), Res. 1176	Educ
Turnpike Trusts, 2R. 1725	Sale
	8F
	Soho
MAGUIRE, Mr. J. F., Cork City	Marri
Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1808	Quos
Ireland—Roman Catholic University, 715	M
New South Wales—Treason Felony Act, 1754
Riots at Ashton, Staleybridge, &c. 817, 819, 821, 825	Marri
	(Mr.
MALMESBURY, Earl of (Lord Privy Seal)	a. Mov
Abyssinian Expedition—Despatches, The, 693, 897, 1221	St
Return of the Army, 1811	Amer
Cotton Statistics, Comm. 918, 919	chi
Egyptian Slave Trade, 381	de
Established Church (Ireland), 1909; 2R. 2068, 2070, 2072	A.
Friendly Societies, Comm. 506	eq
Metropolis—New National Gallery, 94	Aj
Monetary Conference (Paris), Address for Papers, 110	Aj
Patent Office, Library and Museum of the, 244	Mair
Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 9, 1625	2 ^o
Representation of the People (Scotland), 2R. 1913	And,
Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 332, 339, 340	Li
Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy Act Amendment, Report, add. cl. 1630	MARSH
Schools, Public, Address for Papers, 1551	Publ
Sea Fisheries, Comm. cl. 5, 240, 242	cl.
Whitsuntide Recess—State of Public Affairs, 1025, 1034	MARTI
Windsor, Volunteer Review at, 1557	o
	Bour
	14
	Turn
MANNERS, Right Hon. Lord J. J. R. (Chief Commissioner of Works, &c.), Leicestershire, N.	MARTI
Courts of Justice, New, 571, 1051, 2131	Arm
East Worcestershire Election, 1115	11
Metropolis—Burlington House, 1183	Elec
Burlington House, The Colonnade, 1335	El
Park Lane, 2137, 2138	Regi
St. Mary Somerset Church, 2150
Thoroughfares, Obstruction of, 1043	Mauri
Peel Statue, The, Res. 2146	Quos
Supply—Burlington House, 399, 400	Ad
Chapter House, Westminster, 396	MAYO,
Embassy Houses Abroad, 312	C
Foreign Office, New, 313, 314	Bork
Furniture, Public Departments, 295	Curr
National Gallery Enlargement, 393, 395	Man
New Palace, Westminster, 397	Estal
Palmerston Monument, 403	Irela
Parliament, Houses of, 305, 309	B
Public Buildings, 292, 293, 294, 295	C
Public Offices Site, 391	C
Royal Parks, &c. 296, 298, 300	C
University of London Buildings, 395	G
Wellington Monument, 403	L
Wellington, Duke of, Monument to the, 518	M
	R

MAYE, Earl of—cont.

Pawnbroking, Law of, 1758
 Queenstown, Bible Depôt at, 656
 Roman Catholic University, 715, 1473, 1474
 Military at Elections (Ireland), 2R. Amendt.
 174, 175, 1981
 Registration, Leave, 1404
 Representation of the People (Ireland), 922 ;
 Comm. cl. 3, 1582 ; cl. 13, 1586, 1588 ;
 cl. 18, 1593, 1595 ; cl. 20, 1596 ; cl. 26,
 1597 ; cl. 2, 1764 ; cl. 10, Amendt. 1765 ;
 add. cl. 1768, 1769, 1770, 1774, 1784, 1790,
 1793 ; Consid. add. cl. 1899
 Sea Fisheries (Ireland), 287 ; 2R. 2019
 Supply—Common Law Courts (Ireland), 1103, 1104
 Flax, Cultivation of (Ireland), 1175
 Legal Charges (Ireland), 1104
 Petrie's, Dr., Antiquarian Collection, 1183

Medical Practitioners (Colonies) Bill [H.L.]

c. Read 1^o * May 19 [Bill 125]
 Read 2^o * May 21
 Committee * ; Report May 22
 Read 3^o * May 25
 l. Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 29]

MELLY, Mr. G., Stoke-upon-Trent

Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions,
 Res. 533
 Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
 Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 667
 Married Women's Property, 2R. 1360
 Registration, 2R. 1613

Merchant Shipping Acts

Question, Mr. O'Beirne ; Answer, Mr. Stephen
 Cave May 19, 513 ; Question, Mr. Candlish ;
 Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave June 22, 1852

Merchant Taylors' Hall—Mr. Disraeli's Speech at

Question, Mr. Grant Duff ; Answer, Mr.
 Disraeli ; debate thereon June 25, 2150

Metropolis

Burlington House, Observations, Mr. Beresford
 Hope ; Reply, Lord John Manners June 5, 1183 ; Question, Mr. Bentinck ; Answer,
 Lord John Manners June 9, 1335
Clerkenwell Explosion Compensations, Question, Mr. Neate ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 23, 1923
Iron Gates in Devonshire Place and Wimpole Street, Question, Mr. Goldney ; Answer, Mr.
 Tite May 14, 243
Main Drainage—Petition of Inhabitants of Barking, Question, Lord Eustace Cecil ;
 Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy May 28, 954 ;
 June 22, 1853
Obstruction of Thoroughfares, Question, Mr.
 Otway ; Answer, Lord John Manners May 29, 1042
Park Lane Improvements, Question, Viscount
 Hamilton ; Answer, Colonel Hogg May 14,
 244 ; Questions, Mr. Goddard, Sir William Gallwey ; Answers, Lord John Manners
 June 25, 2137
Peel Statue, The—See

Metropolis—cont.

St. Mary Somerset, Church of, Question, Mr.
 Bentinck ; Answer, Lord John Manners
 June 25, 2149
Thames Embankment—Life Chains, Question,
 Mr. Alderman Lawrence ; Answer, Mr. Tite
 May 15, 341

Metropolis Gas Bill Amended Title—(City of London) Gas Bill

(Mr. Morrison, Mr. Locke, Mr. Gorst)
 c. Report * May 13 [Bills 85-115]

Metropolis Local Management Acts
 Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(The Marquess Townshend)
 l. Presented ; read 1^a * June 22 (No. 169)

Metropolis Subways Bill

(The Lord Ebury)
 l. Committee * ; Report May 29 (No. 73)
 Read 3^a * June 8
 Royal Assent June 25 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 80]

Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market Bill (Lord Robert Montagu, Mr. Hunt)

c. Report of Select Committee May 28 [No. 303] Moved, "That it be referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills to inquire whether the Amendments which have been introduced in the Select Committee on the Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market Bill involve any infraction of the Standing Orders" (Mr. Milner Gibson) June 5, 1177 ; after short debate, Motion agreed to Moved, "That Memorials complaining of non-compliance with the Standing Orders be deposited in the Private Bill Office not later than Tuesday the 9th day of this instant June, and that the Examiner do give three clear days' notice of the sitting" (Mr. Milner Gibson), 1180 ; Motion withdrawn Standing Orders Committee ; Resolution reported, "That, in the case of the Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market Bill, the Standing Orders ought to be dispensed with :—That the Bill be permitted to proceed" June 12, 1468 ; Resolution read 2^o Moved, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution"
 Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add
 "the further consideration of the said Resolution be postponed till Monday next" (Mr.
 Milner Gibson) ; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn ; main Question put, and agreed to (See Cattle Plague)

Metropolitan Police

Question, Mr. Ayrton ; Answer, Mr. Gathorne
 Hardy May 26, 925 ; Questions, Mr. Harvey
 Lewis, Mr. Labouchere ; Answers, Mr. Ga-thorne Hardy May 28, 953 ; Question, Mr.
 Harvey Lewis ; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy June 8, 1222 ; Question, Mr. Grove ; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy June 22, 1854

Metropolitan Police—cont.

Stone, Case of Police Sergeant, Amendt. on Committee of Supply June 12, To leave out from "That," and add "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the causes of the dismissal of Police Sergeant Stone from the Metropolitan Police Force" (Mr. Labouchere), 1478; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Metropolitan Police Funds Bill

(Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir James Fergusson)

c. Ordered; read 1st May 21 [Bill 132]

Metropolitan Regulations Bill [M.L.]

(The Marquess Townshend)

l. Presented; read 1st June 15 (No. 149)

Metropolitan Roads Bill [M.L.]

(The Marquess Townshend)

l. Presented; read 1st June 15 (No. 150)
Bill withdrawn^e June 23

Military at Elections (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Serjeant Barry, Major Gavin, Mr. Esmonds)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2nd" (Mr. Serjeant Barry) May 12, 172

Amendt. to leave out "now" and add "upon this day six months" (The Earl of Mayo); Question, "That 'now,' &c."

Moved, "That the debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Bagwell); A. 37, N. 57; M. 20; Question again proposed, "That 'now,' &c."

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Sir Patrick O'Brien); Motion withdrawn; Question again proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" Debate adjourned [Bill 95]

Adjourned Debate June 23, 1880; after short debate, Debate further adjourned

Militiamen—Families of

Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach June 12, 1475

MILL, Mr. J. Stuart, Westminster

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, Amendt. 685, 691, 2180
Government of India Act Amendment, 2R. 1599; Comm. 1876

Local Charges on Real Property, Res. 152

Married Women's Property, 2R. 1370

Municipal Corporations (Metropolis), 2R. 1730

Publications, Registration of, 1814

Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 2, 1850; cl. 3, 1655; cl. 6, 1928, 1931

Registration, 2R. 1611

Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. cl. 18, 1592

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 9, 966, 979; cl. O, Amendt. 1241, 1242, 1243; Schedule A, 1252

Sea Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 2021

MILLER, Mr. W., Leith, &c.

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 10, 988

MILTON, Viscount, Yorkshire, W.R.
Lake Superior and the Pacific, &c., M
a Commission, 1348

Mines, Accidents in—Report of Committee (1867)

Observations, Mr. Bruce; Reply, Mr. Hardy; short debate thereon June (See Colliery Accidents)

Mines Assessment Bill

(Mr. Percy Wyndham, Mr. Cavendish Mr. Henderson)

c. Committee^e; Report May 20 [B

MINTO, Earl of

Salmon Fisheries (Scotland), Comm. 1916

Scotland—County and Burgh Police for a Committee, 1

MOFFATT, Mr. G., Southampton

Bankruptcy Act Amendment, 2R. 19
Post Office Service, 1476

MONCREIFF, Right Hon. J., Edinb

Court of Session (Scotland), 2R. 1511
Land Writs Registration (Scotland cl. 1, 1527

Ministerial Statement, 650

Representation of the People (Scott. Comm. 470; cl. 3, 482, 491, 841, cl. 4, 854, 855; cl. 5, 857; cl. 8, 889; cl. 9, 979, 981; cl. 10, 98, 1006; cl. 51, 1009; add. cl. 12, 1237, 1238, 1239; cl. E, 1240; cl. Schedule A, 1251; Consid. add. c

Monetary Conference (Paris)

Moved, "That an humble Address be to Her Majesty for, Proceedings at International Monetary Conference Paris, June 1867" (The Earl May 12, 107; after short debate agreed to

MONK, Mr. C. J., Gloucester

Boundaries of Boroughs, Comm. Am Boundary, Comm. 270

Election Petitions and Corrupt Pr Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 639

Revenue Officers Disabilities Rem 1352; Comm. 1533, 1538, 1555

Stone, Police Sergeant, Case of, 1471
Supply—Burlington House, 397

Prosecutions, 501

Turkey—New Embassy House, Ther

MONSELL, Right Hon. W., Limer

Burials (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, Am 1382, 1383; add. cl. 1384

Ireland—Railways, 712

Military at Elections (Ireland), 2R. 1

Representation of the People (Ireland cl. 26, 1597; add. cl. 1759, 1753 add. cl. 1801

MONTAGU, Right Hon. Lord R. (Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council for Education), Huntingdonshire

Cattle—Importation of Foreign, 18, 115, 424, 1758

Plague, 1755

Education, Revised Code, 952

Elementary Education, 2R. 1998

Latymer's Charity, Edmonton, 952

Metropolitan Foreign Cattle Market, 1178; Res. 1469

Scientific Instruction in Foreign Countries, 1560

Small Pox Hospital, 1561

Supply—Education, Public, 1134, 1139, 1156, 1160; Report, 1607

Science and Art, 1161, 1165, 1168, 1169, 1171, 1172

MONTGOMERY, Sir G. G. (Lord of the Treasury), Peeblesshire

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 10, 986

MORE, Mr. R. J., Shropshire, S.

Local Rating, Motion for a Committee, 1498

MORRIS, Mr. G., Galway Bo.

Ecclesiastical Titles, 2R. 1696

Ireland—Customs Department, Board of Trade, 426

Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. cl. 18, 1589, 1590, 1591, 1594; add. cl. 1778, 1782, 1789

Supply—Public Buildings (Ireland), 404

MORRISON, Mr. W., Plymouth

Boundary, Comm. 286

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 681, 682

Parliament—Business of the House, 1567, 1570

Postal—Cape Mail, 1180

Weights and Measures (Metric System), 2R. 203

MOWBRAY, Right Hon. J. R. (Judge Advocate General), Durham City

Public Schools, Re-comm. 1637

Municipal Corporations (Metropolis) Bill

(Mr. Mill, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Tomline, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Layard)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Mr. J. Stuart Mill) June 17, 1730

Amendt. to leave out "now" and add "upon this day three months" (Mr. Bentinck); Question, "That 'now,' &c.;" after short debate, Debate adjourned [Bill 105]

Municipal Elections (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

c. Ordered * June 16

Read 1^o * June 24

[Bill 189]

Municipal Rate (Edinburgh) Bill

(Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Baxter)

c. Read 2^o * June 10 [Bill 99]

Committee *; Report June 17

Read 3^o * June 18

l. Read 1^o * (The Lord Sundridge) June 19

Read 2^o * June 28 (No. 167)

Committee *; Report June 25

MURPHY, Mr. N. D., Cork City

Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 777

Ireland—Catholic University, 955

Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.

cl. 3, 1584; cl. 18, 1589, 1592; cl. 20, 1596;

Consid. add. cl. 1906

Music, Royal Academy of, Grant to the Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Mr. Disraeli June 18, 1753

National Gallery — Competition — See Courts of Justice, The New

Navy

F. G. Captains' Reserved List, Question, Captain Mackinnon; Answer, Mr. Corry June 8, 1222

"Glatton" and "Hotspur," Question, Captain Mackinnon; Answer, Mr. Corry May 21, 651

Greenwich Hospital, Observations, Mr. Baillie Cochrane May 22, 719; Observations, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Reply, Mr. Corry June 5, 1184; Question, Mr. Seely; Answer, Mr. Corry, 1185

Iron Clad Fleet, The, Observations, Captain Mackinnon; Reply, Mr. Corry May 11, 19

NEATE, Mr. C., Oxford City

Boundaries of Boroughs, Comm. 432

India—Fort William, Cholera at, 714

Libel, Comm. 596; cl. 1, 605, 606, 608

Local Charges on Real Property, Res. 149

Metropolis—Clerkenwell Explosion, 1923

Mines, Accidents in, 1504

Public Schools, Re-comm. Amendt. 1631, 1649;

cl. 2, Amendt. 1650; cl. 3, 1653; cl. 5, 1925;

cl. 6, Amendt. 1930, 1931; cl. 12, 1933

Representation of the People (Scotland), Consid. add. cl. 1444

NELSON, Earl

Army Chaplains, Comm. 1393

New Forest—Deer, &c. Removal Act, Motion for a Committee, 695

Neutrality Commission

Question, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre; Answer, Lord Stanley June 22, 1854

NEVILLE-GRENVILLE, Mr. R., Somersetshire, E.

Local Charges on Real Property, Res. 157

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.

cl. 8, 874, 875; add. cl. 1244

Supply—Prosecutions, 500

NEWCASTLE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.
Agriculture, Motion for a Committee, 538
Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Committee, 427, 434
Boundary, Comm. 268; Preamble, 1270; cl. 4, 1427
Burials (Ireland), Comm. 1380
Coal Mines, 1064
Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1808
Established Church (Ireland), Leave, 232, 315, 320, 321, 322; 1R. 323; Comm. 1192; Amendt. 1197, 1210, 1211; Consider. 1532 Libel, Comm. Amendt. 592, 593, 594; cl. 1, 606, 608; cl. 3, 617
Ministerial Statement, 633
Public Schools, Re-comm. 1633; cl. 2, 1653; cl. 5, Amendt. 1924, 1925; cl. 6, Amendt. 1926, 1927; cl. 14, 1937
Representation of the People (Ireland), Consider. add. cl. 1904
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 879; cl. 9, 963
Riots at Ashton, Staleybridge, &c. 819, 830; Explanation, 927
Supply—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, 2169
Transubstantiation, Declaration against, Motion for a Paper, 1101

New Forest—Deer Removal, &c. Act, 1851
Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Operation of the 14th and 15th Vict. Cap. 76., intituled "An Act to extinguish the right of the Crown to Deer in the New Forest, and to give Compensation in lieu thereof; and for other Purposes relating to the said Forest" (Viscount Eversley) May 22, 1894; after short debate, Motion agreed to; List of the Committee, 695

Newfoundland—Grants of Land on "The French Coast"
Petition presented (Lord Houghton); short debate thereon May 22, 1895

New Peers Introduced
Sir John Benn Walsh, Baronet, Baron Ormathwaite of Ormathwaite in the County of Cumberland May 15
William O'Neill, Clerk, Baron O'Neill of Shanes Castle in the County of Antrim June 16, 1891

New South Wales—Treason Felony Act
Question, Mr. Maguire; Answer, Mr. Adderley June 16, 1754

New Writs Issued
May 18—For Worcester County (Eastern Division), v. Hon. Frederick Henry William Gough Calthorpe, now Baron Calthorpe
May 26—For Dublin City, v. Sir Benjamin Lee Guinness, baronet, deceased
June 18—For Stamford, v. Viscount Lagestre, now Earl of Shrewsbury

New Zealand
(A)
a. Ordered Read 2^d
Committee Read 3^d
1. Read 1st

New Zealand
(A)
a. Ordered Read 2^d

NICOL, M
India—

NORTH, (
Army—54
Supp
Army R
Knights
1976 Supply—

NORTHCOT
tary shir Abyssin
17
Deap
Tele
Army—
15, 16
Boundar
1011 Election
Elect 2187
Electric
Governor
2R. 1
1891, Governor
India—Bomb Bomb Bomb
Chau
East
42
Fert
Relig
Municip
Public 1855, 1858;

NORWOOD, Mr. C. M., Kingston-upon-Hull
County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), Comm.
168, 169; cl. 4, 171
Electric Telegraphs, 2R. 1808

Nova Scotia—British North American Confederation

Moved, "That this House is informed, by a Petition presented on the 15th day of May last, signed by 86 out of 38 Members of the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia, and by 16 out of 19 Members elected by that Colony to the House of Commons at Ottawa, that great dissatisfaction prevails in Nova Scotia with the Act passed in the last Session of Parliament, intituled 'An Act for the Union of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick:' And that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to appoint a Commission or Commissioners to proceed to Nova Scotia for the purpose of examining into the causes of the alleged discontent, with a view to their consideration and removal" (Mr. Bright) June 16, 1858; after debate, Question put; A. 87, N. 188; M. 96
Petition, Postponement of Motion (Lord Campbell); short debate thereon June 18, 1749

O'BRIEN, Mr. J. L., Cashel
Army—Fortifications, 112, 118
Cattle, Importation of Foreign, 424
Merchant Shipping Acts, 513
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 3, 1585; cl. 18, 1591; Consid. 1893
Riots at Ashton, &c. 1096

O'BRIEN, Sir P., King's Co.
Military at Elections (Ireland), 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 175 Representation of the People (Ireland), Consid.
add. cl. 1904
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 3, 491
Supply—Royal Parks, &c. 297
Science and Art, 1166

O'CONOR DON, The, Roscommon Co.
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
add. cl. 1780

O'DONOGHUE, The, Tralee
Ecclesiastical Titles, 2R. 1697
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
add. cl. Motion for Adjournment, 1804, 1805 Valuation (Ireland), 2136

Ogilvy, Sir J., Dundee
Land Writs Registration (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 28, 1529
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 484; Consid. add. cl. 1446

O'LOGHLEN, Sir C. M., Clare Co.
Ireland—Catholic University, 112
Land, Tenure of, 1850
Ireland—Royal Residence in, Motion for an Address, 846, 858

O'LOGHLEN, Sir C. M.—cont.

Knights of Windsor, Motion for an Address, 1973, 1977
Libel, Comm. 592, 604; cl. 1, 605, 606; cl. 3, 610, 617
Marriage Law Commission, 1757
Representation of the People (Ireland), 922; add. cl. 1779, 1780; Consid. 1895; add. cl. 1903
Supply—Chapter House, Westminster, 396
County Courts, 502; Motion for Adjournment, 503, 504
New Palace, Westminster, 397
Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, 2167
Public Buildings, 292
Royal Parks, &c. 296; Motion for Adjournment, 311
Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland), 400
Ulster Canal, 404
University of Glasgow, Motion for Adjournment, 401
University of London Buildings, 396
Transubstantiation, Declaration against, Motion for a Paper, 1098, 1100, 1103

O'REILLY, Mr. M. W., Longford Co.

Army—Military Uniform, 712
Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions, Res. 540
India—Religious Worship, Facilities for, 1757
Public Accounts, Res. 181
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 18, 1595; add. cl. 1796

OSBORNE, Mr. R. B., Nottingham

Boundary, Comm. 276; Preamble, 1290; cl. 4, 1430, 1435, 1436
Ministerial Statement, 648
Peel Statue, The, Res. 2148
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
add. cl. 1795, 1796
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 9, 964; add. cl. 1803
Supply—Houses of Parliament, 301, 304, 305, 309; Amendt. 311, 312

OTWAY, Mr. A. J., Chatham

Abyssinia—Telegraphic Communication with, 718
Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions, Res. 562
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 2192
Metropolis—Obstruction of Thoroughfares, 1042
Music, Royal Academy of, 1753
Parliament—Business of the House, 1570
Dissolution of, 1064
Revenue Officers Disabilities Removal, 2R. 1352; Comm. 1537
Turkey—Embassy House, Constantinople, 1753

OVERSTONE, Lord

Courts of Justice, New, 1843
Metropolis—National Gallery, 95
Monetary Conference (Paris), Address for Papers, 109
Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 22, 949
Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 337, 340
Vagrancy—Guildford Union, Motion for Correspondence, 98

Oxford and Cambridge Universities Bill
(Mr. Coleridge, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Duff)

a. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d" (Mr. Coleridge) May 13, 209 Amendt. to leave out "now" and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Walpole); Question, "That 'now,' &c.;" after short debate, Debate adjourned [Bill 30]

OXFORD, Bishop of

Army Chaplains, Comm. 1388, 1393, 1467
Consecration of Churchyards Act Amendment, 2R. 507, 509; Comm. cl. 1, 898
Established Church (Ireland), 1921

PAGE, Mr. T. T., Leicestershire, S.
Turnpike Trusts, 2R. 1722

PAKINGTON, Right Hon. Sir J. S. (Secretary of State for War), Droitwich

Army—Brooke, Captain, Case of, 1855, 1856, 2131
Cavalry Uniforms, 1111
Defective Ammunition, 654
Depôts, Officers in Command of, 1160
Engineer Department, Clerks in the, 1125
Floating Obstruction Committee, 1222
Fortifications, 113
Gunnery Experiments, 1477
India, Transport of Troops to, 1111
Military Uniform, 712
Militia Quartermasters, 1395, 1756, 1757
Musketry Instructors, Payment of, 817
Non-purchase Corps, 1855
Rifled Ordnance—Studded Shot, 951
War Department, 1182; — Subordinate Officers in the, 950, 951
Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions, Res. 570
Army Reserve, &c. 512; Motion for a Commission, 1982, 1989
Ireland—Arbour Hill Garrison Chapel, 651
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. add. cl. 1249
Scotland—Militia, 17

PALK, Sir L., Devonshire, S.

Boundaries of Boroughs, Comm. 434
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 3, 490; cl. 8, 860, 878; Amendt. 894; add. cl. 1245
Riots at Ashton, Staleybridge, &c. 821

PALMER, Sir R., Richmond

Boundary, Comm. Preamble, 1282
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 2185
Victoria—Despatches from, 925

PARKER, Major Windsor, Suffolk, W.
Elementary Education, 2R. 1394

Parliam.
LORDS—

Constru
Selec
1867, range presen
in ref Earl agree Whitew
day, 6

COMMON

Progres
Answ
Busines
Answ
June

Orders
That
and presen proce being placir
the L.

Morning do m subje
May Resolu

Forms Griffin

Derby
(Mr.)

Dissolut
Forest
there

General
Answ

Judicial Quest
Gath

Point of Freno

Public l wer,

Privileg
of th
Charl Order, which Table

Rules of Suppl and a Memb
other
(Mr.)

the we withdi

Whitew
Answ
House

Patent
Mr.
May

Partition Bill [H.L.] (The Lord Chancellor)

c. Read 2^o * May 14 [Bill 107]
Committee^{*}; Report May 20
Considered * May 22
Read 3^o * May 25
Royal Assent June 25 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 40]

PATERN, Right Hon. Colonel J. W.
(Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), Lancashire, N.

Army Reserve, Motion for a Commission, 1960

PAULL, Mr. H., St. Ives

Boundary, Comm. Preamble, 1288, 1292
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 688, 2182, 2195
Parliament, Dissolution of, 1072
Riots at Ashton, Staleybridge, &c. 832

PEASE, Mr. J. W., Durham, S.

Boundary, Comm. 277, 284
Courts of Justice, Designs for the, 658
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 891
Supply—Courts of Justice, New, 291
Royal Parks, &c. 298

PEEL, Right Hon. Lieut.-Gen. J., Huntingdon

Army Reserve, Motion for a Commission, 1954
Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions,
Res. 548

PEEL, Mr. A. W., Warwick Bc.

Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Committee, 430
Boundary, Comm. cl. 4, 1436; Amendt. 1440

Peel Statue, The

Amendt. on Committee of Supply June 25,
To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the Peel Statue ought to be removed from its present site in New Palace Yard" (Lord Elcho), 2138; after short debate, Question, "That the words &c.;" A. 71, N. 182; M. 111;
words added; main Question, as amended,
put, and agreed to

PENRHYN, Lord

Established Church (Ireland), 1909

Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders Confirmation Bill (The Lord Clinton)

l. Read 3^o * May 11 (No. 64)
Royal Assent May 29

Petit Juries (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, The Earl of Mayo)

c. Read 2^o *, and referred to a Select Committee
May 28 [Bill 70]
Committee nominated; List of the Committee
June 23, 1867

Petroleum Act Amendment (re-committed)

III

(Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

c. Committee^{*}; Report May 28 [Bills 93-141]
Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr.
Speaker do now leave the Chair" June 15,
1818

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add
"the Bill be committed to a Select Committee" (Mr. M'Lagan); after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," agreed to;
main Question agreed to

Re-comm.; Report [Bill 171]

Considered * June 22

Read 3^o * June 25

Petty Sessions and Lock-up Houses, &c.

Bill (Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

l. Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 22]

Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation, &c. Bill

(Mr. Stephen Cave, Mr. Selater-Booth)

c. Resolution in Committee; Bill ordered * May 18

Read 1^o * May 18 [Bill 118]

Read 2^o * May 21

Committee^{*}; Report May 22

Read 3^o * May 25

l. Read 1^o * (The Duke of Richmond) May 26

Read 2^o * June 8 (No. 120)

Committee^{*}; Report June 22

Read 3^o * June 23

Royal Assent June 25 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 46]

Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation

(No. 2) Bill (Mr. Dodson, Mr. Stephen

Cave, Mr. Selater-Booth)

c. Resolution in Committee; Resolution reported;

Bill ordered; read 1^o * May 29 [Bill 148]

Read 2^o * June 4

Committee^{*}; Report June 8

Read 3^o * June 9

l. Read 1^o * (The Duke of Richmond) June 11

Read 2^o * June 12 (No. 139)

Committee^{*}; Report June 19

Read 3^o * June 23

Royal Assent June 25 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 47]

PIM, Mr. J., Dublin City

Ireland—Mountjoy Convict Prison, 1470

Pawnbroking, Law of, 1758

Ireland—Royal Residence in, Motion for an Address, 361

Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.

1537; cl. 18, 1590, 1595; cl. 10, 1765;

add. cl. 1784; Consid. add. cl. 1901, 1907

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
469; cl. 10, 990

POLLARD-URQUHART, Mr. W., Westmeath Co.

Ireland—Arbour Hill Garrison Chapel, 661

Married Women's Property, 2R. 1360

Public Accounts, Res. 123

Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 14, 1938

Weights and Measures (Metric System), 28-195

Poor Law

Law for Relief of the Poor, Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to request that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the Operation and Administration of the Laws for the Relief of the Poor in England and Wales" (The Marquess Townshend) June 12, 1462; after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Poor Relief Assessment Returns, Question, Mr. Candlish; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach June 12, 1470

Scotland, Question, Sir Andrew Agnew; Answer, The Lord Advocate June 16, 1631

Vagrants—The Guildford Union, Moved, "That there be laid before this House, Copy of Correspondence which has recently passed between the Poor Law Board and the Guildford Board of Guardians in reference to the relief of Vagrants" (The Earl of Carnarvon) May 12, 95; after short debate, Motion amended, and agreed to

Ordered, "That there be laid before this House, Copy of Correspondence which has recently taken place with the Poor Law Board in reference to the Relief of Vagrants in the Guildford Union" (The Earl of Carnarvon)

Post Office

London

Answer

Money

Mr.

June

Penang

Mr.

June

Postal

Mr.

May

Post Office

tion,

Boot

Sunday

M'La

2161

United

Mr.

June

West

Queer

Booth

POTTER,
Elemen
Supply-

Poor Law and Medical Inspectors (Ireland) Bill (The Earl of Mayo, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Ordered * June 10

Read 1^o June 22

[Bill 189]

POTTER,
Diplom
Represent
cl. 9.

Poor Relief Bill [H.L.] (The Earl of Devon)

a. Report of Select Committee May 22

Committee May 28, 946 (No. 111)

Committee June 16, 1621 (No. 132)

Report June 18, 1743 (No. 156)

Read 3^o June 23, 1910 (No. 162)

c. Read 1^o June 23 [Bill 186]

POWELL,

Illinois

Colliery

944

Oxford

Public

cl. 16

Represe

cl. 3.

Supply-

At

Publ

Scien

PORTMAN, Lord

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, 2R. 907, 911; Motion for a Committee, 916; Explanation, 946

Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 9, Amendt. 1621, 1627

POWIS, E
Cotton

Post Office

American Mail Subsidies, Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth May 5, 342

Annual Reports, Questions, Mr. Moffatt, Mr. Crawford; Answers, Mr. Solater-Booth June 12, 1476

Australia—Postal Communication with, Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth June 12, 1472

Cape Mail Contract, Question, Mr. Candlish; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth May 26, 923; Question, Mr. Morrison; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth June 5, 1180

East Indies, Postal Communication with the—The Brindisi Route, Question, Mr. Goldsmid; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth June 15, 1561

Electric Telegraphs, Question, Mr. Ayrton; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave June 15, 1564

PRICE, M
Boundar

Prisons

Amc

(Sir J

c. Ordered

Read 2^o

June

Probate

(Mr. Hem

c. Ordered

Read 2^o

[cont.]

Promissory Oaths Bill [H.L.]

c. Read 1° * May 12 [Bill 113]
Read 2° * May 29

Public Accounts

Moved, "That those who conduct the audit of Public Accounts on behalf of the House of Commons ought to be independent of the Executive Government and directly responsible to this House; and that, inasmuch as the appointment, salaries, and pensions of the officers entrusted with the conduct of such audit are more or less under the control of the Treasury, the present system is one which imperatively calls for revision" (Mr. Dillwyn) May 12, 116; after debate, Motion withdrawn

Publications, Registration of

Observations, Mr. Ayrton; Reply, The Attorney General; short debate thereon June 12, 1509

Publications—Sale of Illegal Publications

Question, Mr. Percy Wyndham; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy May 19, 512 Immoral Publications and Plays, Question, Mr. Hubbard; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy June 15, 1558

Public Schools

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of any Petitions or Memorials on the Subject of Public Schools which have been received by Her Majesty's Government since the 1st of July, 1866" (The Earl Stanhope) June 15, 1538; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Public Schools (re-committed) Bill

(Mr. Walpole, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

c. Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" June 16, 1631

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "the Bill be referred back to the Select Committee, in order that Clauses may be inserted in it giving power to the new governing bodies and the Commissioners to be appointed by the Bill to deal with the constitution and revenues of Eton and Winchester Colleges" (Mr. Neate); Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn; main Question put, and agreed to; Committee—R.P. [Bill 185]

Committee—R.P. June 23, 1924

PUGH, Mr. D., Carmarthenshire
Registration, 2R. 1611

Queen Anne's Bounty Board

Select Committee appointed "to inquire into the management and constitution of Queen Anne's Bounty Board" (Mr. Bouverie) May 19, 591; List of the Committee

Queensland—Polynesian Labourers

Question, Mr. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Adderley May 25, 816

Railway Companies (Ireland) Advances Bill

(Mr. Selater-Booth,
Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

c. Ordered; read 1° * June 17 [Bill 177]
Read 2° * June 25

Railways and Joint Stock Companies Accounts Bill

(Sir William Hutt, Mr. Ellice)

c. Bill withdrawn * June 24 [Bill 58]

Railways (Guards' and Passengers' Communication) Bill

(Mr. Henry B. Sheridan, Sir Patrick O'Brien)

c. Read 2° * May 20 [Bill 66]
Bill withdrawn * June 17

Railways (Ireland) Acts Amendment Bill

(Mr. Serjeant Barry, Mr. Sullivan)

c. Ordered; read 1° * May 18 [Bill 123]
Read 2° * June 23
Committee *; Report June 24
Read 3° * June 25

Railways, Royal Commission on—Report of

Question, Mr. Horsfall; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave May 12, 115
(See Ireland)

RAMSAY, Mr. J., Stirling, &c.
Elementary Education, 2R. 2011

RAVENSWORTH, Lord

Capital Punishment within Prisons, 3R.
add. cl. 14

RAWLINSON, Sir H. C., Frome

Government of India Act Amendment, Comm. 1878; cl. 1, 1889
Russia and Bokhara, 955

READ, Mr. C. S., Norfolk, E.

Agriculture, Motion for a Committee, 584
Turnpike Trusts, 2R. 1726

REARDEN, Mr. D. J., Athlone

Canada—Alleged Flogging in a Prison, 1698, 1699
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1203, 1204
Her Majesty The Queen, Notice, 711
Lectures on Religion, 346
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. Amendt. 1571, 1572; cl. 4, Amendt. 1585; cl. 7, Amendt. 1586; add. cl. 1778; Consid. add. cl. 1898
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. 472, 473

REDESDALE, Lord (Chairman of Committees)

Army Chaplains, Comm. 1393
 Consecration of Churchyards Act Amendment, 2R. 508; Comm. cl. 1, 898
 Courts of Justice, New, 1842
 Education, Withdrawal of Bill, 411
 Established Church (Ireland), 1919
 Poor Relief, Comm. 946; Report, 1744
 Regulation of Railways, 13; Report, cl. 14, 416; add. cl. 419, 421; 3R. Amendt. 707, 708
 Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy, Comm. 1556; Report, add. cl. 1629, 1630; 3R. add. cl. 1744, 1745, 1746, 1748
 South Coast Railway, 2R. 1457
 Vagrancy—Guildford Union, Motion for Correspondence, 99

Reformatory Schools (Ireland) Bill

(The Earl of Mayo, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Committee^a; Report May 21 [(Bill 65)]
 Considered^a May 22
 Read 3^o May 25
 l. Read 1^o (The Earl of Devon) May 26 (No. 122)

Registration Bill

(Mr. Secretary G. Hardy, Sir James Fergusson)

- c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) June 11, 1898
 After debate, Bill ordered; read 1^o [Bill 167]
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) June 15, 1899; after short debate, Bill read 2^o, and committed to a Select Committee
 And, on June 23, Select Committee nominated; List of the Committee, 1616
 Report June 25 [Bill 190]

Registration of Writs (Scotland) Bill

[H.L.] (The Lord Colonsay)

- c. Committee^a; Report May 18 [Bill 62]
 Considered^a May 28
 Read 3^o May 29
 Royal Assent June 25 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 34]

Regulation of Railways Bill

(The Duke of Richmond)

- l. Committee (on re-comm.) May 11, 6 (No. 88)
 Report May 18, 412 (No. 95)
 Read 3^o May 22, 707; after short debate, Bill passed (No. 101)
 c. Read 1^o May 28 [Bill 142]
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Mr. Stephen Cave) June 8, 1894; after short debate, Bill read 2^o

Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites) Bill

(The Lord Cranworth)

- l. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (The Lord Cranworth) May 14, 283; after short debate, Bill read 2^o (No. 77)
 Committee^a; Report May 26
 Re-comm. June 18, 1741 (No. 128)
 Report^a June 19 (No. 161)
 Read 3^o June 25
 Royal Assent July 18 [31 & 32 Vict. c. 44]

Renewal land

(A

c. Commit
Re-comm

Represent

Compou

H. B.

Beac

Bounda

postp

After

Com

Boun

laid and t

be n

430;

Moved

Com

they prese

the 1

tions

Barn

lative

Nort

refer

Nort

Moti

Report

Mr. 1

Bounda

Mr. f

1181

Amend

Wald

June

Assista

Mr.

Hard

Registr

liame

The

May

Registr

Gors

Registr

Morn

Han

1228

Registr

Anw

Represent

Attor

c. Questio

The 1

Order f

Speak

1571

Commit

Commit

Bill r

Conside

Band 1

Representation of the People (Scotland)—
Poor Rate

Moved, "That there be laid before this House, Copy of any Letter or Instructions addressed by the Crown Agent to the Inspectors of Poor in reference to a Return made to an Order of this House, dated 27th March, showing the Deductions allowed to Occupiers before assessing for Poor Rate in various Scotch Parishes, and the Amount of gross Rental required to give a rateable Value of £12 in those Parishes respectively" (The Earl of Airlie) May 26, 919; Motion agreed to

Representation of the People (Scotland)
Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson)

c. Questions, Sir Andrew Agnew, Mr. Moncreiff; Answers, Mr. Disraeli May 11, 18; Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Mr. Disraeli May 15, 346

Order for Committee read May 18, 435

Moved, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee that, instead of adding to the numbers of the House, they have power to disfranchise Boroughs in England having, by the Census returns of 1861, less than 5,000 inhabitants" (Mr. Baxter)

Amendt. to leave out from "Power," and add "to take one seat from Boroughs in England returning two Members, and having, by the Census returns of 1861, less than 12,000 inhabitants" (Sir Rainald Knightley); after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.;" A. 217, N. 196; M. 21; Division List, Ayes and Noes, 461

Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair"

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "no arrangement respecting additional Members can be just or satisfactory which does not treat Scotland, as respects the number of its representatives in Parliament, as an integral portion of the United Kingdom, entitled to be placed on a footing of perfect equality with England and Ireland, in proportion to its present population and the Revenue which it yields to the National Exchequer, as compared with the present population and Revenue of England and Ireland; and that to establish this equality at least fifteen additional Members should now be provided for Scotland" (Mr. McLaren), 466; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Motion withdrawn; main Question agreed to

Bill considered in Committee, 473; after long debate—R.P. [Bill 29]

Question, Mr. Dalglish; Answer, Mr. Disraeli May 19, 513

Ministerial Statement (Mr. Disraeli) May 21, 619

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Percy Wyndham); after long debate, Motion withdrawn

After long debate, Committee R.P. May 25, 840

Questions, Mr. Yorke, Mr. Gladstone; Answers, Mr. Disraeli May 28, 954

Committee May 28, 956; after long debate—R.P.

Committee June 8, 1231; after long debate, Bill reported [Bill 154]

[cont.]

Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill—
cont.

c. Considered June 11, 1444

Considered * June 18

Read 3^o * June 18 [Bill 166]

l. Read 1^a * (The Lord Privy Seal) June 19

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a" (The Lord Privy Seal) June 23, 1913; after short debate, Bill read 2^a (No. 164)

Revenue Officers Disabilities Removal
Bill (Mr. Monk, Sir H. Verney, Mr. Otway)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Mr. Monk) June 10, 1352; after short debate, Bill read 2^o [Bill 76]

Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (Mr. Monk) June 12, 1533

After short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Sclater-Booth); A. 36, N. 52; M. 16

Question again proposed

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Lord Edwin Hill-Trevor); Question negatived

Question again proposed

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Powell); A. 33; N. 42; M. 9; Main Question negatived

Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Mr. Disraeli June 15, 1565

RICHMOND, Duke of (President of the Board of Trade)

Alkali Act Continuance, 2R. 509, 510

Capital Punishment within Prisons, 3R. add. cl. 14

Cotton Statistics, 2R. 710

Foreshore and Bed of the Sea, 1823, 1824, 1830

Regulation of Railways, Comm. cl. 14, 8; cl. 15, 9; cl. 16, 10, 11; cl. 17, 12; cl. 23, 13; Report, cl. 14, 412, 414, 416; cl. 15, Amendt. 418; add. cl. 420, 422; 3R. 709

Salmon Fisheries (Scotland), 2R. 1628; Comm. 1916

Sea Fisheries, Comm. cl. 5, 237, 238, 239

Sea Fisheries (Ireland), Re-comm. 916, 917

South Coast Railways, 2R. 1452

Riots at Ashton, Staleybridge, Birmingham, &c.

Question, Mr. Maguire; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy May 25, 817; Personal Explanation, Mr. Newdegate May 26, 927; Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy May 29, 1042; Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy; debate thereon May 29, 1085

ROBERTSON, Mr. P. F., Hastings

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. 471

ROEBUCK, Mr. J. A., Sheffield

Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Committee, 429, 432, 434

Boundary, Comm. 271, 284

Libel, Comm. 593, 594; cl. 1, 605, 606, cl. 2, 617

BOWLEY, Lord

Foreshore and Bed of the Sea, 1829
Regulation of Railways, Comm. cl. 5, 8
Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites), 2R. 284;
Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 1741

BOYSE, Right Hon. Viscount (Comptroller of the Household), Cambridge-shire

Established Church (Ireland)—Reply to Address, 118

Rule of the Road at Sea

Question, Mr. Holland; Answer, Mr. Stephen Gave June 25, 2185

RUSSELL, Earl

Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 2070, 2105
Whitsuntide Recess—State of Public Affairs, 1026, 1032, 1034

RUSSELL, Colonel Sir C., Berkshire

Commissionaires, Corps of, 246
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. cl. 3, 458

Russia and Bokhara

Question, Sir Henry Rawlinson; Answer, Lord Stanley May 28, 255

RUTLAND, Duke of

Metropolis—New National Gallery, 98

ST. ALBANS, Duke of

Egyptian Slave Trade, 330

Sale of Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. O'Reilly, Lord Oremore, Mr. Pim)

c. Report of Select Committee May 26
(No. 280)

Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy Act Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(The Earl Granville)

1. Presented; read 1st May 19 (No. 108)
Read 2nd May 28
Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee" (Earl Granville) June 15, 1554; after short debate, Committee
Report June 16, 1629 (No. 148)
Read 3rd June 18, 1744
c. Read 1st June 22 [Bill 161]

SALISBURY, Marquess of

Cotton Statistics, 2R. 709, 710; Comm. 918
Courts of Justice, New, 1834, 1847
Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 22, 948
Regulation of Railways, Comm. cl. 5, Amendt. 6, 8; cl. 15, 9, 10; Report, cl. 14, 412; add. cl. 420; 3R. 707
Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 324
Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy Act Amendment, Report, add. cl. 1630; 3R. 1745, 1748

Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Bill
(The Duke of Richmond)

1. Presented; read 1st June 11 (C)
Moved, "That the Bill be now read" (Duke of Richmond) June 16, 1 short debate, Bill read 2nd Committee June 23, 1915 (C)

SANUDA, Mr. J. D'A., Tavistock
Navy—Iron-clad Fleet, 26

SAMUELSON, Mr. B., Banbury

Elementary Education, 2R. 1992
Scientific Instruction in Foreign 1561

SANDFORD, Mr. G. M. W., Malden

Election Petitions and Corrupt Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 2174
Libel, Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 604
Parliament—General Election, 924
Representation of the People (Ireland) 1572
Representation of the People Comm. cl. 8, 667

Sat First

June 8—The Lord Oathorne, after of his Father
June 22—The Earl of Craven, after of his Father
June 25—The Earl of Shrewsbury Death of his Father

SCHREIBER, Mr. C., Cheltenham

Corrupt Practices at Elections, 1044
Ecclesiastical Titles, 1181; 2R. 166
Election Petitions and Corrupt Elections, Comm. cl. 1, 659, 1
Motion for Adjournment, 691
Representation of the People Comm. 469; cl. 9, 963

SOLATER-BOTH, Mr. G. (Secretary Treasury), Hampshire, N.

Army—Superannuation Allowances, Australia—Postal Communication, 1
Commissionaires, Corps of, 246
Courts of Justice, New, 1397, 1563.
Customs Officers, 513, 2135; — Ex 713

Durham County Courts, 816
Electric Telegraphs, 1631
India—Customs Department, Boon 426

Postal Communication with Per Ireland—Questions, &c.

Customs Officers, 247
Post Office, 1562
Regium Donum, 245
Local Charges on Real Property, Re Money Orders and Stamped Receipts
Postal—Questions, &c.

American Mails, 342
Brindisi Route, 1561
Cape Mail, 925, 1190
London Letter Carriers, 1853
West India Mails, 513

SOLATER-BOOTH Mr. G.—cont.

Postal Service, 817, 1476
Post Office, Sunday Labour in the, 2166
Revenue Officers Disabilities Removal, Comm.
Motion for Adjournment, 1536
Slave Bounties, 1131
Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 1010
Convict Establishments (Colonies), 504
County Courts, 502
Embassy Houses Abroad, 312
Government Prisons, 1107
Land Registry Office, 1105
Learned Societies, Grants to, 1132, 1133
Miscellaneous Expenses, 1174; Report, 1609
National Gallery, 1172
Prosecutions, 497, 501
Public Buildings (Ireland), 404
Registry House, Edinburgh, Report, 1176
Sheriff Court Houses (Scotland), 400
Slaves, Bounties on, 2170
Ulster Canal, 404
University of Glasgow, 401
Turkey—Embassy House, Constantinople, 1753
Embassy House, Therapia, 1752
United States—Postal Convention, 2132

Scotland

Judicial System—Royal Commission, Question,
Mr. Baxter; Answer, The Lord Advocate
June 25, 2137
Legislation for—Progress of Scotch Bills, Question, Sir Robert Anstruther; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 14, 245
Militia, Question, Sir Robert Anstruther;
Answer, Sir John Pakington May 11, 17
Poor Law, Question, Sir Andrew Agnew;
Answer, The Lord Advocate June 16, 1631

SCOTT, Lord H. J. M. D., Selkirkshire
Representation of the People (Scotland),
Comm. cl. 10, 986; cl. 11, 1004

SCOURFIELD, Mr. J. H., Haverfordwest
Local Charges on Real Property, Res. 160
Ministerial Statement, 650
Supply—Education, Public, 1147
Science and Art, 1167
Turnpike Trusts, 2R. 1722

Sea Fisheries Bill [H.L.]

(The Duke of Richmond)

- l. Committee*; Report May 11 (No. 46)
Committee (on re-comm.) May 14, 237—R.P.
(No. 96)
Committee (on re-comm.) May 26, 916
Report* May 29 (No. 125)
Read 3* June 11
- c. Lords Amendts. June 22, 1857 [Bill 170]

Sea Fisheries (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Blake, Colonel Annesley, Lord Claud John Hamilton, Mr. Kavanagh)

- c. Question, General Dunne; Answer, The Earl of Mayo May 14, 287
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2°" (*Mr.
Blake*) June 24, 2012; after short debate,
Bill read 2° [Bill 101]

VOL. CXII. [THIRD SERIES.]

SEELY, Mr. C., Lincoln
Navy—Greenwich Hospital, 1185

SELWIN-IBBETSON, Mr. H. J., Essex, S.
Boundary, Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1441

Servia, National Assembly of Question, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, Lord
Stanley June 25, 2135

SEYMOUR, Mr. A., Totnes
Supply—Science and Art, 1167

SHAPTESBURY, Earl of Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, 2R. 907
Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 22, 948; cl. 9, 1625, 1626
Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 332, 333

SHERIDAN, Mr. H. B., Dudley
Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Committee, 428
Compound Householder, The, 245
Customs' Extra Clerks, 718
Sierra Leone—Assistant Judge of, 656, 657

Sierra Leone, Assistant Judge of Question, Mr. H. B. Sheridan; Answer, Mr.
Adderley May 21, 656

SIMEON, Sir J., Isle of Wight
Boundaries of Boroughs, Motion for a Committee, 428
Boundary, Comm. 279
Turnpike Trusts, 2R. 1727

Slave Bounties

Observations, Question, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth June 4, 1130

Small-pox Hospital Report

Question, Sir J. Clarke Jervoise; Answer,
Lord Robert Montagu June 15, 1561

SMITH, Mr. J. A., Chichester
Mauritius—Condition of, 713
Fever in, 1856

SMITH, Mr. J. B., Stockport
Government of India Act Amendment, Comm.
cl. 1, 1891
Representation of the People (Scotland),
Comm. cl. 3, 843
Weights and Measures (Metric System), 2R.
199

SMOLLETT, Mr. P. B., Dumbartonshire
India—Bank of Bombay—Bengal Agency, 1471
East India Irrigation and Canal Company, 425
Representation of the People (Scotland),
Comm. cl. 8, 862; cl. 9, 960
Spain—Case of the "Tornado," 1563

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The (Sir W. B. BRETT)	STAN
Helston	Att
Boundary, Comm. add. cl. 1442	Rit
County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction), Comm. 167, 168	Sch
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 690, 2175	1
Libel, Comm. 603; cl. 3, 613	STAN
Registration, 2R. 1612
Registration of Voters Act, 377, 379
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. cl. 20, 1596; add. cl. 1759	Afr
Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. 1862	7
	Ans
	Cat
	Occ
	Dip
	Dis
	E
	Eg
SOMERSET, Duke of Artisans' and Labourers' Dwellings, 2R. 909
Contagious Diseases Act, 328
Foreshore and Bed of the Sea, 1834
New Forest—Deer Removal, &c. Act, Motion for a Committee, 694
South Eastern and London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Companies Bill	For
l. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a"	Jap
June 12, 1448	Nes
Amendt. to leave out ("now,") and insert ("this Day Three Months") (The Marquess of Clanricarde); after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn; original Motion agreed to; Bill read 2 ^a , and committed; the Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection	Rus
	Sch
	1
	Ser
	Spa
	Sup
	Tur
	Uni
Spain—Case of the "Tornado" Question, Mr. Smollett; Answer, Lord Stanley
June 16, 1563	STAN
	Alk
	Con
	O Cot
	For Poc
	Reg
	4
	Sea
	STAN
	Aby STIRL Bou
	Rep 44
	Sup
	5
	Stock
	Irel
	Stock
STACPOOLE, Mr. W., Ennis
Army—Brooke, Captain, Case of, 1855	c. Read
Supply—Houses of Parliament, 809	Com
	Read
	2. Read
Stamp Duty on the Transfer of Debenture Stock	Read
Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 8, 1227	Com
	Read
	Roya

STONE, Mr. W. H., Portsmouth
Boundary, Comm. 275

STOPFORD, Mr. S. G., Northamptonshire, N.
Boundary, Comm. Preamble, 1271
Boundary Commission, Report, 1181

STRADBROKE, Earl of
Courts of Justice, New, 1842
Poor Relief, Comm. cl. 9, 1624
Vagrancy—Guildford Union, Motion for Correspondence, 102

STRONGE, Sir J. M., Armagh Co.
Established Church, 1210

STUART, Colonel W., Bedford
Dunstable Road, 1396
Ecclesiastical Titles, 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 1697
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. add. cl. 1804
Supply—Houses of Parliament, 311

STUCLEY, Sir G. S., Barnstaple
Army—Cavalry Uniforms, 1111
Transport of Troops to India, 1111

SULLIVAN, Mr. E., Mallow
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 1585 ; add. cl. 1769, 1785

SUPPLY

Considered in Committee May 11, 34—NAVY ESTIMATES—Resolutions reported May 12
Considered in Committee May 14, 290—NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE—ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION—Class I.—Public Works and Buildings—Resolutions reported May 15
Considered in Committee May 15—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Class I.—Public Works and Buildings, 391—Resolutions reported May 18
Considered in Committee May 18—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Class III.—Law and Justice, 494—Resolutions reported May, 19
Vote on Account of Civil Service Estimates, Observations, Mr. Solater-Booth May 28, 1010
Considered in Committee May 28—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Resolutions reported May 29 Considered in Committee May 29—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Class III.—Law and Justice, 1103
Resolutions [May 29] reported June 4
Resolution 7 (Register House, Edinburgh) ; short debate thereon June 4, 1175 Resolution 11 (Government Prisons and Expenses of Transportation) ; short debate thereon June 4, 1176
Resolutions agreed to
The Approaching Dissolution, Questions, Mr. Childers, Mr. Lowe ; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 4, 1126
Considered in Committee June 4—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Class IV.—Education, Science, and Art—Class VII. Miscellaneous Estimates, 1132

Supply—cont.

Resolutions [June 4] reported ; short debate thereon June 15, 1602
Vote 8 (£511,324, Public Education in Great Britain) ; after short debate, Resolution agreed to June 15, 1607
Vote 25 (£19,377, Miscellaneous Expenses) ; Resolution read a second time June 15, 1608 Amendt. to leave out “£19,337,” and insert “£14,877” (Mr. Lusk) ; after short debate, Question, “That ‘£19,377,’ stand part of the Resolution,” put, and agreed to Resolution agreed to
The Dissolution, Question, Mr. Childers ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 8, 1223 Considered in Committee June 25—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Class VI.—Superannuation and Retired Allowances—Class V.—Colonial, Consular, and Foreign Services—POST OFFICE PACKET SERVICE—Resolutions reported June 26

SURTEES, Mr. C. FREVILLE-, Durham, S.
Boundary, Comm. Schedule, 1443
Egypt—Claims on the Viceroy, 924

SURTEES, Mr. H. E., Hertfordshire
East Worcestershire Election, 1123

SYKES, Colonel W. H., Aberdeen City
Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions, Res. 546, 547
Elementary Education, 2R. 2011
Government of India Act Amendment, 2R. 1599 ; Comm. 1877 ; cl. 1, 1887, 1891
Governor General of India, 2R. 1602
India—Municipal Commissioners of Bombay, 1754
Japan—Outrages in, 922
Land Writs Registration (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1528
Navy Estimates—Wages, Amendt. 88, 92
Parliament—Dissolution of, 1076
Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 13, 1933
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm. 470 ; cl. 3, 849 ; cl. 8, 874, 890, 892 ; cl. 10, 986, 987 ; add. cl. 1247, 1250
Slave Bounties, 1130
Supply—Common Law Courts (Ireland), 1104
Consular Establishments Abroad, 2171, 2172
Education, Public, 1154
Government Prisons, 1106
Learned Societies, Grants to, 1133
Parliament, Houses of, 306, 310
Science and Art, 1167, 1170
Slaves, Bounties on, 2170

SYNAN, Mr. E. J., Limerick Co.

Burials (Ireland), Comm. 1380
Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 757, 761
Military at Elections (Ireland), 2R. 1981
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm. 1579 ; cl. 18, 1589, 1594 ; add. cl. 1769, 1779, 1794

TAUNTON, Lord

Ritual, Reports of the Commission on, 335
Sea Fisheries, Comm. cl. 5, 240
South Coast Railways, 2R. 1459

TAYLOR, Mr. P. A., Leicester

Burial Societies, Frauds upon, 920
Eyre, Ex-Governor, and his Expenses, 1477
Ireland—Religion of Convicts, 423
Queensland—Polynesian Labourers, 816

TEMPLETON, Viscount

Contagious Diseases Act, 326

Tenure (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]

(The Marquess of Clanricarde)

1. Report * May 28 (Nos. 23-150)

Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement (Loans) Act Amendment Bill (Mr. Selater-Booth, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 21 [Bill 183]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) June 5, 1212;
after short debate, [House counted out]
Read 2^o * June 9
Committee *; Report June 11
Considered * June 12
Read 3^o * June 15
1. Read 1^o * (The Lord Clinton) June 16
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
(The Lord Clinton) June 23, 1917; Bill read 2^o (No. 152)

The Queen, Her Majesty

Notice, Mr. Bearden; Reply, Mr. Speaker
May 28, 711

THYNNE, Lord H. F., Wiltshire, S.

Established Church (Ireland), 1R. 322

TIRE, Mr. W., Bath

Metropolis—Iron Gates in Devonshire Place,
&c. 243
Thames Embankment, 341
Thames Embankment, &c. Amendment, 2R.
1217

Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland)

Bill (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir Graham Montgomery)

c. Committee *; Report June 4 [Bill 151]

TORRENS, Mr. W. T. McCullagh, Finsbury

Parliament—Public Business, 1130

TOTTENHAM, Colonel C. G., New Ross

Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 18, 1590

TOWNSEND, Marquess of

Poor, Relief of the, Address for a Commission, 1452

Transubstantiation—Declaration

Amendt. on Committee of Supply leave out from "That" and add laid before this House, a Copy of ration against Transubstantiation by the Sovereign of this Realm Parliament or at his Coronation shall first happen after his Access (Colman O'Loghlen), 1098; Question the words, &c.;" after short debate
withdrawn

TREVELYAN, Mr. G. O., Tynemouth

Army—Sale and Purchase of C
Res. 514, 545, 578
Cattle, Importation of Foreign, 424

TREVOR, Lord A. E. Hill, Don

Party Processions Act (Ireland), 15
Revenue Officers Disabilities Remo
Motion for Adjournment, 1538

TRURO, Lord

Windsor, Volunteer Review at, 154

Turkey

Brigandage near Smyrna, Question
Answer, Lord Stanley May 29, 1
Embassy House at Constantinople
Mr. Otway; Answer, Mr. S
June 18, 1753; Question, Mr.
swer, Mr. Selater-Booth, &c.

Turnpike Acts Continuance, &

(Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary)
c. Question, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen
Mr. Gathorne Hardy May 28, 95
Ordered; read 1^o * May 29
Read 2^o * June 8

Turnpike Trusts Act—Dunstable

Question, Colonel W. Stuart; A Gathorne Hardy June 11, 1396

Turnpike Trusts Bill

(Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, Mr. George Goldney, Mr. Ayrton)

- c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read Knatchbull-Hugessen) June 17, 1 Amendt. to leave out "now," and this day three months" (Mr.
Question, "That now, &c.;" at bate, Amendt. and Motion with withdrawn

Unclaimed Prize Money (India)

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir James)
c. Ordered * May 14
Read 1^o * May 18
Read 2^o * May 21
Committee *; Report May 22
Read 3^o * May 25
1. Read 1^o * (The Lord Clinton) May
Read 2^o * June 15
Committee *; Report June 18
Read 3^o * June 19
Royal Assent June 25 [31 & 32 V]

Uniformity of Public Worship Bill [H.L.]
(The Earl of Shaftesbury)

1. Presented ; read 1st June 23 (No. 173)

United Parishes (Scotland) Bill
(The Lord Colonsay)

1. Read 2nd May 12 (No. 84)
Committee* ; Report May 19
Read 3rd May 22
Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 80]

United States

Iron Clads, Question, Lord John Hay ; Answer,
Lord Stanley May 21, 655
Postal Convention, Question, Mr. Baxter ;
Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth June 25, 2132

University Elections (Voting Papers) Bill
(Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Ordered ; read 1st June 24 [Bill 187]
Read 2nd June 25

University Tests

Petitions presented (The Earl of Kimberley) ; debate thereon May 29, 1012

Vagrant Act Amendment Bill

(Mr. Pease, Mr. Akroyd, Mr. Liddell)

c. Committee*—R.P. May 19 [Bill 102]
Committee* ; Report May 21
Considered* May 28
Read 3rd May 29
1. Read 1st (The Duke of Cleveland) June 9
(No. 138)

VANCE, Mr. J., Armagh City

Burials (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 1381, 1382, 1383
Ecclesiastical Titles, 2R. 1696
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 2180
Established Church (Ireland), Leave, 319 ;
Consid. Amendt. 1529
Military at Elections (Ireland), 2R. 172, 175
Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 3, 1584 ; cl. 18, 1591, 1594 ; add. cl. 1779,
1781, 1789 ; Consid. add. cl. 1899, 1901,
1902, 1904
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 882
Supply—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, 2169

VAUX OF HARROWDEN, Lord

Sale of Poisons and Pharmacy, Comm. 1555

VERNER, Mr. E. W., Lisburn

Edinburgh, Duke of, Attempted Assassination
of, 1230
Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 764
Representation of the People (Ireland), Consid.
add. cl. 1901

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham

Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions, Res.
557
Army Reserve, Motion for a Commission, 1959

VERNEY, Sir H.—cont.

Lake Superior and the Pacific, &c. Motion for a Commission, 1336, 1350
Ministerial Statement, 645
Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 12, Amendt. 1933
Supply—Prosecutions, 499

Victoria, Despatches from Governor

Question, Sir Roundell Palmer ; Answer, Mr.
Adderley May 26, 925
Vote to Sir Charles Darling, Question, Sir
Robert Collier ; Answer, Mr. Adderley
June 11, 1397

VIVIAN, Hon. Captain J. C. W., Truro

Abyssinian Expedition, 716
Army—Brooke, Captain, Case of, 1855
Army—Sale and Purchase of Commissions,
Res. Amendt. 533
Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 16, 1940

VIVIAN, Mr. H. H., Glamorganshire

Mines, Accidents in, 1506

Volunteer Review at Windsor

Question, Lord Truro ; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury June 15, 1557 ; Question, Lord
Elcho ; Answer, Mr. Disraeli June 15, 1566

Voters in Disfranchised Boroughs Bill

(Mr. Kekewich, Mr. Jardine, Mr. Alfred Seymour)

c. Ordered ; read 1st May 20 [Bill 128]
Read 2nd May 25
Committee* ; Report June 10
Considered* June 11
Read 3rd June 15
1. Read 1st (The Lord Chancellor) June 16
Read 2nd June 23 (No. 158)
Committee* ; Report June 25

WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE, Hon. G., Hastings

Boundary, Comm. 284 ;—Amended Plans, 1230
Courts of Justice, New, 1563
Land Writs Registration (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 1, 1525
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
add. cl. Amendt. 1238
Ritual Question, The, 112
Sea Fisheries, Lords' Amendts. 1861
Supply—Register House (Edinburgh), Report, 1175

WALKER, Major G. G., Dumfriesshire

Army Reserve and Militia Reserve, 512

WALPOLE, Right Hon. S. H., Cambridge University

Boundaries of Boroughs, Report, 1044
Boundary, Comm. 284 ; Preamble, 1263
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
Elections, Comm. cl. 5, 691
Oxford and Cambridge Universities, 2R.
Amendt. 220
Public Schools, Re-comm. 1648 ; cl. 1, 1649 ;
cl. 2, 1650 ; cl. 3, 1654 ; cl. 5, 1657 ; cl. 6,
1926, 1927, 1930, 1931, 1932 ; cl. 12, 1933 ;
cl. 15, 1939 ; cl. 16, 1940
Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 878, 884

WALBOND, Mr. J. W., Tiverton

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
cl. 8, 879

Stone, Police Sergeant, Case of, 1489

WARREN, Right Hon. R. R. (Attorney General for Ireland), Dublin University

Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 775

Libel, Comm. 601

Representation of the People (Ireland), Comm.
cl. 8, 1585; add. cl. 1776, 1779

Water Supply Bill

(Mr. Clive, Mr. Goldney, Mr. Neale, Mr. Wyld)

c. Ordered; read 1st May 21 [Bill 181]

WATKIN, Mr. E. W., Stockport

Boundary, Comm. cl. 6, 1441; Schedule, 1443

Ceylon—Crops in, 1755

Unauthorized Publication of a Despatch, 1015

Supply—Metropolitan Police, Motion for Ad-jourment, 504

Weights and Measures (Metric System)

Bill (Mr. Ewart, Mr. Basley, Mr. Baines, Mr. John Benjamin Smith, Mr. Graves)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2nd" (*Mr.
Ewart*) May 13, 176

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Beresford Hope);
after debate, Question, "That 'now,' &c.;"

A. 217, N. 65; M. 152; Bill read 2nd [Bill 44]
Bill withdrawn June 18

Wellington, Monument to the Duke of

Question, Mr. Goldsmid; Answer, Lord John Manners May 19, 512

West Indies Bill

(Mr. Adderley, Mr. Selater-Booth)

c. Ordered; read 1st May 19 [Bill 124]

Read 2nd May 21

Committee; Report May 22

Considered May 25

Read 3rd May 28

l. Read 1st (The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos) May 29 (No. 135)

WESTMEATH, Marquess of

Poor Relief, Report, 1743, 1744

WHALEY, Mr. G. H., Peterborough

Agriculture, Motion for a Committee, 580

Coal Mines, 1085

Established Church (Ireland), 2R. 766

Libel, Comm. 599; cl. 1, 605, 607; cl. 3, 611, 617

Parliament, Dissolution of, 1065 [cont.]

WHALEY, Mr. G. H.—cont.

Riots at Ashton, Staleybridge, &c.
830, 1042, 1085, 1086, 1092, 1093,
Supply—Common Law Courts (Ireland)
Government Prisons, 1107
Legal Charges (Ireland), 1104

WHARNCLIFFE, Lord

South Coast Railways, 2R. 1451

WHITBREAD, Mr. S., Bedford

Boundary, Comm. Preamble, 1291, 1;
Public Schools, Re-comm. cl. 6, 1931
Representation of the People (Scotland)
440

WHITE, Mr. J., Brighton

Public Accounts, Res. 124

Representation of the People (Scotland)
add. cl. 1445

WHITWORTH, Mr. B., Drogheda

Representation of the People (Ireland)
cl. 18, 1891

WICKLOW, Earl of

Sea Fisheries, Comm. cl. 5, 233

WILLIAMS, Colonel T. P., Marlo

Army Reserve, Motion for a Commis-

WILLIAMSON, Sir H., Durham, N

Boundary, Comm. cl. 4, 1424

WINTERBOTHAM, Mr. H. S. P., S

Oxford and Cambridge Universities,

WYLD, Mr. J., Bodmin

Turkey—Brigandage near Smyrna, 1

WYNDHAM, Hon. P. S., Cumberla

Boundary, Comm. Preamble, 1281

Illegal Publications, 512

Ministerial Statement, 623

Representation of the People (Scotland)
cl. 10, 985; Schedule A, 1254

YORK, Archbishop of

Army Chaplains, Comm. 1387, 1389

YORKE, Mr. J. R., Tewkesbury

Boundaries of Boroughs, Comm. 431
439

Representation of the People (Scotland)
458, 954; cl. 10, Amendt. 982;
tion for Adjournment, 1009

YOUNG, Mr. G., Wigton, &c.

Representation of the People (Scotland)
cl. 3, 430, 481, 493, 847, 851, 84 986

ERRATUM:

Page 503, line 20 from bottom, for unopposed Vote, read opposed Vote.

END OF VOLUME CXCLII., AND THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION

LONDON: CORNELIUS BUCK, PRINTER, 23, PATERNOSTER ROW.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

3 9015 02788 2904

